UPON the heels of this victory, he received advice of the Hunns having broken into the northern provinces of his empire; upon which he was obliged to return with his whole army into Perſia, whence he happily expelled thoſe barbarous invaders. While Cavades was thus employed, things on the frontiers went not altogether ſo well, tho' not at all leſs honourably for the Perſians. After the departure of the army, the Romans in ſeveral bodies drew nearer to Amida, in order to ſtreighten its garriſon, and to prevent its receiving proviſions. They likewiſe found means to betray Glones the Perſian commander into an ambuſcade, wherein himſelf and two hundred horſe were cut to pieces. This was not only a very unfortunate accident for the garriſon, in point of the loſs they ſuſtained of their governor and a fifth part of their forces, but it was alſo fatal in its conſequences, by reaſon of its reſtraining them from making any excurſions, in order to fill their magazines. The command devolved upon the ſon of Glones, a young man but an excellent officer, and one who acquired a greater reputation by loſing this city, than his maſter had done by gaining it. After a long blockade, in which, though the Romans did little, the Perſians ſuffered much, being conſtrained to feed on the vileſt and moſt nauſeous things to ſatisfy their hunger, while the proviſions in their magazines remained untouched, in order to ſerve another purpoſe, hopes of ſuccour being loſt, the governor entered into a treaty with the Romans for the delivery of the city. During this treaty large diſtributions were made from the magazines; whence the Roman officers conceiving that the beſieged had ſtill plenty of proviſions, they

y agreed to let the garriſon march out, and to carry th them all that they had, giving alſo to the governor a ſum of money for ſurrendering a place, which in a few s muſt have fallen into their hands, with all that was it. Some time after a truce for ſeven years was concluded between the Romans and Perſians, and hoſtages given both ſides for its being duly kept, which afforded Cades leiſure to purſue his wars againſt the Hunns [z] (Q)

(Q) While Cavades made uſe of the peace ſubſiſting between n and the Romans to carry on war on his oppoſite frontier, order effectually to quell the barbarous nations inhabiting on t ſide, the Greek writers tell us, that there happened an nt, which effectually reconciled this prince to the chriſtians, whom hitherto he had not only been averſe, but even an en enemy. Of this remarkable event we have the following ount. Cavades came with his army before a certain caſtle on frontiers of India, called Tzudader. This was filled with menſe riches of all ſorts, and kept by a garriſon, not of men, t of evil ſpirits. Cavades employed to no purpoſe his own gi, the prieſts of the Jews, and other religious perſons in rciſing this infernal guard. At length the chriſtian biſhop dertook and effected what the king deſired; for he expelled dæmons, and delivered the caſtle, with all its riches, to vades. Henceforwards the chriſtian biſhops had acceſs to the g, and, when their preſence was neceſſary, were called to ncil, inſtead of the Jewiſh and Manichean prieſts, who till n had enjoyed his favour. There is ſuch an air of fable in relation, that we could not think of inſerting it in our text; yet, as it is to be found in more than one Greek author, we not think fit to paſs it over in ſilence (49).

the laws of Perſia, he was incapable of reigning. Choſroes very much reſembled his father in temper, fierce, warlike, and ambitious; he was continually contriving great things, and addreſſed himſelf with as much diligence to atchieve them, as with facility he had planned them in his head. On this young prince Cavades repoſed his hopes, and being deſirous to eſtabliſh him in a more glorious ſituation than any of his predeceſſors, he entered into a negotiation with Juſtin, who had ſucceeded Anaſtaſius in the empire, in order to induce him to adopt Choſroes. At firſt this motion was well entertained at Conſtantinople, but by degrees the emperor was perſuaded that it might be injurous to his family and his ſubjects, which determined him againſt it. However, commiſſioners met on both ſides, to treat of a laſting peace, and to ſettle the boundaries of the two empires. For this important buſineſs, Cavades made choice of Seſoſes, whom he had raiſed to the principal offices in his kingdom, and Mebodes, a military officer of great experience. On the other hand, the emperor Juſtin ſent Hypatius, the nephew of his predeceſſor, and Rufinus, a man of great quality. After frequent conferences, diſputes aroſe; and it being propoſed to adopt Choſroes in a new and particular manner as a barbarian, that prince conceived ſuch a diſpleaſure thereat, as induced him to manifeſt an irreconcileable hatred to the Romans. The conferences being broken off, Mebodes, at their return to court, charged Seſoſes with having contributed to the miſcarriage of their negotiation. He was likewiſe accuſed for burying his wife contrary to the law of Perſia, whereby all dead bodies were expoſed to the fowls of the air. On theſe pretences he was tried and adjudged worthy of death. Cavades expreſſed a mighty ſorrow for his friend, but was grown ſo tender of the laws that he would not hinder their courſe. In this manner died Seſoſes, and with him that high office, which had been created on purpoſe to gratify his pretenſions [a].

Breaks with the Romans afreſh.

JUSTINIAN having ſucceeded Juſtin in the empire of the eaſt, purſued alſo his politics, in cauſing all the frontiers towards Perſia to be ſurveyed, the old fortreſſes repaired and new ones erected, as the ſituation of the country required. With this view he ſent inſtructions to thoſe who commanded on the frontiers of Meſopotamia to fortify Mindon the nearest place in the Roman territories to Nisibis; and a body of troops, under the command of Cutzes and Buzes brothers, were sent to protect the workmen. The Persians, who could not look but with an evil eye on the progress of this structure, just in their neighbourhood, took a proper opportunity, when the Roman forces did not observe exact discipline, to fall upon them; and, after defeating, cut most of them to pieces, together with many of the workmen, demolished the place, and sent the prisoners into Persia, where Cavades employed them in his buildings. This stroke opened a new war, for the carrying on of which the Persians took the field with a very numerous army under the command of Peroses, who had under him several generals of reputation. On the other hand, Belisarius had the command of the Roman forces. After some preparatory motions, the armies came to a general engagement, in which, after a very obstinate resistance, the Persians were defeated with very great slaughter. Yet the Romans gained little ground by this victory; for the Persian generals, being supplied with fresh forces, continued to keep the field; only they contented themselves with slight excursions, and did not pretend to give the Romans battle a second time [b].

Carries on the war with indifferent success.

In Armenia things went no better; for Mermeroes, who commanded the Persian forces in chief, was twice defeated by Doritheus the Roman general. Two castles, and certain districts dependent upon them, fell also under the power of the Romans, and in these districts were the gold mines belonging to the king of Persia. The Tzani, a free and barbarous people, were the chief occasion of these losses; for they now embraced the party of the Romans, and, in consequence thereof, possessed themselves of the gold which belonged to the Persian king; at which the Romans were not ill pleased, and Cavades was constrained to be content, his forces not being numerous enough to reduce them; besides, his generals, Narses and Aratius, deserted, and, with all their families and much wealth, retired to Constantinople. This situation of things did not at all discourage Cavades, who, when Rufinus, the Roman embassador, came to treat with him of peace, adhered to his first demands; and when the embassador had his audience of leave, insinuated to him, that if ever he departed from them, it must be in consideration of a large sum ſum of money. To reſtore the luſtre of his arms, he ſet ſe veral new armies on foot, diſgraced Peroſes, and gave th command of the army, which he intended to ſend into th Roman territories, to Azarethas, a very valiant man, an who well underſtood the duty of his charge. This gener made an irruption into the country bordering on the Eu phrates, and, finding himſelf ſuperior in force to Beliſarius waſted all before him with fire and ſword. The Roma ſoldiery ſaw this with indignation, and, notwithſtanding th viſible diſparity of numbers and other diſadvantages, clamo rouſly urged Beliſarius to give the enemy battle; he declined it as long as he could; but at length, by the near approach of the enemy, and the obſtinacy of his own troops, was for ced to fight. The Perſian general knew exactly the advan tages he had, and improved them to the utmoſt, ſo that the Romans were defeated with very great ſlaughter. However, Beliſarius, with the remains of his army, ſo well covered the country, that the Perſians were not able to take a ny place of importance; for which Azarethas, on his re turn to court, notwithſtanding his victory, fell into diſ grace [c].

Makes another peace.

THE war ſtill continuing, Mermeroes had the command of the Perſian army given him; and as Beliſarius was re called in order to be employed againſt the Vandals, he found it not ſo difficult a matter to deal with his ſucceſſors; but, af ter deceiving the Roman generals by certain marches and counter-marches, he at laſt inveſted the city of Martyropolis, a place of the laſt importance to the Roman empire, and in ſight of their armies carried on the ſiege in form. Sittas, who commanded for the emperor Juſtinian, finding that himſelf and his collegues were able to do little good by force; began with better ſucceſs to practiſe ſome of the frauds of war; for having found a perſon fit for his purpoſe, and ha ving thoroughly taught him his leſſon, he ſent him into the Perſian army, where coming privately to Mermeroes, he ac quainted him, that the Maſſagetæ, whom Cavades had hi red to fall into the Roman territories, had accepted a ſum of money from Juſtinian, and were on the point of invading Perſia. This greatly intimidated Mermeroes, engaged him firſt to turn his ſiege into a blockade, and afterwards to conſent to a truce with the Romans; which was the reaſon tha that the Maſſagetæ, who remained firm to the Perſian intereſt, made only a ſhort incurſion, and returned without doing much good to themſelves, or hurt to the Romans [d].

In the mean time Cavades, who was oppreſſed with years, and whoſe activity had drawn upon him in his declining age many infirmities, began to feel the approach of death (R). Upon this he ſent for Mebodes, his confident and miniſter, to whom having explained the reaſons, why he deſired to have Choſroes for his ſucceſſor, he put his will, which contained the ſame things, into his hands, conjuring him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to ſee it executed; which Mebodes then ſolemnly promiſed, and afterwards punctually performed.

(R) It is evident from this part of the Perſian hiſtory, which is more entertaining and fuller of events, than the foregoing, that this people were at this time not only numerous and warlike, but prudent alſo and polite. The Roman authors, for ſo after the oriental cuſtom we call thoſe who treat of the Roman empire, are not fond of owning this; but affect to attribute all the ſucceſs of the Perſians to their vaſt armies, their ſudden incurſions, and the little reſpect which their monarchs had to treaties and to oaths. One thing, however, is certain, that the Roman emperors paid conſtantly certain ſubſidies to the Perſian kings: and this ſeems to be a very ſtrong proof of the proweſs of thoſe monarchs, ſince it was not the cuſtom of thoſe times to pay ſubſidies for nothing. This was one of the great cauſes of the wars which ſo frequently happened between theſe empires. As often as the Roman empire was in diſorder, or had a pacific prince upon the throne, the Perſian received theſe ſubſidies; but when the Romans were in a good condition, or a martial prince was at their head, then they were ſtopped, and of courſe the Perſians began their incurſions, till either they were beaten by the Roman armies, or bought off again with Roman money. On the other hand, it muſt be owned, that when ambitious and turbulent princes wore the Perſian diadem, ſcarce any thing could content them. They knew well, that the Conſtantinopolitan empire could not for any length of time ſupport a war with Perſia, becauſe of the immenſe expence to which it was put, by keeping a great army on the frontiers. Whenever therefore one of theſe princes wanted money, he began a war, and as ſoon as the Romans would come up to his price, he ſold them a peace. Hitherto we have explained the Perſian hiſtory and chronology; we intend this note as a key to their politics.

formed. Thus died Cavades, after reigning thirty years from the time of his reſtoration, forty-one in the whole, and forty-five, if we take in the time of his impriſonment and exile. As ſoon as he was expired, Caoſes, his eldeſt ſon, took upon him the title of king; but Mebodes interpoſed, repreſenting, that the crown of Perſia was never to be taken by ſtealth; that an aſſembly of the nobles was neceſſary to recognize his title, and that until this was done, his ſubjects could not lawfully obey him. Upon this an aſſembly was called, but whether by Caoſes or Mebodes, does not appear. In this aſſembly the will of the king was produced and read, and ſuch a regard was paid by the nobility to his memory, that the claim of Caoſes was ſet aſide, and Choſroes, in virtue of his father's deſignation, declared monarch of Perſia [e] (S)

(S) Moſt of the Greek hiſtorians are ſilent as to the reaſons which induced Cavades ſo vehemently to oppoſe the ſucceſſion of his eldeſt ſon. It appears from what Procopius ſays, that it was not any ſudden fit of anger, or the effect of the peeviſhneſs of old age, but a ſettled reſolution, which he had taken many years before (50). We are obliged to Theophanes for unravelling in ſome meaſure this myſtery, ſince from him we learn, that Cavades was jealous of the Manichees, who were in great favour with this ſon, and who were ſuppoſed to have drawn him to their party; for which great numbers of them, together with their biſhop, ſuffered death (51). We are likewiſe told elſewhere, that theſe heretics, having once drawn Caoſes to favour them, were next very impatient to hoiſt him to the throne, even before the death of his father; which intrigues of theirs were fatal to them and to him; to them, in drawing on a perſecution, which they might otherwiſe have avoided: to him, in that it deprived him of his birth-right, as well as that of his father's affection. It is very probable, that theſe ſchemes were chiefly in the heads of the Manichees and their prieſts, and that Caoſes had very little, if any, knowledge of them; for if it had been otherwiſe, it will be difficult to aſſign a cauſe why he eſcaped, or at leaſt how he came to remain ſtill in the kingdom, nay even at court, and in a condition to appear as a competitor with Choſroes on the death of his father. It has alſo the appearance of reaſon, that the true ground of rejecting him and

CHOSROES, being ſettled on the Perſian throne, quickly received an embaſſy from Juſtinian, compoſed of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, at the head of whom was Rufinus. The intent of this embaſſy was not only to compliment the king on his acceſſion, but alſo to treat of peace. Choſroes, who was a prince of quick parts, received the firſt kindly, and entered readily into the ſecond; but when they came to adjuſt the articles of the peace, then it was he diſcovered his true intention, by inſiſting, that a ſum of money ſhould be given him; that the pretenſions of the Perſians and Romans ſhould be thoroughly canvaſſed and finally ſettled; all places taken on either ſide reſtored, and this peace declared to be perpetual. Some delays happened in the negotiations, and a report being ſpread that Juſtinian had put Rufinus to death, who, at the requeſt of the Perſian king, had returned to Conſtantinople for inſtructions, Choſroes inſtantly took the field with a mighty army, which ſtruck ſuch a terror, that the inhabitants began to retire from the villages in all the frontier provinces, ſuppoſing that the war would become more bloody than ever. But, before Choſroes proceeded to hoſtilities, Rufinus arrived and perfected of exalting Choſroes was, the diffidence the nobility might have of him as to his religion. For it appears from the hiſtory of Agathias, that the magi had not only a great influence in all affairs civil and eccleſiaſtical, but that in the recognition of kings eſpecially, they had a ſort of negative voice. Agathias, and indeed all the Greek writers, cenſure this influence in terms, that ſhew that they did not underſtand it (52). The Perſian magi did not interfere as clergymen, but as men of learning and experience. Politics was with them a ſcience, not learned, as amongſt us, by a long obſervance of events, but by contemplations of certain maxims, and by acquiring a ſkill of applying theſe to the management of public affairs. It is not our buſineſs here to enter into any farther detail of this matter, which we mentioned only to prevent the reader's being tinged with the prejudice of the Greeks. He who would be further acquainted with this curious ſubject, may conſult the learned book of the preſident Briſſon; as alſo the no leſs learned and curious treatiſe of the celebrated lord Bacon, written in the imitation of the magical policy of the Perſians.

fected the treaty; whereupon the Perſians retired, and the inhabitants of the frontier provinces returned to their habitations [f].

Diſcovers and defeats a conſpiracy againſt him.

THE morning of this great prince's reign, like that of his father, was not only darkened with flying clouds, but its luſtre in danger of being totally obſcured. The Perſian nobles, perceiving that Choſroes had much in him of the ſame ſpirit which had made Cavades terrible to his ſubjects, when he aſcended the throne, determined amongſt themſelves to procure their own ſafety at the expence of the king's, by depoſing him, and ſetting up in his ſtead one more tractable. This was Zames the brother of Choſroes. The law incapacitated him from being king, but they had a ſalvo for that; he had a ſon whoſe name was Cavades, who was extremely like his grandfather; him they intended to proclaim king, and to veſt the regal authority in Zames, as his tutor and protector. Into this ſcheme, when it was communicated to Zames, he readily came, and promiſed the conſpirators to act in all things according to their councils. As Choſroes made it a rule throughout his life to ſpare no money for intelligence, ſo it was not long before he was informed of all theſe machinations. He ſuffered them, however, to go on, that he might by this means diſcover who were, and who were not, devoted to his ſervice; for as he had the troops entirely at his devotion, and knew every ſtep his enemies took, he was not in any great pain for his own ſafety. When things grew ripe for execution, he ſeized the conſpirators at once, and had no ſooner ſeized them, than he put them to death. His executions were as wide as the conſpiracy; he had no idea of reconciling traitors; but every man, who had the leaſt ſhare therein, or the leaſt knowledge thereof, paid for it with his life [g].

The hiſtory of Cavades the younger.

THE young Cavades alone eſcaped, and eſcaped only by accident. He was not in the king's power immediately, being brought up by Adergudunbades, to whom therefore Choſroes diſpatched orders to put him out of the way. This extremely grieved the good old man, who had educated him as carefully as if he had been his own ſon; but the royal orders and the royal ſafety were things not to be trifled with. But when he came to acquaint his wife with the command command he had received from court, ſhe who had nurſed Cavades, forgot all concerns, but for his ſafety; and as her huſband was naturally inclined to pity the unfortunate child, ſhe prevailed upon him to think of concealing the youth in their houſe, and to diſpatch a meſſenger to court, to inform Choſroes that his orders had been exactly complied with. This was happily executed for Cavades, who thereby eſcaped a death he no way deſerved. It was no leſs prudently conducted by his wife and generous protector, who intruſted none with the ſecret, but his eldeſt ſon and an old ſervant. In proceſs of time, when Cavades was grown to years of diſcretion, Adergudunbades furniſhed him with a conſiderable ſum of money, adviſed him to retire out of Perſia, and to be careful of his ſafety and his own. Some time afterwards Varrhames, this nobleman's eldeſt ſon, diſcovered this ſecret to Choſroes, and produced the ſervant who was privy to it. The king, who was then employed in an expedition againſt the Hunns, ſent inſtantly for Adergudunbades to attend him. That excellent man, being now far in years, fell through weakneſs from his horſe, as he haſtened to attend Choſroes, and broke his thigh. The king, being informed of it, ordered him to be ſent to a certain caſtle, under pretence of taking care of his cure, but in truth to have him privately murdered; which was done, and his office given to his ſon Varrhames (T). As for Cavades, he retired to Conſtantinople, where he was treated by the emperor Juſtinian with all the reſpect due to his birth. We have digreſſed a little, in order to follow ſo remarkable a tranſaction to its cloſe; let us now return to the thread of our hiſtory [h].

As a peace with the Romans was at firſt very convenient to Choſroes, ſo he very faithfully obſerved it; and when he was informed of the victories obtained by Beliſarius, in Africa, he ſent embaſſadors to congratulate Juſtinian thereupon

[h] Procop. ubi ſupra.

(T) This conſpiracy againſt Choſroes was an event remarkably fortunate to him, if we conſider it in a political light. It gave him an opportunity of freeing himſelf from all who were diſaffected to him, and he uſed it without reſerve, ſparing not his own uncle, who had been in the number of the conſpirators. But the moſt cruel of all his actions was, the putting to death this old general, who had been the faithful ſervant of his father, upon; and, by way of raillery, directed them to tell the emperor, that he had a right to ſhare the ſpoils of his enemies, ſince, had he not been at peace with Perſia, he could not have had either forces or leiſure to make theſe conqueſts in Afric. Juſtinian received theſe embaſſadors kindly, aſſured them of his great affection for their maſter, and, on hearing his meſſage, preſented Choſroes with a conſiderable ſum of money. But this fair correſpondence did not laſt long. The Saracens, encouraged by the Perſian king, made ſeveral incurſions into the Roman territories; of which when Juſtinian by his embaſſadors made loud complaints, Choſroes returned for anſwer, that he believed what they alledged was not altogether without foundation; but that

father, and who had ſubdued twelve barbarous nations, and made them tributaries to the Perſians. There ſeems, however, to have been ſome juſtice in giving to his ſon Varrhames the government which Adergudunbades had poſſeſſed. But it is to be obſerved, that the Perſians were extremely ſtrict in two of their maxims, viz. In puniſhing treaſon without mercy, and in preſerving governments in the hands of one family, ſo long as they continued faithful to their ſovereigns. Theſe cuſtoms are ſo oppoſite to ours, that of courſe we have an indifferent opinion of them; but if it be conſidered, that in the eaſt the ſlighteſt diſaffection, if diſregarded, ripens preſently into a general revolt, fatal alike to the perſon and government of the reigning prince, the reaſon of this conduct will be no more a ſecret, nor can we with any colour of juſtice deny, that it is full as juſtifiable as many of our political maxims. As to the other, it is generally ſuppoſed, that it aroſe thus: The Perſian empire, though extremely wide in extent, being no more than an aggregate body of little principalities, ſome united to it for the ſake of protection, and others, after long wars, by capitulations; their princes who were formerly independent, by this means became only governors for the Perſian monarchs, but hereditary governors, with moſt of their old prerogatives, which in caſe of treaſon, however, were forfeited; and this it was which made the children of governors ſo many checks upon their fathers, as appears, not only in the inſtance of Varrhames, but in what we have heretofore read in the conduct of Cavades, who by the ſame policy drew a nobleman to ſacrifice his parent to the preſervation of the family intereſt. We cannot pretend to juſtify ſuch extraordinary tranſactions. All we have to do is, to account for them; and this, we hope, is effectually done (53).

(53) Procop. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. Theophan. Cedren. &c.

that he could ſcarce believe his brother Juſtinian took this amiſs, becauſe they were arts of empire himſelf had taught him, having practiſed, not only on the Saracens, but the Hunns, to invade Perſia, as he could prove by his own letters; ſo that he had only turned his weapons upon him, as he was obliged to do to preſerve his ſubjects. For a time, however, he ſuffered himſelf to be pacified, yet not without making the neceſſary preparations for carrying on the war whenever he thought fit; to this he was principally excited by Vittiges king of the Goths, who ſent an embaſſy on purpoſe to repreſent the formidable power of Juſtinian, and how much it was the intereſt of Choſroes, as well as himſelf, to ſee it reduced. On the heels of this came an application from the Arſacidæ, or petty princes of Armenia. They ſet forth abundance of grievances under which they laboured from the Roman power; they painted the methods taken by Juſtinian for attaining univerſal empire in the ſtrongeſt light, and beſought Choſroes to conſider not ſo much their caſe as his own. This determined the Perſian monarch to break the peace, and to fall upon Juſtinian before he was at leiſure to fall upon him. The ſeaſon of the year did not permit this reſolution to be executed as ſoon as it was formed; but it influenced Choſroes to aſſemble ſuch an amy as might be able to act in the beginning of the ſpring, notwithſtanding he was adviſed of the death of Vittiges, and the abſolute ruin of his kingdom. Juſtinian, being informed of the preparations made in Perſia, found himſelf under a neceſſity of providing for the worſt; yet, not willing to have recourſe immediately to arms, he wrote letters to Choſroes, wherein he deſcribed at large the bad conſequences, which would attend a haſty and unjuſt breach of the peace ſubſiſting between them. To which letters Choſroes, being already fixed in his reſolution, returned no anſwer; but went on with his military preparations, as openly and as vigorouſly, as if there had been a war declared [i].

His great ſucceſs in his firſt war.

In the beginning of the ſpring, Choſroes, at the head of a great army, entered the Roman territories. He did not, as it was generally expected he would, fall into Meſopotamia; but on the contrary, made the provinces of Syria and Cilicia the ſeat of the war. The firſt place of conſequence which he reduced was Sura, ſeated on the Euphrates, a place of great ſtrength, rich, and populous; yet Choſroes quickly maſtered it, rather by fraud than force, and treated the inhabitants very indifferently, notwithſtanding that he married a woman from among the priſoners taken there, for whoſe ſake it might have been expected he would have better treated her country. From hence he moved on, uſing ſeverity where any reſiſtance provoked him, and uſing great clemency towards the inhabitants of ſuch places as readily ſubmitted, impoſing, however, heavy contributions upon all. At length finding no Roman army in the field, he proceeded to Antioch, and encamped in its neighbourhood, on the banks of the river Orontes. Thence he ſent to acquaint the Antiochians, that, if they paid him a large ſum of money, he would ſpare them, and retire from before their city. As it was very ſtrong, its fortifications newly repaired, and a numerous garriſon in it, the mob were ſo elate, that they not only rejected the Perſian monarch's propoſition, but alſo mal-treated thoſe he ſent, and threw out unmannerly and impudent ſpeeches, againſt Choſroes and his family. This irritated him ſo far, that, quite contrary to his intention, he inveſted the place, and, againſt the ordinary rules of war and even the dictates of reaſon, ſtormed the city, before the walls were at all battered, making uſe of machines to raiſe his ſoldiers againſt them. This was a raſh and deſperate attempt, and notwithſtanding the preſence of Choſroes, who did all that man could do to encourage his ſoldiers, they were beaten off with a miſerable ſlaughter. When they returned to the charge, a worſe accident happened; for the beſieged, encouraged by their former ſucceſs, attacked thoſe who had the keeping of the machines, and having cut the ropes and chains which held them, precipitated them and all who were upon them from the top of the walls over the craggy mountains, on which they were erected, into the diſtant plain underneath. This proved the deſtruction of the city; for the dreadful noiſe of the rolling machines, and the horrid cries of the dying ſoldiers, being heard in the city, and the cauſe not known, the garriſon cauſed the gates to be thrown open, ſuppoſing the walls on the other ſide had fallen down, and, without ſtaying for better information, haſtily riding over women and children, they abandoned the place. Thoſe on the walls

ſeeing this apprehended, that the Perſians had made ſome other attack, and thereupon quitted their poſt, to retire into the market-place. Choſroes did not neglect ſo fair an opportunity; but, drawing freſh forces out of his camp, ſcaled the undefended walls, and, after a bloody ſtruggle in the market-place, inflicted all the ſeverities that could be expected from an incenſed enemy on the miſerable inhabitants of Antioch. Soon after this, and while the Perſian army ſtill remained at Antioch, came embaſſadors from Juſtinian, to expoſtulate with Choſroes on this breach of peace, and to treat of an accommodation. The Perſian monarch received them with much civility; he heard them patiently, and ſeemed to pay a great regard to what they ſaid. When they had done ſpeaking, he began to anſwer them with tears in his eyes; he made a more pathetic deſcription of the miſeries induced by the war, than they had done: he declared it was with the utmoſt reluctance he had taken arms; that he was, in a manner compelled to it by the nobility of Perſia, who could no longer ſee, with patience, Juſtinian ſtiring up enemies againſt them on every ſide, and encouraging his ſubjects to treat them, on all occaſions, with outrageous contempt. He delivered all this with ſuch a ſolemn ſadneſs in his countenance, with ſuch vehement geſtures, and with expreſſions ſo calculated to ſtir the paſſions, that the embaſſadors were quite confounded, openly confeſſing, that the elcquence of Choſroes was more dreadful to the Romans than his arms. In the end, however, he began to intimate, that a conſiderable ſum of money in hand and an annual tribute would ſend him back into Perſia, and fix the peace between the empires. As the embaſſadors demurred a little upon this, Choſroes, to quicken them, burnt the city of Antioch to the ground, and not long after concluded a peace very advantageous to himſelf, as well as very ignominious to the Romans. However, he did not even keep this; but, burning with a miſtaken deſire of accumulating wealth, went on taking city after city, and raiſed contributions where-ever he came. He did not indeed pretend to keep, but, on the contrary, ſlighted all the places he took, after he had extorted what he could from the inhabitants; but, by this means, he alarmed and terrified the Romans, raiſed the courage of the Perſians, and filled his coffers. The laſt city he beſieged was Dara, a place of mighty importance, and which he was very deſirous of having in his power;

but whether he intended to keep or demoliſh it, is uncertain. The citizens, however, weighing within themſelves the treatment which other people had received from the Perſians, and conſidering alſo the ſtrength and advantageous ſituation of the place, determined to defend themſelves to the utmoſt; in which they ſucceeded ſo well, that Choſroes, finding his troops fatigued, his forces diminiſhed, and the ſeaſon far advanced, raiſed the ſiege, and returned, loaded with wealth, into his own territories [k].

Drives the Romans out of Colchis.

As he had now anſwered all the ends he propoſed in the war, he was well enough inclined to let peace take place; to which end he endeavoured to renew the negotiations, and to eſtabliſh things on the plan of a treaty he had concluded. But Juſtinian, by this time, had quite altered his opinion; and, having recalled Beliſarius, determined to make the Perſians feel the weight of the Roman power, ſince, without it, there ſeemed no probability of preſerving peace for any length of time (V). (V) The hiſtory of all theſe wars, treaties and diſputes between the Romans and Perſians, are to be found at large in Procopius, who wrote expreſly on this topic, who had himſelf a perfect knowledge of all theſe tranſactions, and as little partiality for his countrymen, as is to be found in any Greek writer. From thence we might indeed have taken much more than we have done; but then this part of our hiſtory would have exceeded its natural ſize; for it is one thing to uſe memoirs, and another to tranſcribe them; and therefore we have endeavoured to reduce what we have taken from Procopius within ſuch bounds, as might ſuit it to this hiſtory. In this note, however, we ſhall attempt to explain ſome particulars in the text, which need illuſtration. We have followed Procopius cautiouſly in what he ſays of the diſſimulation and inſatiable ambition of Choſroes; and for this reaſon. We find in all the Greek hiſtorians, and in Procopius himſelf, that the Perſian king pretended to be compelled to act in the manner he did, by the formidable power of Juſtinian, and by the attempts he had made to the prejudice of his empire, both in his own days, and thoſe of his father. Now, if this charge was true, either in whole, or in part, then was Choſroes more or leſs culpable in his conduct. But tho' Procopius, in his memoirs of the Perſian war, ſeems war was now ſuddenly transferred to Colchis, much to the diſadvantage of the Romans, and yet entirely through their own management. This region was at that time inhabited by the Lazi, a rude and barbarous people; but who had notwithſtanding, for a long courſe of years, adhered ſteadily to the Roman intereſt. This they did merely out of choice, the Romans having never ſubdued them; for the princes of this country obſerving, that by the ſituation of their dominions, they ſhould, ſome time or other, be reduced, either under the power of the Perſian kings, or of the emperors of Conſtantinople, conceived it to be alike for their own and their ſubjects good, to demand the protection of the latter; which was readily granted them, without prejudice, however, to their liberties; for they were neither charged with any taxes, nor obliged to admit any new magiſtrates as a conquered people. The emperor of the eaſt, however, on the death of any of their princes, appointed his ſucceſſor, and thereby manifeſted a kind of ſuperiority, rather honourable, than of any great conſequence. But the emperor Juſtinian, having thoroughly conſidered the importance of that diſtrict which thoſe people inhabited, and which, as it lay upon what is called the Black-ſea, was a kind of frontier to his empire, and, at the ſame time, covered his metropolis; moved therefore ſeems generally to excuſe the emperor his maſter; yet, in his Anecdotes, he plainly confeſſes, that Juſtinian was a prince boundleſs in his ambition, and who acted under no very ſtrict ties of conſcience; yet, as this piece hath the air of a ſatire, we ought not to give full credit to it, but rather believe on the whole that each of theſe princes had different qualities; that there were faults on both ſides, and that their ſubjects ſuffered through the reſtleſs and unquiet tempers of their governors. As to the complaints of the Armenian princes, they were, in all probability, pretty well founded; but, in order to diſcover this, we muſt remember who theſe princes were. In the foregoing period, we have ſhewn how the Arſacidæ, after loſing the Parthian empire, came to be contented with ſmall principalities in Armenia, where they ſometimes pretended to be independent, ſometimes ſubmitted to the Perſians, and ſometimes again choſe the emperors of Conſtantinople for their protectors: no wonder then, that they were ſeldom perfectly eaſy, or that under ſo ambitious a prince as Juſtinian, they were anxious for thoſe ſhadows of ſovereignty, which they ſtill preſerved (54).

(54) Procop. Evagr. Theophan. Zonar. &c.

therefore with the apprehenſion of the conſequences that might follow, if this nation ſhould, at any time, prove unfaithful, he reſolved to make ſome further proviſion for his ſecurity on that ſide. To this end he recommended it to one Tzibus, whom he named a prince of the Lazi, to build a city, well fortified and ſecured by a ſtrong citadel, on the ſhore of the Euxine ſea, that it might be a check on the Lazi, if they ſhould be at any time inclined to revolt. This commiſſion Tzibus very faithfully executed, his countrymen aſſiſting him to the utmoſt of their power, rejoicing to behold ſo large and fine a city built in their country at the expence of the Romans; but when they found to what end it was erected, and ſaw that Tzibus had received into it a Roman garriſon, they began to be quite of another opinion; and thus all the pains and expence employed about this city and fortreſs, turned to no other account than producing that very effect, which they were erected to prevent; for the Lazi inſtantly diſpatched their deputies into Perſia, to invite Choſroes to their aſſiſtance. This they did in the name of Gabazes, the greateſt of their princes, who beſought him to take under his protection a free people, whom Juſtinian was about to enſlave. There wanted not much entreaty to induce ſo enterprizing a monarch to undertake an expedition ſo viſibly for his ſervice. He therefore cloſed ſpeedily with the propoſal of the deputies; and having given out, that the Huns were about to invade the frontiers of his kingdom, he ſuddenly aſſembled a great army, with which he marched towards Iberia; but turning ſhort when it was leaſt expected, he entered Colchis, through a thick, and, till then, impenetrable foreſt, which he cauſed to be cut down before him. As ſoon as he deſcended into the plain country, Gabazes met and paid his compliments to him, acknowledged him for his ſovereign, and joining his army with a conſiderable reinforcement, they marched together towards Petra. Tzibus, with the Roman garriſon, made at firſt a gallant defence; but finding at laſt, that the place would be infallibly taken, they made their eſcape by ſea, and left to the enemy not only the city and fortreſs, but alſo all the treaſures and valuable merchandize, which had been laid up therein [1].

Beliſarius checks his ſucceſs.

WHILE Choſroes was victorious on this ſide, the Roman general Beliſarius aſſembled an army and laid ſiege to Niſi-

Niſibis; but to little purpoſe, for Nabades, the Perſian governor, made ſo firm a defence and ſo many vigorous ſallies, that Beliſarius was, in a ſhort time, obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and, to conſole himſelf for that misfortune, to march farther into Perſia, where ravaging the country, taking ſome inconſiderable places, and carrying off ſome ſpoil, he ſent advice to Conſtantinople, that he had triumphed over the Perſians, tho', in fact, his expedition was rather honourable than advantageous, the enemy having no army in the field. As ſoon as Choſroes had intelligence of this incurſion, he made all imaginable haſte back again into Perſia with his army, that he might, early the next year, be ready to return the Romans this favour, by an irruption into their dominions. This he accordingly performed, and having waſted a great part of the frontier country, and raiſed vaſt contributions, he at laſt entered Comagene, intending to march from thence into Paleſtine, there to ſack and plunder the city of Jeruſalem. And in this deſign, if we conſider the terror and confuſion of theRomans, we muſt allow that he had a fair proſpect of ſucceſs; but Beliſarius, having, with incredible diligence, poſted quite athwart the empire to the banks of the Euphrates, there unexpectedly aſſembled an army, which checked the progreſs of Choſroes, and forced him to have recourſe to his old method of negotiating, ſince nothing was to be got by force. Another reaſon concurred to drive Choſroes home into Perſia; for the peſtilence, which had waſted Egypt, paſſing over into Aſia, made ſuch an havock in the Roman territories, that the Perſian king retired haſtily out of Aſſyria, and directed his march towards the north. At firſt the Romans conceived, they were entirely rid of this formidable enemy; but it quickly appeared, that their hopes were vain; for having recruited his army in the northern provinces, he began to diſcover his true deſign, which was to fall into Armenia. Juſtinian, being informed of this, ordered an army to aſſemble on that ſide, and ſent likewiſe embaſſadors to endeavour, by all means, to engage Choſroes to think of peace [m].

His general Nabades beats the Romans under Narses.

In the mean time, Narses, being appointed general of the Roman forces, and finding the Persians not yet in the field, determined to make himself master of Anglon, a little town, but of great strength; in which Nabades, a Persian general, had taken up his quarters, with four thousand men. Full of this conquest, he marched, against the advice of many of his officers, with the utmost diligence to reach the place. When he drew near it, he sent out parties to make prisoners; and these reporting that Nabades was retired, Narses, reproaching his officers with timidity, pushed on to take possession of the place. The van-guard of the Roman army consisted of a body of the Heruli, lightly armed. These entering the skirts of Anglon, and perceiving the Persian troops regularly drawn up and ready to charge them, broke, even before they were attacked, and fled. The Persians made the best use of this advantage, following them close at the heels; and charging the Roman forces vigorously, disordered them also, and soon after compelled them to a plain flight, in which numbers were slain, and more would have been slain, if the Persians had not been apprehensive of the ill consequences that might attend their pursuing them too far. With this action ended that campaign; for Chosroes, having changed his views, did not endeavour to penetrate any farther on that side; and the Romans, taught by their misfortunes, forbore also the siege of this place[n].

Chosroes shamefully repulsed at Edessa.

The next year Chosroes made his fourth expedition into the Roman territories, and, if we may credit Procopius, upon a very extraordinary account. He had, in his first expedition, besieged the city of Edessa, and, tho' he had taken much stronger and more considerable places, was constrained to raise that siege. This was said to be owing to the particular favour of Jesus Christ to that city, whose letter to their prince Abgarus was inscribed over the principal gate of the place. This report so irritated Chosroes, that he made this expedition, not so much against the Romans, or against Justinian, as against the God of the christians, who had been said to have driven him from Edessa. His army was very numerous; and it is certain, that tho' he might have done many things more for his glory and the advantage of the Persian empire, yet he chose, after ravaging the open country, to encamp in the the neighbourhood of Edeſſa. In that camp, however, having either formed ſome new project, or doubting of the event of this, he ſent deputies to demand of the inhabitants of Edeſſa a large ſum of money; which if immediately paid him, he offered to turn his arms another way. But as what he demanded was not in their power to yield unto, Choſroes was forced to carry his firſt deſign into execution, tho' now againſt his will. We have, in the memoirs of Procopius, a long and circumſtantial account of this ſiege, which was by far the warmeſt that any Roman city had ſuſtained; and after all, tho' it was not either ſuccoured or relieved, the vigorous defence made by its citizens ſo diminiſhed the Perſian army, that, as the ſeaſon advanced, Choſroes loſt all hopes, and was compelled, notwithſtanding the boaſt he had made, of turning Edeſſa into ſheep-cotes and placing all its inhabitants in the heart of Perſia, ſhamefully to raiſe the ſiege and retire into his own dominions (X). Thither he was quickly followed by the Roman embaſſadors, whom, as he had often done before, he drew into an inſidious treaty, more deſtructive to their maſter than an open war [o].

[o] THINGS

(X) As to the miracle which was wrought at the ſiege of Edeſſa, it makes a great figure, as well in the memoirs of Procopius, as in the writings of eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians. As it is a fact which very nearly concerns the Perſian hiſtory, we might juſtly have been cenſured with want of exactneſs, had we omitted it; and therefore we choſe to give it place in a note, in which we ſhall relate it, as we find it recorded in the hiſtory of Evagrius. There was an old report, that Chriſt had promiſed to Abgarus king of Edeſſa, that that city ſhould be inexpugnable. It is true, that no ſuch promiſe appears in the letter ſaid to have been written by Chriſt to Abgarus, and which is printed at large in the hiſtory of Euſebius; but, not withſtanding that, the report ſpread of this prophecy was believed, and ſome extraordinary deliverances which the city had met with contributed to keep up its credit. To deſtroy this report, and thereby to wound, as he apprehended, the honour of the chriſtian religion, Choſroes ſat down before this place. When all the attempts he had made to induce the people to ſurrender had failed, and his forces had been repulſed in ſeveral aſſaults, he at length de-

The Colchian war concluded by a general peace.

THINGS, however, did not remain long in this ſituation: Choſroes was too ſtirring a prince to indulge his neighbours with much quiet. He had diſcovered, that his new ſubjects the Lazi were become already diſaffected; and, upon examining the reaſons, he found cauſe to apprehend, that their diſcontents were ſuch as could never be removed. The country they inhabited ſtood in need of corn, of ſalt, and of wine. With theſe, on account of the badneſs of the roads, they could not well be furniſhed from Perſia; whereas the Romans eaſily ſupplied them by ſea and at a moderate price, which preſerved an intimacy between the nations. On the other hand, the Lazi, who were zealous chriſtians, endeavoured to convert the Perſians who dwelt among them; by which means they became obnoxious to the magi, who did not fail to inſinuate termined to enter upon a laborious and troubleſome undertaking; which he did, however, the more patiently, becauſe he made no queſtion that by it he ſhould effect his purpoſe. He ordered his ſoldiers to cut down a vaſt quantity of timber, with which he began to erect a mount over-againſt the town-walls; to which when it was become equal in height, his view was, by the help of engines, to make a bridge of communication, over which he might paſs as great a part of his army as he pleaſed into the place. The inhabitants of Edeſſa, perceiving the drift of this deſign, inſtantly began to undermine the new raiſed work, in hopes they might be able to ſet it on fire; but when they had done this, they found their labour loſt, not being able to make the fire burn for want of air, a circumſtance they had not before conſidered. This put them to their wits, and at laſt they bethought themſelves of the miraculous print of our Saviour's face, which he ſent to their king Abgarus and was preſerved in their church. This they brought into their mine, poured water over it, and then this water upon the fire and the wood, which inſtantly lighted and burnt intenſely. Then, to prevent the enemy from apprehending whence the ſmoak came, they threw all ſorts of fire-works from the walls. After three days, however, the Perſians perceived, that the very heart of their mount was conſumed. Choſroes ordered water to be poured upon it in vaſt quantities; but when it was obſerved, that, inſtead of ſlackening, it encreaſed the fire, as much as if ſo much oil had been thrown thereon, he in deſpair ſuffered the mount to burn on; and, having ſent away his baggage, demoliſhed his works and raiſed the ſiege (55).

innſiuate, that difference in religion would everlaſtingly hinder them from being good ſubjects to the Perſian crown. Choſroes thereupon formed â project of tranſporting them from their own country of Colchis into the heart of Perſia, and to ſettle a colony of Perſians in their ſtead. Previous, however, to the execution of this grand project, he determined to build a navy in the port of Petra, which might be able to guard the coaſts, and prevent too ſtrict an intercourſe between theLazi and the inhabitants of theRoman provinces; but knowing that this could not be accompliſhed, if the people were timely appriſed thereof, he cauſed great quantities of timber to be ſent to Petra, under pretence of repairing the fortifications and conſtructing military machines, However, Gubazes king of the Lazi, taking offence at theſe preparations and doubting the ſafety of his perſon, beſought the protection of the Romans. This was quickly afforded him, and the emperor Juſtinian immediately diſpatched a conſiderable army to his relief. This army was commanded by Dagiſtheus, a young man very indifferently ſkilled in the art of war. Gubazes kept his word; for as ſoon as the Roman forces appeared, he joined them, and compelled the Perſians to ſhut themſelves up in Petra, the only fortified place in the kingdom. The reduction of this place therefore was the ſole point in queſtion; for this once effected, the war was at end. Gubazes quickly inveſted it on one ſide, as the Romans did on the other, to whom Gubazes moſt pathetically recommended the cuſtody of the ſtreights called Chiſuræ, through which only the Perſians, if they ſent an army, could enter, if they attempted the relief of Petra. The Roman general, having viewed theſe difficult paſſages, conceived them to be ſo ſtrong in their nature, that he left but a hundred men to guard them. As ſoon as Choſroes was informed of this ſtrange turn in his affairs, and that Petra was blocked up, he ordered Mermeroes, one of the beſt officers in Perſia, to march with an army to its relief. This took up a great deal of time, and in this ſpace the Perſian garriſon was reduced to the laſt extremity; nay, the Romans actually entered the city, and might have taken it, if the governor of the citadel had not drawn them into a treaty for rendering that fortreſs, at the ſame time with the city, into their hands. Mermeroes, from the time he entered Colchis with his army, directed his march according to his own private intelligence, avoiding any correſpondence with the Lazi, who pretended to be in the Perſian intereſt;

ſo that he arrived at the mouth of the Chiſuræ before he was at all expected; and finding how ſmall a guard the Roman general had left there, he cauſed it to be attacked again and again, till, with the loſs of a thouſand men, he carried the paſs, and then, without halting, marched directly to Petra. There he found, of five thouſand men, only nine hundred remaining, and of theſe three hundred and fifty diſabled. The dead dodies they had piled up againſt the narrow walls of the citadel, that the Romans might not be acquainted with their loſs, and from thence he encouraged to ſtorm the place. The Romans conceived that this was but a ſlight reprieve, the walls being every-where broken, and the place, as it were, in ruins; Mermeroes, however, repaired it in the beſt manner he was able, and when he had ſo done and left a freſh garriſon in it, he withdrew his troops from thence, having made a truce with the Lazi, though the Roman forces ſtill continued the war. When the place was put into a ſtate of defence, Mermeroes drew his troops towards Iberia, whence he hoped to receive ſuch ſupplies of proviſions, as might be neceſſary for the occaſions of his own army, as well as of Petra. Here encamping with a rapid river behind him, he conceived his forces to be in ſafety. But it ſo happened, that Gabazes deviſed a method of paſſing this river, and having informed the Romans thereof, and alſo furniſhed them with bridges, they fell upon the Perſian army, and made a dreadful ſlaughter. Mermeroes, however, repaired this miſtake, by encamping more cautiouſly for the future, and ſo kept the war alive, notwithſtanding the great diſadvantages he laboured under. It would oblige us to carry this hiſtory into an extraordinary length, if we ſhould relate all that paſſed in this Colchian war, of which we have very large memoirs in Procopius and Agathias. We ſhall content ourſelves therefore with obſerving, that in the end the Romans were ſucceſsful, by reaſon of their having the empire of the ſea, which enabled them to ſupply heir armies with proviſions and recruits, as often as they ſtood in need of them; whereas the Perſians were obliged to make long and fatiguing marches by land; and to bring all their proviſions in carriages. Mermeroes, ſo long as he lived, preſerved the ſuperiority of the Perſian power, and a little before his death gave the Romans a ſignal defeat; but his ſucceſſor Nachoraganus, a raſh and haughty general, fell as far ſhort of him in his performances, as in his boaſting promiſes he ſurpaſſed him. His ill conduct was one of the great cauſes of the ſucceſs of the Romans; and therefore Choſroes, on his return into Perſia, ordered him to be flayed alive; and perceiving that his affairs were in a declining condition on this ſide, reſolved to make peace with the Romans. With this view he ſent an embaſſador to the court of Juſtinian, who received him graciouſly, and entered readily into a treaty with his maſter, whereby it was provided, that each party ſhould keep what they were poſſeſſed of in Colchis at the time of its concluſion; and thus the Lazi were deprived of their liberties, by calling in their too powerful neighbours, Gubazes having been aſſaſſinated ſometime before, who was extremely careful of his ſubjects, and who, in all the changes of his fortune, conſtantly ſought their good [p] (Y).

(Y) The hiſtory of the Colchian war hath, as we noted in the text, employed the pens of many eminent writers. Procopius, in the ſecond book of his memoirs of the wars with the Perſians, enters into a long detail of the cauſes, why the Conſtantinopolitan emperors on the one hand, and the Perſian monarchs on the other, were ſo ſolicitious to maintain themſelves in the poſſeſſion of this country. He alſo proſecutes the account of the military expeditions on both ſides, till ſuch time as Mermeroes was firſt obliged to retire into Iberia (56). Agathias, who continued the hiſtory of Procopius, reſumes the thread here, and deſcribes at large all that happened afterwards in this country, till the concluſion of the peace between the Romans and the Perſians. To him we owe the character of the Perſian general before-mentioned. Mermeroes, ſays he, was of all the Perſian officers the moſt diſtinguiſhed for his thorough underſtanding of the art of war. He died full of years and glory, after having for a long ſpace of time entirely loſt the uſe of his limbs, ſo that he was carried up and down in a litter; yet was he ſo dreadful to the Romans, that they never thought themſelves in any ſecurity, while he was at the head of the Perſian troops (57). The curious reader, who will take the pains of peruſing the authors I have mentioned, will plainly perceive, that the art of war was at this time extremely well underſtood, as it appears alſo the art of negotiating muſt have

Choſroes makes war on the Romans afreſh with ſucceſs

TOWARDS the end of the reign of Juſtinian, Choſroes fell ſick of a dangerous diſtemper; and depending more on the ſkill of the Roman phyſicians than his own, he requeſted, that ſome ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople, which demand of his was readily complied with. On the acceſſion, however, of the emperor Juſtin, new troubles aroſe. The inhabitants of the Greater Armenia, who were ſubjects to the king of Perſia, were by this time become generally chriſtians; and therefore rather inclined to put themſelves under the protection of the Romans, to which Juſtin raſhly conſented; and having privately encouraged them to revolt, the Armenians, under the command of Varamus, one of their petty princes, ſuddenly took arms, and, having murdered all the Perſians amongſt them, declared themſelves allies and dependents of the emperor of Conſtantinople. Choſroes immediately complained of this, and the emperor Juſtin pretended to colour his conduct by his zeal for the chriſtian religion; and being deceived by the intelligence which the biſhop of Niſibis ſent him, gave orders to his general Marcian to enter the Perſian territories with an army, and to lay ſiege to that city, which was accordingly done. The Perſian governor, incenſed at the folly and raſhneſs of the action, did not ſo much as ſhut the gates, but contented himſelf with relieving the guards at them twice a day, the Roman army being ſcarce numerous enough to inveſt the place. In the mean time Choſroes paſſed the Euphrates, and marched directly towards Niſibis, having firſt made a great detachment under Adermanes, who laid waſte have been, ſince the conferences for bringing this treaty of partition to a concluſion afforded matter for the fourth book of Menander's hiſtory of embaſſies. Of this we have yet an abſtract remaining, wherein the principal arguments made uſe of on both ſides, the characters of the Roman and Perſian plenipotentiaries are elegantly deſcribed, and the heads of the treaty, which conſiſted of ten articles, are briefly ſet down; but yet with ſuch clearneſs, as demonſtrates the ſkill of the politicians in thoſe times, not to have been inferior to thoſe who have been moſt famous for this kind of ſcience in ſucceding ages (58). We ſhould have inſerted ſome quotations from thoſe valuable pieces, if we had not been apprehenſive of extending the hiſtory of this period to far; but we could not avoid writing this note, to ſhew the careleſſneſs of the former writers of the Perſian hiſtory, who have ſlipped over all theſe things, as if the accounts of them had been buried in utter oblivion.

waſte the Roman provinces with fire and ſword. The Roman army before Niſibis, being diſſatisfied with the emperor's meaſures and his changing their commander, ſuddenly, and without any reaſon given, broke up, and retired the beſt way they could; whereupon Choſroes, finding no body in the field to reſiſt him, took and ſacked all the great cities in Meſopotamia and Syria, and gave the plunder to his ſoldiers. He alſo beſieged and reduced Dara, a fortreſs that had always been a curb upon his ſubjects, and in the fortifying of whch the emperor Juſtinian had expended vaſt ſums. Into this place he put a great garriſon, knowing its importance, and reſolving to make uſe of it for a barrier againſt its old maſters (Z). But while he was meditating now exploits, Trajan, a ſenator of Rome, preſented to him letters from the empreſs Sopha, her huſband Juſtin being run mad. In theſe letters

(Z) We are obliged to Evagrius for the hiſtory of this war, which he ſeems to have writen very candidly, ſince it is plain enough from his relation, that hoſtilities were begun by the emperor Juſtin, without any juſt grounds, and that, notwithſtanding the complaints of Choſroes, he refuſed to deſiſt from the meaſures he had taken to gratify his ambition. There is, however, juſt cauſe to believe, that he was a little diſordered in his ſenſes, even before this war. During the time it was carried on, nothing could be more wild than his conduct. He fancied all the little advantages that were gained, before the Perſians well knew that the Romans were their enemies, ſo many victories. He commanded his general to lay ſiege to Niſibis with a ſmall army, badly furniſhed with proviſions; and being informed by the biſhop of Antioch, that his affairs in the eaſt took a very bad turn, he diſpatched Acaces, an ignorant and aſſuming man, to demand of his general the keys of Niſibis, as if fortune had been ſubject to his commands. This man executing the orders of his maſter with the ſame temper, that is, with the ſame ſtupidity with which he gave them, the conſequence was, that the army were afraid to truſt either their new general or their diſtracted emperor, and therefore retired the beſt way they could. John the ſon of Timoſtrates yielded up Dara, either through fear, or from a worſe motive; and Choſroes, as ſoon as he was maſter of it, put part of the inhabitants to the ſword, made the reſt priſoners, and, having diſpoſed of every thing as he thought fit in the place, put a ſtrong garriſon therein, it being held the beſt fortreſs in all that part of the world. Choſroes alſo treated all the frontier provinces in the empire with great ſeverity, aſſigning the emperor's breach of faith for a reaſon; for, it ſeems, he could not bear with the empress pathetically described the misery of the Roma empire, beseeching Chosroes to remember the kindness of former emperors, particularly the sending him physicians, the incertainty of all worldly greatness, and the little glory that wold result to him from conquests, made from a headless nation and a helpless woman. Chosroes, having read the letters, immediately withdrew with his troops from the frontiers of the Roman empire, consenting to a truce for three years, Armenia, however, being excluded [q].

Refuses to make a peace, and is miserably beaten.

THIS respite was very favourable to the Romans, who quickly saw their affairs absolutely re-established by the diligence and prosperous success of Tiberius, the successor of Justin. He was not only an active and vigilant prince and one of a martial disposition, but a person well skilled in the art of war, and a horse-officer of great experience. The first thing he did was to put the cavalry in better order than they had ever been before, knowing that the eastern provinces of the empire were better defended by them than by foot; and as he found the treasury full, through the extortions of his predecessors, it was no hard matter to make quick levies, especially for one so well acquainted with discipline. Chosroes, who had not the least suspicion of these mighty changes, prepared early the next spring to enter Armenia, resolving to penetrate Cappadocia, and to make himself master of Cæsarea, and such other cities in those parts as were of any consideration. The Roman emperor, foreseeing the consequences of such an irruption, sent embassadors to persuade Chosroes from this expedition, and to engage him to make a solid and lasting peace; but at the same time that he sent these embassadors, he dispatched Justinian with directions to assemble all the forces in the eastern provinces, in order, if it was necessary, to repel force by force. When the Roman embassadors came into the camp of Chosroes, he was so far from receiving them as he was wont, that he refused to give them any audience, commanding them to follow him to Cæsarea, where he should be with patience that sort of behaviour from others, which he was himself but too apt to exercise. This, however, was the last fortunate campaign he made, and indeed his conquests therein were of very great importance (59).

(59) Evagr. hist. ecclesiast. lib. iv. c. 7—13.

be at leisure to hear them. Not long after he was informed, that the Roman army was at no great distance, and that they designed to give him battle. He looked upon this as an act of rashness in them, and as an accident favourable to himself; and therefore continued his march with the utmost expedition, that he might not lose this advantage. But when he drew near them, and saw their cavalry extremely numerous, disposed in excellent order, and the soldiers eager to engage, he fetched a deep sigh, shewing by the heaviness of his countenance how very much his mind was affected by this disappointment. On this account therefore he would, in all probability, have retired into some covenient camp, instead of fighting immediately; if Curtius a Scythian, who commanded the right wing of the Roman army, had not charged the left of the Persians, where Chosroes was in person. The combat was sharp and bloody, but in the end the Persians were beaten, the royal treasure and the sacred fire, before which the king worshipped, taken in his sight. In all probability, things would have gone still worse, had not the night come on, which gave the Persians an opportunity of retiring. The next night, or rather evening, Chosroes having intelligence that the Romans were encamped in two separate bodies, he fell upon one of them at midnight, and routed them effectually with a prodigious slaughter, and having taken and set a village on fire that was behind their camp, he marched directly to the Euphrates, that, by repassing that river, he might winter in his own dominions. But Justinian the Roman general, penetrating his design, followed him so closely, that he was himself forced to pass the river on an elephant, and many of those who were immediately about him were drowned. After this the Romans wintered for the first time in the Persian provinces, and Chosroes, retiring to Seleucia, was so much affected therewith, that, he broke his heart, when he had reigned forty-eight years. This is the account which most of the Greek writers have given us, and the collectors of general history have followed them without scruple; yet there is just reason to believe, that this narration is wide of the truth, and therefore we take the liberty of subjoining what we apprehend comes nearer it[r]. Chosroes did indeed die of discontent, but not so hastily as most of the Greek writers aſſert; on the contrary, he lingered on till the following ſpring, and actually ſaw a treaty brought to a concluſion, which he had begun with the emperor Tiberius, ſo that he had a proſpect of leaving his kingdom in peace. Of this he was the more deſirous, on account of the mighty diſorders occaſioned by the depredations daily commited by the Roman veſſels in the Caſpian ſea, as alſo from the mutinous behaviour of his ſoldiers and general diſcontent of the Perſians, too prone to murmur when fortune was againſt their princes (A). Choſroes,

(A) We have more than once obſerved, that the Greek writers are exceſſively partial, and we have more than once commended Agathias Scholaſticus for digreſſing from the cuſtom of his country in this particular. However, with regard to Choſroes, who was his cotemporary, and with whoſe character he had many and great opportunities of being fully acquainted, he is at leaſt as faulty as any of the Greek writers; and, with a ſort of abſurd malice, firſt relates the excellent things ſaid of that monarch, by thoſe who were perfectly well acquainted with him, and then endeavours to deſtroy their characters, as well as that of Choſroes, by a number of weak, as well as ill-natured, reflections (60). Procopius, who had ſtill better opportunities of knowing the true character of this prince than Agathias, could have treated him in a quite different manner; for he every-where magniſies his ablities, though he ſometimes bears hard upon his morals (61). According to Procopius, Choſroes was a very wiſe, but a very ambitious, prince; according to Agathias, he was very fortunate and very vain-glorious. That the latter was not his true character, may be made appear from facts. His conduct towards the Roman embaſſadors, his harangues, his letters, but above all, his ſucceſs againſt the emperor Juſtinian, are ſo many inconteſtable proofs of his ſkill in the art of reigning. As to his knowledge of war, Agathias himſelf confeſſes it in theſe words. In the field, no man knew better than Choſroes how to contrive; nor did any officer execute his orders with greater alacrity, than Choſroes did his own projects; and what was very wonderful, his activity did not forſake him, even in his old age; but he was as quick, or rather quicker in his laſt campaign, than in his firſt. It was not his reputation, as a ſoldier, that offended Agathias; but he could not bear, that a barbarous prince ſhould be cried up for a philoſopher and a man of letters. This, we ſhall elſewhere ſhew, was, however, a tribute juſtly due to the merit of Choſroes; and when we do ſhew this, it will unqueſtionably prove, that we were not too raſh in cenſuring the veracity of the Greek writers. The eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians fall not at all ſhort in this reſpect

Chosroes, as he had lived, so he died, like a great prince, after enacting, that none of his successors should expose their persons in any general engagement against the Romans, and after giving his son the most wholesome instructions for the government of his people, for the management of foreign wars, and for the conduct of himself [s].

Hormisdas succeeded his father in his dominions, but had neither his abilities nor his fortune. Hasty in his temper, haughty in his behaviour, cruel in his disposition, obstinate in all things, he no sooner put on the diadem, than he proclaimed himself unworthy of it. He was always addicted to a silly curiosity as to future events, and his diviners having suggested to him that his subjects were not well affected, he began to conceive suspicions of most of the great men in the kingdom, and to treat them as if suspicion and conviction was with him the same thing. As to foreign princes he kept no measures with them at all; he never notified his succession to the emperor Tiberius, but left him to learn it from common fame. When that monarch sent embassadors to compliment him and to renew the peace, he treated them disdainfully, and refused to grant their request, unless he had a sum of money given him by way of tribute. A demand, considering the circumstances of things, most unreasonable, and which therefore opened afresh those wounds which had been lately healed up, and equally disposed both Romans and Persians to enter on a new war, and which in the end proved very disadvantageous to both (B). At first the military operations were not Hormildas II.

respect of the authors of civil history. In the present case particularly, Evagrius tells us, that Chosroes died miserably, overborn by sorrow and grief, and covered with infamy, by making the law taken notice of in the text (62).

(B) It is to Theophylact we owe the account given in the text of the character of Hormisdas, and his conduct in the beginning of his reign. This author was an Egyptian by birth, a man of letters, and one who purposed to write of things, which either himself was well acquainted with, or of which he had an authentic account from those who were perfectly well acquainted with them. He begins his memoirs with the succession of the emperor Maurice, by virtue of his predecessor's nomination, of any great conſequence; an action happening near the river Nymphium, in which neither party had any great advantage. The Perſians ſoon after beſieged a fortreſs called Aphumum, and the Romans inveſted another fortreſs called Acbas, which ſiege however, was raiſed by the Perſian general Cardariganus. But when the Roman army had received the recruits from Conſtantinople, and Philippicus, whom the emperor Maurice ſent to command, arrived on the frontiers, the Perſians were obliged to withdraw into the mountains, and leave the open country at the mercy of the enemy. Philippicus gratified his ſoldiers with the plunder of all the places he could take; but the thirſt of ſpoil having drawn them too far into the Perſian dominions, they were in the utmoſt nation, and conſequently a good deal later than the times of which we are now ſpeaking. But in the latter end of his third book, he goes back to the ſucceſſion of Hormiſdas, that the remaining part of his hiſtory might be rendered clear and perſpicuous; which it would not have been, if the death of Choſroes and the character and ſucceſſion of his ſon had not been made known to his readers. He aſſures us, that Hormiſdas was at once a moſt ambitious and the moſt cruel prince that ever held a ſceptre; that he loaded his ſubjects with taxes, at the ſame time that he had no mercy on their perſons; that the ſeverities he was drawn into by his wizzards, were not only exceſſive in their nature, but alſo ſpread incredibly wide, ſince he maſſacred thouſands upon his fooliſh ſuſpicions (63). Evagrius the eccleſiaſtical hiſtorian, who was cotemporary with Hormiſdas, though he mentions him often in his hiſtory, doth not enter ſo particularly into his character, but contents himſelf with ſaying, that he was the moſt unjuſt king the Perſians ever had; and that, not content with exhauſting their fortunes, he invented new tortures to imbitter the deaths of ſuch as he ſuſpected(64). Theophlyact gives us likewiſe the character of Varamus, whoſe rebellion proved ſo fatal to Hormiſdas. He obſerves, that he was a man of great quality, had ſerved for many years in the army, was moſt ſucceſsful in his expeditions againſt the Turks, and by his wiſdom and valour roſe ſo high in the favour of this very prince, that he not only continued him general in chief of his troops, but promoted him alſo to the office of mayor of the palace (65). Theſe particulars would have ſwelled the text of the hiſtory too much, and yet are of too great conſequence to be totally omitted; wherefore we have placed them here.

(63) Theophylact. hiſt. lib. iii. c. 17. p. 85. (64) Evagr. hiſt. eccleſ. lib. vi. c. 16. (65) Theophylact. lib. iii. cap. ult.

utmoſt danger of being vanquiſhed, without ſo much as ſeeing an enemy, for want of water. This prompted them to a very extraordinary action, viz. putting all the men and women they had made priſoners to the ſword, reſerving only the children whom they intended to ſell for ſlaves; but they died in their march, and thereby eſcaped miſeries worſe than death. After this Philippicus was more cautious, and though he plundered other provinces, yet he took care not to march far from cities. The next year he had the command again, and defeated Cardariganus in a pitched battle, from which he eſcaped with a handful of men, rather through the inadvertency of the Romans, than any courage or conduct of his own; and with theſe he fled to Dara, but the citizens ſhut their gates upon him, and the Romans at the cloſe of the campaign again made incurſions into Perſia, burnt the villages, and plundered the people. The next ſpring the Perſians gained ſome advantages, upon which Phillippicus was removed and Comentiolus ſent to command in his place, who managed the war rather worſe. At length Philippicus was ſent to reſtore the antient Roman diſcipline; but the army was ſo far corrupted, that they refuſed to obey their general; but having choſen Germanus againſt his will to command them, they threw off all regards to the orders ſent them from Conſtantinople. The Perſians receiving news of this, attempted to take Martyropolis; but the Romans, under the command of Germanus, having penetrated their deſign, marched directly and gave them battle, whereby they ſaved the city for that time. However, it ſoon after fell into the hands of Mebodes the Perſian general; for he, having an intelligence with Sittas, an architect in the place, by his advice ſent four hundred men thither, who pretended to deſert from the Perſian army, and were thereupon readily admitted. Theſe men, by the direction of him who received them, ſurprized the place; and the Romans making a quick march to revover it, were engaged, and beaten by Mebodes; whereupon Philippicus was again removed and Comentiolus was once more truſted with the army. This man quickly loſt his reputation; for coming to a battle with the Perſians, he fled at the very beginning of it; but Heraclius, who commanded under him, managed things ſo well, that the Perſians were entirely ly defeated with the loss of Aphraates and Nabades, two of their best generals [t].

He by his imprudence excites a civil war.

In the mean time, the Persians were engaged in war with the Turks, now first mentioned by the Greek writers, and under the conduct of Varamus had been very successful. To him therefore orders were sent to pass the river Araxes, and to fall on the Roman territories on that side. To oppose him, the emperor sent Romanus; but before he could assemble an army sufficient to take the field, Varamus had done a great deal of mischief. At length, however, Romanus found himself in a condition to give the Persians battle, which he accordingly did; for Varamus, presuming on his former success, desired nothing more ardently than an engagement. This proved fatal to his masters affairs; for the Persian cavalry being defeated, Varamus, with all his skill, had much ado to make an indifferent retreat. As soon as Hormisdas received advice of this disaster, he gave a signal proof of his small capacity for government. He sent to Varamus, instead of a vest of honour, a woman's garment, and threatened the troops with decimation; this inflamed their general, and united them to his interest. The issue of this business was, that Varamus wrote a letter to his master, in which he used always the feminine gender, as if he had been writing to a female slave, and prepared at the same time to treat him worse. Hormisdas, who began to see his error, sent Sarames a man of great quality, to take upon him the command of the army, ordering him to pacify his soldiers at any rate, and to send him Varamus in chains. This Sarames would have done; but as soon as he arrived in the camp and had declared the nature of his commission, Varamus ordered him to be thrown down from his elephant, and by provoking the beast, caused it to trample him to pieces. He spent the winter preaparing for the execution of his purposes, and at the same time took all the care he could to hinder the progress of the Roman arms. The garrison of Nisibis declared for him, and the malecontents began every-where to commit such disorders, that when Hormisdas was informed of them, and saw how unable he was to repress them, he began almost to lose his wits, breaking out into such furious fits of passion, as frighted all who were near him, and contributed no less to

to encreaſe his misfortunes, than the arts of his enemies. Pherocanes commanded the troops which were ſtill faithful, and he ſeemed inclined to attempt the reducing Varamus to his duty by force; but when the two armies were near each other, Varamus ſent deputies to harangue the king's army, and to inform them that his revolt, far from having any tendency to the deſtruction of the Perſian empire, had no other motive than its conſervation; that Hormiſdas was no longer worthy to rule them; and that he ſought only to bring about ſuch a revolution, as the ill conduct of that prince had made neceſſary for the ſafety of the ſtate. The general himſelf made no anſwer to theſe repreſentations, but the army, eaſily debauched from its duty, began viſibly to waver; ſo that in the night, Zoanab, who, was of the guard to the general, fearing that he would head the defection, ſtabbed him in his tent, and gave the plunder of it to the ſoldiers [u].

Which occaſions his being depoſed, and murdered.

HORMISDAS having intelligence of this fact, and not knowing what conſequences it might have, retired out of Perſia Proper to Cteſiphon, where he kept his court. The people in the mean time revolted in all the royal cities and plundered the palaces, which afforded the nobility an opportunity of reſcuing their relations from priſon; and amongſt thoſe, who were at this time releaſed, was a perſon of the royal blood, whom Hormiſdas for a ſlight offence had loaded with chains, named Bindoes. This man making all the haſte he could to the troops formerly commanded by Pherocanes, was by them readily received for their chief. In three days they reached Cteſiphon, whither they no ſooner came, than Bindoes well attended, entered the royal palace, and forced into the preſence of the king. It was after dinner, and Hormiſdas was ſitting in the hall, clad in his robes of ſtate and with his tiara on his head. As ſoon as he ſaw Bindoes, he aſked him, how he eſcaped out of priſon, and wherefore he came thither? He anſwered by a torrent of injurious language, upbraiding his maſter with his ill conduct, and exciting all who were preſent to reject him from being their king. Hormiſdas ordered ſome of his ſervants, who were preſent, to ſeize Bindoes; but they were afraid to execute his commands. On the other hand, Bindoes taking the king by the arm, drew him out of his chair, took the tiara from off off his head, and ordered some of his soldiers to conduct him to prison; which they did without the least reluctance, though he was their prince. In the midst of this tumult, Chosroes the son of Hormisdas made his escape out of the palace, being apprehensive that his own life was not safe; but Bindoes having intelligence where he was, dispatched a person to assure him, that he was so far from having any intentions against his person, that his design was to set him upon the throne. Upon this Chosroes returned, and they took their measures together; but while they were consulting, Hormisdas sent a message from his prison, requesting, that a great council of the nobility might be called, and that he might have the liberty of speaking to them freely. When the Persian lords were acquainted with this demand, they instantly assembled at the palace, and then ordered, that Hormisdas should be brought from his prison, and have liberty given him to say what he pleased. The king, after looking several times round on the assembly, made a long and vehement speech, in which he deplored his own calamity much, but the misery of the people more, inveighing bitterly against the authors of this anarchy and confusion, exhorting them to save the state from that destruction with which it was threatened, and to beware of establishing a tyranny, while they endeavoured to avoid it. He then adjured them not to think of making Chosroes his successor, because he knew him to be of a haughty, turbulent, and cruel nature, prone to all sorts of vices, and equally careless of his own honour and the public good. His other son, however, he recommended as a young prince of a mild and docible nature, one who was inclined to think right and to do well. Lastly, he entered into a detail of the services he had himself rendered his country, in subduing many provinces, and in reducing several of their barbarous neighbours so low as to pay them tribute. When he had finished all he had to say, Bindoes made a long insulting answer, exhorted the people to have no regard to his words, but to act in such a manner as might best insure their own safety. This language suited well the genius of the people, ever prone either to slavish submission, or to licentious insolence; they followed implicitly the directions of their leader, who caused the young prince Hormisdas had recommended to be murdered in his presence, and afterwards to be cut to pieces. Then they sacrificed the unhappy woman his mother in the same manner; and that fortune might might never reſtore Hiormiſdas to his former dignity, they ordered his eyes to be put out with a hot iron. All which was performed with the ſame ready barbarity with which it was directed. This end had the reign of Hormiſdas, when it had continued one and twenty years [x] (C).

CHOSROES,

[x] Theophylact. lib. iv. c. 6. Theophan. chronogr. p. 223. Evagr. lib. vi. c. 16. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 397.

(C) It is impoſible to read this part of the Perſian hiſtory without emotion. One may ſafely number this among thoſe extraordinary revolutions, which appear but rarely in the records of nations; and when they do, ſtrike the judicious reader with an amazement mixed with horror. The Greek hiſtorian, Theophylact, relates the whole of this extraordinary tranſaction very circumſpectly, and inſerts at large the ſpeeches of Hormiſdas and Bindoes (66). One would be apt to think from the many rhetorical turns which are in them both, but in that of the king's eſpecially, that they were not genuine; but when we find the reſt of the Greek writers, and, which is ſtill more extraordinary, the oriental hiſtorians, putting the ſame words into the ſame perſons mouths, one is conſtrained to baniſh ſuſpicion, and to admit, that one of the moſt excellent harangues that was perhaps ever compoſed, flowed from the mouth of a Perſian prince, in a ſituation, when eloquence would have been leaſt expected. But there ſeems to be ſomething fatal in diſtreſſing majeſty, and that the divine character of kings, like the eſſential qualities of gold, appeareth moſt clearly from the ſevereſt trials. The ſpeech of Hormiſdas, too long to be tranſcribed, but faithfully abridged in the text, proved a ſort of prophecy; for after this ſedition the reader will perceive the Perſians were never quiet. Choſroes was indeed juſt ſuch a king as his father foreſaw he would be, and the people ſuffered from his ill conduct much greater evils, than they had ever felt under this unfortunate prince his father. Authors do not agree about the manner in which Hormiſdas was put to death. Some ſay, that he earneſtly deſired it himſelf, rather than to have his eyes burnt out with a hot iron, which was thought neceſſary to prevent his eſcaping, as Cavades had done (67). Theſe add, that his ſon, provoked by his reproaches, ordered him to be beat to death (68). Others affirm, that Hormiſdas refuſing food, Choſroes directed him to be ſlain (69). However it was,

Chosroes II. Year of Christ, 589.

CHOSROES, as soon as these objects of popular cruelty, were removed, was seated on his father's throne; whence rising up, he came and stood under a golden arch, according to the Persian custom, and having received the homage of the principal persons present, the rest with loud acclamations celebrated the accession of their new king, and made vows for his felicity. At first he treated his father with the utmost lenity, sent him diet from his table, ordered him proper attendants, gave him rich wines, and provided for him many amusements; but this prevailing nothing over the spirit of Hormisdas, who continued to reproach his son with his barbarity and unnatural baseness, Chosroes, doubting what effect his reproaches might have, caused him to be cudgelled to death. Then, supposing himself firmly seated on the throne, he gave sumptuous entertainments, and distributed most profusely the royal treasures amongst those he thought most capable of assisting him; mighty largesses he likewise bestowed upon the people, and ordered the prison doors to be every-where set open, that the fame of his lenity and liberality might effectually secure the hearts of his subjects. On the sixth day after his accession, he wrote letters to Varamus, and sent also magnificent presents, exhorting him to come speedily and pay his duty to him, promising him, in case he did so, to make him the second man in his kingdom. Varamus refused his presents, and in a haughty letter, at the head of which, among a multitude of other titles, he called himself 'the friend of 'God, the glorious conqueror, and the scourge of tyrants,' he rejected his proposal, ordering him to lay down the crown, and to come immediately and pay his respects to him, on which condition he should have a government given him. Chosroes having exhibited these letters to his council, they were extremely provoked, and gave it as their opinions, that he ought to be punished. Chosroes, however, wrote again to him, signifying his apprehension that his secretary had imposed upon him, and written rather his own dreams than what was dictated to him by Varamus, exhorting him by his future conduct to redeem his credit, and not to persist in his design of making his country a field of blood. Varamus, was, the people detested the cruelty of their new king, and he had the mortification to see himself abandoned by those who had lately saluted him with the loudest acclamations. It is probable, that his resentment for this continued with him as long as he reigned.

ramus, however, prepared for war, and Choſroes, ſince it could not be avoided, advanced to meet him. They faced each other near Niſibis, the city being in the power of the king, while Varamus encamped before it. Here a negotiation was begun, but it proved ineffectual; and Choſroes, ſuſpecting ſome of the nobility about him, put them to death without heſitation, which created him many more enemies than it delivered him from; ſo that ſhortly after, when Varamus attacked the ſuburbs, and put part of the army quartered therein to the ſword, the reſt preſently joined him, and ſhewed a ſtrong diſpoſition to treat Choſroes as ill as they had done his father; to avoid which, he fled, as privately as poſſible, exceedingly dejected under his misfortune, and the more ſo, becauſe he had ſcarce any friends to ſhare it with him. His women, menial ſervants, and a few of his guards, about thirty perſons in the whole, fled with him, they knew not where; ſometimes he had thoughts of retiring among the Scythians, at others he hoped to hide himſelf in the mountains [y].

Flies into the Roman territories.

AT length, commiting himſelf and his affairs wholly to providence, he came as it were by accident to a frontier poſt in the Roman dominions, and that too, far in the night. Probus, who commanded there for the emperor, received him, and all who were with him, kindly and courteouſly, permitting the king to write immediately to the Roman general, who as readily conſented to his ſending an expreſs with his letters to the emperor. In theſe he beſought Mauritius, who then poſſeſſed the imperial dignity, to aſſiſt him againſt his rebellious ſubjects, preſerving in the midſt of a moſt pathetic ſupplication all the dignity of a king. While Choſroes was in this diſtreſs, Varamus entered the city of Cteſiphon in great ſplendor. Bindoes he ſeized and threw into poiſon, treating all ſuch as had ſhewn any affection to the royal family with great ſeverity; but towards the reſt of the Perſians, he affected the greateſt humanity and a ſuperabundant condeſcenſion. He did not fail, however, to iſſue his orders for apprehending Choſroes, if it was poſſible; and when he found that all his caution in this reſpect was vain and fruitleſs, he turned his thoughts to the ſecuring of the frontier garriſons and the moſt conſiderable cities in Perſia, in which he had better ſucceſs. He likewiſe gave great feaſts, and very bountifully beſtowed beſtowed that treaſure he had ſo eaſily obtained; yet in the midſt of all this pomp and ſplendor, he ſaw with concern, that the nobility were greatly diſſatisfied, and the people not to be relied on. He could not, however, either extinguiſh or contain the violent deſire he had to be a king. On a religious feſtival therefore, when of courſe there was a grand aſſembly of the nobility at the palace, he took upon him to uſe the royal ornaments and furniture with all the ſtate of a monarch, though he forbore the title with reluctance. The Perſian nobility, ſeeing clearly what he intended, and diſdaining to become the ſubjects of one born their equal, began to cabal together, in order to concert meaſures for emancipating themſelves and their country, and for reſtoring the antient luſtre of the Perſian empire. In their conferences upon this ſubject, it was unanimouſly agreed, that Bindoes was the moſt proper perſon to conduct an affair of this kind; and therefore they immediately delivered him out of priſon, and acknowledged him for their chief. By his advice they came to a reſolution to attack Varamus in the palace in the dead time of the night. This they performed with great courage; but Varamus and his attendants defending themſelves gallantly, the engagement was very obſtinate, and at laſt the nobility were vanquiſhed, many of them being ſlain upon the ſpot, and the reſt thrown to the elephants; only Bindoes, with a few who fought about his perſon, eſcaped, and, marching towards Media, endeavoured to raiſe forces for Choſroes [z].

He enters Perſia in conjunction with the Romans.

AFTER this victory, Varamus thought fit to ſend embaſſadors to court the friendſhip of the Roman emperor Mauritius; but they were ſent back without anſwer, the emperor having already made a treaty with Choſroes, and ordered the governors of his frontier provinces to furniſh him with whatever might be neceſſary for his reſtoration. Theſe timely ſupplies had a proper effect; for the Perſians, ſeeing their king now in a condition to protect them, began almoſt every-where to acknowledge him, and to open their gates to receive his forces. Among the reſt, Niſibis ſubmitted to the king, and Martyropolis was recovered by the Romans, to whom likewiſe Choſroes himſelf delivered Sittas the architect, who had betrayed the place to his father Hormiſdas, for which traiterous act he was burnt alive. On the other hand, hand, Varamus continued to raiſe forces, chuſing rather to hazard all things, in order to make himſelf a prince, than to deſcend again to the condition of a private man. The chriſtian writers ſuggeſt, that Choſroes, during his diſtreſs, ſeemed to abandon the religion of the magi; and not only worſhipped God after the chriſtian manner, but alſo vowed to dedicate a croſs of pure gold in the church of a certain martyr, in caſe he proved victorious againſt his enemy. Zadeſpras, one of Varamus's commanders, having attempted to enter the quarters of one of the lords who had declared for Choſroes, was defeated and put to death, and his head, and the ſpoils of his army, ſent to the king. The ſame fate had Anathonus very ſhortly after, of which Choſroes adviſed the emperor his protector by Sarames, one of the principal lords of his party; by whom likewiſe he ſignified, that Comentiolus was very backward in aſſiſting him in the recovery of his dominions; whereupon the emperor ſent an order, forbidding that general to meddle any more in the king of Perſia's affairs, appointing at the ſame time Narſes to have the command of the Roman auxiliaries, deſtined to the ſervice of the Perſian king [a].

THIS was very grateful to Choſroes, who early the next ſpring, with his own forces, and thoſe lent him by the emperor, under the command of Narſes, marched into Perſia with an intent to decide the war at once. Moſt of the frontier places on his approach ſurendered to Choſroes, as did the great and ſtrong city of Dara, formerly the chief bulwark of the Romans on this ſide. Choſroes, in teſtimony of his ſincere gratitude and cordial affection towards the emperor Mauritius, determined to deliver it into his hands. About the ſame time, the Perſian king received from his protector a tiara, richly ſet with jewels, golden houſhold utenſils of all ſorts, and a choſen guard to attend upon his perſon. When the emperor learned that Dara was given up to him, he was ſo well pleaſed with the conduct of Choſroes, that he honoured him with the title of his ſon. In the mean time the Perſians, in great multitudes, quitted the ſervice of Varamus, and went to ſerve under the banners of their prince, who now ſought to bring Varamus to a battle. Before this could could be brought to paſs, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened, and among the reſt one, in which Beyzacius, a great officer in the army of Varamus, was taken priſoner; and, after his noſe and ears were cut off, brought to their king by the Perſians, by whoſe command he was ſoon after put to death. A ſhort ſpace after, Seleucia and moſt of the great cities near the river Euphrates ſubmitted to the king, and Varamus was forced to retire and to avoid fighting. His army conſiſted of about forty thouſand men, whereas the Romans and Perſians under the command of Choſroes were upwards of ſixty thouſand. The former, however, often attempted to fall upon the latter in the night, but were prevented through the vigilance of the Roman officers; ſometimes alſo they preſented themſelves in the field by day, ſo diſpoſed as if they intended immediately to give battle; and, after haraſſing and fatiguing the confederates, withdrew at laſt into their camp. The Roman officers all this time had much ado to reſtrain the ardor of Choſroes, who was always for attacking the enemy, though on diſadvantageous terms. At laſt, however, an opportunity offered, and the Roman officers conſenting, he attacked the army of Varamus, defeated it, and took ſix thouſand priſoners, moſt of whom he ordered to be put to the ſword, or to be thrown to his elephants. The very tent of Varamus was taken with all his golden furniture, which the Romans preſented to Choſroes, who, on the other hand, attributed all his ſucceſs to them, and choſe a thouſand of them for his body guard, and in every other reſpect did all he could to teſtify his gratitude towards them. Choſroes likewiſe took this opportunity to ſend to the church of Sergius the martyr the golden croſs, ſet with jewels, which he had vowed, and with it one taken away by Choſroes the ſon of Cavades, together with a letter, which is ſtill extant in the hiſtory written by Theophylact (D). Choſroes alſo married a chriſtian woman,

(D) Evagrius, the eccleſiaſtical hiſtorian, aſſures us, that Choſroes ſent back to Gregory, biſhop of Antioch, a croſs of gold enriched with precious ſtones, which had been taken out of the church of Sergius the martyr by his grandfather Choſroes, and that he alſo ſent therewith another croſs of gold with the following inſcription: It fell out, that when I Choſroes, king of kings, ſon of Hormiſdas, was obliged by the criminal infidelity of the accurſed Varamus, and certain troops of horſe who adhered to him, to fly for ſafety to the Romans, and that I ſent man, whoſe name was Sira, and honoured her with the title of queen, notwithſtanding the prohibition of the Perſian laws, ſhewing on all occaſions ſuch favour to the chriſtians, that many were of opinion he himſelf was that way inclined; though, in a few years after, he gave the ſtrongeſt demonſtrations, not only of his zealous attachment to the religion of his anceſtors, but of his peculiar averſion to the faith of Chriſt [b].

Alters his conduct entirely.

FROM the moment he was ſettled on his throne, he laid aſide the foreign cuſtoms he had hitherto made uſe of to ingratiate himſelf with the Romans, and put on the ſtate and behaviour of a Perſian prince, as if he had never experienced what adverſity was. The Roman general Narſes intimated to him, before he left his dominions, the

I ſent ſome troops of my cavalry to the city of Carcas, under the command of a certain officer, to traverſe the deſigns of the accurſed Zadeſpras, who was come from Niſibis with an intent to debauch the troops I had in that city from my ſervice, I having heard that the moſt celebrated martyr Sergius granted to every one, who ſought his protecton, whatſoever on their parts were deſired, beſought him on the ſeventh day of January, in the firſt year of my reign, to grant me victory againſt Zadeſpras, promiſing, that in caſe my troops either killed that rebel, or took him alive, that I would give to his church a croſs of gold, enriched with precious ſtones. On the ninth day of the month of February the troops of horſe I had diſpatched againſt him returned, and preſented me with the head of Zadeſpras. Having obtained my petition, and being willing to give the moſt public, as well as ſincere, marks of gratitude and thankfulneſs, I have ſent to his church this croſs, which I cauſed to be made on purpoſe, together with one given by the emperor Juſtinian, and taken by my grandfather Choſroes the ſon of Cavades, which I found depoſited among my treaſure (70). There is another pompous inſcription in the hiſtory cited below; but this is ſufficient to ſhew the hypocriſy of Choſroes, who afterwards declared himſelf the open enemy of Chriſt and of chriſtians, not only by perſecuting them in his own dominions, but by endeavouring to oblige the Greeks to quit that religion, the principles of which induced them to ſet him upon the throne of his fathers. We ſhall hereafter ſee, that he had reaſon to ſay with the emperor Julian, Vicifti ô Galilæe!

vaſt obligations he was under to the emperor Maurice and to the Roman people, whoſe power that general highly magnified, and ſpoke of them as lords of the univerſe. Choſroes modeſtly anſwered, that he was very ſenſible of the kindneſs ſhewed him by the emperor; but as to the Roman power, he predicted ſo exactly its declenſion and deſtruction, that the Greek writers will needs have it Choſroes was a great aſtrologer, and drew his knowledge of future events from the ſkill he had in that ſcience. As to his own ſubjects, Choſroes treated them with great rigour, or, as others phraſe it, with unreaſonable ſeverity; he proſecuted without mercy all ſuch as had any ſhare either in the favour, or in the government, while Varamus held the ſupreme power. By this method he quite extinguiſhed that faction, and, by reſtoring the antient Perſian conſtitution, he aggrandized himſelf ſo as to become terrible to his neighbours; whence it came to paſs, that the barbarous prince, with whom Varamus had ſheltered himſelf, and who had at firſt thoughts of lending him troops to invade Perſia, began to grow ſo apprehenſive of the vengeance of Choſroes, that he ordered his competitor to be poiſoned [c].

Is with difficulty hindered from making war on the Romans.

WHEN the Perſian monarch found all things quiet at home, and himſelf at leiſure to lay hold of any advantages that might offer, he began to threaten the Roman provinces on account of the excurſions made by the Saracens into his dominions, by the encouragement, as he pretended of the Roman generals, who commanded on the frontiers. When the emperor Maurice, whoſe affairs were already in diſorder, was informed of this, he ſent embaſſadors to Choſroes to ſet this matter in a true light, and to prevent if poſſible, a war on this ſide, which he knew as things were circumſtanced, could not but be fatal to the empire. On the arrival of the Roman embaſſadors, Choſroes treated them but indifferently, ſuffering them to remain a long time at court without an audience. At laſt, he who was at the head of the embaſſy, took an opportunity of ſpeaking to the king, and, after a ſhort recapitulation of the favours done him by the Romans, he proceeded to ſhew the weakneſs of the grounds Choſroes pretended to have for making war, and the the injuſtice of ſuch a proceeding towards his benefactor; which free repreſentation ſo affected Choſroes, that far from taking it amiſs, he told the embaſſador, whatever cauſes he might have for the meaſures he meant to take, he would for the preſent lay aſide his reſentment for his ſake; and thus for this time war was prevented [d].

Invades the Roman territories.

It was not long, however, before a freſh opportunity offered for the gratifying of the ambition of the Perſian. This was the murder of Maurice the emperor by Phocas, an impiety which filled the Roman empire with blood-ſhed and confuſion, and gave at the ſame time Choſroes a fair opportunity of taking arms, under colour of revenging the death of his protector and father; for ſo he was wont to call the emperor Maurice. In vain did Phocas, by his embaſſador Bilius, endeavour to appeaſe him with large preſents and larger promiſes; he regarded neither; but having ſent a rude anſwer to Phocas's letters by a meſſenger of his own, threw the embaſſador into priſon, making all the preparations poſſible for entering ſpeedily the Roman frontiers. At firſt he gave out, that he had no other view than revenging the murder of Maurice, and reſtoring the empire to his family; but this ſoon appeared to be only a pretence, ſince the king refuſed to ſend aſſiſtance to Narſes, who at this time had taken arms againſt Phocas. The true intent with which Choſroes made war was, the enlarging of his own dominions, while the Romans were divided and in no condition to reſiſt him. In his firſt campaign he met with ſome trouble, the Roman troops endeavouring to make the beſt defence they could; but, their general being ſlain and themſelves indifferently ſupplied, he at length triumphed over them, and laid all the frontiers under contribution. In the ſeventeenth year of his reign, he continued the war, and reduced ſeveral fortreſſes. The next year, he recovered the ſtrong city of Dara, plundered all Meſopotamia and Syria, and carried off ſuch immenſe richeſs, that no computation could be made of them. In his nineteenth year, he paſſed the Euphrates, ravaged Syria, Paleſtine, and part of Phænicia, waſting all places, wherever he came, with fire and ſword. The year following, his general Cardaregas waſted Armenia and Cappadocia, defeated the Roman army with a great ſlaughter, and then, meeting no oppoſition, deſtroyed Galatia, Paphlagonia, and all the country as far as Chalcedon, burning cities, and putting people to death without any reſpect to ſex or age [e].

Makes a rapid conqueſt of its principal provinces.

In the two and twentieth year of his reign, Choſroes took Apamea and Edeſſa, and blocked up Antioch. This induced the Romans to hazard a battle, though they were much inferior in ſtrength; wherein they were ſo totally defeated, that it is ſaid the Perſians ſcarce left any to mourn the death of their companions. The year following he took Cæſarea, and carried away myriads of people into captivity. Syria had in the next campaign the ſame fate that Cappadocia felt in this. In his twenty-fifth year, Choſroes made himſelf maſter of Damaſcus, to which city the emperor Heraclius ſent embaſſadors, beſeeching him to have mercy upon his ſubjects, and ſupplicating a peace on any terms he would impoſe; but Choſroes would not afford his embaſſador ſo much as an anſwer. The year following he conquered Judæa, took and plundered the city of Jeruſalem, carried away the croſs on which Chriſt ſuffered, and the patriarch Zacharias, into Perſia. In this campaign he ſold ninety thouſand chriſtians for ſlaves to the Jews in his dominions, who, out of their wonted humanity cut every one of their throats. Theſe vaſt conqueſts ſerved only to encreaſe the ambition of the Perſian, and to ſwell his imagination with mighty ideas of his own power; inſomuch, that in the twenty-ſeventh year of his reign, he made an expedition into Egypt, and having divided his forces, with one part of his army he took Alexandria, and ſubdued all the country towards Libya, while the other was employed in the reduction of the upper Egypt; wherein he puſhed his conqueſts to the very frontiers of Ethiopia; adding thus the empire of Afric to that of Aſia, executing in the ſpace of a few years what all his anceſtors from Artaxerxes had been ſo long endeavouring at in vain. The year following, he once more turned his forces againſt the Conſtantinopolitan empire, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, that he reduced the city of Chalcedon, which he had long blocked up. The remaining part of that year, and all the next, was employed in thoroughly ſubduing and regulating in all reſpects the government of the conquered quered provinces. As for the emperor Heraclius, incapable of resisting, and at the same time extremely afflicted at the sight of the horrible cruelties every-where practised by the Persians, he resolved once more to make an effort towards obtaining peace. With this view he sent deputies to Chosroes, with instructions to lay before him the miserable condition of Asia, the deplorable consequences of continuing the war any longer, and the earnest desire that himself had to purchase quiet upon any terms. To all this Chosroes made a very short and plain answer; that he would never spare the subjects of Heraclius, or grant him peace, till he and they abjured their crucified God, and embraced the religion of the Persians [f].

Forces the emperor Heraclius to take up arms.

In the thirty-first year of his reign, Chosroes besieged and reduced the city of Ancyra in Galatia, and prepared against the next year to carry his conquests farther. Indeed there was no probability that any check could be put to them, the emperor being so embarassed in Europe by other barbarous enemies, that he was only able to lament, without having it at all in his power to remedy, the mischiefs suffered by his subjects in Asia. Yet when things were come to this extremity, and nothing could be more apparent, than that Chosroes intended the utter destruction of his monarchy, Heraclus determined to put all to the hazard, and, having granted his enemies in Europe what terms they thought fit, began to make the necessary dispositions for turning the whole of his force, such as it was, upon the Persians. This happened in the thirty-second year of the reign of Chosroes, who, far from being displeased, rejoiced at this news, believing that it would afford him the opportunity he had so long sought of conquering all the Roman dominions, without appearing to make war on an unarmed and defenceless people. After Easter, in the succeeding year, the emperor Heraclius marched with all his forces towards the frontiers of his empire. Sarbanazas at that time commanded the Persian forces, and lay encamped in Armenia, where he was every day committing new outrages, having nothing else in view but the amassing money and plundering the helpless inhabitants of what little they had left. On the approach of the Roman army the Persian general sent out spies to discover its strength; and on their report that it was very numerous, and that the emperor Heraclius had inflamed his men with a ſort of religious enthuſiaſm, he, thought it expedient to recal his parties, and to intrench his forces on the ſummit of a hill, where he could not be attacked, but at a great diſadvantage. This he did, ſuppoſing that the emperor could not long keep the field, eſpecially in that ſeaſon. But in this he was miſtaken, as he was afterwards in his notion of breaking through the Roman army, which he atempted in the night, but without ſucceſs. At laſt weary of being beſieged, he determined at all events to fight. This reſolution once taken, [g] he divided his army into three bodies, and attacked the Roman camp in as many different places. Heraclius, who had previous intelligence of what the Perſian general intended, ſuffered the Perſians to prevail in every one of their attempts. By this means he effectually divided them, and then falling upon the rear of each corps, cut the far greateſt part of them to pieces. This victory was ſo far from making Heraclius elate, that it ſerved only to encourage him to make new propoſitions of peace and friendſhip to the Perſians, which were received, as all the former were, that is, with the utmoſt contempt and indignation [g].

Loſes all his former conqueſts.

CHOSROES to repair the miſtakes of his former general, appointed Sais, a noble Perſian, to command in chief a more numerous army, than that which had been defeated the laſt ſpring; and to make all things ſecure, when the ſeaſon for action drew on, Sarbanazas was ſent again to the army with a conſiderable reinforcement; nay, the king himſelf went thither ſoon after in perſon. However, Heraclius did not fail preſſing as hard upon this army, as he did upon that which he had defeated in Armenia; and the Perſians, wearied with long ſervice and corrupted through their neglect of diſcipline, gave ſuch evident tokens of timidity, when the enemy drew near and had ſkirmiſhed againſt them with ſome ſucceſs, that Choſroes, thought it high time to provide for the ſafety of his perſon; which he did by leaving the army, and thereby encreaſed the general conſternation ſo much, that the Perſians were quickly after totally defeated (E). It is ſaid, that no leſs

(E) There cannot at firſt ſight be any thing more ſurpriſing, than this ſudden extinction of the Perſian power in leſs than twenty

leſs than fifty thouſand perſons were taken priſoners by Heraclius, who, when he found it impracticable to maintain them, firſt diſtributed amongſt them all that could be poſſibly ſpared them, and then gave them their liberties, whereby he gained great reputation. Choſroes now found it neceſſary to exert his utmoſt ſtrength, and having in the winter gathered as great a number of forces as he poſſibly could, he ſent them under the command of Sarablagas and Perozites, two of his beſt twenty years, after it had been carried to a greater height by Choſroes the ſecond, than it had ever attained ſince the demiſe of Alexander the Great. A little attention, however, to the facts preceding this deſtruction of the Perſian empire, will lead us to a ſatisfactory account of its cauſes. From the death of Choſroes the Great the minds of the people had never been thoroughly ſettled. At the very beginning of the reign of Hormiſdas, they were prejudiced againſt his government by the ſtrange meaſures he took, and the infamous company of diviners, ſorcerers, and necromancers, that he kept about him. During the time that Varamus was at the head of affairs, who, by the way, is by ſome authors reckoned one of the kings of Perſia, things went ſtill in a worſe channel. His title to the crown was very indifferent; and therefore, to ſupport it, he firſt laviſhed immenſe ſums among the nobles; but finding this method unſucceſsful, he had recourſe to its contrary; that is to ſay, he oppreſſed the nobility, and turned the ſtreams of his bounty on the loweſt ſort of people. This anſwered his purpoſe better; but it made the condition of the Perſians much worſe, by ſpreading the poiſon of corruption through the maſs of the people. The ſeverity of Choſroes, or rather his cruelty, kept up a conſtant ſpirit of diſaffection, which all his numerous conqueſts could not allay; though theſe ſerved to waſte his veteran troops, and to exhauſt Perſia of able men, to ſuch a degree, that it was with great difficulty, and not without having recourſe to the harſheſt methods, that he ſet armies on foot, ſufficient to ſtruggle with the Romans, as he did; and yet theſe ſtruggles put the laſt hand to the exhauſting of Perſia, and left it in a deplorable condition, when Siroes came to the crown. If that prince had lived, he would, in all probability, have reſtored the luſtre of the Perſian diadem. As it was, he only procured recruits, by the exchange of priſoners, ſufficient to keep up ſuch an army, as enabled his general to deſtroy his family, and to ſeal the ruin of his empire. The laſt monarch had viſibly no force capable of oppoſing the mighty armies of the Saracens; therefore we muſt look on the battles he fought as the laſt efforts of a languiſhing people. From whence it follows, that though they might be briſk and vigorous, yet they could not be either laſting or effectual.

best general officers, into Albania. He likewise took care to recruit his other army in Armenia, and when he understood that the emperor Heraclius was determined to penetrate into the Persian dominions, he sent orders to his forces in Armenia to advance behind the Romans, as they pressed upon the grand army in Albania. This scheme, as it was well contrived, so it was also faithfully and exactly executed; insomuch, that the emperor found himself in the deepest distress, and in all probability would have perished with all his army, if the Persian generals had not been jealous of each other, which tempted them to engage the Romans separately; an act of rashness so apparent, that it revived the drooping courage of Heraclius's soldiers, and was the chief cause of gaining such a victory, as left not a Persian officer of distinction at liberty; so that Heraclius was forced to release one of his prisoners to carry the news of the defeat. After this the inhabitants of Albania rose upon the Persians, so that they were obliged totally to abandon Albania, where the Romans wintered [h].

Makes new efforts to no purpose.

The two succeeding years the war was carried on in the same way, and with the same success; that is to say, Chosroes made prodigious efforts, which yet were altogether ineffectual, or rather served to encrease the power and reputation of Heraclius, who was alike successful in pitched battles and in long and painful expeditions. For his soldiers, flushed with conquests, and fully persuaded that victory attended them on account of the justice of their cause and the strictness of their discipline, made no scruple of undertaking whatever the emperor commanded. In this manner he penetrated into Assyria, passed the river Euphrates and Tigris, after routing several times the Persian armies, which endeavoured to obstruct his passage. In the mean time, Chosroes abated nothing either of his cruelty, or of his haughtiness. The christian churches he plundered throughout his dominions, and compelled all such of his subjects as had embraced the faith to profess themselves Nestorians. He exhausted likewise all his provinces, in order to form new armies to oppose Heraclius, who defeated them as soon as he met them in the field, proceeding so rapidly in his conquests, that Chosroes saw himself obliged to abandon two of his palaces, burning the the rich furniture he could not carry away, and with his wives and concubines to fly at firſt to Cteſiphon, and then to Seleucia. There he received intelligence, that his general Sarbaras correſponded with the Romans; which though a calumny, he eaſily gave into, and, in conſequence thereof, diſpatched orders to his collegue then before Chalcedon to put him to death, and to march his army back into Perſia. The courier, who carried this order, being taken by the emperor's party, they opened his letters, and, having read them, ſent them to the general, who was intended to be cut off. He by interpolating theſe orders, ſignified the pleaſure of Choſroes, that four hundred officers of diſtinction ſhould be put to death with him, and then cauſed them to be delivered to his collegue. On reading theſe diſpatches, the whole army was in a tumult, and great numbers began openly to cry out, that Choſroes, was unworthy to reign. Among theſe, Gundabunas, a principal officer, made the greateſt figure; who, to ſecure himſelf from the reſentment of ſo blood-thirſty a prince, retired with a conſiderable body of men to the camp of the emperor, where he remained in ſafety [i].

Attempts to alter the ſucceſſion, and is depoſed.

AGE, fatigue, and ſorrow, having by this time much weakened Choſroes, he began to think of ſettling the ſucceſſion; but, as he had ever acted on very odd principles, ſo now, out of ſome pique to his eldeſt ſon Siroes, he determined to transfer the crown to Merdaſas, the youngeſt of his ſons. This ſcheme of his could not be long kept a ſecret, and therefore, as ſoon as it reached the ears of Siroes, he immediately projected to hinder it from being carried into execution. With this view he entered inro a correſpondence with Gundabunas, who, as was obſerved, remained in the emperor's camp with a body of Perſian troops. The iſſue of this negotiation was, that application was made to the emperor Heraclius to encreaſe the forces under the command of Gundabunas, by ſetting at liberty the Perſian priſoners, on a promiſe, that Siroes would inſtantly put himſelf at the head of that army, and march againſt his father. This propoſition was no ſooner made than accepted; and, as all the parties concerned therein were were alike intereſted in its ſpeedy execution, all things were quickly ready, and Siroes in a condition to perform his part of the agreement, which he did very effectually. As for Choſroes, his tyranny had rendered him ſo hateful, that, as he wanted an army to ſupport him, he was not only diſappointed in its fidelity, but alſo found himſelf ſo deſtitute of friends, that to eſcape appeared as impracticable as to reſiſt. In a word, he was ſeized by his own ſoldiers, impriſoned, and depoſed by his own ſon, when he had reigned thirty-nine years. We ſhall quickly ſee, that theſe were but the beginnings of his misfortunes [k].

Siroes. Year of Chriſt 626.

SIROES, having aſſumed the regal dignity, during the life-time of his father, and while he was a priſoner, as his father had done in prejudice to his father Hormiſdas, began inſtantly to endeavour the rectifying of thoſe miſcarriages, which had brought the flouriſhing kingdom of Perſia into ſo miſerable a condition. In the firſt place he ordered his father ſhould have his legs, arms, and neck, loaded with chains, and that he ſhould be expoſed in the dungeon, where he lay to all the ſcoffs and inſults of an incenſed unthinking populace. Theſe, forgetting the indelible majeſty of kings, upbraided him with his inſatiable avarice, reproached him with his preſent abject condition, telling him, that, as he had acted like the common enemy of mankind, and the peculiar curſe of the Perſian people, he now juſtly taſted that bitter cup, of which he had made whole nations drink, and was deſervedly degraded from a throne to a dungeon, who, while he ſat on his throne, had filled all the dungeons in his dominions. Five days he languiſhed in this miſerable way, having only bread and water allowed him for a ſubſiſtance; then his beloved ſon Merdaſas, whom he would have raiſed to the throne in prejudice to Siroes, was put to death before his face, together with his other ſons. After all this and ſuſtaining a freſh load of indignities, Siroes gave orders that he ſhould be ſhot with arrows, and left to expire of his wounds [l]. Of all theſe ſeverities, as well as of the cruel death of his father, Siroes adviſed the emperor Heraclius by letter, deſiring his friendſhip, and that the league between their empires might be perpetual. As a proof of his ſincerity in all his promiſes promiſes, he ſet the patriarch of Jeruſalem, Zacharias, at liberty, and ſent him, together with the holy croſs, back into Paleſtine, well attended with rich preſents. On the other hand, Heraclius received the Perſian embaſſadors with great kindneſs, and readily embraced the peace offered him by their maſter. The next year, in conſequence of this league, all the Perſians, who were priſoners in any part of the Roman dominions, were ſet at liberty; and notwithſtanding they were many thouſands in number, yet in their return to their own country, no ill accident happened; ſo ſoon were thoſe nations reconciled, who were inveterate enemies ſo long. But as there is not any thing ſo precarious as human happineſs, while on the one hand the Romans, and the other the Perſians, promiſed themſelves nothing but peace, plenty, and mutual good offices, from the union which ſubſiſted between their princes; all their hopes were blaſted by the death of Siroes, when he had reigned little more than a year, and had ſcarce effaced by his mildneſs towards his ſubjects, the terror ariſing from his unnatural treatment of his father.[m]

ARDESER the ſon of Siroes, according to the Greek writers, ſucceeded his father. They might as well have called him Artaxerxes, ſince the name they give him is only a corruption of that Perſian appellation, which the antient Greeks, to accommodate it to their own way of ſpeaking, changed into Artaxerxes. We may be indulged this criticiſm on names, where we have little to ſay of things. This hapleſs prince was but ſeven years old when he was ſet upon a throne, where he remained but ſeven months, before he was barbarouſly murdered by the command of Sarbarazas, who had commanded the armies of Choſroes his grandfather. This ambitious man had ſtill the chief command of the troops, when Siroes died. He thereupon pretended a right of being conſulted, before the ſon of his maſter was exalted to the throne of his anceſtors; and on this ſlight foundation rebelled againſt the child, ſlew him, and ſeated himſelf in his place[n].

head. An oppoſite faction had ſet up Bornarim, a prince of the blood-royal, who for ſix or ſeven months had the ſhadow of royalty, and then loſt it, together with his life, leaving the throne once more empty to this Sarbarazas. He held it now about ſix months, but always in fear, the friends of the royal family, and eſpecially a ſiſter of the deceaſed Artaxerxes, endeavouring, all that in their power lay, to diſturb his reign. Theſe contrivances broke at laſt out into ſeveral inſurrections, till the flame of civil war catched almoſt every province in the kingdom, and all Perſia began to ſwim with the blood of its inhabitants. This opened the eyes of the nobility, who now clearly ſaw that peace could never be reſtored whilſt this uſurper lived. They therefore made choice of the nephew of Siroes, the ſon of the only one of his brothers, who eſcaped his rage, when he put his father to death; and having once determined to raiſe the young prince to the throne, they opened him a paſſage to it by the death of Sarbarazas, the implacable enemy of his family [o].

Iſdigertes. Year of Chriſt, 630.

HORMISDAS, or, as moſt writers call him, Iſdigertes, was by this means raiſed to the regal dignity, as well by the free election of the people, as in conſequence of his right of deſcent. He did not, however, enjoy the kingdom long, I may ſay, ſcarce at all, in quiet; for by the ſame time that the domeſtic ſtirs of the late factions in Perſia were thoroughly quelled, he found a new and moſt formidable enemy ready to over-run his country. Theſe were the Saracens under the conduct of the ſucceſſors of Mohammed. We ſhall elſewhere treat expreſly of theſe people, their religion, government, and exploits. At preſent, we ſhall only remark on ſuch circumſtances of their affairs, as have a connection with their conqueſt of Perſia, concerning which we have very different accounts from the ſeveral Greek writers, who have mentioned it. Some report, that the emperor Heraclius had a great body of Saracens in his army, when he invaded the Perſian dominions; and that after the peace was made, they, on their return home, inflamed their countrymen with a deſire of making themſelves maſters of ſo pleaſant a country, as this of Perſia was repreſented to be Others affirm, that Mohammed hammed himself, when he was thoroughly settled in his principality, made an irruption into Persia in the days of Chosroes; but that this monarch, with the assistance of the Turks, totally defeated the Saracen army, after a very long and very obstinate engagement, which so far broke their spirits, that they did not renew the war till now. But the general opinion is, that the Saracens did not invade Persia till after the reduction of Jerusalem, and that then the war lasted some time, and with variety of success. Some authors represent Hormisdas, or Isdigertes, as an effeminate and indolent prince, while others again assert, that he defended his country with the utmost intrepidity, till after various defeats the spirits of the Persians were entirely broken; nay, some say, that he was himself killed in the field. However, there appears to be no just cause for censuring either the courage or conduct of this prince, unless it was criminal in him to be unfortunate. He was the last of the line of Artaxerxes, who sat upon the Persian throne; and with him fell that empire, which had subsisted with so much glory for upwards of four hundred years [P] (F).

The total subversion of so great a monarchy in so short a space must appear somewhat wonderful in our eyes, who are

(F) As, at the opening of this period, we endeavoured in a note to point out the advantages the reader would receive from the method pursued therein, so we judged it necessary to close it, by briefly exhibiting a view of those deficiencies, which have made the following section, not only expedient, but necessary. In the first place, as we have confined ourselves therein to the materials furnished us by the Greek authors, the reader must necessarily observe many wide chasms in the narration, occasioned either by the ignorance or carelessness of the Greek historians, as to such affairs of their neighbours, as did not immediately concern themselves. Secondly, the judicious peruser must have observed very imperfect accounts of very important transactions, and not a few, which carry in themselves the strongest appearances of falshood. These defects flow from the same cause, and there was a necessity of suffering this part of the history to appear in this dress, that the reader might know in what light the Greek writers set these transactions. Thirdly, the proper names, titles of honour, wars, and conquests of the Persians, are so disfigured by the mistakes of the authors, from whom we were obliged to take

are accuſtomed to ſee provinces defended for a much longer time, than was taken up by the Saracens in the conqueſt of Perſia; but we ought to conſider, that the ſucceſſors of Mohammed led vaſt armies of a needy ſtarving people, who fought for new habitations, and who eaſily ſettled themſelves in the countries they ſubdued. In this empire of Perſia eſpecially, they had no ſooner defeated Iſdigertes, than they began immediately to canton out his dominions, and to make as exact a ſurvey of them, as the Conqueror did of our country, when he framed what we call the doom's day book; ſuch a record, and for the ſame purpoſes, being taken here. Beſides, the Perſian prince, as the beſt authors aſſure us, though he laid aſide the enſigns of majeſty, after the great defeat he had received, yet he ſheltered himſelf in one of the diſtant provinces of his empire, and died there about the year 640 or 642. As to the condition of the native Perſians ſince, we need not wonder that it hath been always very abject and depreſſed, ſince nothing can be more viſible, than that it hath been the chief maxim among all Mohammedan conquerors, without exception, to break the ſpirits, and exhauſt the ſubſtance of the natives of all the countries which fall under their dominion. This they were particularly led to do in Perſia, on account of the differences in religion between them and the natives. At this time the Saracens were not only rude and barbarous, but a furious and enthuſiaſtic people; they were therefore incapable of diſtinguiſhing the true doctrines of the magian ſect, or of reclaiming, by gentle means, thoſe whom they conceived to be idolaters. They therefore perſecuted the natives through a miſguided zeal, and, having ſtamped on them opprobrious names, tranſmitted to their poſterity the ſame brutal diſpoſition which they had exerciſed themſelves, as will be ſhewn in the following, and ſeveral other ſections.

our accounts, that, if we had publiſhed them alone, they muſt have tended, rather to the propagating of error, than of knowledge; ſince it is better to know nothing, than to apprehend we know what we know not. All theſe deficiencies, miſrepreſentations, and miſtakes, will be ſupplied and corrected in the following hiſtory; which will effectually demonſtrate the great uſe of ſtudying the oriental writers, hitherto much neglected, and, which is ſtranger, ſtill deſpiſed amongſt us.

SECT.

SECT. I.

The hiſtory of the Perſians, from their recovering the empire to their being ſubdued by the Arabs.

According to the oriental hiſtorians.

THE wide difference there is between the hiſtories of the eaſtern nations, as written by European authors and by their own, obliged us originally to diſtinguiſh the hiſtory of Perſia into two ſections; the firſt, according to the former; the ſecond, conſonant to the memoirs furniſhed us by the latter. When we laſt treated of this ſubject from the oriental authors, we ended with the conqueſt of the Perſian dominions by Eſcander, or Alexander the Great [a]. In order therefore to connect this period with that, it is neceſſary, previous to our account of the kings, who ſucceeded Ardſhir-Babegan or Artaxares, to ſpeak of thoſe who reigned in the intermediate ſpace, between the death of Alexander and the acceſſion of the before-mentioned Artaxares. The former part of our hiſtory contained the ſucceſſion of the Perſian kings of the two firſt dynaſties, and the third dynaſty is called by the oriental writers Molouk-al-Thaouaif, i. e. The kings of the nations. In order to have a juſt idea of the ſenſe and meaning of this term, we muſt obſerve, that the word Molouk ſignifies kings, and that all the oriental hiſtorians aſſure us, there were in the courts of the antient kings of Perſia Aulak-Molouk-Fars, i. e. Children of the Perſian kings, or princes of the blood, who were honoured with the chief governments, and, when they reſided in them, lived like princes. When therefore the captains of Alexander the Great cantoned all his conqueſts among themſelves

ſelves, and ſet themſelves up for ſo many independent princes, the eaſtern writers gave to this new race of monarchs the general title of Molouk al Thaouaif, or kings of the nations [b]. Some, however, of the Perſian writers incline rather to call this the dynaſty of the viziers, and it muſt be allowed, that it is by far the darkeſt and leaſt intelligible period of the Perſian hiſtory, according to the orientals. This, however, is no reaſon, that, like ſome modern hiſtorians, we ſhould hurry over it, and leave it juſt as dark as we found it. Had the great men of the laſt century been of this lazy diſpoſition, all antient, nay, and all modern, hiſtory had been a chaos. But to proceed; ſome of the writers of the Perſian hiſtory ſplit this dynaſty into two, and conſequently call them the third and fourth dynaſties of the Perſian kings: the firſt they diſtinguiſh by the name of Aſchkaniens: the latter, by that of Aſchganides [c]. To the firſt they allowed twelve kings, who, according to them, reigned altogether one hundred and ſixty-five years. Of the ſecond race, they ſay, there were eight kings, and that they reigned altogether one hundred and fifty years. The truth ſeems to be, that theſe two dynaſties were invented to fill up the time between the death of Alexander and the commencement of the fifth dynaſty. Our opinion therefore is, that the Aſchkaniens and Aſchganides are in fact one and the ſame ſucceſſion, and no other than that called by the Latin writers Arſacidæ; Aſchek, whom the eaſtern writers make the firſt monarch of this houſe, being, as we believe, no other than Arſaces the firſt of the Parthian kings. But as the proof of this propoſition, and the ſhorteſt detail poſſible of the princes of this family, would exceedingly embarraſs the thread of our narration, the reader will find what we have farther to ſay on this point in a note. In the mean time, we will paſs on to the proper ſubject of this ſection, the hiſtory of the fourth dynaſty of the Perſian kings, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Saſſaniens (A). war

(A) The deſign of this note is to give a ſhort account of the Parthian kingdom from the oriental hiſtorians. Previous to this, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that though it is an error of a very old date, and an error univerſally embraced by all the Latin and Greek

Greek writers, yet it is ſtill an error, to ſuppoſe that there was any real diſtinction between the Parthians and the Perſians. Therefore, notwithſtanding the titles of the three laſt ſections, in which, for the ſake of conforming to the received hiſtory of theſe times, we have admitted this diſtinction, yet here we give our readers notice, that it is groundleſs in itſelf, and took birth from the ignornace of the weſtern writers, who would make diſtinct kingdoms of two provinces in the ſame kingdom.

Khondemir, the Perſian hiſtorian, very wiſely makes but one dynaſty of the kings who ſucceeded after Alexander to the ſucceſſion of Artaxares. The firſt of theſe was Aſchek, or rather Arſchak, who is the ſame with Arſaces. He is ſaid to have been deſcended from Darius the laſt king of Perſia, and to have taken thence his claim to the throne. He revolted therefore from Antiochus, whom the oriental writers call Anthakaſh, or rather from the Seleucidæ his ſucceſſors, about the year 248 before Chriſt, in the third year of the hundred and thirty-ſecond olympiad, and from the building of Rome the five hundred and third.

To him ſucceeded Aſchek the ſecond, whom the Greeks alſo called Arſaces; but how long he reigned, we find not.

Schabour ſucceeded his father Aſchek, and was the firſt of that name who governed Perſia. He was ſurnamed Padiſchabi Buzurk, that is, The great king, becauſe he recovered the treaſures of the antient Perſian monarchs from the Greeks, and brought them back to the royal palaces at Suſa and Perſepolis. He reigned fifteen years, and was ſucceeded by his grandſon

Balas II. Of whom we find nothing remarkable; only we are told, that he reigned twelve years. He had for his ſucceſſor

Ardevan, whom the Latins and Greeks call Artabanus. Some writers, as we apprehend, give this prince the title of Khoſrou, which, amongſt the Perſian princes, was both a proper name and a ſirname; whence there ſprung great confuſion. This prince governed thirteen years, and by ſuch of the oriental hiſtorians as divide the ſucceſſors of Alexander into two dynaſties, he is held to be the laſt of the firſt. He was ſucceeded by

Aſchek III. but how long he governed is uncertain. Some authors report, that he was deſcended from the antient kings of the ſecond dynaſty. There are others, however, who affirm, that he was of the ſame family with his predeceſſors, who, inſtead of Parthians, were Armenians by birth, and only made choice of Parthia for the ſeat of their empire, becauſe it was in the heart of their dominions. After him reigned Choſroes II. his ſon, who governed the empire for twelve years in peace. The eaſtern writers place the birth of our Saviour under his reign. He was ſucceeded by

Balas III. his ſon, or his grandſon, the time of whoſe reign is uncertain; but he left his throne to his ſon

Gudarez, who performed nothing of note, but, after reigning twenty-one years, left the throne vacant to his ſon Narſi or Narſes the ſecond.

This Narſes II. was a very warlike prince, and made great conqueſts in Khoraſſan, governed with great reputation twenty years, and then left the crown to Narſes III. who reigned ten years, and extended his father's conqueſts. He was ſucceeded by

Ardevan II. who governed long, and in whoſe days idolatry, or rather polytheiſm, after the Greek manner, became the prevailing religion of the eaſt. He is ſaid to have had for his ſucceſſor

Ardevan III. who, after a reign of twenty-three years, was defeated and ſlain, as we have ſhewn in the text, by Ardſchir Barbegan (1). To have attempted the reconciling all theſe names and dates to the accounts given us by the Greek and Latin writers, would have required a volume, and perhaps nothing of certainty would have reſulted from ſuch an attempt at laſt. A very learned German hath taken a great deal of pains in this way, whoſe work the inquiſitive may conſult (2). Our buſineſs was to make this note an introduction to the following hiſtory, by connecting it to the laſt period of the Perſian affairs, according to the oriental writers; and this being effected, our end is anſwered.

XXIII. Schirouieh Ben Khoſrou Parviz reigned ſix or eight months. There is a tradition in the eaſt, that parricides, ſuch as this king was, ſurvive not their parents above ſix months.

XXIV. Ardeſchir Ben Schirouieh, who reigned one year and ſix months.

XXV. Scheheriar, who was not of the royal family. He reigned two years and twenty days.

XXVI. Touran Dokht Benat Khoſrou Parviz, who reigned but two months.

XXVII. Azurmi Dokht, ſiſter to the laſt-mentioned king, who reigned one year and four months.

XXVIII. Farakhzad Ben Khoſrou, who reigned only one month.

XXIX. Jezdegerd Ben Scheheriar, Ben Khoſrou Parviz, who according to ſome writers, reigned twenty years, and was the laſt king of this dynaſty [d].

THOUGH we have followed Khondemir exactly in this table of the Perſian kings, yet we do not conceive ourſelves bound to ſubmit always to his authority in our ſubſequent hiſtory. We followed him in the table, becauſe he is more conſiſtent and exact in his liſt of kings than any other writer; but in reſpect of facts, we muſt take the liberty of diſſenting from him, as often as probability and better authority than his ſhall require it. This being premiſed, we proceed to ſpeak of theſe kings, and of the principal tranſactions in their reigns, according to the order in which they are placed above.

Ardſhir Babegan.

ARDSCHIR, or rather, according to our orthography, Ardſhir Babegan, according to the moſt antient hiſtories was the grandſon of Saſſan, the brother of a certain queen of Perſia, who, ſeeing himſelf excluded from the throne, and being a little apprehenſive that his life was not perfectly ſafe, thought fit to travel; and, having ſpent many years abroad abroad, died at laſt in exile, and left among other children the father of this Ardſhir, who having a curioſity to ſee his native country, returned thither privately, and entered into the ſervice of Babec, who was governor of a province for Ardavan, or, as the Greeks call him, Artabanus, the laſt monarch of the Parthians. This nobleman, after ſome time, perceiving in this youth the evident tokens of an extraordinary genius, reſolved to fix him in his family, and with that view gave him his daughter in marriage, by whom he had Ardſhir, who, in gratitude to his mother's family, took the ſirname of Babegan.

His adventures at the court of Ardavan.

HE was educated by his grandfather with great care, in all the learning of the Perſians, and was alſo taught by his father all the exerciſes becoming a perſon of quality; and being equally aſſiduous in acquiring both, he became, while a very youth, the wonder of the province; and in fine, was ſo much talked of, that his fame reached the ears of Ardavan, who ſent for him to court, where he became ſo highly in his favour, that he ordered him to remain conſtantly about the young princes his ſons, and ſeemed to love him as tenderly as he did them. One day, however, when the young princes went a hunting, Ardavan followed them privately, that he might have a better opportunity of obſerving their behaviour; and having by this means an occaſion of ſeeing how much they were excelled in horſemanſhip and archery, as well as in ſtrength and gracefulneſs, by their companion Ardſhir, he from that moment entertained a jealouſy of him, and determined within himſelf to remove him from court, by beſtowing upon him ſome office, which ſhould require his conſtant attendance. Accordingly, he gave him the command of his forces in a diſtant province, whither he went immediately, and remained there till ſuch time as he was informed of the death of his grandfather Babec, which made him return to court, in hopes of procuring his government. Ardavan, far from liſtening to his entreaties, immediately beſtowed it upon the prince his eldeſt ſon.

THIS misfortune was quickly followed by another; the king was much diſturbed by a dream, and on conſulting the moſt eminent diviners in his court, they told him, it portended, that a certain fugitive from his court would deprive him of his live and crown. It ſo fell out, that there was in the king's ſerail a lady, who was paſſionately in love with Ardſhir, and ſhe, being apprehenſive that this interpretation might be fatal to him, immediately gave him notice of it, upon which he inſtantly retired with all imaginable ſecrecy. His flight alarmed the king, who never thought of him before; but it was too late, for Ardſhir was gone into Perſia Proper, the province of which his grandfather had been governor. He was met at the city Eſthechar, or Perſepolis, by a croud of the nobility of the province, who were all devoted to his family, and who readily offered him their ſervice in any thing he deſired. In all probability, the interpretation of the king's dream was what firſt put it into the head of Ardſhir to attempt the recovery of the kingdom of his anceſtors; wherefore taking council from ambition on the one hand, and a juſt ſenſe of the extreme danger he was in on the other, Ardſhir began to ſet before the eyes of the Perſian nobility the advantages that would accrue to them from an entire revolution, and he was ſo fortunate in his applications as to bring them over entirely to his intereſt. From the moment he entered the province, the young prince, who was governor of it, conceived a jealouſy of him; but before he could get any thorough information of his deſigns, Ardſhir took the field with a conſiderable army. The prince preſently drew together ſuch of his father's forces as remained faithful, in order to oppoſe him; but after ſeveral engagements, there happened at laſt one which was deciſive; his army being totally defeated, and the prince himſelf ſlain upon the ſpot. The like fate ſoon after befel Ardavan himſelf, who, entering the province of Fars with all the forces of his empire, was there preſently defeated and ſlain by the victorious Ardſhir, who thereupon immediately aſſumed the regal dignity, and ſoon after the ſwelling title of Shah-in-Shah, or king of kings [e].

Acquires a ſon and ſucceſſor by the prudence of his vizier.

THIS monarch, in the beginning of his reign, very artfully tempered the ſeverity of a conqueror with the mildneſs of a natural prince. Where-ever he found reſiſtance, he deſtroyed it by the ſword; but to ſuch as ſubmitted to his government, he ſhewed all imaginable kindneſs, without any reſpect of perſons. On this account he ſpared all the family of Ardavan; and, to do them ſtill greater pleaſure, he married the eldeſt daughter of that prince. This lady, however, conceived ſuch a hatred towards him, for depriving her family of the empire, that within a very ſhort ſpace ſpace after her marriage, ſhe attempted to poiſon him, in order to ſet the imperial crown on her brother's head. Being detected in the fact, Ardſhir gave orders to his prime miniſter to cauſe her to be put to death. When he came to acquaint the unhappy lady with her ſentence, ſhe told him ſhe was with child; upon which the miniſter, without acquainting his maſter, concealed her privately, and cauſed the ſon of which ſhe was delivered to be brought up with the utmoſt care, giving him the name of Schabour, i. e. king's ſon, the ſame name as the Greek Sapor. The vizier waited a long time for a favourable opportunity of breaking this ſecret to his maſter. At length obſerving the king to be one day in high good humour, after exerciſing on horſeback with many of the nobility, he brought forth the young prince, introduced him to his father, and, not without ſome apprehenſion, entered into the whole detail of his preſervation. Ardſhir, on the other hand, received the young prince with the utmoſt tenderneſs, and, after reflecting ſeverely on himſelf for his raſhneſs, highly commended the prudence of his miniſter; and, having cauſed Schabour to be conducted to the palace, declared him not long after his heir, and took all imaginable pains to inſtruct him in the arts of government [f].

His character as a legiſlator.

THE Oriental hiſtorians agree in affirming, that the character of Ardſhir was that of a complete hero; one no leſs diſtinguiſhed for knowledge and virtue, than for valour and military ſkill. From the moment he was ſeated on his throne, he conceived the important deſign of reſtoring all the dominions which had belonged to his predeceſſors in the Perſian throne. By arms he recovered large provinces from all his neighbours; and, when he had recovered them, he took care to make the people very ſenſible of the difference between his government and that which they had been under before. He erected new cities, where-ever he found inviting ſituations; he fortified all the conſiderable towns on his frontiers; he divided the inhabitants of his empire into ſeveral claſſes or tribes, according to their profeſſions, and not only appointed magiſtrates to govern them, but alſo counſellors, whoſe buſineſs it was to inſtruct them in their true intereſt, to procure for them the redreſs of their grievances, as alſo ſuch grants and privileges as might be for their ſervice. Ardſhir likewiſe rebated the edge of the law law, taking away the exceſſive uſe of capital puniſhments, in order to make way for milder chaſtiſements, purſuant to a maxim frequently in his mouth, "That the ſword was never "to be employed where the cane might do as well." But the greateſt of his performances as a law-giver was in the literary way. He compoſed a book, intitled, Adab alaiſch, i. e. Rules for attaining a happy life. In this treatiſe he laid down the maxims neceſſary to conduct a man in every ſtation, from that of a monarch to that of a mechanic; and this he did with ſuch penetration and perſpicuity, that Nouſchirvan, the wiſeſt and greateſt of his ſucceſſors, cauſed this book to be ſolemnly publiſhed throughout all his territories, obliging every family in Perſia to have a copy thereof [g] (B).

(B) The true orthography of this prince's name is, Ardeſchir Bâbecân. The reaſon we have not writ it ſo in the text, is this; all the authorities that we have quoted make uſe of that manner of ſpelling which is inſerted therein, and which conſequently became neceſſary in our text. He was not only the reſtorer of the Perſian monarchy in reſpect to its civil concerns, by aſſuming the antient title, following the antient cuſtoms, and laying claim to all the dominions of the antient kings; but he was likewiſe ſo in reſpect to the religion of the Perſians, which by this time, was miſerably corrupted. For the purging out all idolatry and ſuperſtition, the king ſummoned a general council of all the wiſe men in his kingdom; the number of theſe was forty thouſand. Out of theſe were ſelected four thouſand; from theſe four hundred; from them forty; and from theſe ſeven. Among theſe was a young man, whoſe name was Erdâvirâph, of unſpotted reputation, and perfectly verſed in the writings of Zerdûſht. This man, having drank three glaſſes of a certain odoriferous wine, remained, in the preſence of the king and of the other ſix learned men, ſeven nights and days in an ecſtaſy or trance. Then riſing up, he dictated to a ſecretary all that he had ſeen in his viſion, and a very large recapitulation of the magian faith. This miracle, or pretended miracle, wrought ſo ſtrongly on king Ardſchir, that he immediately cancelled all the laws which had been made from the time of Alexander the great in favour of idolatry or polytheiſm, and fully re-eſtabliſhed the religion of Zerdûſht. This, as the reader will perceive by our quotations, we have from the very beſt authorities among the eaſtern writers (3). It is, however, very ſingular and worthy of obſervation, that

THE wisdom, moderation, and success of Ardshir Babegan, as they made him almost adored by his subjects in his life-time, so they caused his character to be regarded as a model by those who succeeded him in his throne, which he left vacant, after a reign of fourteen years. A certain historian says, he reigned forty; but, if any regard be paid to his assertion, we must suppose that term to commence from his first taking up arms against Ardavan; whereas most of the historians reckon, as they ought to do, from his accession to the throne on the defeat and death of that prince [h].

that a Rabbinical writer also hath conserved the memory of this very fact: "Orschir, the son of Bábec, the first prince of that "family, caused it to be proclaimed thoughout all Persia, that "he had taken away the sword of Aristotle the philosopher, "which had devoured the inhabitants of that empire five hun-"dred years (4)." By the sword of Aristotle are to be understood the political maxims of Alexander and his successors, which, by this reformation, Ardschir thoroughly extinguished; and on this account the Oriental writers attribute to him the subversion of the third dynasty, which they called Molouck Thaouaif, i. e. the kings of the nations; because tho' the Arsacidæ were Persians, yet they adhered to the Macedonian maxims, and suffered all the petty princes, to whom Alexander had given dominions, to retain them; whereas Ardschir resumed them all, assumed the title of Shâh in-Shâh, or king of kings, and transmitted a new set of maxims to his successors, who followed them very carefully. As to the famous book mentioned in our text, it may not be amiss to quote from thence some maxims relating to the conduct of princes, as a taste of that excellent work, which was, and is still, so highly esteemed throughout the east. It begins thus: "So long as a prince applies himself with diligence to the ad-"ministration of public affairs and the rendering justice to all "degrees of people, his subjects continue affectionate to him, "and look upon obedience in the light of their own interest. "Elsewhere he says, The worst of all princes is he, from whom "the wicked have all things to hope, and the good all things to "fear. That all the branches of society are inseparably united "to the trunk, and that neither can be affected independent of "the other; whence it follows, that kings have their cares, "and

Schabour I. SCHABOUR, or Shah-pour, whom the Greeks call Sapor, succeeded his father, having been preserved, as we have related before, by the tenderness of his prime minister. He was very young when he came to the throne, and therefore the nobility thought it necessary to give him a guardian or protector, who was his uncle by his mother's side, and might consequently have pretended to the crown. He not only executed his charge with integrity and reputation; but when the Persian nobility besought him to change his title and assume that of king, he absolutely refused it, giving up the government to his nephew, as soon as he was of an age capable of ruling his subjects. Schabour was so well educated, that, after he came to the exercise of the sovereign authority, he did not pretend to use his uncle as a counsellor, but rather affected to consult him as a parent; and whenever he had occasion, either to go into the field against the Romans, or to make a progress into any distant province of his dominions, he left his uncle cloathed with a royal authority; so that the Persian historians have actually accounted this Ardshir one of the kings of Persia. There cannot be any thing more different from another than the character of Schabour, as it is drawn by the Oriental historians, and that of Sapor, as it stands in the Latin and Greek writers. We have already seen what the latter say; our business at present lies with the former. They report, that this Schabour was a prince of a magnificent disposition, who sought above all things, to adorn his country with fine cities and stately public buildings. With this view he made frequent visits to all the provinces of his empire, that he might be the better acquainted with their situation, their trade, and manufactures, and consequently have it more in his power to confer upon them real benefits. In the province of Khouhistan, which, we call Susiana, he built a fine new city, restored also its antient capital to its pristine beauty, and caused a most stupendous dike to be erected, to bear the weight of a river, which be brought to run over it, for the sake of supplying the adjacent country with water. In the province of Fars, or Perſia proper, he built the city of Naoubendgian, in one of the fineſt plains in the univerſe; which city, in gratitude to its founder, was a long time called Caſbah Schabour. But the moſt famous, and by far the greateſt city of all he built, was that Niſchabour in Koraſſan. It ſeems the king was marching his army through that province, and by accident encamped near the ruins of an antient city, which had been deſtroyed by Alexander the Great, the remains of which were almoſt every-where over-grown by roſe-buſhes. The king, charmed with the ſituation of the place, returned thither again as ſoon as the campaign was over; and, after having ordered all the roſe-buſhes to be cut up, cleared away the ruins, and by ſending regular detachments from his army to work upon the foundations of his new city, he, in a ſhort ſpace, ſaw it in ſuch a forwardneſs, as invited all the inhabitants of the adjoining country to come and ſettle in it. On account of the roſe-buſhes, he called it Niſchabour, i. e. the roſe of Sapor, "nei" ſignifying, in thePerſian tongue, a roſe. As the Latin and Greek writers are very ſilent as to his victories, ſo the Perſian hiſtorians ſay as little of his vices, and not a ſyllable of his ordering the emperor Valerian to be flayed alive [i]. Mirkhond is the only writer who gives us any account of his death, which, according to him, happened in a very ſurpriſing manner. His ſevere juſtice ſo much alarmed ſome rapacious courtiers, that they took the opportunity offered them by a ſtormy night, to enter the royal tent, where they murdered Schabour and his attendants; which when they had done, they cut its cords, and ſet it on fire; ſo that the guards apprehended his tent had been ſet on fire by lightning. There are different accounts of the years of his reign; but the beſt writers agree, that he held the ſceptre thirty-one years [k].

HORMOUZ, whom the Greeks call Hormiſdas, ſucceeded his father Schabour, and was a moſt generous prince; inſomuch, that moſt of the antient hiſtorians call him Hormouz, alHorri, i. e. Hormiſdas, the liberal. We are told of him, that when one of the governors of his province on the frontiers of the Indies ſent him an expreſs, to inform him, that he could purchaſe a quantity of very fine diamonds for a hundred thouſand pieces of gold, the king wrote him back, that he ſhould let them alone. Upon this the governor ſent him a ſecond expreſs, to acquaint him, that they might be ſold

ſold for two hundred thouſand; ſo that his majeſty might gain cent. per cent. Hormouz replied, "A hundred, or a hund-"red per cent. will not tempt me. If I become a trader, "who muſt take up the trade of being a king? Or what will "become of the Perſian merchants, if the royal treaſures "are employed to foreſtal them?" He was one of the handſomeſt princes of his time, and exceedingly beloved by his ſubjects, tho' it does not appear, that he was a very martial monarch, or that he made any conqueſts. It is ſaid, that he ſhewed a great deal of favour to the famous heretic Manes, and that he built for him, on the borders of the province of Suſiana, a caſtle or place of retreat, called Daſcarah; and it is further reported, that he embraced his opinions. This, we apprehend, ought to be underſtood in a limited ſenſe, and be conſtrued only as to the notions that arch-heretic held in philoſophy; for tho' it be true, that Manes, or, as the Orientals call him, Mani, held very pernicious tenets in theology, yet it is as true, that he was a very great mathematician, and, by conſtant practice, attained ſuch a facility of drawing geometrical figures, that he would ſtrike circles of any given diameter with a pencil only, without the aſſiſtance of compaſſes. During the reign of Sapor, he was obliged to abſcond, that prince being an enemy to the ſetting up of all new religions in his country; and on this account it was, that Mani fled into Turqueſtan. There, by dint of his eloquence and ſkill in the ſciences, he acquired many diſciples. He affected great auſterity of life, and uſed to retire ſometimes for a day or two to meditate in the deſert. This was very advantageous to him; for it made the people believe him a very holy perſon, and gave him leiſure to ſtudy how to confirm them more and more in that belief. Once, as he was rambling in this manner, he diſcovered a cave, which, tho' it had a narrow entrance, was very large within, and had a fine ſtream running through it. Thither he privately tranſported his books and papers, with as much bread and dried fruits as might ſerve him for a year. Theſe meaſures taken, he told his diſciples, that God would call him for a time up into heaven; but that, after a year, he would return and meet them in ſuch a plain. Upon this he withdrew into his cave, and, during the twelve-month that he lived there, he wrote a large book of enigmatical ſchemes and pretended revelations; which book, at the end of the year he produced to his diſciples, affirming, that he brought it from heaven. Shortly after, hearing that Schabour bour was dead, and that his ſon Hormouz was a very learned man and a great patron of the ſciences, he returned into Perſia, and, as we have obſerved, ingratiated himſelf ſo with the king, that he built for him an hermitage, which was ſo well fortified, that ſo long as he remained therein, his enemies were not able to do him any hurt. If Hormouz had reigned long, in all probabiliy Mani would have ſecured to himſelf a party ſtrong enough to have ſupported him ; but his protector died before he had reigned two years, with the reputation, however, of having been an excellent prince, one equally tender of his ſubjects welfare, and of the prerogative of the crown [m] (C).

(C) Beſides what is ſaid in the text, we ſhall add here ſome anecdotes concerning the heroic Manes. The learned Schikard is much miſtaken, when he affirms, that his name was not Manes, but Manicheus, quaſi mannam fundens (6). The great Epiphanius is as much out. He would needs ſuggeſt, that this heretic aſſumes the name of Manes, becauſe, in the Chaldaic tongue, "Man" ſignifies a veſſel; whereby he would intimate, that he was a pure and choſen veſſel. The truth is, he was a Perſian by birth, and his name Mani. Had he been a Chaldean, or had he lived on the borders of Chaldea, when he firſt vented his hereſy, there might have been ſome ground for this conjecture; but as he ſpread his hereſy firſt in the deſert towards Turqueſtan, what probability is there, that he ſhould aſſume a name, the etymology whereof could not there be underſtood (7)? He was by profeſſion a painter; and we are told, that he could draw a line with a pencil twenty yards exactly ſtrait. His excellency in drawing made himconvert moſt of his lectures in religion into emblematical devices, not unlike thoſe of Jacob Boehm. Hence the book he pretended to bring from heaven, was called Ertengh, tengh ſignifying a picture (8). What we have recorded of him in the text, we have tranſcribed verbatim from Khondemir, who opens his account with theſe words: "Mani the Sadducee was a man "excellently ſkilled in painting and ſculpture, who when he "heard that Jeſus had promiſed the Comforter ſhould come, the "devil ſuggeſted to him, that he ſhould pretend to be that "Comforter; which accordingly he did, &c." As to the notions of him and his diſciples, all the Oriental writers agree, that they were a mixture of the magian and chriſtian doctrines; and that, in a very ſhort ſpace of time, they ſplit into ſeveral ſects, according as they entertained different explications of their maſter's prin-

Baharam I. Baharam, the ſon of Hormouz, ſucceeded him. This is the name which the Greeks endeavour to expreſs by the ſeveral appellations of Varanes, Varharanes, and Vararanes. At the beginning of his reign he affected to treat Mani with greater deference than ever his father did, and even ſuggeſted to him a deſign of ſettling his opinions as the national religion of Perſia; in order to which, he invited him to a conference with his magi, that the people might be the better convinced of their monarch's caution in ſo important an affair. His vanity engaged Mani to comply with the king's requeſt; ſo that, leaving his fortreſs, he went, without the leaſt apprehenſion, to court, in order to diſpute with ſuch learned men as he ſuppoſed would be aſſembled there. On his arrival, Baharam ordered him to be ſeized; ſhortly after he cauſed him to be flayed alive, and his ſkin being ſtuffed with ſtraw, he ordered it to be ſet on the top of a hill, with a good guard, as a ſignal to the Manichees of his kind intention towards them. This had the propoſed effect; for all the diſciples of Mani retired immediately out of Perſia, and not believing themſelves ſafe even on its frontiers, they fled into the very heart of the Indies, and ſome of them as far as China [n]. This ſeems to have been the greateſt exploit that Baharam performed, tho' he was a prince of parts, and who earneſtly ſought the welfare of his people, as we may gather from this ſaying of his; "That humanity was "not to be defined, becauſe therein were comprehended "all the other virtues." He reigned with great applauſe three years and three months, at the end of which he was murdered in the baſeſt manner that can be imagined. A tumult happening in his capital, he went in perſon to appeaſe it; which when he had effected, a kinſman of his took the advantage of the croud and confuſion to let fly an arrow, which principles (9). The Oriental writers likewiſe agree, that his patron Hormouz was a moſt learned and beneficent prince; his favourite ſaying was this. "That kings were like fire, they "warmed thoſe who ſtood at a diſtance, and ſcorched ſuch as "ventured too near (10)."

which struck the king to the heart, to the great grief as well as to the great loss of his subjects ° (D).

Baharam II. Baharam II. succeeded his father Baharam I. Some writers say, he was only the adopted son of the last king. However that might be, it is generally agreed, that, at the beginning of his reign, he gave his subjects no great hopes of him. On the contrary, he acted with such austerity, haughtiness, and cruelty, that the people gave him the surname of Khalef, i. e. the unjust. The nobility of Persia, who were never over-complaisant to tyrants, began to think of ridding themselves of so bad a master, by deposing him at least, if not by putting him to death. The magi, however, checked this design in its birth, offering to risque their own safety for the good of the people, by remonstrating to the king on the folly of his conduct. This they did with such warmth, and at the same time with such an evident display of loyalty, that Baharam acknowledged them for his counsellors and protectors, changed the whole bent of his conduct, and, from being a very bad became a most excellent prince, during the remainder of his reign. A certain christian author affirms, that this monarch vanquished the Romans, and that, having taken prisoner the son of the emperor Galienus, he caused him to be put to death. Of this, however, the Oriental writers say nothing; and there is reason to suspect, that this author was imposed on. Most authors agree, that this prince reigned but seventeen years [p].

(D) As we often quote the excellent work of D'Herbelot in this history, it is necessary to give the reader notice, to prevent his suspecting him or us of a mistake, that we do not reckon the Baharams kings of Persia in the same order as he does; but so, that his Baharan III. is our Baharam II. his Baharam IV. our Baharam III. and so on. The reason is this: He reckons Baharam of the third dynasty Baharam I. which, his method considered, is very just; but as the periods of Persian history in this work are at a distance one from another, such a mingling of dynasties would occasion confusion; which to avoid, we have taken a contrary method. We likewise take this opportunity of noting, that we cite the Oriental historians as we use them; so that the reader may at all times distinguish on what authority any remarkable fact is built (11).

(11) D'Herbelot. B. O. artic. Baharam.

Baharam III.

BAHARAM III. ſucceeded Baharam II. During his father's life-time, he was governor of the province of Scigiſtan, which is the reaſon that the Greek writers call him Seganſaa. He reigned thirteen years, without performing any thing extraordinary; or, if he did, the Oriental hiſtorians, as well as the Greeks, have treated him very indifferently; for we find little ſaid of him, even in their moſt copious authors, and as for Mirkhond, he ſays nothing of him at all. Hence it is apparent, that the Oriental writers are not ſo fond of fiction, as they are generally repreſented to be; for, if they were, they would not certainly ſuffer ſuch chaſms in their hiſtories, but rather try to fill them up with inventions of their own, as ſome of our northern writers have done [q].

NARSI BEN BAHARAM, that is, Narſi the ſon of Baharam, ſucceeded Baharam the third his brother, tho' from his ſurname ſome authors have taken him for his father, and in truth he was the ſon, not of Baharam III. but of Baharam II. He proved a prince of a mild temper, gracious to his ſubjects, and deſirous, as far as was in his power, of doing them good; but he had the misfortune to attack the Romans, when they had many great generals and ſeveral potent armies on foot; in conſequence of which he was defeated, and loſt all his frontier provinces; for grief of which, it is ſaid, he broke his heart, when he had reigned nine years [r].

Hormouz II

HORMOUZ the ſon of Narſi, or, according to the Greeks, Hormiſdas the ſon of Narſes ſucceeded his father. All the Oriental hiſtorians agree, that he was a prince endued with all the virtues capable of adding luſtre to a crown. Among theſe his juſtice was by far the moſt conſpicuous. He ſaw with regret the ill uſe that too many of the nobility made of their great power and riches, in oppreſſing the meaner ſort of people, and thereby diſcouraging induſtry and trade, the chief ſupports of all well-governed kingdoms. To eradicate ſo dangerous an evil, he fixed a particular tribunal or court of juſtice, wherein the complaint of the meaneſt man in Perſia might be heard againſt the greateſt; and for fear that intereſt or authority might beget partiality even here, he came frequently and preſided in perſon. He likewiſe deviſed many new laws and regulations, for the benefit of the middling ſort of people, and for the encouragement of trade; out of regard regard to which he was extremely careful of the maritime coaſts, and of all the ports of Perſia. He likewiſe built in the province of Kerman, which the Greeks call Caramania, a very famous city and port, which he called by his own name Hormouz, or, as we pronounce it, Ormus. It was ſeated conveniently along the ſea-ſhore, and, towards the land, was ſhaded by groves of palm-trees; ſo that, in proceſs of time, it became equally remarkable for its being a trading city, and alſo the market for the commodities of a multitude of induſtrious people, who cultivated the fertile plain behind it. In the end, however, its riches proved its ruin; ſo that the inhabitants, finding themſelves expoſed to continual ravages, abandoned it, and tranſported themſelves into an iſland in the Perſian gulf, almoſt over-againſt their old place of reſidence; where they built a new city, which they likewiſe called Ormuz, the ſame that was afterwards conquered by the Portugueze, and of which, in the ſubſequent part of our hiſtory, together with its kings, we ſhall give a particular account. But to return to Hormouz or Hormiſdas; he is ſaid to have extended his dominions very conſiderably, and to have been no leſs fortunate in war, than he was wiſe and temperate in peace. The province of Suſiana was peculiarly favoured by this monarch; inſomuch, that he built ſeveral cities therein, and repaired all ſuch as were fallen to decay: more he would, without queſtion, have done, if he had reigned longer; but, having ſat on the throne nine years, he gave way to fate [s] (E).

Schabour II. ſurnamed Dhoulactaf, i. e. Schabour of the ſhoulders, ſucceeded his father even before he was born, Schabour II.

(E) The Oriental writers differ among themſelves as to the foundation of the city of Hormouz on the continent, ſome attributing this to Hormouz the firſt, the ſon of Schabour; but we incline to think it was erected by this prince, becauſe the moſt accurate hiſtorians are of that ſentiment (12). A learned critic ſuggeſts, that the planet Mercury in the Perſian language was called Hormouz (13); but we are of another opinion, for we apprehend it to have been an attribute or name of the Supreme Being (14).

the crown being placed on his mother's belly, and the nobles ſwearing to acknowledge for their ſovereign the child ſhe ſhould bring forth. In his nonage the Perſians were expoſed to many diſaſters, more eſpecially to the inſults and ravages of the Arabs, who, under their king Thair, broke in vaſt numbers into Perſia, and ſpread deſolation where-ever they came, plundering the royal cities, and carrying off the ſiſter of the late king Hormouz and the aunt of Schabour into captivity. When the young king came to attain the age which qualified him for martial exploits, he determined at all events, to revenge the injuries which had been done him and his ſubjects during his infancy. With this view he, with a choice body of troops, made a quick march, and ſurprized Thair, in one of his frontier provinces. The place was indeed inveſted, before the Arab prince had any notice of it; but it was ſo ſtrong and the garriſon ſo well provided, that, in all probability, Schabour muſt have abandoned his enterprize, if Malekah, whom ſome call the ſiſter, others affirm to have been the daughter, of Thair, had not betrayed the place to Schabour, with whom ſhe fell in love, and thereby put the king, the nobility, and the garriſon into the hands of their mortal enemy. Schabour took this opportunity of revenging the cruelties committed by the Arabs in Perſia, by putting Thair, and all who were with him, to the ſword, aſſigning this as his reaſon, that if a king would ſo far forget his own dignity as to turn robber, he ought not to expect that his enemies ſhould conſider him in any other light. This prince was ſovereign of Yemen, which province Schabour immediately over-ran, putting numbers of the inhabitants to the ſword, and cauſing the ſhoulder-bones of all who were able to bear arms to be broke; whence he had the ſurname of Dhoulactaf, as the general opinion is. The Arab writers, however, give us ſomewhat a different account of this matter: they ſay, that, on Schabour's return into Perſia, Malek Ben Naſſer, one of the anceſtors of Mohammed, was deputed by the Arabians to intercede with the king, and to beſeech him to treat them with greater lenity, or at leaſt to diſcover the true cauſe of his implacable hatred. Malek, in purſuance of this commiſſion, took all the pains he could to ſoften the inflexible temper of the Perſian king, who at length told him, that his averſion to the Arabs proceeded from his being adviſed by his aſtrologers, that they would one day ſubvert the Perſian empire, and inflict the greateſt cruelties upon his people.

Malek

Malek Ben Naſſer took this occaſion of remonſtrating againſt the ſeverity of his proceedings on ſo ſlight a pretence, ſince the predictions of ſuch ſort of people were at leaſt as often falſe as true, and therefore could never be of weight enough to paſs for reaſons of ſtate. On the other hand he remarked, that if there ſhould be any grounds for believing this prophecy, the king's conduct was the moſt impolitic that could be; becauſe his treating the Arabs ſo harſhly could not fail of giving them the moſt inveterate hatred againſt the Perſians, which muſt prove fatal to them, whenever they became ſubject to thoſe whom they had thus maltreated. Schabour, having reflected upon this, altered his conduct entirely, and not only put an end to thoſe miſeries which he had inflicted on that unhappy people, but alſo favoured and encouraged them on all occaſions; whence, as the Arab writers ſay, he acquired the ſurname of Dhoulacnaf, i. e. on the wings; by which the Arabs would ſignify, that he was their protector, becauſe the eagles are ſaid to carry their young ones on their wings [t]

SCHABOUR, as we have already ſeen in our former period, was at continual enmity with the Romans; and tho', during the reign of Conſtantine the Great, he durſt not attempt any thing very conſiderable, yet that did not hinder him from taking all the neceſſary ſteps to act effectually, when ever an opportunity ſhould offer. The Oriental writers give us an inſtance of this, of which there is not the leaſt trace to be found in any of the Greek hiſtorians, tho' it be more ſingular than any thing they have recorded: Schabour was ſo deſirous of being thoroughly acquainted with the ſtate of the Roman empire, that he went to Conſtantinople himſelf, under colour of being an embaſſador from Perſia. He had not, however, been long there before he was ſuſpected, and thereupon impriſoned; during which time the Romans made ſeveral incurſions into the Perſian provinces, and treated the people with great ſeverity. At length Schabour having corrupted a lady of the court, ſhe not only procured him his liberty, but fled with him. They were obliged to travel with great circumſpection, and, not without much-ado and after many dangers paſſed, they arrived at a little hermitage in Media; which place hath ever ſince been called Schahbouran. It is not very clear, whether the religious Perſians, who reſided here, were of the chriſtian, manichean, or magian religion; but, whatever whatever they were, their chief was very loyal, acquainted the king with the preſent ſituation of things, and took pains to convey his orders where-ever he directed; ſo that, by degrees, Schabour aſſembled a very conſiderable body of troops, and with them fell ſo opportunely on the Roman forces, that he gave them an entire defeat. The king's ſtay in Media gave him an opportunity of obſerving the ſituation of that country, and the improvements of which it was capable. This determined him to build a new city not far from the hermitage, where he had repoſed himſelf after his return from Conſtantinople, hoping that, when it became conſiderable and was thoroughly peopled, it would ſerve as a barrier, and protect the open country from the inſults of neighbouring nations [u].

As ſoon therefore as the circumſtances of the times would permit, Schabour laid the foundations of the city of Cazvin, which we call Caſbin. When he firſt began this work, he found himſelf exceſſively annoyed by the Delemites, who began to be jealous of his undertaking. Schabour, who was a very wiſe prince, perceiving that it was not at all in his power to carry on the building of his city and a war with theſe people at the ſame time, reſolved to bribe them; which accordingly he did, by conſiderable gifs for the preſent, and promiſes of ſtill greater things hereafter. When Caſbin was finiſhed, aud the Delemites began to renew their incurſions, Schabour, who was by this time at peace both with the Romans and the Arabs, turned his whole force upon them, and eaſily ſubdued them, adding thereby the province of Deilem to his empire, which had been an antient and independent kingdom till then, and which became ſo again, after the Arabians made themſelves maſters of Perſia. This monarch alſo beautified and inlarged the antient city of Scheuſtar in the province of Khouhiſtan, where he likewiſe re-edified another antient city, called Corkh, and which he afterwards called by his own name. He was one of the greateſt and moſt fortunate monarchs of this dynaſty, and, during his long reign of ſeventy-two years, not only made great conqueſts on all ſides of his dominions, but but alſo wonderfully improved his territories, by building cities and encouraging the trade of his ſubjects [x] (F).

Ardſchir II. ARDSCHIR ſucceeded Schabour, and governed the Perſian kingdom for twelve years. One author aſſures us, that he was uncle by the mother's ſide to the laſt king; another, that he was only his couſin; and a third, that he was brother by the mother's ſide to Schabour Dhoulactaf. However it was, he aſſumed the goverment at firſt as tutor only, or protector, to Schabour III. tho' afterwards the nobility prevailed upon him to take the title of king. The reader will eaſily perceive, that the Perſians were afraid of nothing ſo much as of being governed by a child, which was the true cauſe, that they were deſirous of conferring the regal dignity on him, whoſe birth and abilities made him the moſt proper for diſcharging its eſſential functions. It may be, the miſeries the kingdom had endured, under the minority of the laſt king, might the more ſtrongly incline them to make uſe of this expedient, to prevent their falling under the like misfortunes a ſecond time. It is alſo very remarkable, that the nobility did not ſuffer this Ardſchir to transfer the crown to his family, though they gave it him for life; but immediately diately upon his demiſe called his kinſman the ſon of Schabour II. to the ſucceſſion, who was by this time become a man, and capable of taking the reins of government into his own hands.

(F) The learned Schikard (15) takes a great deal of pains in rectifying a miſtake in the verſion of Mirkhond by Teixera (16). The ſirname of the Perſian king is there written Zabel Ketaf, which, the judicious critic rightly conjectures, ſhould have been Dhul-Aktaf; but then he is in a great miſtake himſelf, for he attributes this ſirname to Schabour the firſt, to whom it did not belong. He is, however, perfectly juſt in his cenſure of Reineccius (17), who had condemned Nicephorus, an antient writer, for calling Schabour the firſt Choſroes, ſince that was no miſtake, all the kings of this dynaſty preſerving this appellation. The hiſtory of Schabour's being crowned in his mother's belly, is not only to be found in the Oriental writers and in the Greek hiſtorians, but alſo in the writings of the Rabbins; and therefore, tho' the fact is an odd one, yet it cannot be called incredible (18). We thought it unneceſſary to load this reign with recapitulations of facts mentioned in the former period, or with ſuch immaterial circumſtances, as might have ſwelled this part of our hiſtory beyond its due bounds.

Schabour III. SCHABOUR III. the ſon of Schabour Dhoulactaf, governed the kingdom of Perſia five years and four months in great tranquillity. He was cotemporary with Theodoſius the great, with whom he made a ſtrict alliance, and lived in the greateſt friendſhip during his whole reign. As he was a very pacific prince, and ſought nothing ſo much as to keep his kingdom from feeling the plague of war, that his ſubjects might have leiſure to repair all former loſſes, we ought not to wonder, that the account we have of his reign is very ſuccinct, and amounts to neither more nor leſs than we have recorded [a].

Baharam IV. BAHARAM I. ſucceeded his father Schabour, whom he very much reſembled in his diſpoſition. He had in his father's life-time been governor of the province of Kerman, and, according to the privilege of the royal family, was ſtyled Kerman-Shah. This the Greek writers converted into a ſirname, which is the reaſon, that in their hiſtories he is called Varanes Cermanſaa. He governed the kingdom eleven years, in which ſpace of time the Perſians grew ſo extravagantly rich, that their pride inclined them to frequent revolts; in one of which the king, preſenting himſelf ſuddenly among the rebels, and expoſtulating with them on the folly and madneſs of their behaviour, was baſely ſhot with an arrow behind his back, and died upon the ſpot [b].

Jezdegerd. JEZDEGERD ſucceeded his father Baharam, and proved a very bad prince. Equally cruel and avaricious, he diſtreſſed his ſubjects alike in their perſons and their properties. This was the more grievous to the Perſians, becauſe in the life-time of his father he had affected ſo much modeſty, humanity, and condeſcenſion, that never any monarch promiſed more at his acceſſion, or performed leſs during his adminiſtration. Hence he was ſirnamed Al Athim, i. e. The Wicked, or, The Abandoned. There is ſome reaſon to ſuſpect, that his character hath been injured through the malice of the magi, who could never forgive him his ſtrong inclinations to the chriſtians, and his keeping ſo ſtrict a hand on the clergy of the eſtabliſhed religion. This king had had the misfortune to see all his children die within a month after they were born. This made him very uneasy; and therefore he consulted not only the Persian physicians, but also all the travellers who visited his dominions, as to the wholesomest air they were acquainted with, in order to try, whether, by removing a child as soon as possible thither, he might not conserve the succession in his family. The result of this enquiry was, that the province of Hirah was recommended to him, as that where the best air was to be found. This country was a part of Chaldea, which, on the falling out of Alexander the Great's successors among themselves, an Arab prince had seized, and having built a city therein, called it Hirah, and made it the cipital of a little principality, which in process of time became tributary to the Persians. The name of the present possessor of this small sovereignty was Nooman, for whom Jezdegerd sent as soon as his son Baharam was born. When he came to court, the king put the child, who was then about a month old, into his hands; acquainted him how unlucky he had been in the rest of his children, and told him that what he expected from him was, the education of his son, after the manner of the Arabs, in all those exercises which usually encrease the strength of the body, and render men healthy and robust. Nooman on his part promised to take all imaginable care of the child, whom he immediately carried home with him; and Jezdegerd, being now at ease in his mind, governed his dominions, according to his own maxims, and little to the satisfaction of the magi, twenty-one years. At the end of this space, as he was looking upon a horse extremely beautiful, and which he much valued, the beast suddenly struck him with one of its hind feet on the stomach, with such force, that he immediately fell down dead, and thereby delivered the discontented part of his subjects from a master, whose government they hated, and whom yet they were not able to depose. As soon as he was dead, those who were so much disaffected to him took advantage of the absence of the prince his son to transfer the regal dignity to another family. Accordingly, they fixed on Kersa, a nobleman of fair qualities and great fortune; from whom having drawn many advantageous concessions in their own favour, they saluted him king, and actually put him in possession not only of the royal robes and ornaments, but also of the royal treasure, procured the submission of the forces then on foot, and the consent of the greatest part of the provinces of that extended empire [c].

Baharam V. BAHARAM V. surnamed Gour, or rather Jur, for a reason that will appear in the course of our history, was as we have seen, sent in his infancy to the court of an Arab prince, for the sake of establishing his constitution; which end was perfectly answered by the care his guardian took of his education. Nooman Ben Mondir, to whose care he was committed, caused two palaces to be built for his reception in the capital city of his dominions. These were built by the greatest architect of the east, whose name was Sennamar. These castles or palaces were called Sedir and Khaouarnak, and the Arab writers tell us, that amongst other singularities, the stones of which they were built were hewn in such a manner, as to change their colour several times in a day, by their different reflections of light; and that they were so contrived, as to lean upon a single stone, which, if removed, the whole building would have fallen to the ground. Nooman most bountifully rewarded Sennamar for his care and skill; but that unfortunate person having indiscreetly given out, that he could have performed still greater things, if he had expected to have been paid in such a manner, Nooman began to doubt his fidelity, and whether he might not be induced by money to divulge the secret of the supporting stones in the palaces he had built; and therefore ordered him to be thrown from the top of one of them to the bottom, whereby the miserable man lost his life. In process of time, Nooman, the tutor of Baharam, became a convert to the christian religion, and in consequence thereof, thought fit to retire from the world, and to spend the rest of his days in an hermitage in the desart, resigning the crown and the care of the young Persian prince to his son Hendu. This prince was no less careful of Baharam than his father had been; he provided for his health both in body and mind, he took care to have him taught all the exercises, and to be instructed in all the learning, with which a person of his high quality ought to be acquainted. He gave him lessons himself in the art of governing, and at the same time, that he discharged the duty of governor, shewed himself on all occasions his friend in the circumstances of private life, as he was his constant companion

nion in all his diverſions. By this means Baharam, who had an excellent genius, grew one of the moſt accompliſhed princes of his age, and had a ſagacity and reſolution almoſt incredible, conſidering his tender years [d].

Enters Perſia at the head of an army.

WHEN the news of his father's death reached Hirah, the young prince could not help expreſſing, not only his amaſement at the conduct of the Perſian nobility, but his reſolution not to part with the crown on ſuch eaſy terms. He therefore addreſſed himſelf to Hendu, and beſought him to furniſh him with ſome troops, that he might endeavour by force to recover what was undoubtedly his right. The king of Hirah, who owed him his allegiance as being dependent on the Perſian empire, promiſed him all the aſſiſtance in his power. When he was thus embarqued in the buſineſs, he thought proper to invite all the Arabian princes his neighbours to a council, wherein he expoſed the right of Baharam to the Perſian throne, and the indignity offered them in his excluſion, on account of his being bred up among them. The petty princes, to whom he addreſſed himſelf, eaſily received the impreſſions he ſought to make upon their minds, and, with great alacrity, promiſed to ſupport the pretenſions of his pupil with their utmoſt force. This point gained, Baharam, at the head of ten thouſand Arabian horſe, entered the Perſian territories, and was ſhortly after followed by Hendu and the confederate princes with thirty thouſand more. The Perſian nobility, obſtinate in their rebellion, drew together a great army, in order to maintain the king they had made choice of upon the throne. Things being in this ſituation, a general and deciſive battle was daily expected, the armies being within half a day's march of each other; but, by the wiſdom of Hendu, a negotiation was ſet on foot. Both parties were deſirous of deciding the buſineſs without blood, and yet neither of them would recede in the leaſt from their pretenſions. In this critical juncture, Baharam propoſed an expedient, which was inſtantly accepted. It was this; that the crown of Perſia ſhould be placed on a cuſhion between two hungry lions, and that the prince who would fetch it ſhould wear it. On the day appointed the experiment was made, and the crown placed between the lions. Then Baharam, turning to his competitor, ſaid, "Kerſa, Why don't you go and fetch the "crown? I need not, anſwered he; I am in poſſeſſion of it al- "ready; you deſire it, therefore do you go and take it." Baha-ram inſtantly fell upon the lions, killed them both, and took up the crown. Upon which Kerſa immediately ran towards him, embraced him, and did him homage. His example was followed by all the Perſian lords; and thus this controverſy, which had armed all the eaſt, was determined without bloodſhed, and to the ſatisfaction of all parties, the Perſians being charmed with the generoſity and valour of their new king; and Hendu and his Arabian confederates were no leſs pleaſed with the ſucceſs of their undertaking, and with the vaſt preſents, and other marks of gratitude, which were given them by Baharam at parting [e].

The Turks invade the Perſians with a prodigious army.

BAHARAM, on taking poſſeſſion of the throne, treated his ſubjects with ſuch lenity, and excuſed them from ſo many duties and taxes, that the oriental hiſtorians ſay, he turned the heads of the whole nation; inſomuch, that computing the hours between ſun-riſing and ſun-ſet, they divided theſe into equal parts: the firſt for buſineſs, the ſecond for diverſion. The king was ſo far from diſliking this, that he ſent for twelve thouſand muſicians from India, not only to divert his ſubjects, but to prevent their becoming fidlers and dancers themſelves; and it is ſaid, that thoſe, who follow this profeſſion at this day in Perſia are deſcended from theſe Indians. The khacan, for ſo the orientals call the ſovereign of Turqueſtan, having intelligence of the merry diſpoſition the Perſians were in, conceived, that a better opportunity would never offer for invading that rich and fertile country. Without therefore any previous declaration of war, he aſſembled a mighty army, ſome hiſtorians ſay, of three hundred thouſand men, with which he broke into Perſia like a torrent, ſpreading fire and ſword, deſtruction and deſolation, wherever he came. Baharam, as ſoon as he had intelligence of this, knowing well that it was impoſſible for him to raiſe any forces ſufficient to repell them, left his capital, and with a thouſand choſen horſe fled to the mountains, leaving the government in the hands of his brother Narſi. The Perſians inſtantly concluded, that the king had abdicated the government, and endeavoured to make the beſt terms they could with the conquerors; and thereupon ſent deputies to acquaint the khacan with the deſertion of their prince, and to implore his mercy. The khacan did not, however, take things upon truſt; he ſent out parties to obſerve the motions of Baharam and his horſe; and and theſe on their return having reported that they had followed the Perſian king two days march into Armenia, their maſter concluded from thence, that he was fled into the Roman territories, and that Perſia was abſolutely ſubdued [f].

BAHARAM, in the mean time, puſhed with his thouſand horſe through the ſtreights of Derbent, and keeping cloſe by the Caſpian ſea, came quite round into Turqueſtan; and having there refreſhed and remounted his troops, he ſuddenly and ſilently ſtole into Perſia; ſurpriſed the forces of the Khacan, who no longer kept any diſcipline, in the dead of the night; advanced in perſon to that monarch's tent, where he found him ſcarce awake, huddling on his cloaths, ſo that he ſtruck off his head without any reſiſtance; and the Perſians riſing every where upon the flying army, ſcarce a man of this huge multitude returned again into Turqueſtan. This wonderfully raiſed the reputation of Bahaham; his ſubjects began to look upon him as a perſon inſpired, and he on the other hand, being better ſatisfied with his brother's adminiſtration than his own, reſolved to travel for a time, and leave to him the reſettling the affairs of Perſia. This unaccountable vivacity, in otherwiſe ſo great a prince, cannot be accounted for any other way, than by conſidering where he received his education. This roving diſpoſition is the very character of an Arab chief, and indeed all the accounts we have of this monarch ſhew, that his manners were exactly thoſe of that nation. As for inſtance, the word Jur ſignifies a wild aſs, and this prince was called Bahaam Jur, becauſe he ſpent the greateſt part of his time in hunting that creature, a diverſion he had learned among the Arabs. But to return to the current of our hiſtory. Leaving the government of Perſia in the hands of his brother, he appeared in the habit of a private perſon at the court of an Indian prince; where he quickly diſtinguiſhed himſelf, ſo far as to merit the notice of the king, whoſe favourable inclinations towards him he greatly improved, by killing a monſtrous wild elephant, which had done a prodigious deal of miſchief. At length the king ſent him at the head of an army to oppoſe a very potent neighbour of his, who, notwithſtanding he had offered him tribute, invaded and plundered his country. This prince Baharam was ſo fortunate as to defeat, and he made ſo prudent a uſe of his victory, ry, that he put it out of the enemy's power to think of renewing the war for a conſiderable number of years at leaſt. On his return to court, the Indian king thought himſelf obliged to promote him to the office of prime vizier, and to give him his daughter to wife; which he accordingly did, with an immenſe fortune [g].

He returns into his dominions from India.

But as the graces of kings uſually produce envy in the minds of their ſubjects, againſt thoſe on whom they are conferred, ſo here the promotion of Baharam drew upon him the hatred of the Indians, though he reſcued them from oppreſſion, and by his wiſe adminiſtration procured them as great felicity as a people could enjoy. When therefore he perceived this, he reſolved to bear no longer with their ingratitude, eſpecially when he found their whiſpers had pierced the king's ear, and inclined him to alter his conduct towards him, though on his ſide not the leaſt occaſion had been given. This reſolution once taken, Baharam ſoon after diſcovered himſelf to the king, who was exceedingly alarmed, when he knew that the perſon, to whom he was ſo much indebted, was the king of Perſia, his potent neighbour, and one whoſe anceſtors had deprived him of a part of his dominions. The Perſian monarch, to rid him of all apprehenſions, acquainted him with his reſolution of returning forthwith into his own territories; and that, as well out of tender affection for his wife, as in return for the many favours he had received, he was content to yield up the places in diſpute. The Indian king received this declaration with the utmoſt joy, and Baharam, conceiving that no time was to be loſt, quitted his court immediately, and returned with his wife and family, with all the immenſe treaſures he had acquired, into Perſia. His ſubjects received him with all the demonſtrations of loyalty and cordial affection; and the king on his part promiſed to apply more aſſiduouſly to public affairs, than the vivacity of his diſpoſition had hitherto allowed him to do [h].

Turns his army on the Greeks and Arabians.

The firſt ſtep of importance he took after his return was, to ſend his brother Narſi with a great body of troops into Rumeſtan, ſo the Perſians call the dominions of the Greek emperor; and being informed that his forces met with no great oppoſition on that ſide, he ventured to make an expedition in perſon into Arabia, where he reduced the kingdom dom of Yemen with all its dependencies. After this he returned into Perſia, and reigned the reſt of his life in peace, beloved by his ſubjects and revered by his neighbours. Authors differ very much concerning the manner of his death. Some, and indeed the moſt conſiderable, ſay, that, being exceedingly addicted to hunting, and paſſing full ſpeed through a wood, his horſe fell with him into a deep pit, where he was ſtifled before any body came to his aſſiſtance [i]. Others affirm, that being engaged in a war with a neighbouring prince, and having defeated his army in battle, Baharam, in the purſuit, was ſo unlucky as to plunge his horſe into a moraſs; whence being unable to extricate himſelf, he was either ſuffocated, or periſhed with hunger. The reaſon this point remains ſo full of doubt and uncertainty, is this; the body of Baharam was never found, and conſequently all accounts ot his death muſt be conjectural only [k]. It is however, generally agreed, that this accident happened in the twenty-third year of his reign, and that, notwithſtanding the many irregularities in his conduct, he left behind him the character of being one of the braveſt and moſt generous, as he was one of the moſt fortunate, princes that ever ſwayed the Perſian ſceptre [l].

JEZDEGERD II. ſucceeded his father Baharam Gour. As he had been chiefly educated by his uncle Narſi, he became a prince of great knowledge and experience, though but a young man, when he aſcended the throne. He followed his father's example, in placing his uncle at the head of all his councils, yet without neglecting buſineſs himſelf, or deſerting any branch of it, to give himſelf up to another more agreeable to his temper. He was peculiarly ſtrict in doing juſtice, eſpecially between the great and ſuch as depended upon them. He reſtored all the excellent conſtitutions of his anceſtors, which in proceſs of time were ſunk into diſſuetude; where he found theſe inſufficient, he framed new laws, by the advice of his council. The care of ſeeing theſe executed he took wholly upon himſelf. The army on the other hand he rendered more affectionate to himſelf, than they had ever been to any of his predeceſſors; for he cauſed it to be excellently paid, and though he took care to preſerve diſcipline amongſt his ſoldiers, yet he cauſed cauſed their duty to be ſo thoroughly explained to them, and when he was obliged to puniſh, did it ſo gently, and with ſuch reluctancy, that he acquired the ſirname of Sipahdoſt, or the lover of his ſoldiers. There is, however, but one expedition of his mentioned, and that is againſt the Greeks, who, in his opinion, had broken the terms of their alliance with the Perſians. In order to convince them of the folly of this proceeding, Jezdegerd marched with a very numerous army into the Roman territories. Far from ſuffering his troops to live as in an enemy's country, he obliged his ſoldiers to pay for every thing they had, to treat the inhabitants with the greateſt civility, and to behave rather like ſtrangers, who came to ſee the country, than like enemies, diſpoſed to deſtroy it. The Greek emperor, fearing the conſequences, in caſe his ſubjects ſhould come to change their opinion as to the Perſian government, ſent to acquaint Jezdegerd, that he was ready to accept the terms he had formerly refuſed, and that he would pay the arrears of the tribute which he demanded; upon which the Perſian retired with his forces into his own country, without committing the leaſt diſorder, which gained him more reputation, than all their conqueſts had done his predeceſſors [m].

Makes choice of his younger ſon for his ſucceſſor.

THIS great prince had two ſons, the eldeſt called Ferouz, and the younger Hormouz. The latter was the favourite of his father, who took all imaginable care of his education, and alſo very aſſiduouſly promoted his intereſt with the nobility, that upon his own demiſe he might ſucceed him in the throne. This naturally induced great diſturbances in the kingdom, the elder brother taking all poſſible meaſures for defeating the project of his father in favour of his brother. To cool theſe heats, as alſo to pave the way to his own deſigns, the king thought fit to make his eldeſt ſon governor of Nimrouz, an antient province of the Perſian empire, comprehending the greateſt part of thoſe countries which are now called Sigiſtan and Makran, obliging him alſo to go and reſide in his government. This had a fair appearance, but was ſo far from anſwering the purpoſe of Jezdegerd, that it proved the means of defeating all the other precautions he had taken. This, however, did not happen in his life-time; for the good king, after a reign of eighteen years, died died ſuddenly, to the great grief, as well as to the inexpreſſible loſs, of his ſubjects, who ſaw themſelves plunged upon his death into a miſerable ſituation, out of which they were not extricated, till they had felt almoſt all the various calamities by which providence chaſtiſes offending nations [n].

HORMOUZ III. being upon the ſpot, having a great intereſt through his father's ſollicitations, and being himſelf a perſon of ſo great merit, as to have deſerved the name of Firzaneh, i. e. The Sage, ſeated himſelf upon the throne, and was acknowledged by almoſt all the nobility. As he reigned but a very ſhort time, moſt of the Perſian hiſtorians are ſilent as to his character. One of them, however, aſſures us, that his conduct, after his acceſſion, was very unlike his behaviour during the life-time of his father; for that he no ſooner found himſelf poſſeſſed of the ſovereign authority, but he began to tyrannize over his ſubjects, and to treat the nobility with equal contempt and ſeverity, though his title to the crown depended in a great meaſure upon their choice. However it was, he did not long enjoy that dignity, which it had coſt him ſo much pains to acquire. His brother Ferouz no ſooner heard of his acceſſion, than he determined in himſelf not to loſe tamely what he looked upon to be indubitably his right. It ſo happened, that the province of which he was governor lay on the frontiers of the country of the Haiathelites, who in the works of the Greek hiſtorians are called Nepthalites, and by the tranſlator of Mirkhond Euthalites. To the king of this nation, whoſe name was Khaſchnaouar, he applied himſelf, offering him a part at leaſt, if not the whole of his province, if he would aſſiſt him in taking the crown from his brother's head to ſet it upon his own. This propoſition was readily accepted, and Ferouz furniſhed by him with a body of thirty thouſand horſe. With theſe auxiliaries he entered Perſia, and was quickly joined by ſuch as had a good opinion of his title, and ſuch as had not been well received at his brother's court. Hourmouz was no ſooner acquainted with this ſtep taken by his brother, than he immediately marched towards him with all his father's forces. But it ſo fell out, that part of the Perſian army being diſſaffected, and the other part afraid of the Barbarians Ferouz had brought along with him, made but a poor a poor reſiſtance; ſo that, without much difficulty, the ſituation of things was entirely changed, and Hormouz was not only thruſt from the throne, but alſo put into chains and committed to priſon, when he had reigned but one year[n].

Ferouz. FEROUZ, being now exalted to the regal dignity, could not think himſelf ſafe, while his brother lived, tho' in a priſon; and therefore the firſt act of his reign was the cutting off the head of Hormouz, together with the heads of three of his chief counſellors. As to his conduct afterwards, it was pretty much of a piece with this extraordinary ſeverity, which darkened the very dawn of it: neither was it long before the Perſians began to perceive, that heaven viſibly puniſhed them, as well for their own offences, as for the great wickedneſs of their prince. The rod by which they were chaſtiſed was, a moſt ſevere drought, all the brooks and ſmall rivers being every-where dried up, the earth parched, and its fruits withered. It laſted ſix years, and in that ſpace deſtroyed ſuch multitudes, and brought the remainder into ſo miſerable a ſituation, that we are told the king and the nobility conſented to do open penance to avert the wrath of the Almighty. This they performed, and in the ſeventh year all the ſeaſons were wonderfully kind and pleaſant; the earth, being thoroughly moiſtened, bore the next year as it was wont, and the ſcourge being removed, Ferouz and his people returned to their old manner of living; that is to ſay, the king ruled according to his will, and his ſubjects, as ſoon as they had the utenſils of luxury, plunged themſelves into all ſorts of exceſſes. The obligations conferred upon the Perſian monarch by the king of the Haiathelites were ſo great, that one may eaſily judge of the diſpoſition of Ferouz, by his behaviour towards his benefactor. The people were no ſooner recovered from that miſery and conſternation, which had been ſpread amongſt them by the late famine and drought, but preſently Ferouz was for turning his arms againſt him who had ſet him on the throne. It is true, that ſome Perſian authors alledge, that the ſubjects of this prince entered the frontiers of Perſia, and plundered them in a hoſtile manner; but there is little reaſon to believe this, becauſe the ſame writers confeſs, that the Perſians were were out of comparison more powerful, and that the misfortunes they afterwards met with could not possibly have befallen them, but by their own temerity and ill conduct [P].

Invades the country of the Haiathelites.

FEROUZ was not long in executing his project; he drew together as numerous an army as the circumstances of the Persian affairs would allow, and, as soon as he had drawn them together, he marched northwards in order to invade the country of the Haiathelites. The king of that people was under the greatest amazement, when he heard of the preparations Ferouz had made. An officer in his troops, as some historians say, but, as others affirm, his grand vizier took upon him to revive his courage, by promising him a victory without fighting, if he would listen to his advice. This man had, as some say, a hand wanting by an accident prior to this event; but others assure us, that when his master had promised him to be entirely guided by his counsels, he cut off his nose, his ears, a hand, and foot. In this mangled condition, he caused himself to be laid in a wood, through the skirts of which he knew that the Persian army must pass. When the vanguard of Ferouz's army reached him, they took him up, and carried him to their king, who, struck with the miserable condition of the man, received him kindly, asked him, Who he was, and by whom he had been so cruelly mangled? The artful Haiathelite readily answered, that he had been thus treated by his king, for having exhorted him to give any kind of satisfaction to the king of Persia, rather than engage in a war, the more, because he was so excessively hated by his own subjects. Ferouz rejoiced at this account, enquired narrowly into the strength of the enemy, and where the king of the Haiathelites was encamped? The wounded man answered, that the king had with him the flower of all his people, and that they lay in ambuscade behind certain mountains, which were but a few days march from thence, if the king took his road through the woods; but if he continued in that wherein he now was, he would be obliged to pass on the other side of those mountains, and thereby give the Haiathelites an opportunity of falling upon his rear. Ferouz, not in the least suspecting the fidelity of his wounded guide, listened readily to the advice he gave him; and without more ado turned out of the ordinary road, and ſuffered himſelf to be led, ſometimes through thick woods, at others through wide deſerts, till at length his army was on the very point of being famiſhed for want of neceſſary proviſions. Then the Haiathelites appeared on all ſides, and in ſuch vaſt numbers, that Ferouz ſeeing it alike impoſſible to defend himſelf, or to eſcape, ſurrendered with the ſmall remains of his army, throwing himſelf entirely on the mercy of his injured benefactors. The king of the Haiathelites, ſuppoſing that this diſaſtrous expedition would prove a ſufficient warning to Ferouz, offered to ſend him, and thoſe that were with him, ſafely back into their own country, provided they took an oath never to invade his dominions any more. This they readily conſented to do, and, as ſoon as they had done it, were permitted to return without the leaſt injury done them [q].

Invades the Haiathelites a ſecond time.

THE firſt thing Ferouz projected after his return into his own kingdom was, the attacking the Haiathelites a ſecond time, in breach of the ſolemn oath which he had ſo lately made. The chief reaſon which induced him to apprehend that he ſhould be more ſucceſsful in this expedition than his firſt was, the obſervation he had made of the number of forces about the king of that people, when he had aſſembled the whole force of his nation. The Perſian army appeared to Ferouz capable of beating twice the number of Haiathelites he had ſeen, if they had not been circumvented by the policy of the wounded vizier. This fault therefore he determined to repair by marching directly into the heart of the country, without turning either this way or that. Accordingly, as ſoon as the neceſſary levies could be made, he appointed Saouk, a prince deſcended from the antient kings of Perſia, regent in his abſence; and with a prodigious army marched once more againſt the people, by whoſe aſſiſtance he was ſeated on the throne. There is no need of repeating here the ſame ſtory, which hath been already inſerted, in the hiſtory of this prince's life under the name of Perozes, in the former period. Let it ſuffice that he and his army were by a new ſtratagem buried altogether in a pit, and the Haiathelites delivered from all apprehenſions of ſuffering any more by the incorrigible diſpoſition of Ferouz. The oriental hiſtorians torians differ, however, widely from the text, in the accounts they give us of the conſequences of this war; for they affirm, that Saouk the lieutenant of Ferouz, as ſoon as he received the news of his maſter's defeat, marched with a conſiderable body of horſe he had drawn together from an apprehenſion of this diſaſter, and encamping with them on the borders of the Haiathelites, prevented their invading Perſia, and even obtained from their king, who was a prince of great wiſdom and juſtice, a peace upon honourable terms, on a ſuggeſtion that the Perſians were by no means well affected to the meaſures of Ferouz, but were conſtrained to follow that unhappy prince, becauſe he was their ſovereign. The king of the Haiathelites, on this conſideration, not only made peace, but ſent back all the Perſians he had taken priſoners without ranſom, as thinking the death of Ferouz a ſufficient ſatisfaction for the injuries he had done him. According to the beſt of the eaſtern hiſtorians, Ferouz reigned thirty, though ſome ſay not above twenty-ſeven years [r].

BALASCH ſucceeded his father Ferouz or Firouz, and was not his brother, as the Greeks give out. His acceſſion to the throne was very grateful to his ſubjects, but his younger brother Cobad was ſo diſſatisfied therewith, that he inſtantly retired from court, and fled to Turqueſtan with the ſon of Saouk, who was his friend and counſellor. It does not appear, that Balaſch either ordered his brother to be purſued, or attempted by any means to take away his life; but, on the contrary, left him at full liberty to live abroad at his eaſe, ſince he would not live at home. This, however, had no effect upon Cobad; his heart was full of ambition, and his head as full of ſiniſter contrivances. His friend had prevailed upon him to marry his daughter, who is repreſented by the Perſian hiſtorian, from whom we have theſe particulars, as a woman of exquiſite beauty, and of exquiſite parts. By her Cobad had a ſon, whom he left with his mother, that he might return again to the court of the Khacan, in order to ſolicit his aſſiſtance againſt his brother. Having prevailed in his ſuit, and orders being iſſued for raiſing an army, at the head of which he was to make an irruption into Perſia, Cobad thought fit to make a viſit to his father-in-law's family, in order to have his ſentiments of this expedition; and while Balaſch II.

he was there ſeeking to draw the beſt intelligence he could from his friends in Perſia, he firſt received advice that his brother was ſo extremely beloved by his ſubjects, that any attempt to dethrone him would be vain; and while he was afflicting himſelf with thoughts of being defeated in all his ſchemes, he received another courier, who brought him advice, that Balaſch died ſuddenly a few days before, and that there required no army to ſet him on the throne, his ſubjects being very ready to receive him. Upon this he ſet out with his father-in-law, his wife, and young ſon Nouſchirvan, to receive that crown by ſucceſſion, which he fought to have ſeized by force, or to have acquired by his intrigues. Authors are not agreed how long Balaſch reigned, ſome giving him fourteen years, and others little more than four [s].

Cobad. COBAD, aſcended the throne with all the advantages poſſible: he was in his perſon one of the handſomeſt men in Perſia, very adroit in his exerciſes, of a very generous diſpoſition, and of quick parts; but as to his morals they were exceedingly depraved, and he had in his exile ſucked in ſuch falſe notions of politics, as ſerved only to make himſelf uneaſy, and to put him upon oppreſſing his ſubjects. The firſt wrong ſtep he took was, the putting to death Saouk, his wife's grandfather, becauſe that under his father and brother he had had the chief direction of all things, which Cobad ſuppoſed he would expect during his reign, a thing he did not care to grant, and which, conſidering Saouk's great power, he thought it might not be ſafe to refuſe. He therefore made uſe of one Schabour, a ſoldier of fortune, who offered him his ſervice on his acceſſion to the throne, and to whom he gave orders to take off Saouk, in ſuch a manner, as might leaſt reflect upon his government. Having this commiſſion, Schabour went to pay his reſpects to Saouk; and having drawn him into a converſation, quarrelled with him, and cut his throat. In the tenth year of the reign of Cobad a certain impoſtor appeared, whoſe name was Mazdek [t]. He followed the ſteps of Mani pretty cloſely; for he ſet himſelf up for a prophet in the deſert, and having drawn together a multitude of people by his ſpecious pretences, firmly perſuad-perſuaded them of his having revelations from heaven. The drift of theſe revelations was to the old purpoſe, viz. the eſtabliſhing of a more pure and holy religion, than had been hitherto made known to mankind. But as auſterity and ſelf-denial were never very popular doctrines, he invented ſome new notions of purity; and, in order to take away the luſt of wealth and of women, he propoſed rendering them both common. This ſuited well with the diſpoſition of Cobad, who, as we obſerved before, was a very diſſolute prince; and therefore he countenanced this impoſtor, brought him to court, treated him with reſpect, and, under pretence of promoting purity in religion, fell to plundering his nobility and debauching their wives and daughters. This is that decree for rendering women common, which the Greek writers ſpeak of, and which they make the pure effect of the corruption of the king's heart, and repreſent as an action which loſt him the hearts of all his people. But this is ſo far from being true, that the bulk of the people were more attached to this prince than any of his predeceſſors. The poor hoped to have a ſhare in the treaſures taken from the rich, and the youth were ſo tranſported with the thoughts of having all the women they pleaſed, that the nobility found it a very difficult matter to do what they did. Cobad had a ſiſter, who was wonderfully beautiful, and of whoſe adventures the oriental romance-writers have written very largely. This ſiſter Mazdek gave him a diſpenſation to marry, which is the cleareſt proof in the world, that the Greek writers are altogether in the wrong in ſuggeſting that ſuch marriages were conformable to the magian religion; had it been ſo, Cobad needed not have turned heretic to have obtained ſuch a diſpenſation, nor would his making uſe of it have alarmed the nobility as it did. It was this that put the finiſhing ſtroke to his ruin; for the Perſian lords looked upon it now as a thing certain, that he would ſtick at nothing. Coming therefore in great numbers to court, with ſuch of their dependents as they could truſt, they ſeized the perſon of the king, committed him to priſon, and appointed one Giamaſp, a perſon of great wiſdom and integrity, regent of the kingdom [u]. As to the impoſtor Mazdek, they would likewiſe have ſecured his perſon, if they could; but he was too circumſpect to put it in their power. His disciples were very numerous, and he failed not to keep a sufficient number of them about him to repel any attempt of this sort; and he likewise took care not to trust himself in cities or fortresses, where the nobility might shut him up as in a cage [x].

Cobad recovers the kingdom.

THE account the Oriental writers give us of the manner in which Cobad escaped from his prison, differs so little from that given by the Greeks already inserted at large in the life of Cavades, that, to avoid prolixity, we shall repeat nothing of it here. The eastern writers assure us, that it was some time before the king of the Haiathelites could be prevailed on to raise forces, in order to re-establish Cobad on his throne. At length he sent thirty thousand horse into the frontiers of Persia to try the disposition of the people; and it appearing that they were well affected to Cobad's interest, that prince followed in Person, and was shortly after peaceably restored, Giamasp readily resigning all title to the imperial thrown, which procured him a very favourable reception from Cobad, who treated him with much respect as long as he lived. After his restoration, it is said, he altogether reformed his conduct, and became in every respect an excellent prince, equally careful of extending his empire by arms, and of improving it by the encouragement of arts. It appears not, however, that he quitted the sect of Mazdek, though he durst never attempt to carry his notions into practice after his return; and in all probability he was the less inclined to attempt any thing of this sort, on acount of the trouble he had with one of his own sons, who embraced the opinions of Mani, and in whose favour all the Persians, infected with that heresy, discovered an inclination to revolt, in order to have placed him on the throne before the death of his father, had they not been prevented by the diligence of Cobad, who was of a most active disposition, and preserved his activity even in old age. Authors are not very well agreed as to the length of his reign; some giving him more years, some less. The best historians, however, agree, that he reigned forty-three years with great variety of fortune, and that he died beloved by his subjects, and revered by his neighbours, after having restored peace and order throughout Persia, repaired such cities as were falling to decay, and erected erected many new ones to ſerve as monuments of glory to his poſterity [t] (G).

To Cobad ſucceeded his ſon Khoſrou or Choſroes, ſo famous throughout all the eaſt under the ſirname of Nouſchirvan, i. e. the magnanimous. This word, literally taken, ſignifies a ſoul candied in honey, and metaphorically a mind equally diſtinguiſhed by ſweetneſs of temper and great abilities. He was by very far the greateſt prince of this dynaſty, and, in the opinion of moſt of the oriental hiſtorians, the moſt glorious monarch, that ever reigned in Perſia; happy in his genius, more ſo in his education, excelling in all royal virtues, and deficient in none requiſite to diſtinguiſh a man in private life. The dawn of his government promiſed much felicity to his people, and he reigned long enough to make good to them much more than that promiſed. The firſt act of ſovereignty with Nouſchirvan.

(G) There are ſome varieties in the relations we have of the reign of Khobad, which deſerve to be remarked. Khobad, according to Mirkhond, married Zarmeher, the grand-daughter of Saouk, who had governed the kingdom after the miſerable defeat of his father; but of this we find no diſtinct account in any other hiſtorian. What is ſtranger ſtill, Mirkhond makes this lady the mother of Nouſchirvan. As to his ſiſter, whoſe beauty and accompliſhments tempted him to accept of the impoſtor Mazdek's diſpenſation, Mirkhond aſſures us, that ſhe was taken priſoner at the time her father Ferouz was killed, a circumſtance we did not inſert in the text, becauſe it ſeems to be altogether improbable. The march which Ferouz made into the enemy's country was in itſelf attended with great difficulties, and who can imagine, that he would expoſe a young lady the only daughter he had, in ſuch a manner? All the oriental hiſtorians agree, that during his reign there were prodigious numbers of Jews ſettled in his dominions, eſpecially in Chaldæa, where ſometimes he treated them with great lenity, and at others he loaded them with heavy taxes. It does not appear, that he ever had any good opinion of the Manichees, though they had been in favour with his father, and though the impoſtor Mazdek had concurred with them in ſome of their notions. The truth ſeems to be, that he was far from being nice in religion himſelf, and only pretended a high zeal for the ſect of Mazdek, becauſe it gave him an opportunity of filling his coffers, and gratifying his paſſion for his ſiſter (19).

(19) Mirkhond ſect. xxxiii. Lebtarikh. Shariſtani de religion. orient.

which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf was full of ſeverity, though he was naturally the mildeſt prince in the world. He found means to cauſe the impoſtor Mazdek to be ſeized, and to be brought priſoner into his preſence. On this occaſion Nouſchirvan made a long oration, in which he explained the many and great miſchiefs brought on mighty kingdoms by ſuch deluders, declared his ſettled reſolution to extirpate all this new ſect, and as an earneſt thereof, he ordered Mazdek to be immediately put to death. That deceiver, deſirous of keeping up ſome reputation, addreſſed himſelf to Nouſchirvan in theſe words, as the officers were about to take him out of that prince's preſence: "Providence, O king! appointed thee to rule over us, "that thou mighteſt protect and not deſtroy. True, "thou ſon of corruption, anſwered Nouſchirvan; but "doſt thou not remember, that thou didſt once impudently demand of Cobad my father permiſſion to lie with "my mother, and that thy followers have pillaged all the "reſt of my ſubjects? I do not therefore ſeek to deſtroy "thee and thine, but to preſerve my ſelf and the people "committed by providence to my care". After the execution of Mazdek, Nouſchirvan did not proceed to any farther ſeverities. The death of their chief ſtruck ſuch a damp to the hearts of his followers, that they willingly laid hold of the alternative offered them by the king's edict, viz. either to reſtore what they had wrongfully taken from others, or to ſuffer capital puniſhment as thieves. Thus the peace and properties of the people of Perſia were ſecured againſt the attempts of theſe debauched enthuſiaſts, without any extraordinary effuſion of blood [u].

NOUSCHIRVAN alſo removed at the very beginning of his reign ſuch officers of his court, as, by their conduct in his father's life-time, had rendered themſelves diſagreeable to his people. Among theſe there was one particular perſon whom he forbad ever to come into his preſence, and who by this ſudden and total diſgrace fell into extreme poverty. On the birth-day, however, of the king, when all the Perſian nobility came to make preſents, and to pay their duty to their ſovereign, this officer appeared among the reſt, and, after having dined at the royal table, put one of the golden plates into his boſom, unperceived by any but Nouſchirvan. When the plate was miſſed, and the ſervants vants began to make ſome ſtir, the king bade them be at quiet; "For," ſaid he, "the man who took it will not "bring it again, and he who ſaw him take it will not diſ-"cover him". On the next birth-day the officer came to court again, clad in a new robe, upon which the king calling him, whiſpered in his ear, "Did my plate go to "buy that fine robe?" The man readily anſwered, Yes, and then drawing it aſide, ſhewed him a pair of ragged breeches: but you ſee, Sir, ſaid he, that it would go no farther. Nouſchirvan was ſo charmed with the frankneſs of the man, that he reſtored him to his place as well as favour, and the Perſians were ſo delighted with the generoſity and good-humour of their prince, that in all their hiſtories this ſtory is preſerved, as a monument of his beneficence and clemency. For the better diſpatching of juſtice, and the more eaſy management of all public affairs, the king in the ſecond year of his reign divided all the Perſian dominions into four vizierſhips: the firſt conſiſted of the frontier provinces towards Tartary and India: the ſecond included Parthia, Armenia, and the provinces bordering on the Caſpian ſea; the third comprehended Perſia Proper, and all the provinces between it and the gulph: the fourth was compoſed of Meſopotamia, Chaldea, the countries taken from the Arabs, and thoſe conquered from the Greek emperors. Over each of theſe he appointed a governor of the royal blood, who, in all ordinary caſes, judged without appeal: but in all extraordinary caſes and where judgments were capital they could not proceed, till they had inſtructions from court [x].

And of his martial diſpoſition.

EARLY alſo in his reign he made an expedition into Rumeſtan, or the territories of the Greek emperor, of which we have given a long account in the foregoing period. In this war, however, he did not ſo much endeavour to augment the bulk of his territories, as to encreaſe the number of his ſubjects. It was with this view that he tranſported all the inhabitants of the great city of Antioch into the province of Irak, where he gave them the city of Mahouza for their habitation, the name of which, to oblige them, he changed for that of Antioch. This city lay at no great diſtance from Babylon; but the new name conferred upon it by Choſroes did not remain with it long; for for after his decaſe the old one of Mahouza came again into uſe, and it is ſo called even at this day. After this he reſolved to reſtore the Perſian frontier on the other ſide of his empire, on which the Haiathelites had treſpaſſed exceedingly, ſuppoſing they could never be too well rewarded for the aſſiſtance they had given to his father Cobad. At firſt Nouſchirvan endeavoured to proceed by way of negotiation, repreſenting to theſe people, that the wide-ſpread countries of Thebet, Candahar, and Brantolah, ſuited better their way of life, than the provinces they had uſurped from Perſia; but the Haiathelites having treated theſe repreſentations with contempt, Nouſchirvan was conſtrained to have recourſe to force; whereby he anſwered his purpoſe better, and obliged this barbarous people to repaſs the mountains, by which means his ſubjects were delivered from thoſe apprehenſions, with which the neighbourhood of this mighty nation had tormented them for upwards of fifty years. This manner of proceeding alarmed all the neighbouring princes, and more eſpecially the khacan, who immediately raiſed a great army, and, while Nouſchirvan was on the borders of India with his troops, broke like an inundation through the Perſian provinces into the very heart of the kingdom. Nouſchirvan, as ſoon as he was acquainted with what had happened, reſolved to ſend his ſon Hormouz againſt this formidable invader, being afraid to leave his frontiers towards India uncovered, leſt ſome advantages ſhould be taken by his enemies on that ſide[y].

His ſon Hormouz defeats the khacan.

HORMOUZ diſcharged his duty to his father and to the Perſian nation, not only with great fidelity, but with great capacity alſo. Though but a young man, he had been a ſoldier from his childhood, and therefore wanted not experience, as he naturally abounded with courage. The troops he had about him were daily augmented by the country people, who looked upon the army as the ſureſt aſylum, and prudently choſe to hazard their lives in the ſervice of their country, rather than to fly and hide themſelves from the enemy with equal hazard. Hormouz judged perfectly well of the ſtrength of his own forces, and did not, becauſe they were numerous, pretend to give the enemy battle, which, if he had loſt, muſt have loſt Perſia; but by haraſſing the unwieldy army of the khacan by continual ſkirmiſhes, by withdrawing all ſorts of proviſion out of

of the open country, by garriſoning ſtrong cities, and by abandoning weak ones, he obliged that monarch to think of retiring, as by burning all the country behind him, he had rendered his retreat almoſt impracticable. The khacan, ignorant of this, began to march back, and was amazed when he found a deſert before him, and the Perſian forces behind, and on every ſide. In this miſerable ſituation himſelf, with the principal nobility and a great corps of the beſt horſe, deſerted the reſt, and precipitately eſcaped into their own country, leaving to the young prince of Perſia the glory of having defeated him, and of having defeated him by his conduct. Nouſchirvan on the other hand, having completed his deſigns in reſpect to his Indian frontiers, made an offenſive war on the khacan, and puſhed his conqueſts ſo far, that he obliged him to accept peace on the terms he thought fit to give him; after which Nouſchirvan married his daughter. This remarkable event happened in the twelfth year of his reign, and as it delivered him from any apprehenſions of danger from foreign enemies, ſo he laid hold of this opportunity to ſettle the boundaries of his vaſt dominions, and then to return to Madain his capital city, where he gave audience to the embaſſadors of the greateſt potentates of the world, who came to compliment him on his victories, and to penetrate, if poſſible, any new deſigns he might have formed [z].

The bounds of the Perſian empire.

It may not be amiſs to take notice here of the boundaries which Nouſchirvan gave to his empire, becauſe the reader will from thence perceive, with how great juſtice the Perſian writers acknowledge this prince for the greateſt monarch that ever ruled in their country. The city and country of Farganah, which lies along the river Sihon or Jaxartes, was the limit of Perſia on that ſide; the river Indus ſeparated his territories from thoſe of the independent Indian princes. Arabia, to the frontiers of Egypt, acknowledged him for its ſovereign, and in Syria he had puſhed his conqueſts as far as the ſea would permit. While Nouſchirvan enjoyed in peace an empire of ſuch an extent, he formed two projects highly commended by the eaſtern writers, and which, it may be would not have gained him ſo much honour, had he reigned in another part of the world. The firſt was the bringing out of India a certain book, intitled Homaioun Nameh, i, e. The Royal

[z] Mirkhond ubi ſupra. Lebtarikh. Khondemir

Royal Manual, the work of the famous Pilpai, containing a multitude of parables, relating to the art of government. This, by the care of his chief miniſter Buzurge Mihir, he procured, and cauſed it to be tranſlated into the Perſian language for his own uſe. His other project was of the ſame ſort, but undertaken for the ſake of his people. It was the publication of his predeceſſor Ardſchir's inſtructions for all degrees of men. Of this he cauſed a multitude of copies to be made, and obliged every family in Perſia to receive one [a].

Nouſchizad the ſon of Nouſchirvan rebels againſt him.

We muſt not, however ſuppoſe, that the life of Nouſchirvan was ſpent without meeting with any troubles: For what prince, what private man, ever ſpent his life ſo? The ſource of his uneaſineſs was his own family, and the enemy who gave him muſt trouble was his own ſon. In one of his expeditions into Rumeſtan, or the dominions of the emperors of Greece, he had taken a female captive, by whoſe beauty he was ſubdued himſelf. This woman was a chriſtian and very devout. Nouſchirvan eſpouſed her, and had by her a ſon whom he dearly loved. The name of this young prince was Nouſchizad. His mother took care from his cradle to educate him in her religion, and impreſſed the truths thereof ſo ſtrongly on his mind, that when he grew up, he was not to be moved by the arts of the magi, or by the threats or promiſes of his father. Nouſchirvan, perceiving this and being afraid of the conſequences, confined him. For, as we have ſeen, religious diſputes were dreadful to this wiſe prince, who thought he could not be maſter of the hearts of his ſubjects if they were not united amongſt themſelves. The prince's cuſtody was eaſy enough, the king deſigning, not ſo much to puniſh him as to prevent any thing which might deſerve puniſhment; and therefore, when he found himſelf obliged to viſit the frontiers of his empire towards India, he did not think fit to alter Nouſchizad's condition, but left him under the ſame gentle reſtraint, wherein he had lived for ſome years. During his abſence from his capital, he had a fit of ſickneſs, whereupon a report was ſpread that he was dead. Nouſchizad hearing this took inſtantly an opportunity of making his eſcape; and as there were many chriſtians in Perſia, he quickly drew together a conſiderable force, and continued to encreaſe his army, army, even after he was informed, that his father was alive and well. The news of this revolt greatly afflicted Nouſchirvan, who did not, however, immediately ſend an army againſt his ſon, but ſuffered things to remain as they were, that the young prince might have time to conſider the condition he was in and return to his duty. But when he ſaw this delay produced nothing, but that on the contrary, many of the grandees, who were diſcontented at the ſeverity of the king's juſtice took this opportunity of fortifying themſelves againſt his reſentment, Nouſchirvan reſolved to wait no longer; and therefore inſtantly diſpatched a body of forces under the command of Ram Berzin, one of his principal generals, to reduce the rebels. However, when that officer took his leave of him, he gave him theſe inſtructions: "I underſtand that my ſon "hath not only taken arms, but hath alſo poſſeſſed himſelf of my treaſures, opened the priſons, augmented "his army with thoſe he found in them, and, by the "help of my money and his own promiſes, hath drawn "abundance of my officers to his party. My commands "therefore are, that you advance with all poſſible dili"gence towards him, yet without attacking him, or thoſe "of my ſubjects who are about him, till you have advi"ſed him of your arrival, and exhorted him to return to "that obedience he owes me; which if he inclines to do, "I expect that he ſhould ſend back to their priſons thoſe "whom he has releaſed; that he ſhould put to the ſword "the officers who have deſerted to him, and diſband his "army. If he refuſes to execute theſe things, do your "utmoſt to reduce him by force, even though it ſhould "be at the expence of his life. But if the young "man falls alive into your hands, do not offer him the "leaſt in dignity, nor ſo much as reproach him with his "want of duty; his conſciouſneſs thereof will be a ſuffi"cient puniſhment". Ram Berzin followed his inſtructions exactly, but the prince proving obſtinate, a general engagement enſued, in which Nouſchizad was defeated and received a mortal wound, which when he perceived, he ſaid to thoſe who were about him, Tell the queen my mother, that it is my laſt requeſt, that my body may be buried among the chriſtians. Nouſchirvan ſucceeded no leſs happily in his Indian war, than he had done in this domeſtic one; he compelled all the princes on his frontiers to do him homage and to pay him tribute. After this he marched with a great army into Arabia, where he was fortunate in the higheſt degree, and uſed his fortune to the beſt purpoſe imaginable. He found the country diſtreſſed by tyrants, whom he diſpoſſeſſed of their power, reſtored the lawful ſovereigns, whom they had driven from their dominions, and did ſo many kindneſſes to the people in general, that Mohammed himſelf was wont to boaſt, that he was born under the reign of this monarch, ſurnamed by the Arabians Al-malek, i. e. The Juſt [b].

After all his victories Nouſchirvan adorns his capital.

AFTER this he returned to Madain, his capital, and began to adorn it with a multitude of new and ſumptuous buildings; amongſt the reſt with a palace, which was accounted one of the wonders of the eaſt. It was called Thak Khoſrou, i. e. The dome of Choſroes. It had a beautiful cupola, and underneath ſtrong and large vaults, in which were depoſited all the mighty treaſures of this powerful monarch. In order to have a juſt idea of this wonderful building, the reader muſt be informed, that the caliph Almanzor ordered this palace to be pulled down, in order to employ its materials in adorning the citadel of Bagdat; but, after working ſome time thereon, he found the expence ſo great, that he was forced to abandon the enterprize, and leave the greateſt part of the palace of Choſroes undemoliſhed, on which a Perſian poet wrote the following diſtich, alluding to the founder of this glorious edifice:

Thy works, like thee, eternity enjoy;
Nor rage, nor time, can thy deſigns deſtroy.

If we were to mention a twentieth part of the acts recorded of this prince, which have come even to our hands, it would take up much more room than we have allowed to this period; we ſhall content ourſelves therefore with giving the reader an account of his laſt expedition and death, and a ſhort view of his character, according to the Oriental writers, in a note, that we may not be condemned of negligence, amidſt ſuch immenſe materials. The laſt war, which Nouſchirvan made againſt the Conſtantinopolitan emperor, was occaſioned by his ſupporting the petty princes of Armenia, againſt the Perſian prince, who was their ſovereign. At firſt Nouſchirvan had the ſame good fortune in this as in his other wars; but truſting it too far, he was defeated, and conſtrained to paſs to paſs the river Euphrates on the back of his elephant, and not without great danger of being drowned. On his return to his capital Madain, wich is either the ſame with Cteſiphon, or a city built upon its ruins, he began to find himſelf extremely weak, and not a little indiſpoſed. He therefore judged it time to think of making peace, and then of ſettling the ſucceſſion; for being now eighty years old, and having reigned forty-eight, he had not either cauſe to hope for much longer life, or to repine at his approaching deceaſe, after having ſo long and fully enjoyed the good things of this world. When therefore he heard, that the Greek emperor was willing to conclude a treaty on reaſonable terms, and ſaw that the nobility were well inclined towards his ſon Hormouz, he diſpoſed himſelf chearfully to ſubmit to fate, having firſt delivered in writing the following inſtructions, or political teſtament, to his ſon [d].

"I Nouſchirvan, the poſſeſſor of the kingdoms of Perſia "and India, addreſs theſe my laſt words to Hormouz my ſon, "that they may ſerve him as a lanthern in the days of darkneſs, as a path when he ſhall enter the deſerts, and as a poleſtar when he navigates through the ſeas of this tempeſtuous world. When my eyes are cloſed, which are already unable to bear the light of the ſun, let him be ſeated on my throne, and let his luſtre be equal to that glorious planet: but let him remember in the midſt of his greatneſs, that kings rule not for themſelves, but for their people, and that they are, with reſpect to them, what the heavens are to the earth. Can the earth be fuitful, if it be not watered, if it be not cheriſhed by the heavens? My ſon, let all your people be ſenſible of your benefactions; thoſe who are neareſt you firſt; by degrees thoſe who are at the greateſt diſtance. If I durſt, I would propoſe to you my own example: but I will rather put you in mind of that which hath been example unto me. Behold the ſun, it viſits all parts of the world; and if it is ſometimes viſible, and at others removed from our ſight, it is becauſe the univerſe partakes of its ſplendor and is cheriſhed by its beams. Enter not any province but with a proſpect of doing good to its inhabitants; neither quit it with any other view, than to do good

" good elſewhere. Ill men muſt be puniſhed; to them the

" couragement, and ought to experience the morning beams.
" As that glorious luminary anſwers all the purpoſes for which " it was created at all times, be thou careful to act " always like a king, ſince you will deſire at all times to be " revered as a king. My ſon, preſent thyſelf often before " heaven to implore its aid; but be ſure that thou approach it " not with an impure mind. Do thy dogs enter the temple?
" If thou ſhalt obſerve exactly this rule, thy prayers ſhall be " heard, thy enemies ſhall be ſtruck with terror, thy friends
" ſhall be ever faithful; thou ſhalt be the delight of thy ſub-

" kingdom, which you will keep, if you will follow my " counſels; and which it will be impoſſible for you to keep, if
" you follow others [e]." Such was the end of Nouſchirvan, the moſt beloved prince of his age, and whoſe reputation ſurvives to this day in the works of all the eaſtern hiſtorians, in the writings of their moraliſts, and more eſpecially in the works of their poets [f] (H).

(H) Khondemir cloſes his account of the reign of Nouſchirvan with this obſervation: " Princes in ſucceeding times ought to place " him, of whom we have been ſpeaking, as a model before their " eyes, and make his conduct the rule of theirs, ſince he poſſeſ-
" ed in a ſovereign degree, as well the good qualities which ren-

" ality without any other bounds than thoſe aſſigned by reaſon, con" tributed moſt to his high reputation while living, and have pre-
" ſerved his fame freſh to poſterity (20)." We have ſeen, in the foregoing hiſtory, many inſtances of the grandeur of this prince's ſoul, (20) Hiſtor. Perſar.

HORMOUZ, whom the Greeks call Hormiſdas, and who was the fourth of that name of this dynaſty, aſcended the throne with the faireſt proſpect that ever any Perſian prince had. He was naturally of a very indifferent diſpoſition, addicted to his pleaſures, haughty, and cruel. His father who was too wiſe a prince not to perceive theſe defects in his ſon, endeavoured to correct them by education. With this view he put him under the care of the celebrated Buzurge Mihir, the wiſeſt man in Perſia, and the firſt miniſter Hormouz IV.

ſoul, in undertaking the moſt ſtupendous works for the benefit, and for the ornament, of the ſeveral parts of his dominions. There is one, however, of which we have not ſpoken; and as it makes a great figure in all the Oriental hiſtories, it is requiſite to take ſome notice of it here: This is the wall of Jagouge and Magouge or a thick and high rampart commencing at Derbent, and running from mountain to mountain, ſo as to ſecure the frontiers of Perſia from the northern nations. It was projected by Alexander the Great, and, as ſome ſay, begun by his command. However, it remained unfiniſhed, tho' not altogether unproſecuted, till the reign of Nouſchirvan, who undertook and happily concluded it (21). The court of Nouſchirvan was one of the moſt magnificent that the world ever ſaw. The deputies from all the provinces of Perſia conſtantly attended therein, as did the embaſſadors of all the great princes in the world. The expence of their entertainment was defrayed by Nouſchirvan, who, in the midſt of all his proſperity, preſerved a mind ſo equal and undiſturbed, that he was never ſurprized into any expreſſion unworthy of a philoſopher. A courier coming haſtily into his preſence, cryed out, God is juſt! God is juſt! the implacable enemy of our king is taken away by death. Nouſchirvan anſwered without the leaſt emotion, "Far be it from me to rejoice at the death of my enemy. "There can be nothing more ridiculous, than for mortals to be "pleaſed with inſtances of mortality (22)". When he had been hunting, and was deſirous of eating ſome of the veniſon in the field, ſome of his attendants went to a neighbouring village, and took away a quantity of ſalt to ſeaſon it. The king ſuſpected it, and ordered that they ſhould immediately go and pay for it; then turning to his miniſter, he ſaid, "This is a ſmall matter in itſelf, "but a great one as it regards me. A king ought ever to be juſt, "becauſe he is an example to his ſubjects; and if he ſwerves in "trifles, they will become diſſolute. If I cannot make all my "people juſt in the ſmalleſt things, I can at leaſt ſhew them that "it

ter of Nouſchirvan. This excellent perſon took ſuch pains with Hormouz, and knew ſo well how to ſet folly and vice in their proper lights, that he vanquiſhed his natural proneneſs to evil, and made him, in ſpite of himſelf, a great and a good man. For the firſt three years of his reign, while his old tutor remained about his perſon, he as far tranſcended Nouſchirvan, as Nouſchirvan had all his predeceſſors. His diſcourſes were fraught with wiſdom, his actions were all beneficent. He carried ſo far his reſpect for Buzurge Mihir, that he would not wear his royal ornaments in his preſence; and when ſome of his courtiers intimated, that his reverence

" it is poſſible to be ſo (23)." The ſame way of thinking induced him to put the following inſcription on his diadem, after he had ſettled the immenſe dominions he had acquired, and was revered at home and abroad, as the mightieſt of all monarchs:

What is long life? or what a glorious reign?
Since our ſucceſſors cloſe upon us tread.
My fathers left this crown, and I again
Muſt leave it too, and mingle with the dead (24).

Theſe are ſufficient ſpecimens of the ſolidity of his underſtanding, and of the ſtrength and rectitude of his ſentiments. We have therefore all the reaſon in the world to believe, what all the oriental hiſtorians poſitively affirm, that he was one of the moſt learned men, not only in his own dominions, but in his age; that he was the moſt beneficent patron of the ſciences, and of thoſe who cultivate them; and that his court was the aſylum of merit in diſtreſs. He held regular aſſemblies for the promoting of real, that is, uſeful knowledge, at which he aſſiſted himſelf, with his miniſters of ſtate, as will be ſeen in the next note; and he was ſo far from being a ſmatterer, that not only in the politer branches of learning, but even in the buſineſs of mechanics, he knew as much as the artiſts themſelves. With all this, he was the moſt debonnaire man in his court; and tho' he never ſaid a light or trivial thing himſelf, yet he would laugh at the jeſts of others, and never took ill any poignant expreſſion that eſcaped a man in a flow of humour (25). No wonder then, that the wits of his own time loved him; that the wits of ſucceeding ages have done their utmoſt to embalm his character. The facts related of him muſt ſtrike all generous minds; and therefore we make no excuſe for ſo long a note.

rence to him was exceſſive, ſince it was more than was due to a parent, he anſwered, "You ſay well, my friends; "but I owe more to him than I do to my father. The "life and kingdom I received from Nouſchirvan will remain "with me but a few years; but the reputation I ſhall ac- "quire, in virtue of his inſtructions, will ſurvive to lateſt "times". Happy had it been for this prince, had he always adhered to theſe notions; but when old age had rendered Buzurge Mihir unfit for the great employments he poſ- ſeſſed, he requeſted, and had leave from Hormouz to re- tire; and with him retired the happineſs and fortune of his maſter (I). The young courtiers who were about Hormouz

(I) The character of Buzurge Mihir makes ſo great a figure in the oriental hiſtories, that it is but juſt we ſhould beſtow a note upon it here. In the firſt place we muſt remark, that this is the ſirname only of the prime miniſter of Nouſchirvan, and that it ſignifies, in the Perſian tongue, well beloved. We have taken notice in the text of his being appointed governor to Hormouz; and that, with great difficulty, he triumphed over the evil diſpoſi- tion of that prince. It cannot be improper to give an inſtance of his addreſs in this reſpect; he ſaw with regret that his pupil ſlept till noon, ſpent the afternoon in dreſſing, and the night in de- bauches; he reproved to no purpoſe, he expoſtulated to no end; yet he continued to expoſtulate and reprove, hoping, that impor- tunity might effect what was unattainable by reaſon. Hormouz at length, quite tired out, deviſed a method, to rid himſelf of theſe lectures: he ordered ſome of his favourites to diſguiſe them- ſelves, and to ſtrip his preceptor quite naked, as he came in the morning from his father's court to wait upon him. This being accordingly done, when Buzurge Mihir related his misfortunes, "You ſee, ſaid the young prince, what comes of all this diligence; "if you had not been up ſo early, you had not been robbed. You "miſtake, Sir, ſaid the preceptor, the thieves were more ſucceſs- "ful than I, becauſe they roſe earlier. Vigilance, Sir, is a copy "of the divine activity; it is the torch by which ſcience becomes "viſible, the great treaſure of virtue and true pleaſure, and the "key of victory in all things. Riſe then, my dear prince, that "the ſon of good fortune may diſplay his beams on thy head, and "the freſh air in the morning may diſpoſe thy mind to receive "thoſe graces from heaven, which may in time make thee a "bleſſing to the whole earth (26)." One day Buzurge Mihir be- ing with his maſter Nouſchirvan at one of the aſſemblies of the learned began from that moment, to have a viſible aſcendency over him, and to influence him to do many things alike contrary to his intereſt and injurious to his reputation. Such of his old counſellors as were about his perſon, and had ſtill ſome ſhare in his eſteem, theſe ſycophants found means to remove, either by miſinforming their king, or by treating thoſe they diſliked in ſo rude a way, that they made it their choice to retire from court. It had been the policy of Nouſchirvan to provide the ſhorteſt and ſpeedieſt methods of diſtributing juſtice throughout his wide empire. Every little village had its judge, and, in all courts of judicature, care was taken, that decrees ſhould not coſt either more time or money than they were worth. At the time of his death he left thirty thouſand perſons in judicial offices in his dominions. Numbers of theſe were removed when Hormouz fell into the hands of bad counſellors; and the miſchiefs which followed on this raſh ſtep were ſo great, that the inſpectors of juſtice in the ſeveral provinces of the empire joined in a remonſtrance upon that head; which Hormouz was ſo infatuated learned, the king propoſed for the ſubject of debate this queſtion, What is the extreme degree of miſery? A Greek philoſopher, who was eſteemed one of the moſt learned men of his age and country, anſwered, Poverty in extreme old age. An Indian ſage alſo, of great reputation, gave it as his opinion, "That great pain, attended with dejection of mind, was the moſt "unſupportable of evils. And what ſay you? ſaid Nouſchirvan "turning to his maſter. My judgment is, replied he, that he "is the moſt miſerable of men, who begins to repent, when he "finds his life is at an end (27)." He had no ſooner ſaid this, than the other two ſages came immediately over to his opinion. It would take up a great deal of room to inſert a tenth part of the examples we have met with of this man's wiſdom: One inſtance, however, of his miniſterial virtues may not be amiſs. One day at counſel, after a good deal had been ſpoken by others, it was obſerved, that he remained ſilent; upon which Nouſchirvan aſked him, Why he did not ſpeak his ſentiments, as well as the reſt? Becauſe anſwered he, a ſtateſman ought to give his advice, as a phyſician does medicines, that is, when there is occaſion (28). At this the king ſmiled, and the reſt of the counſellors teſtified their ſatisfaction at ſo well turned a compliment. This great man was privately a chriſtian, which chiefly induced him to retire from court, and for which the cruel Khoſrou Parviz cauſed him to be put to death, when he had arrived at an extreme old age (29).

infatuated as to conceive a libel on his government, in reſentment of which he perſecuted this whole uſeful and venerable race of men with implacable hatred, and by a new ſtrain of tyrannical madneſs, would be the ſole judge of his people himſelf. On this pretence he wore every day the tiara or royal diadem, which his predeceſſors never put on, but when they were about to adminiſter juſtice to their ſubjects. Hence his people gave him the ſurname of Tagedar, i. e. the crown wearer [g].

It is impoſſible for a bad prince to maintain himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the hearts of his people, as well as of their obedience; and it is as impoſſible for a nation univerſally diſaffected to hinder their prince from perceiving the diſlike they have of his meaſures. This quickly became the caſe of Hormouz and his ſubjects. His jealouſies induced him to murder by thouſands. His people, believing themſelves in continual danger, could not avoid betraying an earneſt deſire of ſeeing themſelves ſafe, which begat further inclinations of revenge in their prince. To compleat the misfortunes of both parties, the frontier provinces towards India and Arabia threw off the Perſian yoke, and ſet up princes of their own; and the Khakan, who long waited for ſuch an opportunity, entered Perſia with an army of three hundred thouſand men, tho' he was uncle by the mother's ſide to Hormouz. The Perſian monarch, in this diſtreſs, called a general council of the nobility about him; and after hearing, without following, the advice of moſt of the great lords preſent, he ſuffered himſelf to be guided on this important occaſion by the counſel of an old man, who had been embaſſador for Nouſchirvan in the country of the khakan, at the time that prince demanded the mother of Hormouz in marriage. This old nobleman aſſured him, that, on this occaſion, an aſtrologer predicted, that, under the reign of a Perſian king to be born of a princeſs choſen for Nouſchirvan's queen, a certain khakan ſhould invade, and almoſt conquer, his dominions; but would be at length vanquiſhed himſelf by a Perſian general, whoſe face ſhould reſemble that of a wild cat; that the aſtrologer being further entreated to endeavour by his art to diſcover the name of this general, he by degrees placed ſeveral letters on a tablet, which taken together, compoſed theſe words, Baharam Tchoubin. One cannot conceive any thing more viſibly abſurd than this ſtory, which was certainly invented to amuſe Hormouz, who was exceſſively addicted to the occult ſciences, and thereby to engage him to place this officer at the head of his armies, of whom otherwiſe he would probably not have thought, tho' he was the moſt capable of that command of any man in his dominions. He was at this time governor of Media, from whence the king ſent for him, and offered him the ſupreme command of all the troops in Perſia; which Baharam declined, and, to the amazement of his maſter, choſe only twelve thouſand men, at the head of whom he marched inſtantly againſt the khakan [i].

The khakan entirely defeated by Baharam, who is himſelf diſgraced.

He moved with ſuch diligence and ſecrecy, that he attacked the enemy upon their march, with ſuch a fortunate vivacity, that the khakan was conſtrained to advance againſt him in perſon at the head of his guards. This poiſed the ſcales for ſome time; but at length the khakan being killed and his ſon taken priſoner, their army fled in ſuch confuſion, that they left their baggage behind them; ſo that the Perſian collected two hundred and fifty camels load of treaſure. The moſt precious of the ſpoils, together with the captive prince, Baharam ſent to the king his maſter, with a very dutiful letter, and an exact account of the advantages he had gained. At firſt Hormouz was extremely well ſatisfied with his general's good fortune, gave the higheſt commendations to his valour, and propoſed to beſtow on him mighty rewards. His favourites, however, ſuſpecting, that Baharam might not have any great complaiſance for them, in caſe he arrived at the chief employments in the ſtate, reſolved to ſecure themſelves at his expence. With this view they inſinuated to the king, that, under pretence of ſending the richeſt of the ſpoils, Baharam had only given him a ſmall ſhare thereof, and kept the reſt for himſelf; that it was to be feared he might make an ill uſe of this, and that it was a dangerous thing to truſt ſo ambitious a man at the head of an army. The ſuſpicious temper of Hormouz rendered any proof in ſupport of theſe conjectures quite unneceſſary. Inſinuations were with him always ſufficient evidence; and therefore, on no better grounds than theſe, he not only diſtruſted his general, but moſt imprudently and ſhamefully diſgraced him, by ſending him, inſtead of a habit of honour, the uſual preſent of Perſian kings, all all the neceſſary apparel of a woman. This ſo far provoked Baharam, that, in his own mind, he reſolved to dethrone his maſter, and therefore having arrayed himſelf in the woman's habit the king had ſent him, he came out and ſhewed himſelf to his ſoldiers; and having aſked them, whether they thought he deſerved ſuch treatment? he, by a premeditated harangue, drew them to concur with him in his reſentments, and to aſſiſt him in his project of depriving the ſon of Nouſchirvan of the regal dignity [k].

The army ſupport Baharam againſt his maſter.

THE Perſians, however, retained ſuch a reſpect for the royal family, that Baharam ſaw there was a neceſſity of making choice of ſome other prince of the ſame line. Accordingly he proclaimed Khoſrou Parviz, the eldeſt ſon of Hormouz, king. That young prince, being perſuaded by his uncles, retired from court, and countenanced the rebellion, cauſing money to be coined in his own name, and practiſing in other reſpects as if his father had been dead. Hormouz, having intelligence of theſe proceedings, ſeized Hindouiah and Botham his wife's brothers, whom he knew to have encouraged his ſon to deſert him. Their confinement, however, did not laſt long; for the whole maſs of the people, having contracted an irreconcileable averſion to their king, broke open their priſon, releaſed theſe lords, and aſſiſted them in ſeizing Hormouz; and notwithſtanding the excellent ſpeech made by that prince, at the motion of Hindouiah, put out his eyes. Khoſrou, who was at this time in Media, returned with all imaginable ſpeed to his capital, where, as the Eaſtern writers unanimouſly agree, he went and comforted his father, aſſured him, that his uncles had acted entirely without his permiſſion or conſent, and beſought his forgiveneſs in the moſt humble terms. The old blind king, ſufficiently humbled by his misfortunes, and having no hopes but in his ſon, promiſed to forgive him, provided he puniſhed thoſe who depoſed him and put out his eyes; which Khoſrou promiſed to comply with, as ſoon as he ſhould be thoroughly ſettled on the throne. In the mean time, Baharam, having inſinuated to the principal officers of his army, that Khoſrou, notwithſtanding he owed his crown to them, had yet a ſtronger affection to his family than to his people, whereby they had no hopes left, in caſe he ſhould have it in his power to puniſh them for the revolt, they determined, for for their own ſakes, to ſupport their general, and to hazard all things, rather than his and their ſafety under a ſettled government. With this view they ſuffered him to lead them to Madain; before which city when they arrived, Khoſrou drew out his forces in a plain called Niherſan, and offered them battle. The engagement was long and bloody; but Khoſrou was at length beaten, and forced to retire into the city, where going to viſit his father, the poor old man adviſed him not to ſuffer himſelf to be ſhut up in the place, but to retire into the territories of the Greek emperor, till his affairs ſhould take a happier turn. Khoſrou, having indeed no other meaſure to take, followed his father's advice, and diſpoſed all things for his retreat. When he was about to withdraw, or, as ſome writers ſay, when he was actually out of the city, his uncles came to him, and repreſented the danger of leaving his father alive, even tho' he was blind, on a ſuppoſition that Baharam might re-inſtate him and govern under his name; wherefore they very humanely propoſed to go back and put him to death. Khoſrou oppoſed all he could this deteſtable project; but his uncles, however, turned back, and, to ſecure themſelves, ſtrangled the old unhappy prince with a bow-ſtring, when he had reigned fourteen years. This is a very different account from that given by the Greek hiſtorians, and yet all the Oriental writers concur therein; and their authority ſeems to be of at leaſt as much weight as that of ſtrangers, in a point regarding their own hiſtory [1].

Baharam Tchoubin.

BAHARAM TCHOUBIN, on the flight of Khoſrou, aſſumed the regal authority, tho' without the title. He was deſcended of the antient princes of Rei, and was the talleſt man in the Perſian dominions. He had ſerved, when a youth, as a voluntier in the armies of Nouſchirvan, and had riſen, gradually and purely through merit, to the government of Media. As he was an excellent officer and mightily beloved by the ſoldiers, ſo he was naturally loyal to his prince, and, in all probability, had maintained him on his throne, notwithſtanding his ill conduct, if Jezdan Bakſche, who was his firſt miniſter, had not inſtigated Hormouz to treat him as he did. When he had once taken the reſolution of rebelling againſt the king, he reſolved alſo to dethrone him, and to transfer the empire to his own family; but not daring to declare this, he made uſe of the name of Khoſrou, till his ſcheme

ſcheme was ripe for execution. When he was informed of the flight of that prince, he ſent a great detachment of horſe in purſuit of him, under the command of Siaonſchan the captain of his guards, with orders to re-take, if it was poſſible, and to bring him priſoner to his camp. This officer executed his orders ſo punctually, that he came up with Khoſrou and his uncles at a certain hermitage; whereupon Hindouiah to preſerve his nephew, put on the royal robes, and looking out of a window, which was very high, told the ſoldiers, who had already inveſted the place, that, as ſoon as their commanding officer came up, he would ſurrender. On the arrival of the captain of the guards, Hindouiah reſumed his own cloaths, appeared at a window, and, in the name of the king, beſought that officer to grant him ſome reſpite for his repoſe; which was accordingly allowed, a ſtrong guard being poſted round the place. At evening Hindouiah came again to the window, told the captain of the guards, that the king was very ſenſible of the civility ſhewn him, and beſought him to lie there that night, that he might recover his ſpirits a little, and be the more able to bear the fatigue of travelling next day, where-ever they ſhould think proper to carry him. This likewiſe was allowed; but the next morning Hindouiah acknowledged the fraud, and confeſſed that he did it to ſave his nephew, whom he perſonated when the place was firſt inveſted, that they might not purſue him any farther. Upon this he was made priſoner, and conducted to Baharam, who ordered him to remain in confinement; but did not put him to death, becauſe he affected to govern with greater lenity than his predeceſſor. He alſo gave out, that he would follow the example of Nouſchirvan, and reſtore the luſtre of the Perſian diadem to its antient ſplendor. A while the nobility remained faithful, and the people loved him; but by degrees they became diſſatisfied with his conduct; and hearing that Khoſrou was powerfully ſupported by the Greek emperor, they began to ſhew leſs inclination to his ſervice. Baharam, however, ſet a great army on foot, and for a time maintained himſelf in poſſeſſion. At laſt, after having been defeated in a general engagement, and finding himſelf quite borne down by numbers, he determined to retire to the khakan, by whom he was at firſt well received, and to whom he rendered great ſervices by his military ſkill; but, after having been put off for many years with fair promiſes,

he was at length poisoned, at the solicitation of Khosrou, who could never be easy so long as he lived [m].

Khosrou II. KHOSROU, the son of Hormouz, was surnamed Perviz or Aperviz; concerning which appellation the Orientals are by no means agreed. Some say, that, in the antient Persian tongue, it signifies victorious; others the most glorious king. A great critic in that language affirms that it signifies "fish"; and that Khosrou had this surname given him because he was a great lover of fish. If we durst offer our own judgment amongst so many great opinions, we should say, that, as Aperviz in the antient Persian tongue, signifies a violent mover forwards, whence it is understood to signify "fish", we should apprehend it ought here to be taken allegorically; and that, as a surname, it implies "Khosrou the impetuous", which, we think was well justified by the whole current of his conduct. We have seen, in the foregoing period, how he was set upon his throne by the assistance of the Greek emperor, whose forces, in conjunction with those of Khosrou, defeated Baharam Tchoubin in a pitched battle. Mirkhond relates this matter differently; he says, that when the two armies were drawn in order of battle, it was proposed by three general officers belonging to Baharam, that three others should be chosen by Khosrou, and that, to spare the effusion of blood, the issue of the business should be decided by these six champions; which being accepted, Khosrou put himself at the head of his troops, and, notwithstanding all that his uncles could do, fought Baharam's three generals one after another, and slew them all on the spot; whereupon the army of Baharam saluted him king, and Baharam himself; with a few of his friends, were forced to place their safety in flight. The eastern writers agree with the Greek historians in this, that Khosrou married a christian and made her queen; but then they differ exceedingly as to the quality of this lady, most of the oriental writers affirming, that she was the daughter of the emperor Maurice; whereas the Greek authors alledge, that she was a woman of ordinary birth, with whom Khosrou fell in love for her beauty. This woman, whatever her quality was, by the Greek writers is called Mary or Irene, and by the oriental historians Schirin, a name which signifies "soft" or "agreeable". They report, that Khosrou loved her her to diſtraction; and that, on the other hand, ſhe deſpiſed him, and was in love with one Ferhad, a perſon of no great quality. They celebrate exceedingly the ſweetneſs of her voice and her ſkill in muſic; which, together with her amour, renders it improbable that ſhe was the daughter of a Greek emperor, but that ſhe was rather a dancer or muſic-girl. For her ſake Khoſrou was for a long time very kind to the chriſtians; but in proceſs of time, either from his jealouſy of her, or from ſome other cauſe, he conceived a moſt implacable hatred againſt them; and finding a fair opportunity on the acceſſion of Phocas to the Greek empire, he began to enter its provinces, to beſiege its fortified cities, and to plunder all its ſubjects, without mercy, as hath been largely ſhewn in the former period. In the invaſion of Judæa and the ſacking of the city of Jeruſalem, he was aſſiſted by the Jews, who made high profeſſions of loyalty to this prince, that, under his protection, they might exhauſt the chriſtians by uſury, and, when they were totally deſpoiled of property, enſlave their perſons. Arabia, Egypt, and the iſlands in the Mediterranean, fell under the power of this victorious prince, who, as we before noted, might well deſerve the ſirname of impetuous, from the rapidity of his conqueſts [n].

On his return to Madain, he wonderfully embelliſhed the palace of his grandfather, diſpoſing the upper part thereof in the form of a throne, which was ſupported by forty thouſand ſilver columns, and the concave over them was adorned by a thouſand globes of gold, wherein all the planets and great conſtellations were ſeen to perform their natural revolutions, all the walls of this ſumptuous place being covered with tapeſtry, wrought with gold flowers, and enriched with pearls and other precious ſtones. Underneath he had a hundred vaults filled with treaſure. In the apartment of his women he had three thouſand ladies, who were free, and twelve thouſand ſlaves, the moſt beautiful that could be found throughout his dominions. His houſhold troops were compoſed of ſix thouſand men. In his ſtables he had ſix thouſand horſes and mules for his own riding; twelve thouſand large mules, and eight thouſand of the ordinary kind, which ſerved to carry his baggage. He had alſo nine hundred and ſixty elephants, which he made uſe uſe of in his armies. In the midſt of all theſe fine things, the mind of Khoſrou was very little at eaſe; for, not to enter into his family concerns and the uneaſineſs he had on account of his miſtreſs Schirin, it is ſufficient for us to know, that as he grew in years, he grew exceſſively covetous, loſt all manner of tenderneſs and compaſſion, and plundered his ſubjects in ſuch a manner, that he alone was rich in all his vaſt dominions. He grew alſo exceſſively ſuſpicious, and ſo jealous of the wealth he had amaſſed, that he made himſelf a ſlave in guarding it. His avarice likewiſe made him exceſſively cruel, inſomuch, that he put numbers of perſons to death, without any viſible cauſe. This was the rock on which his father ſplit, and which proved no leſs fatal to him. His nobility, finding themſelves abſolutely unſafe while he remained upon the throne, determined to ſecure themſelves at all events, and therefore addreſſing themſelves to an officer of his, who was then at the head of the army, they prevailed upon him to ſeize the perſon of Khoſrou, whom they inſtantly depoſed, and elevated to the throne his eldeſt ſon * (K).

(K) The character of Khoſrou, both in this and in the former period, hath been ſo fully treated, that it might ſeem unneceſſary to add any thing more concerning him; but if it be conſidered, that this prince was more terrible to his neighbours than any of his predeceſſors, his grandfather Nouſchirvan not excepted, and that he really poſſeſſed greater dominions than any monarch of his dynaſty, it will not ſeem ſtrange, that we have ſo much to ſay about him. He promiſed, as we have ſeen in the text, to do juſtice on his father's enemies, of whom the principal were his own uncles; and in this he kept his word, for when they had eſtabliſhed him upon the throne, he cauſed them to be put to death; and, by his example, his ſon firſt directed him to be murdered, then buried him ſplendidly, and laſtly ſlew the perſon who executed his own commands. He was ſo exceſſively covetous, that, in his wars, he acted more like a partizan than a great prince; for, throughout all Syria and Meſopotamia, he firſt plundered the churches of all that was valuable in them, and then he ordered them to be demoliſhed, that he might carry away the beſt of the materials employed in building them. He was likewiſe an outrageous perſecutor, not certainly from any religious principle, but that he might maintain himſelf in the good opinion

KHOBAD Schirouieh, whom the Greeks call Siroes, was no ſooner poſſeſſed of the diadem by the choice of the nobility, than he reſolved to ſecure it, by depriving his father of life. To this purpoſe he ſent for Mihir Hormouz, a nobleman, whoſe father Khoſrou had cauſed to be put to death, and diſpatched him inſtantly to the priſon, where Khoſrou lay in chains. As ſoon as the king ſaw him, Schirouieh.

opinion of the magi. It was impoſſible he ſhould keep his conqueſts, becauſe he ſtripped the people of all things that they poſſeſſed, and thereby drove them, if they eſcaped ſlavery, into other territories; whence if ever they returned, it was in quality of ſoldiers, to revenge themſelves of ſo barbarous an enemy; whereas Nouſchirvan treated all his new ſubjects in the frontier provinces with ſuch extraordinary lenity, that there was nothing they feared ſo much as changing their maſter. All theſe devaſtations and plunderings were merely to fill thoſe vaults, which, with ſo much care, he had built under his palace, and wherein he greedily deſired to lay up the treaſures of the whole earth. Indeed, if what the Perſian hiſtories ſay be true, he did amaſs more riches than any of his predeceſſors had ever ſeen. They tell us likewiſe, that when his protector, the emperor Maurice, and his family were in diſtreſs, and had put all their jewels and riches on board two or three veſſels, theſe ſhips coming on the coaſts of Perſia, he cauſed them to be ſeized, and confiſcated all the treaſure on board them, which he ordered to be brought and placed in one of the vaults under his palace, of which he had an hundred; and having ſealed the door, placed over the head of it an inſcription, ſignifying, that theſe treaſures were brought him by the winds. When his ſubjects had depoſed him, they could not find any priſon ſo ſafe, or ſo proper, as one of thoſe vaults, where, it is ſaid, he was loaded with chains of gold, and had ſeveral days leiſure to conſider, to how little purpoſe he had oppreſſed ſo great a part of the world; ſince neither power nor wealth could hinder his feeling as exceſſive a load of miſery, as he had ever inflicted on the meaneſt of his ſubjects (30). Beſides the account of his death given in the text, we have in another hiſtorian that which follows: Siroes his ſon ſent for him into his preſence, and having entered into a long detail of his cruelties and mal-adminiſtration, he concluded thus: "You cannot think "it unjuſt or unnatural in me to order you to be put to death, "ſince, for leſs than this, you pronounced the ſame judgment "on your own father (31).

him, he roſe up, and looking upon him with an air of wildneſs and fury, "Man," ſaid he, "I cauſed your fa-"ther to be put to death, and I hold him to be a baſtard, "who takes not the life of his father's murderer, when "he has it in his power." Hormouz upon this drew his ſcymitar, and plunging it into the bowels of Khoſrou, left him wallowing in his blood. Returning to Khobad, he gave him an exact account of what he had done, repeating alſo the ſtrange ſalutation he had from Khoſrou, to which the king at that time made no anſwer; but having cauſed his father to be ſumptuouſly interred, he ſent for Mihir Hormouz, and having repeated to him the words of his father, ſaid, "You ſee how juſtly you are put to death," and ordered him to be ſlain in his preſence. After this, Khobad ordered all his brethren to be ſeized and put to death. He had eighteen in all, and two ſiſters. Of theſe ſeventeen were murdered, and the eighteenth, whoſe name was Scheheriar, was concealed in the antient city of Perſepolis, and ſo eſcaped. As for his ſiſters, Khobad ſpared them on account of their ſex, and treated them with all imaginable kindneſs; but theſe ladies, when they ſaw their country invaded by peſtilence and famine at once, and obſerved the general diſaffection of the people, could not help reproaching their brother with his cruelty, charging on him the miſeries of his people, and exhorting him, if it was poſſible, to repent. Theſe diſcourſes made ſuch an impreſſion on his mind, that he began to grow extremely melancholy, and at laſt the diſpoſition of his mind inducing a fever, the plague ſeized him, and he died after a reign of ſix or eight months. He was ſucceeded by his ſon [P] (L).

(L) The name of this prince is ſo differently written, that many miſtakes and great confuſion have ariſen therefrom, not only among the Greek writers, but alſo among ſome of the moderns. Khondemir, Mirkhond, and the reſt of the Perſian hiſtorians agree in calling this prince Khobad; but then they diſtinguiſh him by the ſirname of Schirouieh; whence the Greeks form their Siroes, tho', if they had followed their uſual cuſtom, they ſhould rather have called him Cavades. He was certainly well inclined to the chriſtian religion; and that is the reaſon we have ſuch different accounts of him. The Greek writers, and

His ſiſters and the nobility promiſed themſelves great bleſſings under his reign, hoping they might have time to ſettle the affairs of the kingdom, and to eaſe the people of the exceſſive taxes with which they were burdened; but in this they were miſtaken, for Scheheriar, the general of the army, who had ſeized and depoſed his father, taking umbrage at the ſetting up of the ſon of his maſter without his participation, or rather making uſe of this and other frivilous pre- Ardſchir II.

and indeed the chriſtian authors, in all languages, ſpeak of him very tenderly, and either drop the ſtory of his father's murder, or endeavour, tho' that be a hard thing, to palliate it. The oriental hiſtorians again draw him in the blackeſt coulours, and ſay, that he broke his heart on account of the reproaches of his ſiſters, and of the terrible judgments from God, which fell upon his realm and people (32). There is, however, a circumſtance relating to this prince, which, tho' it happened long after his death, deſerves to be taken notice of, ſince it is one of the moſt curious paſſages in the eaſtern hiſtory, and is perfectly well atteſted. The caliph Montaſer having cauſed his father to be put to death, ſome ſmall time after looking over the rich furniture in the palace, and cauſing ſeveral rich pieces of tapeſtry to be opened before him, that he might examine them the more exactly, amongſt the reſt he met with one, which had in it the figure of a very beautiful young man, mounted on a Perſian horſe, with a diadem on his head, and a circle of Perſian characters round himſelf and his horſe. The caliph, charmed with the beauty of the tapeſtry, ſent for a perſon who underſtood the antient Perſic, and deſired him to explain to him that inſcription. The man read it, changed colour, and, after ſome heſitation, told the caliph, it was a Perſian ſong, that had nothing in it worth hearing. That prince, however, would not be ſo put off; he readily perceived, that there was ſomething in it extraordinary, and therefore he commanded the interpreter to give him the true ſenſe thereof immediately, as he valued his own ſafety. The man then told him, that the inſcription ran thus: "I am Siroes, the ſon of "Choſroes, who ſlew my father to gain his crown, which I kept "but ſix months". This affected the caliph ſo much, that he died in two or three days, when he had reigned about the ſame ſpace of time (33).

pretences to colour the deteſtable ſcheme he had formed of ſeizing the crown and extirpating the royal family, he marched with his forces to the capital city, and having eaſily vanquiſhed thoſe who remained faithful to their infant monarch, he put the child to death, with all the nobility who were ſtrictly attached to him, and filled the palace with blood; after which, in purſuance of his project, he ſeized the ſovereign authority, which he had ſo dearly bought. Authors do not agree as to the time Ardſchir reigned; moſt of them allow him a year and a half; but Mirkond is poſitive, that he reigned no more than fifty days [q].

Scheheriar. SCHEHERIAR, as he attained the ſovereign authority by treachery and cruelty, ſo he governed by all the arts of a tyrant, and made the people know the difference between a natural prince, and one raiſed to empire by his ſword. The army, as it aſſiſted him in his enterprize againſt the young Ardſchir, ſo they expected, on his ſucceeding him, that he ſhould pay the wages of their infidelity. This he was deſirous enough to do; but as they not only demanded money, but inſiſted likewiſe on ſetting a price on their labour, he found it not very eaſy to content them; and this drove him upon extortion and oppreſſion, the exerciſe of which did not hinder them from being guilty of the moſt notorious rapine. The eldeſt princeſs of Perſia perceiving, that the nobility were generally diſaffected, ſecretly influenced their minds, and inſtigated them to ſet their country free, by putting to death this uſurper. Her arts had their effect, the people began univerſally to deteſt a monarch, whoſe conduct was as offenſive, as the method by which he gained his crown was unjuſtifiable; yet ſtill there was nothing done; the cruelty of Scheheriar, and the madneſs of the army reſtrained all things but complaints. Every one readily confeſſed they ſhould be glad to be delivered from the miſeries they were under; but nobody durſt undertake this deliverance, leſt ſo great a work ſhould miſcarry in their hands. At length Touran Dockht fixed upon three brothers, all young men, of great quality and diſtinguiſhed courage. She explained to them the preſent ſituation of affairs, the miſerable condition of their country, and the impoſſibility there was of removing theſe grievances, any other way than by the death of Schaheriar. She

She likewiſe obſerved, that, however dangerous this might appear, it was as eaſily accompliſhed as projected; and that as he was not of the royal family, but an upſtart, and generally hated, his death would be agreeable to the people, and the man regarded as a hero, from whoſe hand he ſhould receive it. Theſe leſſons had their effects; the brothers fixed themſelves one day at the palace gate, and as Scheheriar came out and was about to mount on horſeback, they fell upon him, and killed him before he could receive any aſſiſtance from his adherents, when he had been called a king little more than two years. He was no ſooner dead, than all the inhabitants of the city of Madain aſſembled to protect thoſe who had killed him. In this aſſembly it was reſolved to reſtore the crown to the royal family, and ſince there was not an heir male, to elevate the eldeſt of the princeſſes to the throne [r].

Touran Dockht.

Touran Dockht, as ſoon as ſhe received the crown, made choice of the eldeſt of the three brothers, whoſe name was Ferokhzad, to be her prime minister and general of her armies. This nobleman diſcharged his truſt perfectly well; for he not only reduced the army to the obedience of his miſtreſs, and engaged them to live peaceably among their fellow ſubjects, but he alſo diſappointed the Arabs, who, in the reign of this princeſs, made a vigorous effort to conquer Perſia. Ferokhzad, with a conſiderable body of horſe, was quartered in Chaldea, when he received advice, that Abou-Obeidah, general of the forces of caliph Omar, had thrown a bridge over the Euphrates, in order to come and attack the Perſian army quartered in the vicinity of Babylon. Ferokhzad ſent orders to the Perſians to act on the defenſive, while he, with the horſe under his command, marched directly to the bridge, forced the Arab guard, and having filled the veſſels of which it was compoſed with combuſtible matter, ſet them on fire; then following the enemies camp, he cut off their proviſions, till a fair occaſion offered of fighting, and then having given a ſignal to his Perſians to charge the Arabs in front, he, while the battle was hot and doubtful, fell upon them in flank and rear, ſo that they were totally defeated; and this vigilant general purſued the remains, that not ſo much as their leader eſcaped to carry the news of their defeat. In the mean time, the queen acted in civil affairs with a firmneſs not to be expected from a woman; for having in vain endeavoured, by fair means, to engage ſome of the nobility to forbear plundering the people, ſhe had recourſe at length to harſher methods, cauſing them to be ſuddenly ſeized, and as ſuddenly put to death. This endeared her to the commonalty, and ſo humbled the nobility, that they durſt neither oppreſs their vaſſals, as they were wont, nor undertake any thing againſt their ſovereign, as they deſigned. But this peaceable ſituation of things laſted but a very ſhort time; Ferokhzad being marched into the frontier provinces, in order to oppoſe the attempts of the Greek emperor, his miſtreſs was ſeized with a violent diſtemper, which, in a little time, hurried her out of the world, not without ſtrong ſuſpicions, that ſhe died a martyr to that love which ſhe had ſhewn for the people. On her deceaſe the public affairs fell into the greateſt confuſion: the nobility began to ſee, that there was no truſting to the weakneſs of a woman; and therefore they fixed upon Gihan Schedah, a prince of the royal blood, but a man of very mean parts, and declared him king that they might govern as they pleaſed themſelves. But when he came to be inaugurated, he ſaid, That the imperial diadem was very heavy, and that it did not fit him. This the nobility would needs underſtand metaphorically, and as the effects of his modeſty; but the people either ſaw, or fancied they ſaw, ſuch evident ſimplicity in his looks, that, after a few days, they depoſed him, and ſeated the youngeſt daughter of Khoſrou Perviz on the throne [s] (M).

(M) The confuſion of this country could not be greater than that of all its hiſtorians, in reſpect to its princes, or thoſe who were called its princes, at this time. We have followed the catalogue of Khondemir, becauſe he was an author of great judgment, and did not adhere implicitly to thoſe from whom he wrote. The Spaniſh copy of Mirkhond hath a prince called Joonſchir, who is called the twenty ſecond monarch of this dynaſty; and it is ſaid, that he was nephew to Baharam Tchoubin; and this ſurname is ſaid to ſignify a young lion, or a beautiful lion; but we acknowledge, that we are able to give no account of this matter, or to divine who this man ſhould be. It is true, ſome chriſtian writers mention one Khoſrou

Azurmi Dockht.

Azurmi Dockht had as much ſenſe as her ſiſter, and is ſaid to have ſurpaſſed her very much in beauty. On her firſt acceſſion to the throne, ſhe gave the people the ſtrongeſt hopes of a mild and happy reign; but when the news of her becoming queen reached the province of Khoraſſan, Ferok Hormouz, who had been long governor thereof, conceived a violent deſire of marrying her; and therefore, entruſting the province with his ſon of the ſame name, he ſet out for Madain, in order to carry his ſcheme into execution. The queen, knowing the reſtleſs diſpoſition of the people, and the great power of this nobleman in his province, received him with great civility, and did him all the honours in her power; but all this had no effect; his paſſion or his ambition was ſo very ſtrong, that nothing could poſſibly ſatisfy him, leſs than being made the partner of her bed and throne; a thing ſhe could not grant. Upon her refuſal, her lover had the inſolence to threaten her, and even to have recourſe to force; upon which, in her own defence, ſhe was conſtrained to ſeize him and put him to death. His ſon, when informed of his father's cataſtrophe, forgetting the duty he owed his ſovereign, and that his Khoſrou or Choſroes, the grandſon of the laſt Choſroes; but this is unintelligible, unleſs we ſuppoſe, that the meant Ardſchir, who might be called Choſroes, becauſe all the Perſian kings were ſo called; which, however, is improbable. Perhaps after all, this Joonſchir might be the ſame with Gihan Schedah, of whom we have ſpoken in the text; and whoſe reign of a few days Khondemir hath omitted in his liſt. We muſt acknowledge, that there is little affinity between the names; but all the names in Teixera's verſion are ſo ſtrangely written, that at leaſt half the German critics obſervations on the Perſian kings are ſpent in reconciling them to the Arabic. There is, we know, a ſtrong objection to this account of the matter; and that is, that Teixera alſo mentions this monarch, and likewiſe a ſon of his, whom he calls Keſere, by which doubtleſs he meant Khoſrou. But to all this it may be anſwered, that, as we find theſe kings no where elſe, we may ſafely ſuppoſe them to be but one and the ſame perſon; and that, inſtead of Joonſchir, Jaſancedah, and Keſere, we ought to read, Khoſrou Ginan Schedah. But all this is left to the deciſion of the reader (34).

(34) Teixera, c. 41. Schikard Tarich. Khondemir. Eben Batrick. Lebtarikh, &c.

father had drawn this evil upon himself, marched immediately with an army to revenge what he held a disgrace; and having forced the city of Madain, stormed the palace, made the queen prisoner, and afterwards, notwithstanding all the tears and entreaties of her subjects, caused her in cool blood to be put to death. This enormous crime rendered him so obnoxious to all who had any sense of humanity, that, distrusting the army he had brought with him, he immediately retired back into Khoraſſan. After his departure, it was discovered, that when the children of Khosrou Perviz were put to death, a boy, his grandson, had been preserved by his aunts. This young man therefore the nobility brought from the place where he was hid, and resolved to bestow upon him the crown, the rather perhaps, because, excepting his birth, he had nothing that could recommend him [t]. The name of this young prince was

Ferokhzad

FEROKHZAD. He was esteemed a good-natured, inoffensive lad, and, in quiet times, might very probably have made a very gracious prince. As it was, he had not time to give any signs either of ability, or want of it; for before he had reigned a month, he was, on what account we know not, poisoned by one of his slaves, and the kingdom thereby thrown once more into confusion [u].

Jezdegerd III.

WE are now arrived at the last of the Persian kings, whose name was Jezdegerd Ben Scheheriar, of whose pedigree it is necessary that we should give a clear account. Some of the Greek writers call him the son of Siroes; which is absolutely impossible he should have been. Others, acknowledging this, say, he was the descendent of that prince in a remote degree. This, however, only carries the mistake a little further out of sight; for it is just as impossible that he should be his descendent, as that he should be his son. Mirkhond gives us the following account, which, tho' it hath something in it of the marvellous, yet, as it hath manifestly a mixture of truth, the reader must take it, till our acquaintance with the oriental histories procures him a better. Khosrou Perviz, towards the latter end of his reign, had a very odd dream. He fancied he saw the city, in which he then was, surrounded with a strong wall, adorned with eleven fine towers, and that these, while he was looking upon them, fell, one one after another, to the ground; ſo that the city was left quite open and defenceleſs. In the morning the king ſent for ſome of the magi, told them his dream, and beſought them to explain it; which they did to this purpoſe: That, by the fortified city, was repreſented the kingdom of Perſia; by the towers, the princes who ſhould ſucceed him; and by the open and defenceleſs condition in which it was at laſt left, the final ſubverſion of the monarchy. The king, ſtrangely alarmed by his dream, and quite diſtracted with its interpretation, began to caſt about in his mind how to prevent its taking effect. Amongſt other notions that came into his head, one was that the number of his ſons might cauſe great diſturbance; for he had no leſs at that time than eighteen. He therefore ordered, that they ſhould be all committed to cuſtody, and ſo ſtrictly kept, as not to have the permiſſion of ſeeing their wives or children. One of them, Scheheriar, having lately married a lady, whoſe name was Schirin, and being paſſionately fond of her, he firſt contrived a means of writing to her, and then of ſeeing her. The ſtratagem he made uſe of was this: he pretended to be ſeized with a fever, and deſired that he might be let blood. Schirin, upon this occaſion, perſonated a ſurgeon; and from this interview ſhe became with child. When it was known, the hiſtorian tells us, that Khoſrou ordered the child to be made away with, as ſoon as it ſhould be born; but being at laſt mollified by the tears and paſſionate entreaties of the mother, he directed, that it ſhould be expoſed in the woods; which was accordingly done, but, by the care of its parents, it was ſoon taken from thence, and privately educated. If this be true, then the reaſon why Siroes put his brethren to death will no longer remain a ſecret, but ſerve as a ſufficient warrant to diſtruſt all interpretations of dreams, whch, we ſee, are often fatal and almoſt always deluſive. However, we think, that the dream of Khoſrou might have been better interpreted; and, if it had, none of theſe bad conſequences would have followed. It appears, by the age at which Jezdegerd mounted the throne, viz. ſixteen, that this dream happened to Khoſrou in the twenty-ſeventh year of his reign. The eleven towers therefore might have been underſtood to be the years he was ſtill to ſit upon the throne; and the deſolate condition in which he ſaw the city, after they were fallen down, expreſſed perfectly well his own miſerable circumſtances at the end of that period. But to proceed [x].

JEZDEGERD the third, who appears to have been the grandson of Khosrou Perviz, ascended the Persian throne, and made choice of Ferokhzad, who had been his aunt's general, for his prime minister and commander in chief. He was scarce arrived at man's estate, before he found the crown totter on his head, being attacked on all sides of his dominions by powerful enemies. Authors are extremely divided as to the beginning of his wars; for some alledge, that the Turks, that is, the inhabitants of Turquestan, the inveterate enemies of the Persians, invaded the frontiers of his dominions next them, and that while he marched to make head against them, the Arabs invaded Chaldea; whereupon he was forced to return to oppose these. Others affirm that the Turks did not invade his dominions; but that he sent for them to his assistance, but was so unfortunate as to be obliged to fight before they could come up. In this confusion, all that we can do is to report facts, as clearly and as methodically as we can. It seems then, that the caliph Omar, being extremely desirous of reducing Persia under his dominion, sent a part of his army, under the command of Sâd, to penetrate into that country through Chaldea. Ferokhzad, who was upon the spot, took all imaginable pains to harass the Arabs in their march; and having an army superior to them in numbers, employed them continually in skirmishes, which were sometimes favourable to him, and sometimes otherwise. But Sâd perceiving clearly, that this lingering war would destroy his army, and that to very little purpose, determined to push forward and force the enemy to a general engagement. The Persians declined this as long as thy could; but at length finding a convenient plain, where all their forces might act, near the city of Cadessia, Ferokhzad drew up there in order of battle, and resolved to wait for the Arabs. It was not long before Sâd and his forces appeared, who seeing how advantageously the Persian army was posted, rejoiced thereat, hoping that he would now be able to fight, which was all he sought; since a long war, at so great a distance from his own country, would have destroyed him, even if he had been successful in slight engagements. He therefore disposed his troops in the best order he could, and attacked the Persians with great fury. There never was a battle more famous in history than this, nor one that deserved it better, either on account of the resolution with which it was fought, or of the consequences that followed thereupon. It lasted three days and nights, the Persians retiring continually from one post to another, till at length length they were entirely defeated; and, by this defeat, the capital city, and the greateſt part of the dominions of Perſia, fell into the hands of the Arabs. Moſt of the oriental writers call the Perſian general Roſtam; but we believe that was rather a title of honour, or a common name for all the champions of their country. The firſt thing they did was, to ſeize on the treaſures of Khoſrou, which were ſo immenſe, that ſome Mohammedan writers tell us their prophet, to encourage his diſciples, carried them to a rock, which, at his command, opened, and gave them a proſpect through it of the treaſures in the vaults of Khoſrou [y].

He retires into Chorraſſan.

On the loſs of this battle, Jezdegerd retired into Chorraſſan; and tho' he had not reigned above three years, loſt, from that time forwards, all the reſt of his dominions, except the two dependent provinces of Kerman and Sigiſtan, which he held as long as he lived, partly by force, keeping up a conſiderable army about his perſon, and partly becauſe the Arabs were not at leiſure to carry on a war at ſuch a diſtance. But tho' the king retired ſo early, ſome of the governors of his provinces maintained themſelves longer, hoping to turn them into little kingdoms for their own benefit. Among theſe Hormozan poſſeſſed himſelf of Khouhiſtan, and held it for ſome time; but being at length reduced to great extremities, he ſurrendered it up, and went in perſon to pay his duty to the caliph Omar, who received him kindly, and at whoſe requeſt he embraced the Mohammedan religion [z].

Is killed in a battle.

When Jezdegerd had poſſeſſed the royal title about nineteen years, a new misfortune fell upon him; for one of the governors of the few towns he had left, betrayed it, and called in the Turks. This place was called Merou, ſeated on the river Gihon or Oxus, and therefore called Merou al Roud, or Merou of the river, to diſtinguiſh it from another Merou, lying, as well as this, in the province of Choraſſan. Jezdegerd immediately marched with his army to give battle to the rebels and their allies the Turks. In this engagement he was defeated, and having, with much difficulty, reached the river, he found there a little boat, and a fiſherman to whom it belonged. To him the king offered a bracelet of precious ſtones; but the fellow being equally brutal and ſtupid, ſaid his fare was five farthings, and he would not take more or leſs. While the king and and he diſputed, a party of the rebel horſe came up, and knowing Jezdegerd, killed him. This happened in the year after Chriſt 652 [a] (N).

(N) There hath been a great deal of diſpute as to the ſettling the commencement of the æra Jeſdegerdica, ſo called from this laſt king of the Perſians. It would be needleſs to cite what ſeveral chronologers have advanced upon this head, many of them, tho' great men in other reſpects, having ſhewn little ſkill on this ſubject, and at the ſame time not a little arrogance, in expecting that their deciſions ſhould be implicity yielded to, even by thoſe who were better informed; and therefore Dr. Hyde (41) had great reaſon to teſtify his amazement, that Petavius ſhould aſſign three years for the reign of Jezdegerd; whereas there is no fact more certainly eſtabliſhed, than that he died about the cloſe of his twentieth year. The true ſtate of this queſtion is not, as moſt writers put it, whether the commencement of this æra ought to be fixed to the acceſſion, or to the death, of Jezdegerd? but where it is really fixed by the beſt Oriental authors? ſince our conjectures can have no effect upon their computations, and the utmoſt we can expect from them is, to know how to regulate our own. The beſt of the Oriental writers fix the commencement of this æra very preciſely at the 16th of June in the eleventh year of the Hegira, and in the year of Chriſt 632 (42). Now, it is certain, that this date coincides not with the death, but the acceſſion, of Jezdegerd; and if any are of opinion, that this æra ought to begin at his death, then it muſt begin in the thirty-firſt year of the Hegira, and in the year of Chriſt 652. Why the Eaſtern authors made choice of the acceſſion, rather than the death, of Jezdegerd is a queſtion that we can eaſily reſolve. It is before ſhewn, that Jezdegerd had lived as a private man, as his father always did, till the Perſians, underſtanding how juſt a title he had thereto, ſet him upon the throne. Now, the Arabs ſay, this was done with the conſent of their khalif, who, therefore, looking upon him as his tributary, reckoned the kingdom of Perſia among the reſt of his dominions thenceforward, regarding the ſubſequent reduction of that country not as a conqueſt, but as the re-uniting a part of his empire torn away by a rebel. This is plainly the cauſe why the commencement of this æra is and ought to be fixed at the acceſſion of Jezdegerd; which was what we undertook to prove.

Account of his family.

THE common opinion is, that with this unfortunate prince the majesty of the Sassanian line sunk irretrievably. But this like many other common opinions, is far from being strictly true. Jezdegerd left behind him a son and daughter. The name of the son was Firouz, and of the daughter Dara. The latter espoused Bostenay, whom the rabbinical writers qualified with the title of head of the captivity. In fact he was the chief or Capital prince of the jews settledin Chaldea. As for Firouz, he still preserved a little principality, and dying, left an only daughter, whose name was Mah Afrid, who married Valid the son of the caliph Abdalmalek, by whom he had a son named Jezid, who became caliph, and consequently sovereign of Persia; who was so far from thinking himself above claiming the title derived to him by his mother, that he constantly styled himself the son of Khosrou king of Persia, the descendent of the caliph Maroan, and among whose ancestors, of the side of the mother, were the Roman emperor and the khakan. This end had the dynasty of the Sassanians, according to the Oriental historians; and consequently here ends this section [b].

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Italy.

AS the ſeveral petty ſtates and kingdoms, which we are to write of in this place, were antiently comprehended under the common name of Italy; for the better underſtanding of the preſent hiſtory, we ſhall premiſe a general deſcription of that country, following therein the beſt guides of antiquity, and conſidering this beautiful region in its moſt flouriſhing condition, that is, in the times of the Roman republic and in the reign of Auguſtus, that prince having introduced a new partition of the Italian provinces, which continued, without any conſiderable alteration, to the diviſion of the empire.

Names. ITALY [illegible]untry once revered, and ſtill admired, by all nations, was, in more ant[illegible] times, known by the names of Saturnia, Oenotria, Heſperia, and Auſonia. It was called Saturnia from Saturn, who, being driven out of Crete by his ſon Jupiter, is ſuppoſed to have taken refuge here. The names of Oenotria and Auſonia it borrowed from its antient inhabitans the Oenotrians and Auſones; and that of Heſperia, or Weſtern, given it by the Greeks, from its ſituation with reſpect to Greece. vailed over all the reſt, ſome derive from Italus king of the Siculi; others from the Greek word Italos, ſignifying an ox, this country abounding, by reaſon of its rich paſtures, with oxen of an extraordinary ſize and beauty [a]. All theſe names were originally peculiar to particular provinces of Italy; but afterwards applied to the whole country.

THE limits of Italy have been fixed by nature itſelf, which ſeems not only to have taken more than ordinary care in ſupplying this happy region with every thing neceſſary both for the ſupport and pleaſures of life, but in parting it from all other countries, and defending by ſtrong barriers its native riches from foreign invaders. Thus it is divided from Africa, Greece, the antient Dalmatia, and Liburnia, by the Tyrrhenian, Ionian, and Adriatic ſeas; and from Tranſalpine Gaul, and Rhætia, now part of Germany, by a long ridge of ſteep mountains, called the Alps. The country comprized within theſe boundaries is, according to Cluverius, about nine hundred miles in length; for ſuch is the diſtance between Auguſta Prætoria, now Aoſta, at the foot of the Alps, and cape Leucopetra, now Capo del Armi, in the country of the Brutii, or the Farther Calabria, as it is called by the preſent inhabitants. In ſhape it reſembles a man's leg, rather than the leaf of an oak, to which the antients compared it, and is conſequently very unequal in breadth, being, at the foot of the Alps, according to the above-mentioned writer, five hundred and ſixty miles broad; in the middle parts, that is between Ancona and the mouth of the Tiber, an hundred and thirty-ſix; and in ſome places ſcarce twenty-five. Limits.

ITALY, taking that word in its moſt extenſive ſignification, was in antient times, like moſt othther countries, parcelled out into endleſs petty ſtates and kingdoms, which we ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention in the ſequel of this hiſtory. In after-ages, when the Gauls ſettled in the weſtern, and many Greek colonies in the eaſtern, provinces of this ountry, it was divided, with reſpect to its inhabitants, into three great parts, viz. Gallia Ciſalpina, Italy properly ſo called, and Magna Græcia. This diviſion, as it has been generally adopted by the antient geographers and hiſtorians, we ſhall Diviſions.

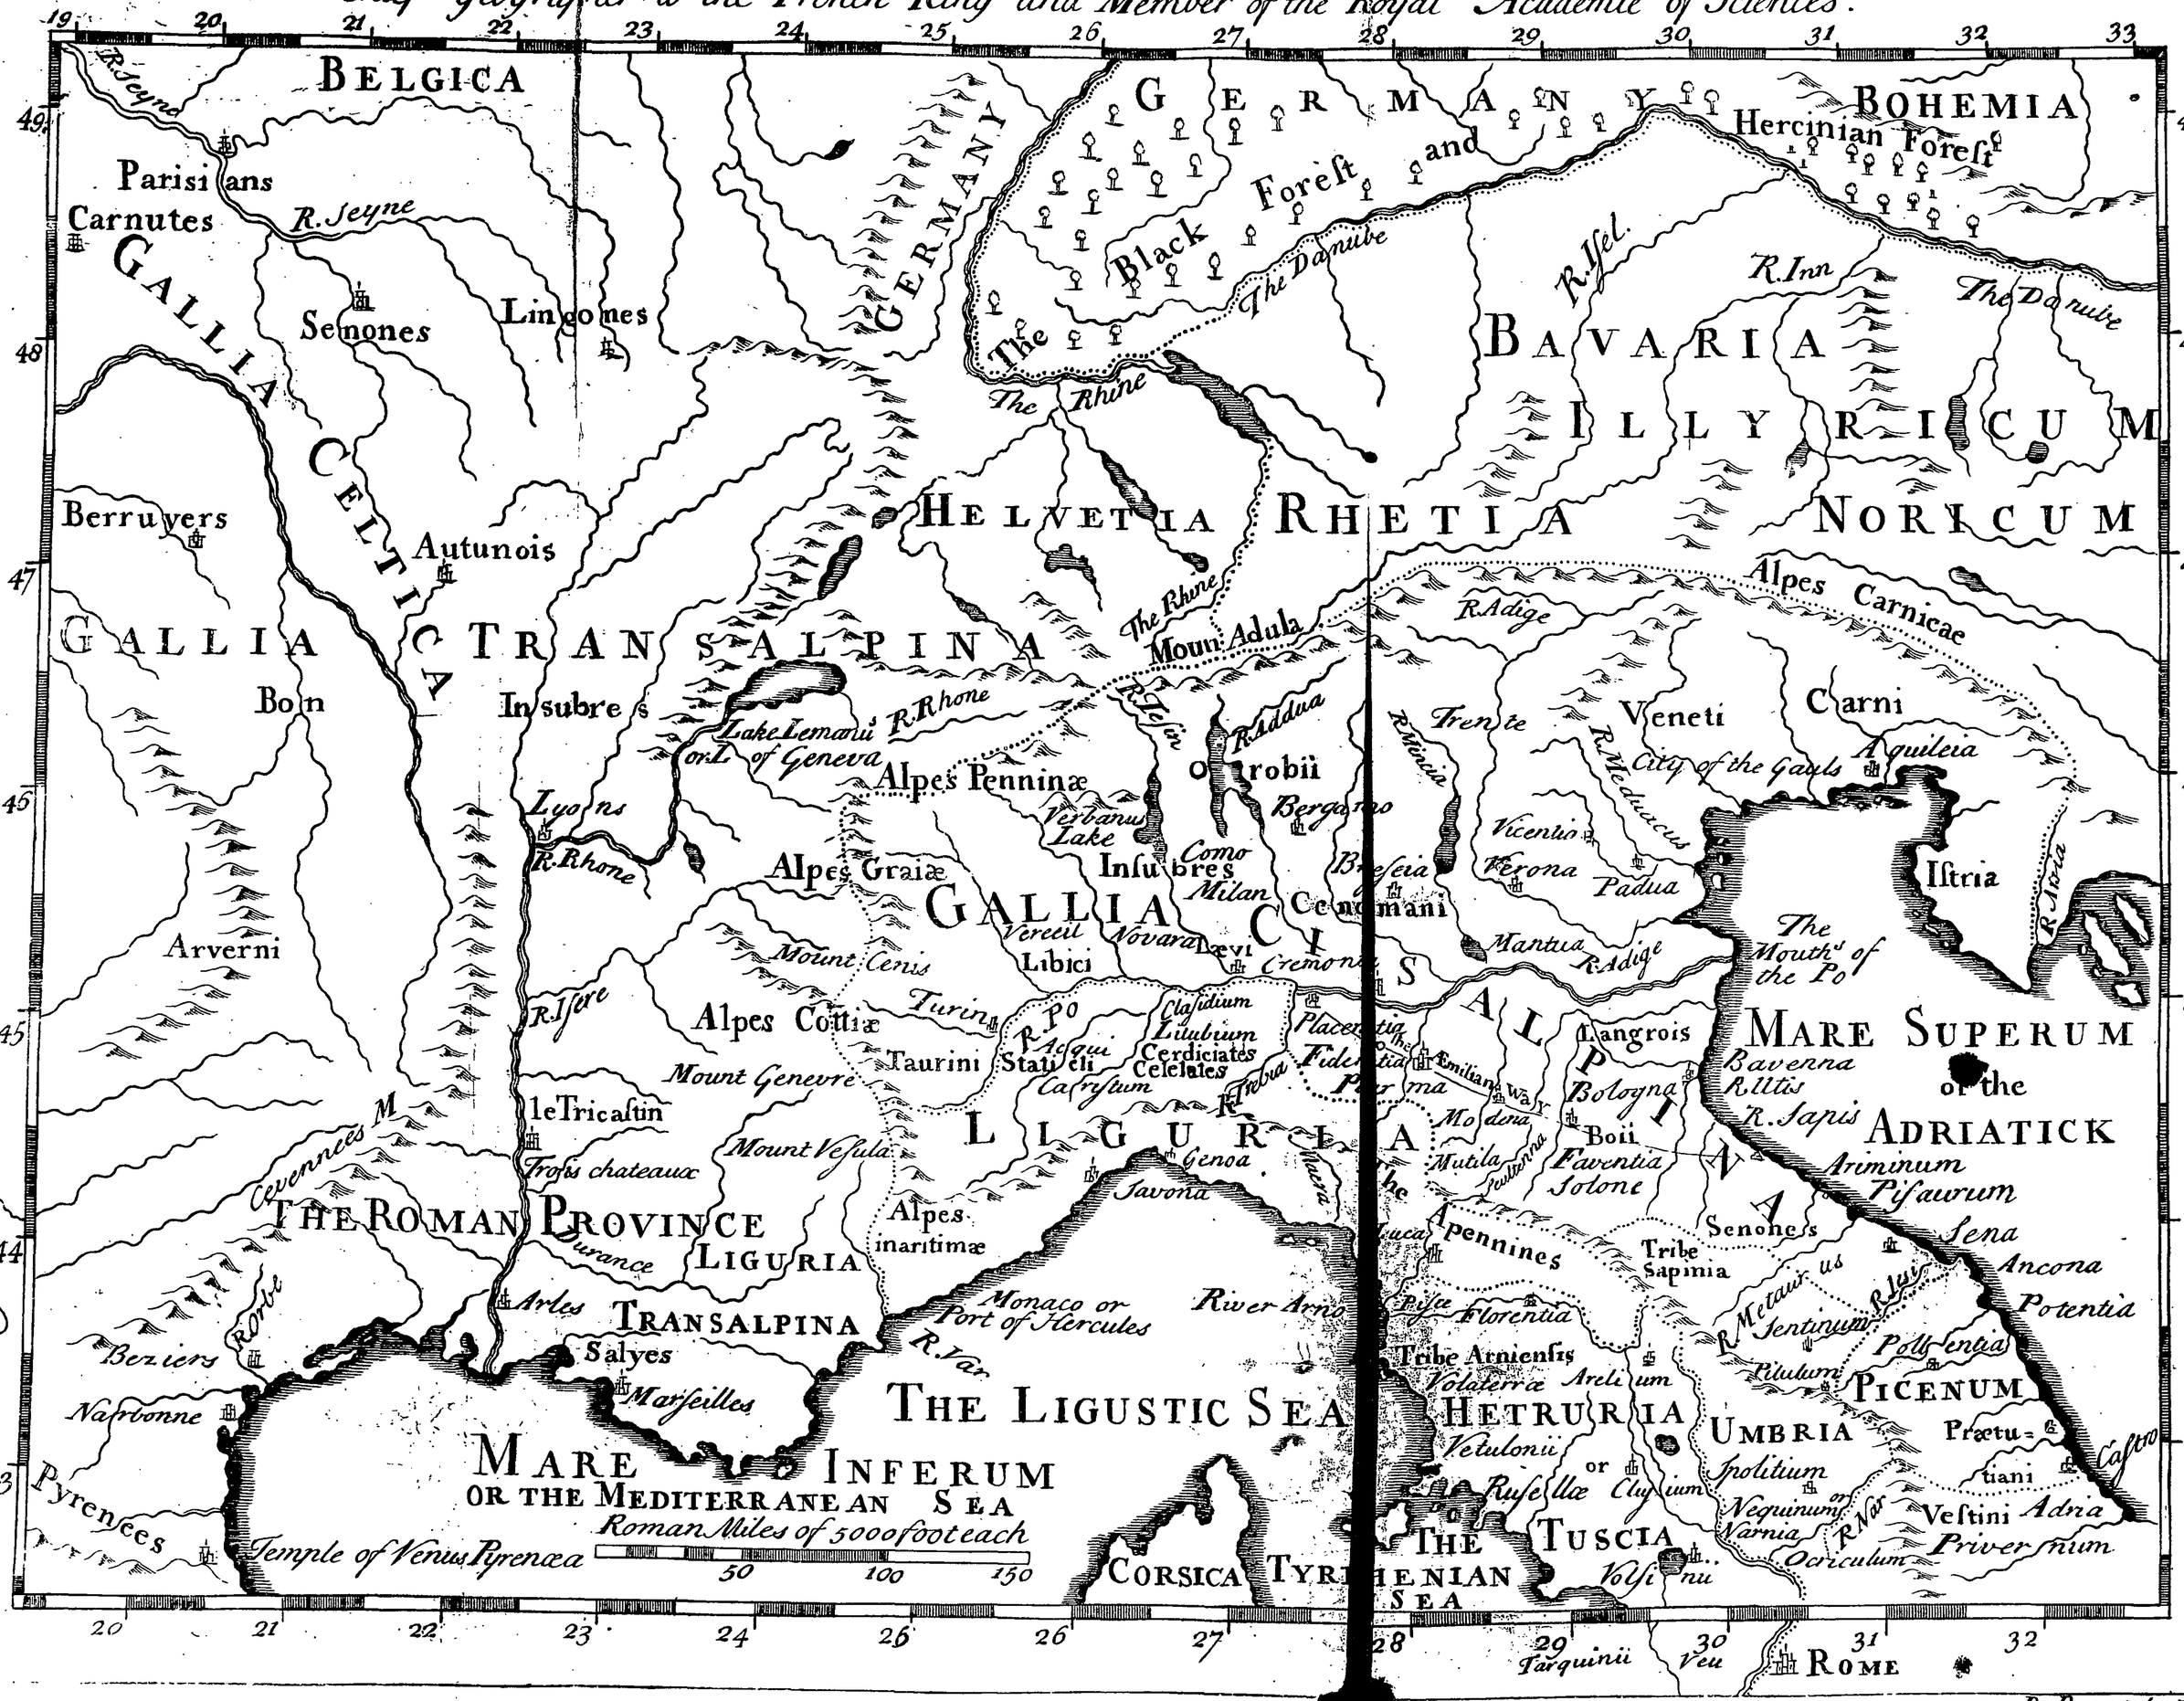
ſhall follow in our preſent ſurvey of Italy, after having acquainted our readers, that we do not deſign to deſcribe in this place the many towns and cities of note which antient Italy contained, being well apprized, that ſuch an undertaking would prove tedious to them, and at the ſame time oblige us to exceed the limits we preſcribe to ourſelves. On theſe two conſiderations, we ſhall at preſent take only a curſory view of them, ſuch as may give our readers a clear idea of their ſituation with reſpect to each other, and reſerve a more diſtinct account of them for the particular countries to which they belonged.

Ciſalpine Gaul.



To begin with the firſt member of the above-mentioned diviſion: The moſt weſtern and northern provinces of Italy were in great part poſſeſſed by the Gauls, and thence called Gallia, or Gaul, with the epithets of Ciſalpina and Citerior, becauſe they lay on the ſide of the Alps next to Rome, and Togata, with relation to the Roman gown or dreſs, which the inhabitants uſed; but this laſt epithet is of a much later date than the former [b]. Plutarch [c] and Pliny [d] call the country we are ſpeaking of Italia Subalpina, or Italy at the foot of the Alps; and Polybius ſimply Italy [e]. In like manner Brutus, in one of his epiſtles to Cicero, and Cicero in his anſwer to him [f], gave the name of Italy, without any epithet, to that tract at the foot of the Alps, where the antient city of Eporedia, now Ivria, ſtood. Whence it is plain, that the large and fruitful provinces formerly poſſeſſed by the Gauls were, ſtrictly ſpeaking, part of Italy, and called Gaul, only becauſe inhabited by the Gauls, who firſt ſettled there in the reign of Tarquinius Priſcus. This appellation was antiquated in the reign of Auguſtus, when the diviſion of Italy into eleven regions, introduced by that prince, took place. And hence it is, that the name of Ciſalpine Gaul frequently occurs in the authors who flouriſhed before, and ſcarce ever in thoſe who wrote after, the reign of Auguſtus. As to the boundaries of this country, it extended [illegible] the Alps and the river Varus, parting it from Tranſalpine Gaul, to the river Aeſis, according to Livy [g]; or, as Pliny will have it [h], to the city of Ancona in the antient Picenum. Chief Ga

tonius [k], and Plutarch [l], make the river Rubico, between Ravenna and Ariminum, the eaſtern boundary of Ciſalpine Gaul. But theſe writers are to be underſtood as ſpeaking of Gaul, after the Romans, under the conduct of M. Lepidus, had made themſelves maſters of Picenum and Umbria, and reduced them to the form of a Roman province, there being nothing more certain, than that theſe countries were antiently poſſeſſed, in great part, by the Senones [m], and conſequently comprized within the limits of Ciſalpine Gaul; nay, they retained the name of Ager Gallicus, or Gallicanus, even after they were become a Roman province [n]. On the north, Ciſalpine Gaul was divided from Rhætia by the Alps, called Rhæticæ, and from Illyricum by the river Formio; but on this ſide the borders of Italy were, in Pliny's time, extended to the river Arſia in Iſtria [o]. On the ſouth it reached to the Liguſtic ſea and the Appennines, parting it from Etruria; ſo that, under the common name of Ciſalpine Gaul were comprehended the countries lying at the foot of the Alps, called by Pliny and Strabo the Subalpine countries, Liguria, Gallia Ciſpadana, and Gallia Tranſpadana. The countries bordering on the Alps were inhabited by the Vediantii, or Veſtiantii, as Ptolemy calls them, the Vagienni, the Taurini, the Seguſiani, the Salaſſi, the Lepontii, the Libicii, and the Canini. The Vediantii inhabited the ſmall tract lying on the eaſt bank of the Varus, and extending from the Alpes Maritimæ to the territory of Nicæa. Next to them, on the north ſide of the Alpes Maritimæ and near the ſource of the Padus or Po, were the Vagienni. Cemelium, or Cemenelium, was the metropolis of the Vediantii; and Auguſta Vagiennorum, now Saluzzo, of the Vagienni. The Taurini were parted from the Vagienni by the Po, on which river ſtood their metropolis, called firſt Tauraſia [p], and afterwards, from a colony ſent thither by Auguſtus, Auguſta Taurinorum [q]. Forum Vibii, another city of the Taurini, is placed by Pliny [r] at a ſmall diſtance from the head of the Po. North of the Taurini and among the Alps lay the kingdom of Cottius, from whom the neighbouring mountains were called Alpes Cottiæ. The Seguſiani were ſubject to him;

him; and Seguſio, Secuſia, or Seguſium, now Suſa, on the Druria, was the metropolis of this ſmall kingdom [s]. The Salaſſi poſſeſſed the country lying between the Alpes Graiæ, on the north, and the country of the Libicii, on the ſouth. Their chief cities were, Auguſta Prætoria and Eporedia, now Aoſta and Ivrea, both on the Great Druria. For in this country there were two rivers, as Pliny obſerves [t], bearing the ſame name; the one called the Great Druria, ſpringing from the Alpes Graiæ, the other, which he ſtyles the Little Druria, riſing on the Alpes Cottiæ. Auguſta Prætoria was ſo called from a colony of three thouſand Prætorian ſoldiers ſent thither by Auguſtus. Eporedia, built about an hundred years before the chriſtian æra, was firſt a Roman colony, and afterwards a municipium [u]. The territory of the Lepontii lay between the Salaſſi and the Lacus Verbanus, now Lago Maggiore. Their metropolis was Oſcela, called by the modern inhabitants Domo d'Oſcela. Next to them were the Libicii, or Libui, who poſſeſſed that tract, which was watered by the Seſſites, now the Seſſia. Their chief cities were Vercellæ and Laumellum, which ſtill retain their antient names. The country of the Canini lay between the lakes Verbanus and Larius. The Alpes Maritimæ, or maritime Alps, which we have mentioned above, extended from the mouth of the Varus to mount Veſulus, now Veſo, in Piedmont, and were ſo called from their ſituation. The Alpes Graiæ, or Greek Alps, reach from mount Cenis to the antient Mons Jovis. at preſent known by the name of The Great St Bernard. Some antient writers ſuppoſe, that Hercules paſſed the monntains at the head of an army of Greeks on his return from Spain, after he had ſuddued Geryon, and derive from thence the appellation of Alpes Graiæ. But Livy [w] looks upon this expedition of Hercules as altogether fabulous.

THE countries, which we have hitherto deſcribed, are by Strabo and Livy placed within the confines of the antient Liguria, and the inhabitants counted among the Ligurian nations, with the epithets of Montani and Comati, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe who inhabited Liguria properly ſo called. Some

Some antient writers, quoted by Pliny [x], derive the Lepontii from the Greeks, whom they ſuppoſe Hercules to have left in theſe countries after he had paſſed the Alps, by reaſon of their being diſabled, by the hardſhips they had ſuffered on that occaſion, from purſuing their march with the reſt of the army. But this opinion has no other foundation than the ſimilitude between the name of that people and the Greek verb 'leipo' to leave.

Liguria. LIGURIA, properly ſo called, was bounded on the eaſt by the river Macra; on the weſt by the Varus; on the ſouth by the Liguſtic ſea; and on the north by the Po. Cities of note in this country were, on the coaſt, Nicæa, now Nizza, built by the Maſſilienſes as a barrier againſt the Ligures Montani [y]; Portus Herculis Monæci, now Monaco. Portus Herculis and Portus Monæci were, according to Ptolemy, two diſtinct cities; for that writer ſpeaks of a place, which he calls Tropæa Auguſti, lying between them. But herein he was certainly miſtaken, ſince all the antient geographers and hiſtorians call the ſame place ſometimes Portus Herculis, and ſometimes Portus Herculis Monæci. This city is ſpoke of by Virgil [z], and deſcribed by Lucan [a]. Albintemalium or Albium Intemelium, Albium Ingaunum, or Albingaunum, Vada, Sabata, Genua, Portus Delphini, and Portus Lunæ; now Vintimiglia, Albenga, Vado, Savona, Genoa, Porto Fino, and Golfo delle Spezie, were all on the coaſt now called La riviera di Genoa. Cluverius ſuppoſes Vada and Sabatia, or Sabata, to be one and the ſame city, which he calls Vada Sabatia, but is therein contradicted by the learned Lucas Holſtenius. Genua was in antient times, as it is at preſent, the chief city of Liguria, and an empory, as Strabo ſtiles it [b], to which merchants reſorted from all parts. The modern writers call it Janua, and pretend, that it was built by Janus; but the antients conſtantly write it Genua. It was deſtroyed by Mago the Carthaginian and rebuilt by the Romans. Portus Lunæ is placed by all the antients in Liguria, but the city of Luna, which ſtood on the eaſt bank of the Macra, in Etruria [c]. The inland inland cities of Liguria were Pollentia, Alba Pompeia, Aſta, Aquæ Statiellæ, Forum Fulvii, or Valentium, Induſtria, Dertona, and Iria, now Pollenza, Alba, Aſti, Acqui, Valenza, Tortona, Voghera. Induſtria was called by the antient Ligurians Bodincomagum, becauſe it ſtood on the Po, which was known to them by the name of Bodincus, that is, the bottomleſs [d]. Some writers make the river Iria the eaſtern boundary of Liguria; but as Livy [e] places the cities of Calſtidium and Litubium in that country, Cluverius extends its confines on this ſide to the river Trebia.

Galla Ciſpadana.

NEXT to Liguria lay Gallia Ciſpadana, extending from the Trebia to the city of Ancona, and bounded on the north by the Po and part of the Adriatic, and on the ſouth by the Apennines, parting it from Etruria. It was called Gallia from its inhabitants, and Ciſpadana, becauſe it lay on the ſide of the Po next to Rome. This country was poſſeſſed by the Boii, the Lingones, and the Senones. The chief cities of the Boii, were Placentia, Parma, Mutina, and Bononia; of the Lingones, Ravenna, Forum Cornelii, Faventia, Solona, Forum Livii, Forum Popilii, and Cæſena; now Ravenna, Imola, Faenza, Citta di ſole, Forli, Forlinpopoli, Cæſena; of the Senones, Ariminum, Piſaurum, Fanum Fortunæ, Sena Gallica, and Ancona; now Rimini, Peſaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, Ancona.

Gallia Tranſpadana

GALLIA TRANSPADANA extended from the countries of the Lepontii, Libicii, and Carni, mentioned above, and counted by Strabo and Pliny among the Subalpine nations, to the Adriatic ſea and the river Formio, now Il Riſano, parting it from Iſtria, being bounded on the ſouth by the Po, and on the north by the Alpes Rhæticæ and Carnicæ; the former ſeparating it from Rhætia, now the Trentin, and the latter from the country of the Carni, now Carniola. This part of Ciſalpine Gaul was inhabited by the following nations, the Orobii, the Inſubres, the Lævi, the Cenomani, the Euganei, and the Veneti, and contained many cities of great note. Of theſe, Comum, Bergomum, and Forum Lucinii, now Como, Bergamo, and Pieve d'Incino, or, as others will have it, Berlafina, belonged to the Orobii; Mediolanum, Laus Pompeia, and Forum Intuntorum, now Milan, Lodi, Crema, to the Inſubres; Novaria and Ticinum, now Novara and Pavia, to the Lævi; Brixia, Cremona, Mantua, and and Verona, to the Cenomani; Sabium, Voberna, Edrum, and Vannia, cities long ſince demoliſhed, to the Euganei; Patavium, Vicetia, or Vicentia, Ateſte, Forum Allieni, Tarviſum, Ceneta, Aquileia, Forum Julii, and Tergeſte, near the Formio, now Padua, Vicenza, Eſte, Ferrara, Treviſo, Ceneda, Aquileia, Civitad di Friuli, Trieſte, to the Veneti, by whom all that tract, which extends from the territories of the Euganei to the Formio, was antiently poſſeſſed; but in after-ages the Carni made themſelves maſters of the country lying between that river and the Tilaventum, now the Piave.

Italy properly ſo called.

ITALY, properly ſo called, extended on the coaſt of the Adriatic from the city of Ancona to the river Frento, now the Fortore, and on the Mediterranean from the Macra to the Silarus, now the Sele, and comprehended Etruria, Umbria, Sabinium, Latium, Picenum, the countries of the Veſtini, Marrucini, Peligni, Marſi, Frentani, Samnites, Hirpini, Campani, and Picentini.

Etruſia.

ETRURIA, inhabited by the Etrurians, Tuſcans, or, as the Greeks ſtyle them, Tyrrhenians, was bounded on the eaſt by the Tiber, on the weſt by the Macra, on the ſouth by the Tyrrhenian ſea, and on the north by the Apennines. The inhabitants are divided by Livy [f] and Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus [g] into twelve different nations, or rather tribes, each of which had their peculiar city, whence they borrowed their names. The cities were, Volſinii, Cluſium, Peruſia, Cortona, Aretium, Falerii, Volaterræ, Vetulonium, Rouſellæ, Veii, Tarquinii, and Cære, now Bolſena, Chiuſi, Perugia, Cortona, Arezzo, Civita Caſtellana, Volterra, Groſſeto, Cerveteri. The cities of Veii, Tarquinii, and Cære, lie at preſent in ruins. Beſides theſe, the following cities were in antient times of great note in Etruria; on the coaſt, or at a ſmall diſtance from it, Luna, Piſæ, Portus Herculis, Labronis, or Liburni, Populonia, Telamon, Coſa, Coſæ, or Coſſa, Centumcellæ, and Alſium, now l'Erice, Piſa, Livorno, Telamone, Anſidonia, Civita Vecchia, Palo. The ruins of Populonia are to be ſeen near Piombino. In the inland country ſtood Nepete, Sutrium, Falerii Faliſcorum, Fanum Voltumnæ, Hortanum, Herbanum, Suana, Saturnia, Senæ Juliæ, Florentia, Fæſulæ, Piſtoria, Luca, called by the modern inhabitants, Nepe, Sutri, Civita Caſtellana, Viterbo, Orti, Orvieto, Saturna, Saona, Florenza, Fieſoli, Piſtoia, Lucca.

Umbria. UMBRIA was bounded on the ſouth by the Nar, now the Nera; on the north by the Adriatic ſea; on the eaſt by the Æſis, new Fiumicino; and on the weſt by the Tiber on the ſide of the Apennines next to Rome, and on the other ſide by the Bedeſis, now il Ronco, which falls into the Adriatic at Ravenna. So that this city, Ariminum, Piſaurum, Fanum Fortunæ, Sena Gallica, and Cæſena, though poſſeſſed by the Lingones and Senones, were, ſtrictly ſpeaking, in Umbria. The other places of note in this country were, Sarſina, Urbinum, Metaurenſe, and Hortenſe, Sentinum, Æſis, and Camerinum, or Camers, now Sarſina, Caſtel Durante, Urbino, Sentino, Jeſi, Camerino. Theſe cities ſtood between the Adriatic ſea and the Apennines. On the other ſide of theſe mountains, were Iguvium, Mevania, Spoletium, Tifernum, Nuceria, Camellaria, Aſiſium, Hiſpellum, Fulignium, Tuder, Interamnium, or Interamna, Narnia, Ameria, and Ocriculi, or Ocriculum, known at preſent by the names of Ugubio, Bavagna, Spoleti, Citta di Caſtello, Nocera, Aſſiſi, Iſpello, Foligno, Todi, Terni, Narni, Amelia, Otricoli.

Sabini. THE country of the Sabini lay between the Nar and the Anio, now the Teverone, the former ſeparating it from Umbria, and the latter from Latium. Cures, whence the Romans were called Quirites, was at firſt the metropolis of the Sabini, and in after-ages Reate, now Riete. The ruins of Cures are ſtill to be ſeen at a place called Vecovic di Sabina. The other cities in this country worth notice were Nurſia, Eretum, Nomentum, Cutiliæ, and Amiternum, now known by the names of Norcia, Monte Rotondo, Lamentario. The cities of Cutileæ and Amiternum have been long ſince deſtroyed; but there are ſtill remaining ſome ruins of the former at Civita Ducale, and of the latter near the city of Aquila.

Latium. NEXT to the country of the Sabini was Latium, compriſed at firſt within very narrow limits, viz. the Tiber, the Anio, and the Circæan promontory, now Monte Circilli; but after the reduction of the Æqui, Hernici, Volſci, and Auſones, reaching to the river Liris, called by the preſent inhabitants il Garigliano. And hence the diſtinction that frequently occurs in the antients between Old and New Latium. In Old Latium ſtood the following cities; Rome, once the moſt powerful, and ſtill the moſt ſtately and beautiful, city of the world, Tibur, Præneſte, Gabii, Tuſculum,

I. Davison Sculpt.

Tuſculum, Aricia, Lanuvium, Alba Longa, ſo called from its length, and to diſtinguiſh it from another city of the ſame name in the country of the Marſi, Lavinium, Laurentum, Oſtia, Antemnæ, Collatia, and Ardea, the metropolis of the Rutuli, a Latin nation. Of Gabii and the four laſt-mentioned cities there are now ſcarce any footſteps remaining; but the others are ſtill known by the names of Tivoli, Paleſtrina, Fraſcati, l'Aricia, Citta Lavina, Albano, Patricia, Paterno, Oſtia. Carſeoli, or Carſula, Valeria, Sublaqueum, Algidum; now Arſuli, Vico Varo, Subiaco, belonged to the Æqui. Of Algidum ſome ruins are to be ſeen near an inn, which the Italians call l'Oſterio dell Aglio. Anagnia, Alatrium, Verulæ, Ferentinum, now Anagni, Alatri, Veroli, Ferentino, were the chief cities of the Hernici. In the country of the Volſci ſtood Antium, Circæi, or Circæum, Tarracina, called alſo Anxur, Sueſſa Pometia, whence the neighbouring marſh was named Palus Pometina, or Pomptina, Velitræ, Cora, Norba, Privernum, Setia, Signia, Sulmo, Fruſino, Frabrateria, Aquinum, Caſinum, Atina, Arpinum, Arz, Sora, Fregellæ, and Interamna. The ruins of Antium, Circæi, and Sueſſa Pometia, are ſtill to be ſeen at Capo d'Anzo, Citta Vecchia, and in the neighbourhood of Velëtri. The other cities bear at preſent the names of Terracina, Veletri, Cora, Norma, Piperno, Sezza, Segni, Sermoneta, Fruſinone, Falvaterra, Aquino, Monte Caſino, Atina, Arpino, Arce, Sora, Ponte Corvo, l'Iſola. In the country of the Auſones were Cajeta, Fundi, and Formiæ, at preſent Gaeta, Fondi, and Mola.

Picentes. PICENUM, the country of the Picentes, lay between the Æſis and the Aternus, now Peſcara, extending from the Adriatic to the Apennines, where it joined Umbria, and beyond them reaching to the country of the Sabini. Their chief cities were, Ancona, once poſſeſſed by the Gauls, Caſtrum Novum, Caſtellum Truentinum, ſo called from the river Truentum, now the Tronto, Auximum, Septempeda, Tollentinum, Firmum, Picenum, Aſculum Picenum, Interamnium, and Atria, at preſent Ancona, Flaviano, Torre Segura, or, as others will have it, Porto d'-Aſcoli, Oſimo, S. Severino, Tolentino, Fermo, Aſcoli, Teramo, Atri. Eaſt of this country lay the country of the Veſtini, which contained the following cities; Angulus, Pinna, and Avia, or Avella, now called Civita di S. Veſtini.

Marrucini. Angelo, Civita di Penna, Aquila. Next to the Veſtini were the Marrucini, whoſe ſmall territory had but one city, viz. Teate, now Chieti.

Peligni. The Peligni inhabited a ſmall tract lying between the countries of the Veſtini and Marrucini to the north, and the Apennines to the ſouth. Their chief cities were, Corfinium and Sulmo; the ruins of the former are ſtill remaining about eight miles from Sulmo, now known by the name of Sulmona.

Marſi. The Marſi were ſeated in an inland country, having the Peligni and Veſtini between them and the Adriatic ſea; on the other ſide the Apennines they bordered on the countries of the Sabini and Æqui. They had only two cities, viz. Alba Fucentes, ſo called from the lake Fucinus, now Lago di Celano, near which it ſtood, and Marrubium. The former ſtill retains the antient name of Alba; but the latter is now called Morrea.

Frentani. Samnites. Next to the Marrucini on the coaſt were the Frentani; in the inland country the Samnites between the Frentani and the Campani; and the Hirpini Hirpini ſeated between Samnium, and the river Silarus, having Apulia Daunia on the north-eaſt, and Campania on the ſouth-weſt. The cities of Ortona, Anxanum, and Hiſtonium, now Ortona, Lanzano, Guaſto d'Amone, belonged to the Frentani; Bovianum, Æſernia, Sepinum, Allifæ, and Teleſia, now Boiano, Iſernio, Sepino, Alifi, Teleſe, to the Samnites. Beneventum, Equus Tuticus, Abellinum, and Compaſa, now Benevento, Ariano, Avellino, Conza, to the Hirpini.

Campani. CAMPANIA extended from the Liris to the promontory of Minerva, called ſtill il capo di Minerva, being bounded on the north-eaſt by Samnium, and on the ſouth-weſt by the country of the Hirpini. In this tract, which was the moſt pleaſant and fruitful of all Italy, ſtood the following cities; on the coaſt Liternum, Bajo, Miſenum, Puteoli, Neapolis, or Parthenope, Herculaneium, Pompeii, and Surrentum, now Torre di Patria, Baie, Monte Miſeno, Puzzuolo, Napoli, Torre di Greco, Scafati, Sorrento; in the inland country, Capua, the ruins of which are ſtill to be ſeen about two miles from the preſent city of the ſame name, Sueſſa Aurunca, Venafrum, Caſilinum, Teanum Sidicinum, Calatia, Cales, Atella, Acerræ, Nola, and Nuceria, known at preſent by the names of Seſſa, Venafro, Nova Capua, Tiano, Cajazzo, Calvi, Averſa, Acerra, Nola, Nocera. The ſmall tract, lying between the promontory montory of Minerva, and the river Silarus, was inhabited by a colony of Picentes planted here by the Romans; Pliny [h] and Ptolemy call them Picentini, to diſtinguiſh them from the Picentes who inhabited Picenum on the Adriatic ſea. The Picentini had but two cities, viz. Picentia, called by Strabo [i] the metropolis of the Picentini, but at preſent demoliſhed, and Salernum, now Salerno. Picentini.

MAGNA GRÆCIA compriſed Apulia, Lucania, and the country of the Brutii. This country was called Greece, becauſe moſt of the cities on the coaſt were Greek colonies and ſpoke the Greek tongue. The inhabitants gave it the epithet of Great, not becauſe it was larger, or near ſo large as Greece, properly ſo called; but merely out of oſtentation, as Pliny in informs us [k]. Apulia extended from the river Frento quite to the ſtreights parting Italy from Greece; but was divided into three parts, viz. Daunia lying between the Frento and the Aufidus, now l'Ofanto, Peucetia, extending from the Aufidus to the iſthmus between Brunduſium and Tarentum, and Meſſapia, called alſo Calabria and Iapygia, comprehending the peninſula. In Apulia, by which name the antient geographers underſtand both Daunia and Pucetia, were the following cities; Teanum Apulum, Geryon, Sipuntum, Luceria, Equulanum, Arpi, the ruins of which are to be ſeen near the preſent city of Foggia, Aſculum Apulum, Venuſia, Acherontia, Canuſium, Cannæ, Salapia, Rubi, Butunti, Barium, and Egnatia, now Civitate Tragonaro, Siponto, Lucera, Troia, Aſicili, Venoſa, Acirenza, Canoſa, Canna, Salpe, Ruvo, Bitonio, Bari, Terra d'Anazzo. In Calabria, Brunduſium, Hydruntum, Caſtrum Minervæ, Callipolis, Tarentum, Neritum, and Aletium, now Brindiſi, Otranto, Caſtro, Gallipoli, Tarento, Nardo, Lezze. Near Aletium ſtood in antient times the city of Rudiæ, the birth-place of Ennius. Magna Græcia.

LUCANIA lay between the Silarus and the Laus, now the Laino, the former parting it from the country of the Picentini, and the latter from that of the Brutii. It was divided from Pucetia by the river Bradanus, now the Brandano, and from Calabria by the upper part of the Sinus Tarentinus, or gulf of Tarento. On the Mediterranean or Tyrrhenian ſea ſtood the cities of Paſtum, called by Lucania.

[h] Plin. l. iii. c. 5. & 12.
[i] Strabo. l. v. ſub finem.
[k] Plin. l. iii. c. 5.

the Greeks Poſidonia, Velia, Buxentum; on the gulf of Tarentum, Metapontum, Heraclea, antiently called Siris and Sybaris, afterwards known by the name of Thurii and Copiæ; in the inland country were ſituated Potentia and Grumentum. Theſe cities are called by the preſent inhabitants, Peſto, Piſciotta, Policaſtro, Terre di Marc, Pollcore, Potenza, Clarimonte. The city of Thurii or Thurium was deſtroyed ſoon after the ſecond Carthaginian war.

Brutii. THE Brutii poſſeſſed that peninſula which extends from Lucania to the ſtreights, ſeparating Sicily from Italy. In this corner of Italy, as we may call it, ſtood the following cities; on the weſtern coaſt, Cerilli, Clampetia, Temſa, Terina, Lametia, Scyllæum, and Rhegium, now Cirella, Amantea, Torre Loppa, Nocera, Sant'Eufemia, Sciglio, Reggio; on the eaſtern coaſt, Locri called Epizephyrii from the promontory Zephyrium, Caulonia, Scylacium, Croto, Petilia, and Ruſcianum, now Jeraces, Caſtel Veteri, Squillaci, Crotone, Belicaſtro, Roſſano; in the inland country, Couſentia, now Coſenza, formerly the metropolis of the Brutii; Pandoſia, and Hiponium, called by the Romans Vibo Valentia, and by the modern inhabitants Monte Leone. Theſe are the chief cities cities of Italy, which we ſhall deſcribe, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of them in the ſequel of the hiſtory.

Rivers. THE rivers, which it may be proper to take notice of in this place, are the Po, called by the Latins Padus and Eridanus, which ſprings from the mount Veſulus, now Veſo, one of the higheſt among the Alps, and diſcharges itſelf into the Adriatic ſea by ſeven different ſtreams, after having received into its channel above thirty rivers. On the Alps likewiſe riſe the Druria, the Seſſites, the Ticinum, the Addua, the Ollius, the Mincius, the Tanarus, the Trebia, and the Rhenus Bononienſis, now the Dora, Seſſia, Teſino, Adda, Oglio, Mincio, Tanaro, Trebia, and Reno di Bologna. The Atheſis, now the Adige, has its ſource, like the others we have mentioned, in the Alps, waters the cities of Trent and Verona, and is the only great river in Lombardy that does not fall into the Po; which it muſt have done, had it run but a little further before its entering the Adriatic. The Arnus, and the Tiber, which receives the Clanis, the Nar, and the Anio, now la Chinana, la Nera, il Teverone, ſpring from the Apennines, and fall into the Mediterranean. The

Liris,

Liris, which ſeparates Latium from Campania; the Volturnus in Campania; the Silarus parting the Picentini and Lucani; theSybaris andCrathis in Lucania; theAufidus in Apulia; the Aternus and Metaurus in Picenum, now the Garigliano, Volturno, Silaro, Cochile, Crati, l' Ofanto, Peſcara, Metauro, were all rivers of great note, and are much ſpoke of by the antients.

Mountains. THE chief mountains of Italy are the Alps and the Apennines, the former parting it from Gaul, Vindelicia, Noricum, and Pannonia, taking Italy in its greateſt extent, and the latter dividing it into two, almoſt equal, parts. Feſtus is of opinion, that the Alps borrowed their name from the Latin word Albus, which the Sabines pronounced Alpus, ſignifying white, becauſe they were almoſt always covered with ſnow [l]. But Iſidorus [m] and Servius [n] tell us, that in the language of the Celtes all high mountains were called Alps: others derive the name of the Alps from one Albion, the ſon of Neptune, who they ſay, was killed by Hercules in diſputing his paſſage over theſe mountains. But not to loſe time in ſuch trifling etymologies, the Alps are a long chain of mountains, which begins at the mouth of the Varus, and, after a great many irregular turnings of about eight hundred miles, ends at the river Arſia in Iſtria. The maritime Alps reach from Vada or Vado to the ſource of the Varus, the Cottiæ from the courſe of the Varus to the city of Suſa, from thence the Graiæ to Little St. Bernard, and the Penninæ from that mountain to Monte St. Gottard, ot St. Gothard; to the Penninæ are joined the Alpes Rhæticæ, which extend to the ſpring of the river Piave: thoſe, which reach from thence to Iſtra and the head of the Savus, are called Noricæ and Carnicæ. The Apennines extend from the maritime Alps, where they take their riſe, quite to the ſtreights which ſeparate Italy from Sicily. The mountains Maſſicus near Sueſſa, Gauras between Puteoli and Balæ, Fifata at a ſmall diſtance from Capua, Veſuvius in the neighbourhood of Nola, and Garganus in Apulia, are much ſpoke of both by the antient and modern writers [o].

Soils. ITALY lies between the thirty eighth and forty-ſixth degrees of north latitude, in the ſixth and ſeventh north climates.

mates. We need not here enlarge on the fruitfulneſs and various productions of this happy region, it being well known, that whatever deſirable things nature has dropt frugally here and there in other countries, are found in Italy, as in their original ſeminary; whence ſome call it the parent of plenty, others the fountain of earthly bliſs, the incomparable region of this globe, the garden of Europe, the epitome of the world, or rather a little world itſelf. The inhabitants of this country were once the triumphant lords and conquerors of the world; but at preſent the ſofter arts prevail; and in theſe they are generally thought to be as much ſuperior to the modern, as their anceſtors were to the antient nations in war and military exploits. But the antient inhabitants of Italy ſhall be the ſubject of the following ſection.

SECT. II.

Of the antient ſtate and firſt inhabitants of ITALY.

THERE is ſuch a diſagreement among the antients, in what they have wrote concerning the firſt inhabitants of Italy, that we cannot pretend to give any ſatisfactory account of the primitive ſtate of that country. We ſhall therefore only relate in this place what has been tranſmitted to us, on ſo perplext and intricate a ſubject, by the moſt credible writers of antiquity, without taking upon us to prefer the authority of one to that of another, ſince they may be all, for aught we know, and as the moſt judicious among them ſeem to inſinuate, equally miſtaken. We ſhall begin with Latium, which roſe by degrees to be the ſeat of a mighty republick and of an empire, which had no other bounds than thoſe of our hemiſphere. Old Latium, which from the banks of the Tiber extended n[illegible]ther ſouthward than to the Circæan promontory, being bounded on the north by the Anio, and to the eaſt by mount Algidus, only eighteen miles diſtant from Rome, was at different times inhabited by the following nations[p]; viz. the Aborigines, Pelaſgi, Arcades, Siculi, Aurunci,

[p] Plin. l. iii. c. 5.

Aurunci, and Rutuli: New Latium, which reached to the Iris, by the Volſci, Oſci, Auſones, Coriolani, Fidenates, and Sicani. Some hiſtorians are of opinion, that the Aborigines had that name given them, becauſe they had been in Italy from the beginning, and did not derive their origin from any other: others changing the name of Aborigines into Aberrigines, hold, that they were a wondering people, ſuch being the import of that word, who coming from different countries, met accidentally in Italy, and there lived by rapine [q]. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, who was perſuaded that they came from Arcadia, propoſes two other opinions; viz. that they were ſtyled Aborigines, becauſe they lived on mountains, in which the Arcadians took great pleaſure (A); or becauſe they gave origin to the Latins [r] (B), who being deſcended from them, called them Aborigines, that is, the people from whom they derived their origin. The appellation of Aborigines in the firſt acceptation is derived from the Greek words Oreon Genos, that is, natives of the mountains, in the ſecond from the Latin word Origo, which imports origin. The above-mentioned writer takes them to be one Aborigines.

(A) Virgil ſpeaks of the Aborigines as living diſperſed on the mountains before the arrival of Saturn:

Is genus indocile, & diſperſum montibus altis,
Compoſuit, legeſque dedit (1).

(B) This was, according to Servius, Virgil's opinion, which he takes to be plainly expreſſed in the following verſes:

Quin etiam veterum effigies ex ordine avorum
Antiqua ex cedro, Italuſque, paterque Sabinus, Saturnuſque ſenex, Janique bifrontis imago, Veſtibulo aſtabant, aliique ab origine reges (2).

By the laſt words Virgil meant, ſays Servius, the kings of the Aborigines, that is, the kings of the nation, from which the Romans derived their origin. In like manner Pliny calls the Tyrians, Aborigines Gadium, becauſe that city was founded by them (3).

one and the ſame people with the Oenotrii, who leaving Arcadia, their native country, croſſed the ſea, and ſettled in Latium, above four hundred years before the Trojan war.

Pelaſgi. The Pelaſgi were originally Peloponneſians, who, being driven out of their country by the Curetes and Leleges, ſettled firſt in Theſſaly, and removed from thence into that part of Italy, which is watered by the Po, and built there the city of Spina. Some of them croſſed the Apennines, joined the Aborigines, and, having made themſeves maſters of great part of Umbria and Hetruria, drove the Siculi out of thoſe countries, and obliged them to fly for refuge into Sicily. They likewiſe took ſeveral cities of Campania from the Aurunci: but at length, being afflicted with many calamities, they abandoned their conqueſts, and returned to Greece [s]. From them the Aborigines borrowed many cuſtoms of Greece.

Arcades. About ſixty years before the Trojan war, another colony arrived from Peloponneſus, in a port of Latium, under the conduct of Evander the Arcadian, who, being kindly received by Faunus, at that time king of the country, aud ſuffered to ſettle on a ſmall uncultivated hill near the Tiber, introduced the worſhip of the gods of his own country, and taught the inhabitants the uſe of the Greek letters (C), and of ſtringed inſtruments of muſic. By this means he reformed the cuſtoms, and ſoftened the manners of the Aborigines, who, at the time of his arrival, ſtill lived after a ſavage manner, and without any regulation of laws [t]. Not long after, another colony of Arcadians and Eleans arriving in Latium with Hercules, are ſaid to have ſettled there, and made one people with thoſe whom Evander had brought with him.

Siculi. THE Siculi were, according to Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, the firſt inhabitants of Latium, but being driven from thence by the Aborigines and Pelaſgi, and by other nations from

(C) The Greek characters were the firſt which the Latins made uſe of. Of this there was ſtill remaining a plain proof in the time of Auguſtus, viz. the treaty between Tarquin the Proud and the Gabii, which was written in Latin words, but Greek letters, on a wooden ſhield covered with the ſkin of the ox that had been ſacrificed on that occaſion (4).

(4) Dio Hal. l. iv. p. 246.

from all the countries of Italy, they took refuge in Sicily. As to the origin of the Siculi, Pliny [u] takes them to be one and the ſame people with the Sicani. If this opinion be true, they came originally from Spain, according to Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, Thucydides, and Philiſtus, an antient Sicilian writer; but, according to Diodorus Siculus, from Sicily, that author being of opinion, that the Sicani inhabited Sicily from the firſt ages of the world. Sophocles ſays, they were called Siculi from one Siculus their king. The Aurunci or Arunci were originally Auſones [w], of whom hereafter. Virgil ſpeaks of them as a Trojan colony [x]. The Rutuli were deſcended from the Aborigines. Theſe were the various nations, which at different times had been maſters of all, or great part of, Latium before the arrival of Æneas.

Aurunci.

Rutuli.

In New Latium the Volſci were a very warlike people; but antient authors give no account of their origin. They only tell us, that they had a language peculiar to themſelves. Their territory comprehended one of the moſt conſiderable portions of Old Latium. The Oſci, Opici, or Obſci, were deſcended from the Auſones. From their name the etymologiſts derive the Latin word Obſcænus, obſcene; for they had the character of being licentious in their diſcourſe and leud in their manners, above the reſt of the inhabitants of Italy. Their language was different from that of the Romans; for Ennius uſed to boaſt, as Gellius informs us [y], that he could ſpeak Oſcian, Greek, and Latin. The Fidenates were a colony of the Albani, and the Coriolani of the Volſci. Of the Sicani we have ſpoken above. As to the Auſones, they came originally from Greece, and were one of the moſt antient colonies that ſettled in Italy. They firſt planted themſelves in New Latium, but, being diven from thence by new adventurers, they retired to that part of Campania, which lies between Teanum and Capua [z]. They were called Auſones, according to Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, from Auſon the ſon of Ulyſſes by Calypſo, whom he ſuppoſes to have reigned over them while they were in Latium. But that writer is herein certainly miſtaken, ſince they had the name of Auſones, long before the arrival of Æneas, Æneas, and conſequently before the ſuppoſed king Auſon could be born. From them, firſt the countries where they ſettled, and afterwards all Italy, took the name of Auſonia.

Hetruſei. NEXT to Old Latium lay Hetruria, which was inhabited by the Tyrrhenians, called alſo Hetruſci, Etruſci, Tuſci, and ſometimes Thuſci. The name of Tyrrhenians they borrowed from their leader Tyrrhenus, that of Hetruſci from one of their kings, and the laſt from the Greek word Thuo, to ſacrifice, the Hetruſcans having been ſkilled, above all other nations, in the ceremonies that were uſed in the performing of ſacrifices [a]. They came originally, according to the common opinion both of the Greek and Latin writers, from Lydia, under the conduct of Tyrrhenus, as we have related in the hiſtory of Lydia [b], and arriving in Italy, ſettled firſt in that tract, which lies between the Adriatic ſea and th Apennines, after having driven out the Umbri, and taken from them, as Pliny informs us [c], three hundred cities. Being animated by the ſucceſs that attended them on their firſt arrival, they extended their conqueſts beyond the Apennines and made themſelves maſters of the territories of Nola and Capua, and almoſt of the whole coaſt of that ſea, which from them took the name of Tyrrhenian. Theſe countries they held till the invaſion of the Gauls, when they were driven from the coaſt of the Adriatic ſea by that warlike nation, and from Campania by the Latins; ſo that they were obliged to take refuge in that country, which lies between the Macra and Tiber, and is called by all the antients Hetruria.

Ligures. THERE is a great diſagreement among authors about the origin of the Ligures. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus owns, that he cannot determine whether they were deſcended from the Gauls, or from ſome of the antient nations inhabiting Italy. Strabo, ſpeaking of the various tribes living among or near the Alps, ſays, that they were all originally Gauls, except the Ligures [d]; and elſewhere ſeems inclined to believe, that Liguria was firſt peopled by Greek colonies. Some carry up their origin to the fabulous heroes of antiquity, and others, led by the [e] ſimilitude of names, to the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus [f], as attending Xerxes in his expedition into Greece. The Ligyes are placed by ſome antient geographers in Colchis, by others in Albania. Sextus Pompeius will have the Ligures.

Ligures to be deſcended from the Siculi [g]. But the moſt common opinion is, that they came originally from Celtic Gaul. Of this origin Cluverius [h] diſcovers ſome traces in the word Bodencus, which was, according to Polybius and Pliny, the name the Ligures gave to the Po to expreſs the depth of that river. The word Boden as the ſame writer obſerves, is ſtill uſed by the Germans, and ſignifies bottom; whence he concludes, that the Ligures had the ſame origin with the inhabitants of Germany, who were, without all doubt, ſo many branches of the antient Celtæ. But when, or on what occaſion, theſe Gauls removed from their native country, we find no where recorded. However, it is paſt doubt, that they were ſome of the moſt antient inhabitants of Italy, and conſequently that they croſſed the Alps many ages before thoſe Gauls, from whom Ciſalpine Gaul took its name.

Umbri.

THE Umbri are counted by the Roman writers among thoſe nations, of whoſe origin we have no records, and therefore ſtyled the Aborigines of Italy. The name Umbri or Ombri Pliny [i] derives from the Greek word "Ombros", ſignifying "a ſhower", becauſe they had eſcaped a deluge occaſioned by violent ſhowers, which had laid their land under water. Before the arrival of the Tyrrhenians, they poſſeſſed great part of that country, which was afterwards known by the name of Ciſalpine Gaul; but were driven from thence by the Tyrrhenians, as the Tyrrhenians were in their turn by the Gauls.

Sabini, Picentes, Frentani, &c.

THE Sabini were, according to ſome antient writers, a colony of Lacedæmonians, according to others, the offspring of the Auſones. The name of Sabini they took, if Porcius Cato is to be credited, from Sabinus, the ſon of Sancus or Sabus, whom they worſhipped under the name of Dius Fidius. From the Sabini were deſcended the Picentes, Frentani, Marrucini, Peligni, Veſtini, Marſi, Æqui, Hernici, and the Samnites; from the Samnites, the Hirpini, Lucani, Brutii, and Campani.

OEnotrii.

THE Œnotrii were, according to moſt of the antient writers, originally Arcadians. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus ſays, that they were the firſt Greeks who paſſed the Ionian ſea and ſettled in Italy, under the conduct of Œnotrus and and Peucetius, two ſons of Lycaon king of Arcadia. Peucetius landed at the Iapygian promontory, made himſelf maſter of Apulia and Calabria, and from his own name called the inhabitants Peucetii; and hence that tract was named Apulia Peucetia. Œnotrus landed on the oppoſite coaſt, and poſſeſſed himſelf of Lucania and Brutium. From him this tract was called Œnotria, and not from the Greek word 'Oinos,' as Servius [k] pretends, becauſe this country produced great plenty of excellent wines. The Œnotrians ſpread themſelves afterwards into Umbria, and, according to ſome writers, as far as Latium and the country of the Sabini. A modern writer is of opinion, that the Œnotrius of the antients was Noah, who, to avoid the inſults and evil deſigns of Ham, came with Japheth and Gomer into Italy, and reigned in Latium under the name of Janus, which he derives from the Hebrew Jain, and the Chaldee Jaino, ſignifying wine, becauſe he firſt planted vines, and diſcovered the ſecret of grapes, and making their juice potable [l]. For this reaſon the Greeks called him Œnotrus, which in Greek anſwers the ſirname of Janus. But, after all, theſe are only conjectures, which every one may adopt or reject as he pleaſes. Some are of opinion, that the Œnotrii were the firſt inhabitants of Italy; but moſt of the antients tell us, that the country, where they ſettled on their arrival, was firſt poſſeſſed by the Auſones, whom they drove out.

Crotoniates, Locrenſes, Tarentini, &c.

THE Crotoniates, Locrenſes, Tarentini, Meſſapii, Apuli, Salentini, Calabri, and Iapyges, were, without all doubt, of Greek extraction, and ſettled in that part of Italy, which from them was called Great Greece, many ages after the Umbri, Siculi, and Auſones, which three nations are reckoned by moſt of the antients among the Aborigines, or natives of Italy, as if they had been there from the beginning, and did not derive their origin from any other nation. Of the Gauls and their different tranſmigrations into Italy, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in a more proper place.

THUS far we have related what we find in profane hiſtorians concerning the firſt inhabitants of Italy. But Euſebius and Cedrenus [m], looking upon their accounts as fabulous bulous, tell us, that Italy was firſt peopled by the deſcendents of Kittim, the fourth ſon of Javan, who, being planted in that part of Greece, which hath been ſince called Macedon, ſpread themſelves, as their number encreaſed, as far as Ætolia, and from thence advanced in queſt of a more fertile ſoil to the coaſts of the Adriatic ſea, which they croſſed, and ſettled at laſt in that fruitful and pleaſant country, which was afterwards known by the name of Italy. The opinion of theſe writers is in ſome degree confirmed by what we read in Suidas, who tells us in expreſs terms, that the Latins were antiently called Ketii. Beſides, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus mentions a city in Latium called Ketea, and Ariſtotle ſpeaks of a lake near Cumæ, named Ketus [n]. Reineccius, falling in with Euſebius and Cedrenus, is of opinion, that Italy did not take that name from Italus king of the Œnotrians, but from Ætolus and a colony of Ætolians, that is of the deſcendants of Kittim, who under him ſettled in that country. He obſerves, that by only throwing out the firſt letter of Ætolia, and changing the o into a, which change is found in the name of Æthalia, an iſland near Italy, peopled by the Ætolians, it becomes Italia. So that Italy, according to theſe writers, was firſt peopled by the deſcendents of Kittim, who had ſettled in Ætolia, or, as the Greeks write it, Aitolia. The way into ſo pleaſant a country being once ſhewn, it was not long, before the Pelaſgi, the Arcadians, and other Greek nations followed their countrymen, and ſettled in the eaſtern and ſouthern parts of Italy, while the Tyrrhenians from Lydia, and the Celtæ afterwards called Ligurians, from beyond the Alps, planted themſelves in the weſtern and northern provinces. Thus was Italy, before the arrival of Æneas, poſſeſſed by the Greeks, Lydians, and Celtæ.

SECT. III.

Of the antient kings of Hetruria, Latium, and Alba.

Of the government and kings of the antient Hetrurians.

THE Hetrurians and Latins are the only two nations in Italy, of which we find any thing recorded worth mentioning before the foundation of Rome. We are told indeed, that the Umbrians and Ligurians made once a great figure; that the former were maſters of the beſt part of Italy, and that the latter were governed by their own kings, princes of great power, many ages before the arrival of Æneas in Latium; but this is all we know of them, till their wars with the Romans rendered them more famous. We ſhall therefore confine ourſelves to the Hetrurians and Latins, though we can give even of them but a very indifferent account, what authors tell us of thoſe diſtant ages being ſo blended with fables, as to leave us no way of coming at the truth. However, it ſeems paſt all doubt, that the Hetrurians or Etrurians were for many ages the moſt powerful people of Italy: for Livy [o] tells us in expreſs terms, that they not only poſſeſſed a great ſhare of the inland countries, but were maſters of all the coaſt of the Tyrrhenian ſea, from the Alps quite to the ſtreights of Sicily. The cities of Capua, Nola, Mantua, Bononia, firſt called Felſina, Adria, and Ravenna, are ſaid to have been built by them. Virgil [p] calls them a nation renowned in war, and moſt of the antients ſpeak of their kings as mighty princes and lords of extenſive dominions. As to their form of government, it was firſt monarchical, the whole nation being ſubject to one prince. But in proceſs of time this great ſtate was divided into twelve cantons, called leucumonies, which were governed by twelve chiefs ſtyled leucumones. Over the leucumonies was placed one veſted with a kind of ſovereign authority, and choſen by the people, who gave him the name of lars, a title borrowed, it ſeems, from the Egyptian tongue; for Manetho gives that that title to ſome of the antient kings of Egypt. Sometimes we find one leucumony carrying on a war by itſelf, and at other times all the leucumonies joined in one national body in defence of their common liberties; which plainly ſhews, that their government under the Iartes was not monarchical, but rather ariſtocratical. When the war was undertaken by the unanimous conſent of all the leucumonies, the general, or commander in chief, was attended by twelve lictors carrying the faſces before him, it being cuſtomary for each leucumony to ſend one; ſo that it was eaſy to judge from the number of the lictors, how many leucumonies were engaged in the war. We have enumerated above the capital cities of the twelve leucumonies, and ſhall only add here, that each of them was impowered to chuſe a king peculiar to themſelves, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory. As to the religion of the Hetrurians, it is well known, that moſt of the Roman ceremonies were borrowed from them, eſpecially the uſe of ſacrifices, divinations, and auguries, and that Hetruria was looked upon by the Romans as the mother of all politeneſs and learning, before they ſubdued Greece. For thither they ſent their children to improve their knowledge and cultivate their minds. The gods worſhipped by the antient Hetrurians were, Janus, Jupiter, Vertumnus, Volumnus, Volumna, Voltumna, Viridianus, Curis, Nurtia, Fortuna, Pallas, &c. Their language was different both from the Greek and Latin, as is manifeſt both from Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus [q], and from ſome antient monuments, which are ſtill to be ſeen in the cities of Florence and Arezzo. The account of their kings, tranſmitted to us by the antients, are ſo interwoven with fables, that in our opinion they deſerve little or no credit. We find a great many of thoſe princes occaſionally mentioned by the writers of the Roman hiſtory; but as to the time, in which they reigned, and the order of their ſucceſſion, we are quite in the dark. Janus is ſaid to have been the firſt who reigned in Hetruria [r]; but who this Janus was, we find no-where recorded. Some take him to be Tyrrhenus the Lydian; others will have him to have reigned many ages before the arrival of the Lydian colony. The kings ſprung from him are ſtyled by the antient writers Janigenæ ; and among them are counted the following princes ; Tiberinus, Vertumnus, Aunus, Anus, Dehe beris, and Tiber. Tiberinus is ſaid to have killed his father Janus [s]. Aunus is mentioned by Silius Italicus [t]. Anus is ſaid by Strabo [u] to have been drowned in the river Parenſius, which was thenceforth from him called Anio. Deheberis and Tiber were both drowned in the river Albula, which from them borrowed the names of Deheberis and Tiber, as Sextus Pompeius informs us [w]. Beſides theſe, we find mention made of Coritus, Æolus, Etruſcus, Tuſcus, Raſena, Tarcon, Ocnus, Mezentius, Aſylas, Abas, Maſſicus, Oſinius, Morrius, Cluſius, Veientus, Olenius, Porſena, or Porſenna, and Tolumnius. Coritus had Jaſius and Dardanus by Electra the daughter of Atlas king of Mauritania. Upon his death, the two brothers falling out about the ſucceſſion, Dardanus killed Jaſius, and being on that account obliged to abandon his native country, he took refuge firſt in Samothrace, and afterwards in Phrygia, where he married the daughter of Teucer, and became the parent, as Virgil ſtyles him, of the Trojan nation [x] ; for he ſucceeded Teucer and built Dardania, afterwards called Troy. From him the Trojans were named Dardanidæ. Æolus is mentioned by Plutarch [y] as reigning over Hetruria and the iſlands of the Tyrrhenian ſea. Etruſcus and Tuſcus, from whom the Hetrurians took the name of Etruſci and Tuſci, are ſpoke of by Servius [z] and Sextus Pompeius [a], as are Raſena and Tarcon by Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus [b] and Virgil. Tarcon was contemporary with Æneas, and is ſaid to have built the twelve cities, which afterwards became the capitals of the twelve leucumonies. Ocnus, Mezentius, Aſylas, and Abas, are well known from Virgil's Æneid. Of the other kings we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of Latium. The emperor Claudius is ſaid by Suidas and Suetonius to have wrote the hiſtory of Hetruria in twenty books ; but as neither that performance, nor the works of Soſtratus, often quoted by Strabo, when he ſpeaks of the Etruſcan affairs, have reached ed our times, we know but very little of the antient ſtate, government, and laws of that once powerful nation.

THE kings we find mentioned as reigning in Latium, before the arrival of Æneas, are Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Picus is ſuppoſed by Virgil [c] and others to have been the ſon of Saturn; but Voſſius is of opinion, that there never reigned any king of that name in Latium, and looks upon all that is ſaid of Picus as quite fabulous [d]. The next king is Faunus, ſuppoſed to have been the ſon of Picus. In his time Evander landed with a colony of Arcadians in a port of Latium, and being allowed by him to ſettle with his followers on a ſmall uncultivated hill near the Tiber, built there a city, which he called Pallantium, that being the name of the capital of his dominions in Arcadia, which he had been conſtrained to leave, for having accidentally killed his father Echemus. Faunus was ſucceeded by Latinus, his ſon, according to Virgil [e], by a nymph named Marica; according to others, by one of the miſtreſſes of Hercules; for that hero is ſaid to have arrived in Latium during Faunus's reign. Faunus had married to his firſt wife his own ſiſter Fauna, a famous propheteſs; but as ſhe brought him no children, and a ſon was born to him after his marriage with Hercules's miſtreſs, it was thought that the child was rather Hercules's ſon than his. But however that be, the name of Latinus is very famous in hiſtory, not on account of any military exploits performed by him, but for the arrival of Æneas in Latium, which happened in his reign. This prince was engaged in a war with the Rutuli, in which he was attended but with very indifferent ſucceſs, when news was brought him, that a foreign army had made a deſcent on his coaſts, pillaged the maritime parts of his dominions, and were fortifying themſelves in a camp at a ſmall diſtance from the ſea. Hereupon he marched againſt them with all his forces, hoping to oblige them to reimbarque and abandon his dominions, without meeting with any great reſiſtance from a band of vagabonds, as he ſuppoſed, or pirates, come only to ſeek for plunder. But finding them, as he drew near, well armed and regularly drawn up in battalia, he thought it adviſeable to forbear engaging troops that appeared ſo well diſciplined, and, inſtead of venturing a bat-

a battle, to deſire a parley. In this conference, Latinus underſtanding who they were, and being at the ſame time ſtruck with terror, and touched with compaſſion for thoſe brave, but unfortunate, men, entered into a treaty with them, and aſſigned them a tract of land for a ſettlement, on condition that they ſhould employ their arms and exert their valour, in defence of his dominions, and look upon the Rutuli as a common enemy. This condition Æneas readily accepted, and complied with this engagement ſo faithfully, that Latinus came at length to repoſe an entire confidence in the Trojan, and in proof of it gave him Lavinia, his daughter and only child, in marriage, ſecuring to him by that means the ſucceſſion to the throne of Latium [f]. Æneas, to teſtify his gratitude to Latinus and affection for Lavinia, gave her name to the camp he had pitched, and inſtead of Troy called it Lavinium. The Trojans followed the example of their leader, and, by marriages making alliances with Latin families, became in a ſhort time one and the ſame people with the Latins.

Marries Lavinia.

In the mean time, Turnus, the queen's nephew, who had been brought up in the palace under the eye of Latinus, and entertained hopes of marrying Lavinia and ſucceeding to the throne, ſeeing the princeſs beſtowed on a ſtranger, and all his views defeated, went over to the Rutuli, and, by ſtirring them up, brought on a battle between them and the Latins, in which both he and Latinus were killed. Thus Æneas, by the death of his father-in-law and by that of a troubleſome rival, came into the quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Latium, which he governed with great wiſdom, and tranſmitted to his poſterity [g] (D).

(D) The genealogy of the kings of Latium, we have here mentioned, is given by Virgil in the following verſes:

Bu

ÆNEAS is ſaid to have reigned three years, during which time he eſtabliſhed the worſhip of the gods of his own country, and to the religion of the Latins added that of Troy. The two palladiums (E), which had been the protectors of that city, became the tutelary deities of Lavinium, and in after-ages of the whole Roman empire. The worſhip of Veſta was likewiſe introduced by Æneas, and virgins, from her called Veſtals, appointed to keep a fire continually burning in honour of that goddeſs. Jupiter, Venus, and many other deities, who had been revered in Troy, became in all likelihood, known to the Latins by means of Æneas; which gave occaſion to the poets of repreſenting him under the character of a pious hero.

But other writers, diſagreeing with Virgil, ſpeak of a long ſeries of kings reigning in Latium before Picus, the grandfather of Latinus. Among theſe they mention two Saturns, and two Faunuſes, and ſuppoſe the elder Faunus to have lived two hundred years before him, who was the father of Latinus. He is ſaid to have been the firſt who civilized the inhabitants of Italy, and introduced a kind of religion among them, and was on that account honoured as a god. Voſſius, as we have hinted above, believes, that there never was in Latium a king bearing the name of Picus, and aſcribes this common notion to a fabulous tradition reported by Dionyſius Halicarnuſſus, viz. that in a certain province of Latium the god Mars had delivered his oracles by a myſterious bird, called in the language of the country, Picus, that is, woodpecker. Other writers count Janus, OEnotrus, and four kings bearing the name of Latinus, among the antient princes of Latium. Virgil himſelf owns, that the inhabitants of Latium were called Latins long before the reign of king Latinus, who received Æneas; for he introduces Juno addreſſing Jupiter in favour of the Latins, and entreating him not to ſuffer the antient name of Latins to be changed into that of Trojans. His words are;

> Pro Latio obteſtor, pro majeſtate tuorum, &c.
> Ne vetus indigenas nomen mutare Latinos,
> Neu Troas fieri jubeas, Teucroſque vocari (6).

(E) Theſe were two ſtatues, whereof one was the original, and the other the copy; ſo that, properly ſpeaking, there was but one true Palladium, of which we have ſpoke at length in the hiſtory of Troy, to which we refer our readers (7).

(6) Idem l. x.v. 820. & ſeq. (7) Vide Vol. II. p. 10.

WHILE Æneas was thus employed, the Rutuli, antient enemies of the Latin name, entering into an alliance with Mezentius, king of the Tyrrhenians, took the field with a deſign to drive out thoſe new-comers, of whoſe power they began to conceive no ſmall jealouſy. Æneas marched out againſt them at the head of his Trojans and Latins. Hereupon a battle enſued, which laſted till night, when Æneas, being puſhed to the banks of the Numicus, which ran cloſe by Lavinium, and forced into that river, was there drowned. The Trojans concealed his body, and pretending that he had vaniſhed away on a ſudden, made him paſs for a deity among his credulous ſubjects, who accordingly erected a temple to him, under the title of Jupiter Indiges [h] (F). Such was the end of Æneas, the Trojan prince ſo much celebrated by the Greek and Latin poets. Of his progenitors, birth, and behaviour, during the ſiege of Troy, and adventures after the fall of that city, till his ſettling in Latium, we have ſpoke at length elſewhere [i], and therefore ſhall not break off the thread of our hiſtory to give in this place any farther account of that hero.

Aſcanius.

UPON the death of Æneas, his ſon Euryleon, called alſo Aſcanius and Iulus, aſcended the throne (G). But as the [h] Dio Hal. p. 51. [i] Vide Vol. V. p. 556, & ſeq.

(F) The inſcription, according to Aurelius Victor, was conceived in theſe words, Patri Deo indigeti. The words Indiges in the Latin tongue ſignified one of thoſe gods who had been of the race of men, and at length were deified. The temple or tomb of Æneas, in the time of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſus, was nothing but a riſing ſpot of ground ſet round with trees. Perhaps, ſays that writer, it was the tomb of Anchiſes, who died but a year before his ſon(8). Livy likewiſe tells us, that Æneas had divine honours paid him under the name of Jupiter Indiges (9).

(G) Euryleon was, according to ſome, the ſon of Æneas, by Creuſa, according to others, by Lavinia. He was called Aſcanius from a river in Phrygia bearing that name, and Ilus, which name was afterwards changed into Iulus, from Ilium or Troy. Cato, as quoted by Servius (10), derives Iulus from the Greek word ἴουλος, ſignifying the ſoft and tender hair which firſt appears on the face, and pretends, that this name was given to Aſcanius, becauſe he killed Mezentius in a ſingle combat, when he was very young. But herein he contradicts all the antients hiſtorians, who ſpeak either of Iulus or Mezentius.

(8) Dio Hal. l. i. p. 51. (9) Liv. l. i. (10) Servius in l. i. Æneid. v. 271.

the young prince did not think it adviſeable to venture a battle in the very beginning of his reign with a formidable enemy, who promiſed himſelf great ſucceſs from the death of Æneas, he had the prudence to confine himſelf within the walls of Lavinium, and to try whether he could by an honourable treaty put an end to ſo dangerous a war. But the haughty Mezentius demanding of the Latins, as one of the conditions of a peace, that they ſhould pay him yearly, by way of tribute, all the wine produced in the territory of Latium, Aſcanius rejected the propoſal with the utmoſt indignation, and having cauſed all the vines throughout his dominions to be conſecrated to Jupiter, and by that means put it out of his power to comply with the enemy's requeſt, he reſolved to make a vigorous ſally, and try whether he could, by force of arms, bring the inſulting Tyrrhenian to more reaſonable terms. The main body of the enemy's army was encamped at ſome diſtance from Lavinium; but Lauſus the ſon of Mezentius, with the flower of their youth under his command, lay intrenched at the very gates of the city. The Trojans, who had been long accuſtomed to make vigorous ſallies, marching out in the night, attacked the poſt where Lauſus commanded, forced his intrenchments, and obliged the troops he had with him to ſave themſelves by flight, to the mean body of the army encamped on the plain. But the unexpected arrival and overthrow of their advance-guard ſtruck them with ſuch terror, that inſtead of ſtopping the flight of their companions, they fled with them in great diſorder to the neighbouring mountains. The Latins purſued them, and in the purſuit Lauſus was killed, whoſe death ſo diſcouraged Mezentius, that he immediately ſued for peace, which was granted him, upon condition, that for the future the Tiber ſhould be the boundary between the Latin and Hetrurian territories [k].

In the mean time, Lavinia, who had been left with child by Æneas, entertaining a ſtrong jealouſy of the ambition of her ſon-in-law, retired to the woods and was there peaceably delivered of a ſon, who from his father was named Æneas, and from the place of his birth had the firname of Sylvius. But as the queen's flight, who had diſappeared on a ſudden, raiſed ſuſpicions at Lavinium prejudicial dicial to the reputation of Aſcanius, he uſed all poſſible means to remove them, cauſed diligent ſearch to be made after Lavinia, calmed her fears, and prevailed upon her to return to the town with her ſon, whom he ever after treated as a brother. Lavinium grew every day more populous; but as it was in reality the patrimony of Lavinia and the inheritance of her ſon Sylvius, Aſcanius reſolved to reſign it to them, and build another city for himſelf. This he made the place of his reſidence and the capital of his new kingdom, calling it Alba Longa; Alba, from a white ſnow, which we are told Æneas had found in the place where it was built, and Longa, to diſtinguiſh it from another town of the ſame name in the country of the Marſi, or rather, becauſe it extended, without having much breadth, the whole length of a lake near which it was built [1] (G). It was thirty years after the building of Lavinium, that Aſcanius fixed his abode at Alba, and there he died after a reign of about thirty-eight years, twelve of which he had reſided at his new ſettlement. He left a ſon called Iulus; ſo that between him and Sylvius lay the right of ſucceſſion to the Latin throne; the latter being the ſon, and the former the grandſon, of Æneas. The Latins, not thinking it for their intereſt to continue divided, as it were into two ſtates, reſolved to unite Alba and Lavinium in one ſovereignty; and as Sylvius was born of Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, and had thereby an undoubted title to the kingdom of his grandfather, whereas the other, after all, was but the ſon of a ſtranger, the Latins beſtowed the crown on Sylvius, and, to make Iulus ſome amends, decreed to him the ſovereign power in affairs of religion, a power which thenceforth continued

(G) The place which Aſcanius choſe for his new capital was pleaſant, fruitful, and eaſy to be fortified, being covered on one ſide by a mountain, and on the other by a deep lake, which rendered it inacceſſible. It was built at an equal diſtance from the lake and the mountain, probably, between the preſent city of Albano and the lake of Caſtel Gandolfa, and peopled by a mixed colony of Latins and Trojans. The inhabitants of this city were called Albani, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of the other Alba, who were called Albenſes (11).

continued in his family. Sylvius was ſucceeded by thirteen kings of the ſame race, who for near four hundred years reigned at Alba. But we ſcarce know any thing of them beſides their names and the years of their reſpective reigns. Æneas Sylvius died after a reign of twenty-nine years. His ſon, called alſo Æneas Sylvius, governed Latium thirty-one years. LatinusSylvius, who ſucceeded him, ſwayed the ſceptre for the ſpace of fifty-one years. Alba reigned thirty-nine; Capetus, called by Livy Atys, twenty-ſix; Capis twenty-eight; and Capetus thirteen. Tiberinus, who ſucceeded him, engaged in a war, which proved fatal to him; for in a battle, which was fought on the banks of the Albula, he was forced into that river and drowned. From him the river took the name of Tiber, which it has bore ever ſince. Agrippa ſucceeded Tiberinus after a reign of eight years, and left the throne, which he had held forty-one years, to Alladius, who reigned nineteen, and was ſucceeded by Aventinus, who left his name to the hill Aventinus, where he was interred. Procas, who ſucceeded him and reigned twenty-three years, was the father of Numitor and Amulius, and at his death bequeathed the throne to his elder ſon Numitor. But Amulius, who ſurpaſſed his brother in courage and underſtanding, drove him from the throne, and, to ſecure it for himſelf, murdered Ægeſtus, Numitor's only ſon, and conſecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the worſhip of Veſta, by which ſhe was obliged to perpetual virginity. But this precaution proved ineffectual; for as the Veſtal was going to a neighbouring ſpring, to fetch water for the performance of a ſacrifice to Mars, ſhe was met and forced by a man diſguiſed in a military habit, like that in which the god Mars was repreſented. Some authors think, that this counterfeit Mars was a lover come thither by her appointment; others charge Amulius with uſing this violence to his niece himſelf, not ſo much to gratify his luſt, as to have a pretence to deſtroy her. For ever after he cauſed her to be carefully watched, till ſhe was delivered of two ſons, and then, exaggerating her crime in an aſſembly of the people, he prevailed upon them to ſentence her to death, and to condemn the fruit of her criminal amour to be thrown into the Tiber. The ſentence againſt Rhea was, according to ſome authors, changed by Amulius, at the requeſt of his daughter Antho, into perpetual confinement, but executed againſt the twins, who being laid in a wooden trough, trough, and carried to the foot of mount Palatine, were turned there adrift on the Tiber, which at that time overflowed its banks. But the wind and ſtream proved both ſo favourable, that at the fall of the water the two infants were left ſafe on the ſtrand, and there happily found by Fauſtulus, the chief of the king's ſhepherds, and ſuckled by his wife Acca Laurentia, who for her diſorderly life was called Lupa. And this probably gave riſe to the fabulous miracle of their being nurſed by a wolf [m].

As Faſtulus was probably well acquainted with the birth of the twins, he took more than ordinary care of their education, and ſent them to Gabii to be inſtructed there in Greek literature [n]. As they grew up they appeared to have ſomething great in their mein and air, which commanded reſpect; and the aſcendant, which they aſſumed over the other ſhepherds, made them dreaded in the foreſts, where they exerciſed a ſort of empire. A quarrel happening between the herdſmen of Amulius and thoſe of Numitor, the two brothers took the part of the former againſt the latter; and ſome blood being ſhed in the fray, the adverſe party to be revenged on Romulus and Remus, for ſo the twins were called, on the feſtival of the Lupercalia (H), ſurpriſed Remus, and carried him before Numitor,

(H) Valerius Maximus pretends, that the feſtival of the Lupercalia was not older than the foundation of Rome. But he is therein contradicted by Livy (12), Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus (13), and Plutarch (14), who tells us in expreſs terms, that this feſtival was brought by Evander out of Greece. The ceremonies obſerved in it were theſe: In the firſt place two goats and a dog were killed; then the foreheads of two young men of diſtinction were touched with the bloody knife, and they were to laugh when they were thus touched. This being done, the ſkins of the victims were cut into thongs, and whips made of them for the young men, who ſcoured the ſtreets and the fields, all naked but their middle, and ſtruck thoſe they met. The young women offered themſelves to their ſtrokes, fancying they contributed to fruitfulneſs (15). They ran naked, becauſe Pan, the god of the ſhepherds, was commonly repreſented ſo. They ſacrificed a goat, Numitor to be puniſhed by him, according to his deſerts. But Numitor, either by inſtinct or compaſſion, feeling himſelf touched in the priſoner's favour, aſked him, where he was born, and who were his parents? His anſwer immediately ſtruck Numitor with a lively remembrance of his two grandſons. Their age, which was about eighteen years, agreed with the time when the two infants were expoſed upon the Tiber; and there needed no more to change his anger into tenderneſs [o].

In the mean time, Romulus, eager to reſcue his brother and purſue thoſe who had carried him off, was preparing to be revenged on them; but Fauſtulus diſſuaded him from it, and on that occaſion diſcloſing to him his birth, awakened in his breaſt ſentiments worthy of his extraction. He reſolved at all adventures to attempt the delivering of his mother and grandfather from oppreſſion. With this view he aſſembled the country-people, over whom he aſſumed a kind of ſovereignty, and engaged them to come to the city on an appointed day, and enter it by different gates, provided with arms, which they were to conceal. While Romulus was thus diſpoſing every thing for the execution of his deſign, Numitor made the ſame diſcovery to Remus, concerning his parents and the oppreſſion they groaned under, which ſo fired him, that he was ready to embarque in any goat, becauſe that divinity was ſuppoſed to have goats feet. A dog was added as a neceſſary companion of a ſhepherd. Some have thought with Plutarch, that theſe Lupercalia were inſtituted in honour of the wolf that ſuckled Romulus and Remus. But moſt other writers tell us, that they were appointed in honour of Pan, from whom they borrowed their name, Pan being called in Greek Λύκαιος, perhaps from Λύκος, which anſwers the Latin word Lupus, a wolf, becauſe the chief employment of Pan was to drive away the wolves from the ſheep he protected. This feſtival was celebrated the fifteenth day of February. The prieſts who preſided at theſe ſacrifices, were called Luperci; and were divided into two companies or colleges, viz. the Fabiani and Quinctiliani, one for Romulus the other for Remus. They took their names from Fabius and Quinctilius, their chief prieſts (16). Dion Caſſius tells us, that afterwards a third college was added by the ſenate in honour of Julius Cæſar (17).

any enterprize. But Numitor took care to moderate the tranſports of his grandſon, and only deſired him to acquaint his brother with what he had heard from him, and ſend him to his houſe. Romulus ſoon came, and was followed by Fauſtulus, who took with him the trough or ſkiff, in which the twins had been expoſed, to ſhew it to Numitor. But as the ſhepherd betrayed an air of concern and earneſtneſs in his looks, he was ſtopped at the gate of the city, led before Amulius, and examined concerning his burden. It was eaſily known by its make and inſcription, which was ſtill legible; and therefore Fauſtulus owned what it was, and confeſſed that the twins were living; but, in order to gain time, pretended, that they were feeding flocks in a remote deſert [P]. In the mean time, the uſurper's death being reſolved on, Remus undertook to raiſe the city, and Romulus to inveſt the king's palace. The country-people came at the time appointed, and formed themſelves into companies, each conſiſting of an hundred men. They had no other enſigns but bundles of hay hanging upon long poles, which the Latins at that time called Manipuli; and hence came the name of Manipulares, originally given to troops raiſed in the country (I). With this tumultuous army Romulus beſet the avenues of the palace, forced the guard, and having killed the tyrant, after he had reigned forty-two years, reſtored his grand-father Numitor to the throne [Q].

AFFAIRS being thus ſettled at Alba, the two brothers by the advice of Numitor, undertook the founding of a new colony. The king beſtowed on them thoſe lands near the Tiber, where they had been brought up, ſupplied them with all manner of inſtruments for breaking up ground, with ſlaves, and beaſts of burden, and granted full liberty to his ſubjects to join them. Hereupon moſt of the Trojans, of whom there ſtill remained fifty families in Auguſtus's time, choſe to follow the fortune of Romulus and Remus; as did alſo the inhabitants of Pallantium and Saturnia, two ſmall towns. For the more ſpeedy carrying on of the work, it was thought proper to divide thoſe who were to be employed in the building of the city into two companies, one under the command of Romulus, the other of Remus. But this diviſion, which was deſigned purely with a view to the public welfare, and that the two parties might work by way of emulation, gave birth to two factions, and produced a jealouſy between the two brothers, which broke out when they came to chuſe a place for the building of their new city. For Remus was for the Aventine, and Romulus for the Palatine mount. Upon which the matter being referred to their grandfather, he adviſed the contending parties to have recourſe to the gods, and to put an end to the diſpute by augury, to which he was himſelf greatly addicted. The day appointed for the ceremony being come, the brothers poſted themſelves each upon his hill; and it was agreed, that whoever ſhould ſee the firſt flight, or the greateſt number of vulturs, ſhould gain his cauſe. After the two rivals had waited for ſome time for the appearance of a favourable augury, Romulus, before any had appeared, ſent to acquaint his brother that he had ſeen ſome vultures. But Remus, having actually ſeen ſix while his brother's meſſengers were yet on their way, haſtened on their arrival to mount Palatine, to examine the truth of what they had told him. He had no ſooner got thither, than, by unexpected good fortune, twelve vulturs appeared to Romulus. Theſe he immediately ſhewed to his brother, and, tranſported with joy, deſired him to be judge himſelf of the truth of what his meſſenger had told him. However, Remus diſcovered the deceit, and being told that Romulus had not ſeen the twelve vulturs till after he had ſeen ſix, he inſiſted on the time of his ſeeing them, and the other on the number of the birds he had ſeen. This widened the breach between the two brothers; and their parties being divided, while each man eſpouſed the cauſe of his leader, the diſpute grew ſo warm, that from words they came at length to blows. The ſhepherd Fauſtulus, who was equally dear to both the brothers, endeavouring to part the combatants, was by an unknown hand laid dead on the ſpot. Some writers tell us, that Remus likewiſe loſt his life in the fray; but the greater number place his death later, and ſay, that he was killed by one Fabius, for having in deriſion leaped over the wall of the new city; but Livy ſays, the more common report was, that Remus fell by the hand of his brother [r] (K).

ROMULUS being now head of the colony, by having got the better of his brother's party in the late engagement, applied his thoughts wholly to the building of the city, which he propoſed to call after his own name. He choſe mount Palatine for its ſituation, and performed all thoſe ceremonies, which the ſuperſtition of the Hetrurians had introduced. He firſt offered ſacrifices to the gods, and ordered all the people to do the ſame; and from that time decreed, that eagles ſhould be the auſpices of his new colony. After this great fires were kindled before their tents, and all the people leaped through the flames to purify themſelves. When this ceremony was over, they dug a trench round the ſpot, where the aſſemblies of the people were afterwards held, and threw into it the firſt-fruits of whatever they were allowed to make uſe of for food; every man of the colony was ordered to caſt into the ſame trench a handful of earth, brought either from his own, or ſome neighbouring country. The trench they called Mundus,

(K) Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, who is of opinion, that Remus was killed before the foundation of the new city, adds, that he was buried in a place called after his own name Remuria, about thirty furlongs from Rome; which ſituation ſeeming to him the moſt convenient for building a city, he went thither, according to ſome writers, and, according to others, to mount Aventine, to obſerve the flight of the birds. Feſtus ſays, that the ſummit of mount Aventine was called Remuria from the time Remus reſolved to built the city there. But Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus ſpeaks of mount Aventine and Remuria as two different places. Stephanus will have Remuria to have been a city in the neighbourhood of Rome.

Mundus, that is, the world, and made it the centre round which the city was to be built. Then Romulus yoking a cow and a bull to a plough, the coulter whereof was braſs, marked out by a deep furrow, the whole compaſs of the city. Theſe two animals, the ſymbols of marriage by which cities are peopled, were afterwards ſlain upon the altars. All the people followed the plough, throwing inwards the clods of earth, which the plough-ſhare ſometime turned outwards. Where-ever a gate was to be made, the plough was lifted up and carried; and hence came the Latin word Porta, "a gate", derived from the verb Portare, "to carry" (L). As mount Palatine ſtood by itſelf, the

(L) The Hetrurians had, as Feſtus informs us (20), a ſort of ritual, wherein were contained the ceremonies that were to be obſerved in building cities, temples, altars, walls, and gates. Fabius Pictor ſays, that Romulus ſent for a prieſt or augur out of Hetruria, to preſide at the building of this new city, and Plutarch tells us, that men from Hetruria taught the founder every rite he was to obſerve. The meaning of the ceremonies we have mentioned was as follows: they leaped through the flames, being perſuaded that ſo religious a ceremony required great purity. The bull and cow were both white.

Alba jugum niveo cum bove vacca tulit (21),

ſays Ovid. Their whiteneſs was a ſymbol of that purity of manners and innocence, which ſhould be the character of every citizen. Iſidorus (22) tells us, that a cow and an ox yoked together repreſented the foundation of cities, and ſettlement of colonies. By throwing the firſt-fruits and a handful of earth into the trench, they admoniſhed the heads of the colony, that it ought to be their chief ſtudy to procure for their fellow-citizens all the conveniencies of life, to maintain peace and union amongſt a people come together from different parts of the world, and by this means to form themſelves into a body never to be diſſolved. By the care which the people took to throw the clods of the earth back towards the city, they were inſtructed, that plenty in cities is owing to the fruitful product of the lands about them, and that they ought to bring every thing from abroad, that could contribute to the welfare of the inhabitants.

the whole was incloſed within the line made by the plough, which formed almoſt the figure of a ſquare; whence it is called by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus Roma Quadrata. Plutarch ſeems to make a diſtinction between Roma Quadrata and the city of Rome; for he ſays, that Romulus had built the former before he marked out the plan of the latter. But the authorities of Fabius Pictor, Cato, and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus are of greater weight with us.

As to the exact year of the foundation of Rome, there is a great diſagreement among hiſtorians and chronologers. Varro, whoſe opinion is, according to Petavius, the moſt agreeable to the rules of chronology, places it in the third year of the ſixth olympiad; that is, according to the computation of the learned Uſher, whom we chuſe to follow, four

The whole length of the ground where the plough had paſſed was by the antients looked upon as ſacred and inviolable; and for this reaſon they thought themſelves obliged to ſpend the laſt drop of their blood in the defence of their walls; and to break through them was a crime of the higheſt nature.

In ſpeaking of the foundation of Rome, we have followed the account which Livy, and after him moſt of the Latin hiſtorians give us of that memorable event; but Plutarch tells us (23), that there is a great diſagreement among authors, both as to the founder of Rome, and the reaſon why it was ſo called: Some were of opinion, as that writer informs us, that the Pelaſgians, who had over-run the greater part of the habitable world, fixed there, and from their "power" and "ſtrength in arms", in Greek Ῥωμῃ, called the city by that name: others thought the city was built by ſome Trojans, who, eſcaping from Troy, were driven upon the coaſts of Hetruria; among them was a woman of diſtinction, named Roma, whoſe name was given to the new city: others pretend, that Roma was the daughter of Italus and Lucaria, or of Telephus the ſon of Hercules, and that ſhe was married to Æneas. Some will have her to have been the daughter of Aſcanius, Æneas's ſon. The ſame writer ſpeaks of Romanus, the ſon of Ulyſſes by Circe, of Romus the ſon of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent from Troy, and of Romus, a king of the Latins, who drove out the Hetrurians; to each of theſe the building of Rome has by ſome authors been aſcribed. Solinus beſtows that honour on Evander, and adds that, Rome was firſt called Valentia; while others, as St. Auſtin informs us (24), pretend, that its antient name was Febris, borrowed from Februa the mother of Mars.

(23) Plut. in Romulo. (24) Auguſtin. de civitat. Dei l. iii.

four hundred and thirty-ſix years after the deſtruction of Troy, and ſeven hundred forty-eight after the chriſtian æra (M). The Romans, if we may ſo call them, began to build, as Plutarch [s] and others inform us, on the twenty-firſt of April, which day was then conſecrated to Pales, goddeſs of the ſhepherds; whence the feſtival of Pales and that of the foundation of the city were afterwards jointly celebrated at Rome (N).

(M) Timæus of Sicily thinks, that Rome and Carthage were built much about the ſame time, that is, thirty-eight years before the firſt olympiad; Q. Cincius places the foundation of Rome in the fourth year of the twelfth olympiad; Fabius Pictor, in the firſt year of the eighth; Polybius and Diodorus Siculus, in the ſecond year of the ſeventh olympiad; Portius Cato and others, in the firſt year of the ſame olympiad; Marcus Verrius Flaccus, the ſuppoſed author of the Capitoline tables, and Livy, in the fourth year of the ſixth olympiad. But the moſt exact Roman writers follow Varro's calculation, according to which the foundations of Rome were laid near the end of the third year of the ſixth olympiad. Plutarch, from the teſtimony of ſome antient writers, tells us, that an eclipſe of the ſun happened the firſt day that Rome was founded, which was ſeen by Antimachus of Teos. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus mentions another eclipſe (25), which happened the ſame day that Romulus died. From theſe aſtronomical obſervations ſeveral writers have attempted, by the help of the tables of eclipſes, to fix the true æra of the foundation of Rome; but the fruit of their labour has been nothing but endleſs diſputes, in which every one is at liberty to chuſe what ſide he pleaſes.

(N) The Palilia, or feaſt of Pales, is ſometimes called Parilia, from the Latin word Parere, "to bring forth", becauſe prayers were then made for the fruitfulneſs of the ſheep. Ovid mentions a very tedious courſe of ſuperſtitious ceremonies, which the ſhepherds went through on that occaſion. They had always a great feaſt at night, and when they were pretty merry, they concluded the whole with dancing over the fires they had made in the fields with heaps of ſtraw (26). As the Romans celebrated at the ſame time the feſtival of the foundation of their city, no victims were ſlain, becauſe they judged the ſhedding of blood unſuitable to ſo extraordinary a feſtival, which was deſigned only for public rejoicings.

When Rome had received the utmoſt perfection, which its poor and rude founder could give it, it conſiſted of about a thouſand houſes, or rather huts, and was, properly ſpeaking, a beggarly village, whereof the principal inhabitants followed the plough, being obliged to cultivate, with their own hands, the ungrateful ſoil of a barren country, which they had ſhared among themſelves. Even the walls of Romulus's palace were made of ruſhes and covered with thatch (O). As every one had choſen his ground to build upon without any regard to the regularity and beauty of the whole, the ſtreets if we may ſo call them, were both crooked and narrow. In ſhort, Rome, till it was rebuilt after the burning of it by the Gauls, was rather a diſorderly heap of huts, than a city built with any regularity or order[t]. From this mean and contemptible beginning, Rome, in proceſs of time, became the metropolis and miſtreſs of the whole known world, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

(O) The hut of Romulus was long preſerved on the Capitol, according to Vitruvius, Macrobius, and Seneca, as a venerable monument of antiquity; and it was a point of religion with the Romans never to make uſe of any other materials but ruſhes and ſtraw to repair it, till it was at length deſtroyed by fire in the time of Auguſtus. But after all, this hut on the capitol could not be the houſe of Romulus, it being certain that he dwel on mount Palatine.

CHAP. II.

The Roman Hiſtory, from Romulus to the Commonwealth.

AS Romulus had taken upon himſelf the chief command of the colony only for the time the city was building, as ſoon as the work was finiſhed, he aſſembled the people, and gave them liberty to chuſe what kind of government they liked beſt. They without heſitation, gave the preference to monarchy, and unanimouſly proclaimed Romulus king of Rome. But the prince elect, before he aſcended the throne, begged leave to conſult the will of the gods by auguries. It is ſaid, that, after he had offered ſacrifices to the gods in an open place, a flaſh of lightning was ſeen to gleam from the left, which was, according to the augurs, a lucky omen. From this time it became an eſtabliſhed cuſtom to have recourſe to augury upon raiſing any one to the royal dignity, the prieſthood, or any public employment. In proceſs of time, this came to be only a matter of mere ceremony, though the cuſtom, introduced by the example of the founder, ſubſiſted above ſeven hundred years [u] (P). Romulus being thus declared king by the election of the people and approbation of the gods, applied all his thoughts to the eſtabliſhing of good order in this new city, and a due ſubordination among his ſubjects. Romulus choſen king.

He

(P) This practice continued from the time of Romulus to the end of the republic, and was ſometimes uſed even under the emperors. Thoſe who ſtood for employments went out early on the day which was appointed for their election, made a public prayer, and conſulted the augurs. When their anſwers proved favourable, as they generally did, the augurs being commonly well paid for their pains, the candidates gave out that the gods were not againſt their having the office, which they ſollicited. Upon this they were ſaid to obtain and bear it auſpicatò.

He himſelf put on a habit of diſtinction, and appointed twelve lictors to attend him as guards, each of them bearing an ax ſtuck in a bundle of rods, which was the uſual ſymbol of ſovereignty among his neighbours the Hetrurians (Q). He divided the three thouſand three hundred men, of which his colony conſiſted, into three equal parts, called Tribes or Thirds, each being commanded by its præfect or tribune. The tribes were divided into ten curiæ, and theſe ſubdivided each into ten decuriæ: over the former was appointed officers, named Curiones, and over the latter Decuriones, each curiæ and decuriæ having their peculiar commander. After this Romulus divided his ſmall territory, not above five or ſix miles in extent, into three parts, but not equal. One was conſecrated to the expences of religious worſhip; another reſerved for the king's revenue, and the exigencies of the ſtate; and the third, which was the moſt conſiderable, divided into thirty portions, to anſwer to the thirty curiæ [w] (R). The next thing which Romulus did was, to diſtinguiſh the people, according to their birth and dignity, into Patricians and Plebeians. The former as being of a more noble extraction, were to take care of the religious rites and ceremonies, and to bear all the civil and military dignities; the latter to till the ground, feed cattle, and follow trades, but not to have any ſhare in the government, to avoid the inconveniencies of a popular power. But to prevent the ſeditions, which ſuch a diſtinction might produce, and to bind them to each other by reciprocal ties and obligations, every plebeian was allowed to chuſe out of the body of the patricians a protector, who was obliged to aſſiſt him with his intereſt and ſubſtance, and to

(Q) Some think that he choſe twelve lictors, becauſe he had ſeen twelve vulturs, a number, which had given him the ſuperiority over his brother.

(R) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus expreſly affirms, that each decuria was ſubdivided into ten decuriæ, and that theſe leſſer bodies were governed by decuriones. And, upon the ſtrength of his authority, moſt compilers of the Roman hiſtory give the ſame account. But the learned Grævius is of opinion, that Dionyſius by a miſtake aſcribes ſuch a diviſion to the curiæ, as was peculiar to the turmæ in the army (27).

(27) Vide Grævium in præf. ad 1. Vol. Theſ. antiq. Rom.

to defend him from the oppreſſions of the great. Theſe protectors were ſtyled patrons, and the protected clients. It was the duty of the patron to adviſe his clients in point of law, to manage their ſuits, to take care of them as of their own children, and by all ways and methods to ſecure their peace and happineſs. The clients, on the other hand, were to aſſiſt their patrons on ſeveral occaſions, to ranſom them or their children, when taken in war, to contribute to the portions of their daughters, to defray in part the charges of their public employments, &c. They were never to accuſe each other, or take contrary ſides; and if either of them was convicted of having violated this law, the crime was equal to that of treaſon, and any one was allowed to kill the offender with impunity. This patronage was a tie as effectual as any conſanguinity or alliance, and had a wonderful effect towards maintaining union and concord among the people, for the ſpace of ſix hundred years and upwards; during which time we find no diſſenſions nor jealouſies between the patrons and their clients, even in the times of the republic, when the populace frequently mutinied againſt thoſe who were moſt powerul in the city [x].

AFTER this, Romulus formed a ſenate, which conſiſted of a hundred perſons choſen out of the patricians; but the choice was not made by the king himſelf; each tribe choſe three ſenators, and each of the thirty curiæ the like number, which made in all the number of ninety nine; ſo that Romulus named only the hundredth, who was the head, or prince of the ſenate, and the chief governor of the city, when the king was in the field. They were called patres or fathers, either on account of their age, or their fatherly care of their fellow-citizens. Their deſcendants, to whom alone ſome appropriate the name of patricians, were the prime nobility among the Romans. The ſenate being thus eſtabliſhed, Romulus ordered the curiæ to chuſe him a guard of three hundred young men, ten out of each curia; and theſe he called celeres from their activity, and the expedition with which they executed the orders they received. They were all horſemen; but fought either on foot or on horſeback, as occaſion required or the ground would allow. They were commanded by a tribune called Tribunus Celerum, three centurions, and other inferior officers. Romulus in the next place proceeded to ſettle the reſpective powers and privileges of the king, ſenate, and people. The king's office at home was to take care of religious affairs; to be guardian of the laws and cuſtoms; to decide the weightier cauſes between man and man, referring thoſe of leſs moment to the ſenate; to call together the ſenators, and aſſemble the people, firſt delivering his own opinion relating to the affairs he propoſed, and then ratifying by his conſent what was agreed on by the majority: abroad and in time of war, he was to command the army with abſolute authority, and to take care of the public money [y]. The ſenate were not only to be judges in cauſes of ſmall importance, but to debate and reſolve upon ſuch public affairs as the king propoſed, and to determine them by the plurality of voices. To the people he committed three things, viz. to create magiſtrates, enact laws, and reſolve upon any war that was propoſed by the king; but in all theſe things the approbation of the ſenate was neceſſary.

When order was thus eſtabliſhed in political affairs, Romulus thought it his duty to make ſome regulations in matters of religion. He did not indeed give it that form, to which it was afterwards brought, but contented himſelf with eſtabliſhing ſome ſort of regularity in the prieſthood, and in the worſhip of thoſe deities, which Evander had introduced, or Æneas brought from Troy, or the Aborigines worſhipped in their time. He appointed, that each curia ſhould have its own temple, and its peculiar gods and prieſts, that the people ſhould aſſemble on ſtated days in cœnacula, or public halls, and that they ſhould there feaſt in common on the victims that had been offered to the gods. He likewiſe eſtabliſhed feſtivals, whereby religion became an eaſe and relief to the labouring people. The chief miniſters of the gods were choſen out of the patricians, and the inferior prieſts out of ſuch families only as were honourable. They were to be at leaſt fifty years old, and none but their wives were allowed to perform the functions of prieſteſſes. Their ſons were to wait at the altars to the age of puberty, and their daughters ſo long as they continued virgins. The ſons were called camilli, and the daughters camillæ. When a prieſt had no no children of his own, he might chuſe the handſomeſt in his curia to attend him in his ſacrifices. As the ſacerdotal families were exempted from paying taxes and bearing arms, and beſides, their employment was for life, Romulus prohibited the ſeeking of it by intrigues and cabals, the purchaſing of it by money, and even the truſting of it to the hazard of lots. He left to each curia the free choice of their prieſts, auſpices, and augurs. The aruſpices inſpected the entrails of the victims; and the augurs foretold future events by the flight and ſinging of birds (S).

THUS

(S) As we ſhall frequently have occaſion, in the courſe of this hiſtory, to ſpeak of Augurs and Haruſpices, or Aruſpices, it may not be improper to give ſome account in this place of that kind of divination. The art of divination and foretelling future events, by the flight, chirping, or motions of birds, came from the Chaldeans to the Greeks, from them to the Hetrurians, and from the Hetrurians to the Latins and Romans (28). The name of Augur is derived by ſome ab avium geſtu; by others ab avium garritu, that is, either from the motion and actions, or from the chirping and chattering of birds. As Romulus himſelf was well verſed in this art, after he had divided the city into three tribes, he appointed an augur for each tribe (29). A fourth was added ſome time after, probably by Servius Tullius, who encreaſed the tribes. Theſe four were all choſen out of the patricians; but in the year of Rome 454, at the ſolicitation of the tribunes, five perſons were added to the college, elected out of the common people (30); and in the year 672, Sylla encreaſed their number to fifteen (31). The eldeſt of theſe preſided over the reſt, and was honoured with the title of magiſter collegii (32). Their office, which we find compriſed in the augural law mentioned by Tully (33), was to interpret dreams, oracles, prodigies, &c and to tell, whether any action ſhould be fortunate or prejudicial to particular perſons or to the whole ſtate. Thus they were the interpreters of the will of the gods, with reſpect to the making of war or peace; and all were obliged to obey them in ſo important an article. We find five ſorts of auguries mentioned by the antients; 1. From the appearances in heaven, as thunder, lightning, comets, and other meteors. 2. From birds, whence they had the name of Auſpices, from the Latin words avis and conſpicio. Some birds furniſhed them with obſervations from their chattering or ſinging; others, from their flying. The former were called Oſcines, and the latter Præpetes.

Aſylum

THUS was the colony founded; but, as it was thin of inhabitants, Romulus, to attract ſtrangers from the neighbouring countries, opened an aſylum or place of refuge for fugitive ſlaves, homicides, outlaws, and perſons plunged in debt.

For the taking of both theſe ſorts of auguries, the augur went up to ſome high place, took the augural ſtaff, which was bent at one end like a croſier, and marked out with it the four templa or quarters of the heaven. Then he turned to the eaſt, and, in that ſituation, waited for the omen, which was of no ſignification, unleſs confirmed by another of the ſame ſort. 3. From birds kept in a coop for that purpoſe. The manner of divining from them was as follows: Early in the morning the augur that was to make the obſervation, after having commanded a general ſilence, ordered the coop to be opened, and then threw a handful of crumbs or corn. If the chickens did not eat greedily, ſcattered their food about with their wings, let a great deal of it fall from their mouths to the ground, or, above all, refuſed to eat, the omen was reckoned unlucky, and ſome great misfortune portended; but if they fed greedily, and let none of their food drop out of their mouths, there was all the aſſurance that poſſibly could be wiſhed for of hapineſs and ſucceſs (34). This ſort of augury was called tripudium, from the antient Latin word pavire, to ſtrike, and terra, the earth; becauſe the birds in eating greedily, ſtruck the ground with their beaks. The 4th ſort of augury was from beaſts, viz. wolves, goats, foxes, heifers, aſſes, rams, hares, weeſels, and mice. The general obſervations about them were, whether they appeared in a ſtrange place, or croſſed the way, whether they ran to the right or left, &c. The laſt ſort of divination by auguries, was from what they called Diræ, or unuſual accidents happening to any perſon, as ſtumbling, ſeeing apparitions, hearing ſtrange voices, meeting a wolf, a fox, a hare, &c. Any augur was allowed to take an obſervation; but the judging of the omen was left to the deciſion of the whole college.

As to the Aruſpices, they were ſo called ab aris aſpiciendis, that is, from looking on the altars. The Roman aruſpices were all taken at firſt from Hetruria, where their art was in great requeſt; but afterwards the ſenate ordered twelve of the ſons of the chief men in Rome to be ſent into that country, to learn there the rites and ceremonies of the Etruſcan religion, of which this ſcience was the chief part (35). The buſineſs of the aruſpices was to look upon the ſacred victims, and by them to foretel the ſucceſs of any enterprize. They took their obſervation from the victims before they were cut up; from their entrails after they debt. Theſe he did not at firſt receive within the walls; but allotted them the hill Saturnius, afterwards called Capitolinus, for their habitation. Nor was the appearance of religion wanting to cover the king's policy: he erected a temple to a new ſort of divinity, called by him the Aſylæan god (T), under whoſe protection all criminals were to live ſecurely. Afterwards, when Romulus enlarged his new city, the aſylum was incloſed within the walls, and thoſe who had fled to it, being brought under ſome regulation, became citizens they were cut up; from the flame that uſed to riſe while they were burning; and laſtly, from the flour, bran, frankincenſe, wine, or water uſed in the ſacrifice. Before the victims were cut up, it was an ill omen when they would not come to the altar without being dragged, when they broke the rope, fled away, avoided the ſtroke, ſtruggled much after it, made a great bellowing, were long a dying, or bled but little. When the victim was cut up, they obſerved the colour of the parts, and whether any were wanting: a double liver, a little or lean heart, were counted very bad omens. If the heart was wholly miſſing, nothing could be thought more dreadful and fatal; if the entrails fell out of the prieſt's hands, or were more bloody than uſual, or of a pale colour, they portended ſudden danger and ruin. As to the flame of the ſacrifice, it furniſhed them with a good omen when it was pure and clear, roſe up in a pyramid without noiſe, and did not go out till the victim was conſumed. The ſmoke likewiſe was conſidered, whether it whirled about, or ſpread itſelf to the right or left, or yielded a ſmell different from that of broiled meat. If the incenſe they burnt melted all at once, and had an agreeable ſmell, it was a lucky omen. There were ſeveral other ſigns which ſupplied them with conjectures too inſignificant to be mentioned here. The buſineſs of the aruſpices was not reſtrained to the altars and ſacrifices; but they had an equal right to the explaining of other portents and monſters. Hence we find them often conſulted by the ſenate on extraordinary occaſions. If the Roman aruſpices lay under any diſrepute, others were ſent for out of Hetruria, where this ſcience had moſt credit.

(T) Plutarch tells us, that the aſylum was put under the protection of the Aſylæan god; but who this god was, is unknown to us. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus tells us, that, in his time, the place where the aſylum had been was conſecrated to Jupiter; whence ſome have conjectured, that the Aſylæan god was no other than Jupiter, worſhipped by Romulus under the title of Aſylæus, that is, the protector of aſylums.

tizens of Rome [z] (U). Nothing was now wanting but women, to ſecure the duration of the ſtate; but, as the neighbouring people refuſed to give their daughters in marriage to ſuch a crew of vagabonds, Romulus, by the advice of his grandfather Numitor and the conſent of the ſenate, proclaimed a ſolemn feaſt and public games, in honour of Equeſtrian Neptune, called Conſus. This occaſioned a great concourſe of people, who flocked from the adjacent places to behold thoſe pompous ſhews, together with the new city; but in the midſt of the ſolemnity, the Romans, upon a ſignal given by Romulus, ruſhing in with their drawn ſwords among the ſtrangers, ſeized their daughters, and by main force carried them to their houſes, where they were kept till the next day, without any further inſult offered to them, agreeable to the expreſs orders of Romulus. They were in all ſix hundred and eighty-three, and Romulus choſe ſo many huſbands for them, marrying them after the ſame manner that was ever after uſed in Rome (W).

The rape of the Sabine women.

[z] Plut. & Dio. Hal. ibid.

(U) To this Juvenal alludes in the following verſes, addreſſed to a Roman citizen boaſting of his original and noble extraction:

Attamen ut longe repetas, longeque revolvas, Nomen; ab infami gentem deducis aſylo.
Majorum quiſquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut latro fuit, aut illud, quod dicere nolo (35).

(W) The form uſed in marriage was, Partake you of your huſband's fire and water. This communication of fire and water between the huſband and wife, was the ſymbol of conjugal love and union, and inſinuating, that their goods were in common between them. The virgins ſeized on this occaſion were all called Sabines, becauſe the greater number was of that nation. The common opinion is, that they were in all ſix hundred and eighty-three; ſome ſay five hundred and twenty-ſeven, and others reduce them to thirty only, deriving the word curia from Cures the name of the town, of which the women were for the moſt part natives. But no hiſtorian of any account is of this opinion. Romulus found but one married woman among all thoſe who had been ſeized. Her name was Herſilia; and we are told by Zenodotus, quoted by Plutarch, that Romulus married her, and had a daughter by her, named Prima, becauſe ſhe was his firſt child, and a ſon, called Abilius; but other hiſtorians ſay, that Herſilia was married to a noble Roman, named Hoſtus; and that Tullus Hoſtilius, the third king of Rome, deſcended from her.

(35) Juvenal. ſatir. viii. ver. 272.

THIS violence was highly reſented by the neighbouring people, eſpecially by the Sabines; but, as they were unwilling to engage in a war, their country being open on all ſides and defenceleſs, they firſt ſent to demand the reſtitution of their daughters, promiſing to enter into an alliance with the Romans, whereby they ſhould have liberty to intermarry with them; but Romulus was inflexible, demanding, on his part, that the Sabines ſhould confirm the marriages of the Romans. While the treaty, which went on ſlowly, ſuſpended hoſtilities on both ſides, Acron, whom the hiſtorians ſtyle king of Cænina (X), being provoked at the late audacious rape, and jealous of the growing power of the new city, took the field; and being joined by the inhabitants of Cruſtuminum and Antemnæ (Y), made an incurſion into the Roman territories. Romulus inſtantly marched out againſt him, and having engaged the enemy in the open field, challenged their leader, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, to a ſingle combat, killed him, put his army to flight, and purſuing the fugitives to their town, made himſelf maſter of it without oppoſition. He ſpared the blood of the conquered; but razed their city, and carried their inhabitants to Rome, where he allowed them the ſame privileges as the moſt antient citizens [a]. For this victory Romulus decreed himſelf the honours of a triumph; and bringing home the ſpoils of king Acron, conſecrated them to Jupiter Feretrius ſo called, according to ſome, from the Latin word "ferire", to "ſmite", becauſe he had killed the king with his own hand; or from the word "ferre", to "carry", becauſe Romulus had himſelf carried thither the armour of the king he had killed. A name of diſtinction was

(X) Cænina was ſituated on the confines of Latium and the country of the Sabines; whence ſome geographers make it a city of the Sabines, and others of antient Latium. Cluverius thinks, it ſtood on the banks of the Anio next to Rome; but Holſtenius places it on the oppoſite bank, in the neighbourhood of the preſent Monticelli.

(Y) Cruſtuminum and Antemnæ were either ſubject to the Sabines, or in their neighbourhood. Some geographers think, the former ſtood where Marcigliano Vecchio now ſtands, and place the latter on the Tiber, between the Tiburtine and Nomantine ways.

was likewiſe given to the ſpoils; for they were called opima ſpolia (Z), becauſe they were more honourable than any other, on account of their being taken by the general of the Roman army from the enemy's general, after he had killed him with his own hand. Romulus, elated with this victory, marched with one legion (A), levied in haſte, againſt the Antemnates and Cruſtumini, who had joined the king of Cænina; and having, without much-ado, overcome them and taken their cities, at the requeſt of Herſilia, who was a native of Antemnæ, he not only pardoned the inhabitants, but tranſplanted them to Rome, where they were admitted to all the privileges of Roman citizens. By this conduct, the reputation of his clemency, as well as bravery, became ſo great, that ſeveral cities of Hetruria voluntarily ſubmitted to him. Cœlius, an Hetrurian leader, led all the troops under his command to Rome, and ſettled on a hill near the city, which from him took the name of mount Cœlius [b]. And now Romulus, being obliged to enlarge the compaſs of his city, took in the hill Saturnius, called afterwards the capital; and on the top of it built a citadel, which he committed to the government of a noble Roman, named Tarpeius. The citadel was ſurrounded on all ſides with ramparts and towers, which equally commanded the city and country. From the foot of the hill Saturnius a wall was carried on quite to the Tiber, and a gate opened in it, which they called Car-

(Z) Feſtus derives the word opima from ops, which ſignifies the earth, and the riches it produces; ſo that opima ſpolia, according to that writer, ſignify rich ſpoils. But Plutarch derives it from the word opus; ſo that opima ſpolia, and ſpoils hard to be obtained, are, in his opinion, one and the ſame thing. This name was given, as Plutarch informs us, only to ſuch ſpoils as the general of the Roman army had taken from the general of the enemy's troops. Of the order, laws, and pomp of the antient triumphs we ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

(A) The word legion is derived from the Latin word legere, to chuſe, the legions conſiſting of choſen men. The number of men in a legion was different at different times, as we ſhall occaſionally obſerve in the ſequel of this hiſtory. In the times we are now ſpeaking of, a legion conſiſted of three thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, as we read in Plutarch (36).

Carmentalis, from Carmenta, the mother of Evander, who either lived there, or had in that place ſome altar or chapel erected to her.

NOTWITHSTANDING this encreaſe of the Roman forces, the Sabines ſent a ſecond deputation to Romulus, to demand back their daughters; and, upon his refuſal, began hoſtilities, and marched towards Rome with an army of twenty-five thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, under the command of their king Titus Tatius. Romulus, having received ſupplies from his grand-father Numitor and from Hetruria, marched out againſt them, at the head of twenty-thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe. Romulus poſted his army between the hills Eſquilinus and Quirinalis, while the Sabines encamped at the foot of the hill Saturnius, in the plain afterwards called Campus Martius. Tatius, finding the Romans too well fortified to be attacked, was very uneaſy about the ſucceſs of the enterprize. But an unforeſeen accident extricated him out of his difficulties; for Tarpeia, daughter to the governor of the citadel, being greatly taken with the bracelets and rings of the Sabines, called to them from above, and promiſed to betray the place into their hands, provided they gave her what they wore on their left arms. The Sabines readily agreed to grant her what ſhe required, and being by her admitted into the citadel, made themſelves maſters of that important place. We are told, that the Sabines cruſhed Tarpeia to death with their bucklers, which they threw upon her, thinking they diſcharged their promiſe by thus giving her what they wore on their left arms. From her the hill Saturnius took the name of Tarpeius, till the building of the capital; and even then the ſteepeſt part of it, whence criminals were thrown down headlong, continued to be called the Tarpeian rock. The Sabines, now maſters of the citadel, had the advantage of being able to continue the war with more ſecurity. For a long time only light ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the two parties; but at laſt, as they both began to be tired with the charges of the war, they reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement, which was fought with great reſolution on both ſides, and renewed, for ſeveral days together, with almoſt equal ſucceſs. In the laſt conteſt the Sabines were at firſt put into diſorder, and obliged to take refuge in the citadel, which the Romans, who purſued them, expected to have re-taken. But the enemy rolling great ſtones from the top of the hill, wounded Romulus on the head, and ſtunned him ſo, that falling down ſenſeleſs, he was carried out of the field into the city. This accident inſpired the Sabines with new courage, who falling upon the Romans, put them to flight in their turn, and purſued them to the very gates of Rome. In the mean time, Romulus, coming to himſelf again, returned to the battle, encouraged his routed troops, and, having made a vow to Jupiter in order to obtain his favour (B), drove the enemy back to the citadel. Some writers tell us[c], that, in the heat of the engagement, the Sabine women, at the perſuaſion of Herſilia, ruſhing out of the city with their hair diſhevelled and their children in their arms, threw themſelves deſperately into the midſt of the darts and dead bodies, and by their tears and entreaties, put a ſtop to the fury of their huſbands and fathers. But this is an adventure too wonderful not to be thought fabulous. What part the Sabine women acted in the reconcilation of the two people, will appear in the ſequel of the hiſtory.

TITUS TATIUS being in poſſeſſion of the citadel, and Romulus continuing ſhut up in his city, neither party was very forward to hazard another engagement. The Sabines were doubtful, whether they ſhould raiſe the ſiege and content themſelves with ragaging the Roman territory. The Romans, on their ſide, were no leſs undetermined what to do. They conſidered, that the Sabines were a powerful people, and that the late victory had neither been complete nor deciſive; but, on the other hand, they could not with honour reſtore the Sabine women; for that would have been an acknowledgment of their weakneſs, which would have made the enemy more haughty and more difficult to treat with. But while the men were thus deliberating, the

(B) We are told, that, while the Romans were flying before the enemy, Romulus made a vow to Jupiter, in order to obtain his aſſiſtance for the ſpeedy rallying of his troops, and that they unexpectedly ſtopped at the ſight of their general, on his return to the field of battle. Being therefore fully convinced, that this was a particular bleſſing of heaven, he erected a temple to Jupiter, whom he called Stator, in memory of the happy moment, when the Romans, recovering from their fright, made a ſtand and faced the enemy (37).

the women at the perſuaſion of Herſilia, demanded an audience of the ſenate; and being admitted, laid before them a deſign which they had formed, without the privity of their huſbands. This was to mediate between the contending nations, and try whether they could put an end to the war, which had been undertaken for their ſake. Their propoſal met with no oppoſion in the preſent conjuncture of affairs. A decree was immediately paſſed, permitting the women to go upon the negotiation they propoſed. All the ſecurity that was required of them was, to leave one of their children at Rome; the reſt they were allowed to carry with them in their arms, in order to raiſe the compaſſion of their grandfathers. The women, being thus authorized, laid aſide their ornaments, and, putting on mourning, advanced to the camp of the Sabines, where, by throwing themſelves at the feet of their fathers and relations, they raiſed a general compaſſion. King Tatius, having aſſembled his chief officers, ordered the women to declare on what purpoſe they were come; which Herſilia is ſaid to have done in a long and pathetic ſpeech: after which ſhe begged a truce, that the chiefs of the two armies might have an opportunity of conferring together. As the Sabines wanted only an honourable pretence to put an end to the war, they were eaſily prevailed upon to accept the propoſal. Accordingly a truce was granted, during which the two kings had a conference, which ended to the ſatisfaction of both parties; for a treaty of union was made and confirmed by oath, the articles whereof were, 1. That the two kings ſhould reſide and jointly reign at Rome. 2. That the city ſhould ſtill, from Romulus, be called Rome; but the citizens Quirites, a name till then peculiar to the Sabines (C). 3. That the two nations ſhould become

The Romans and Sabines become one people.

(C) The word quiris, in the Sabine language, ſignified both a dart and a warlike deity armed with a dart. 'Tis uncertain whether the god gave name to the dart, or the dart to the god; but, however that be, this god Quiris, or Quirinus, was either Mars, or ſome other god of war, and continued to be worſhipped in Rome, till Romulus, who, after his death, was honoured with the name Quirinus, took his place (38).

come one; and that the Sabines ſhould be made free of Rome and enjoy all the privileges of Roman citizens [d]. Three Sabine families of great diſtinction are particularly ſaid to have ſettled at Rome on this occaſion, with their relations and dependents. The head of one was Valerius Voleſus; of another Talus Tyrannus; and of the third Metius Curtius, who had ſignalized himſelf in the laſt battle (D) To Valerius Voleſus Plutarch aſcribes the honour of negotiating the peace.

The comitium.

THE two nations being thus united, Tatius, in imitation of Romulus, formed a council of an hundred ſenators of his own nation, who were alſo ſtyled fathers, and enjoyed the ſame privileges with thoſe who had been inſtituted by the founder. The two councils aſſembled firſt at the houſes of their reſpective kings; but afterwards met at the ſame place, which from thence was called comitium (E). After this u-

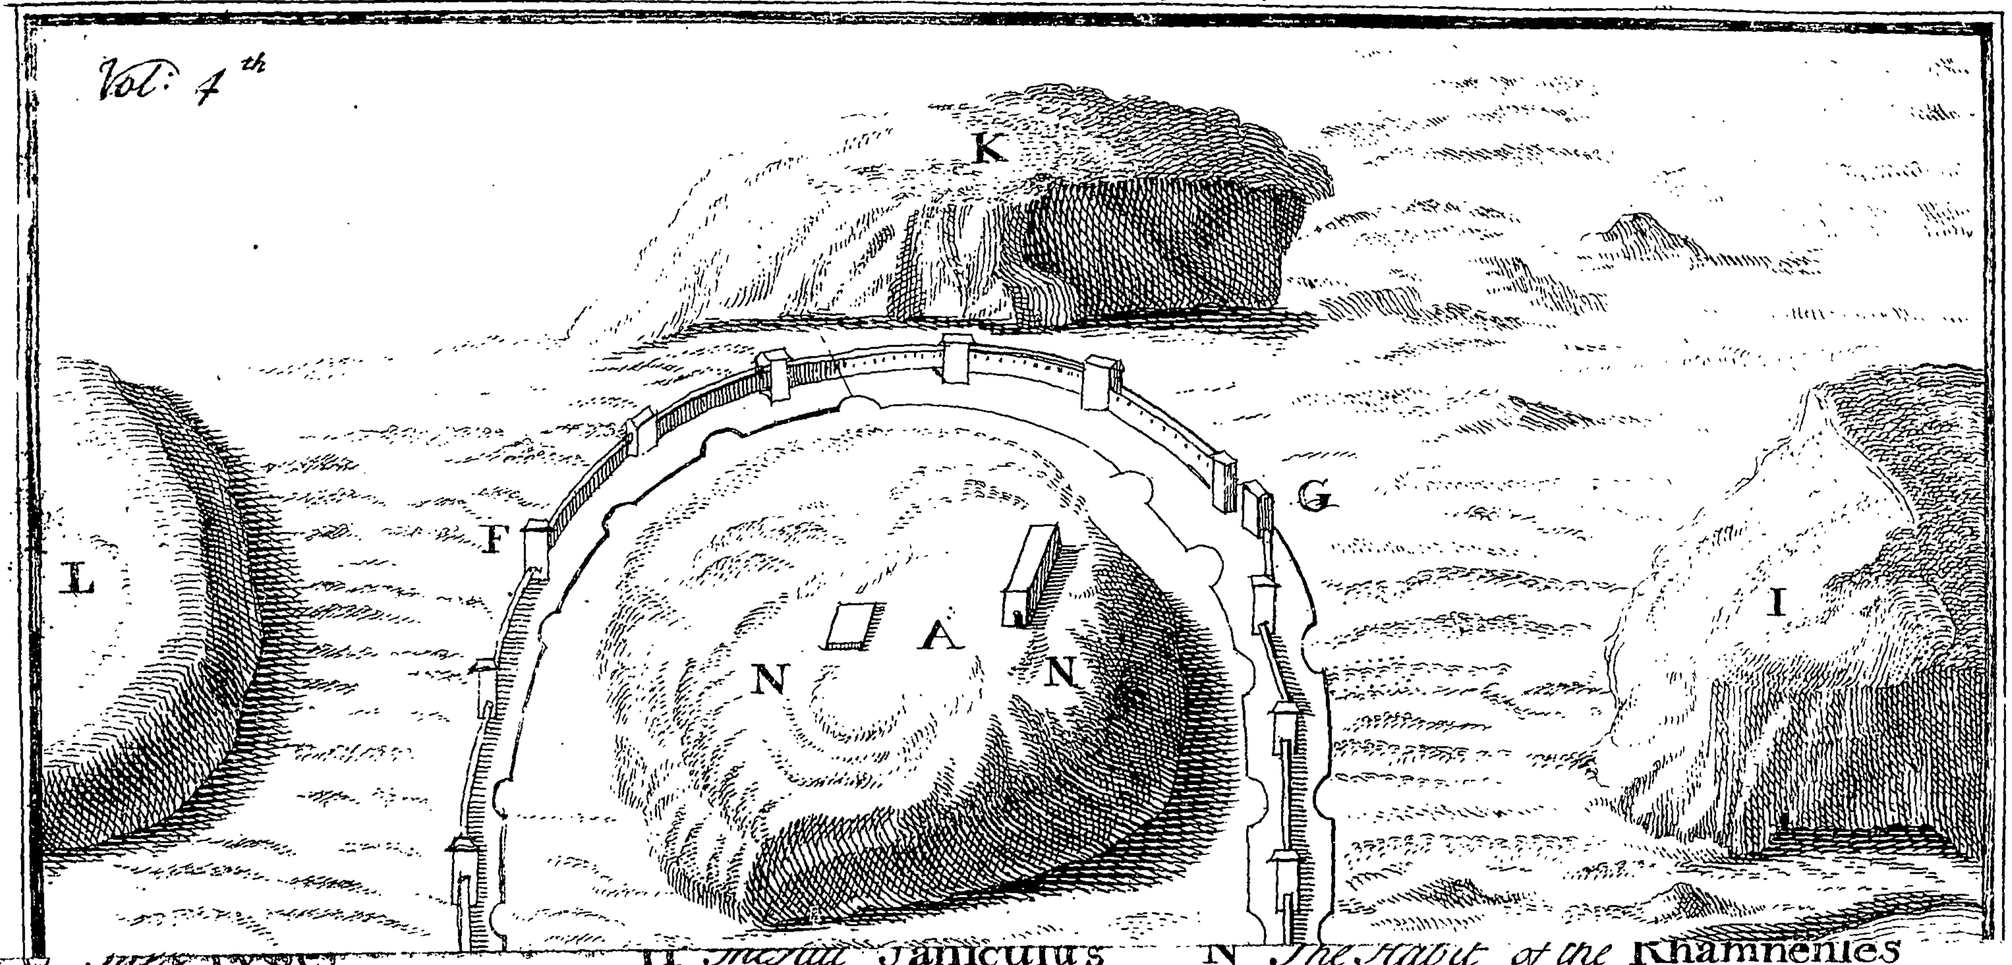
(D) While the Romans had the advantage, this brave Sabine, breaking into the centre of their army, and rallying his countrymen, who had been put in diſorder, turned the ſcale in their favour. But Romulus, meeting him and engaging him in ſingle combat, obliged him, as he was already wounded, to quit the field Curtius, being ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemy, choſe rather to throw himſelf into a pool, made by the inundation of the Tiber, than to go a great way about. As the pool was deep, and full of mud, Romulus, thinking his enemy was loſt, left him and rejoined his army; but the Sabine was taken out of the water, and the place ever after called Lacus Curtius, even when it was dryed up, and almoſt in the center of the Roman forum (38). Procilius ſays, that the earth having opened, the aruſpices declared it neceſſary for the ſafety of the republic, that the braveſt man in the city ſhould throw himſelf into the gulf; whereupon one Curtius, mounting on horſeback, leaped armed into it, and the gulf immediately cloſed. Before the building of the common ſewers, this pool was a ſort of ſink, which received all the filth of the city. Some writers think, that it received its name from Curtius the conſul, collegue to M. Genucius, becauſe he cauſed it to be walled in by the advice of the aruſpices, after it had been ſtruck with lightning (39).



(E) The word comitium is derived from the antient Latin verb cumire, which ſignifies to meet. The comitium was at the foot ing to Livy [e], the three bodies of Roman knights, called Ramnenſes, Tatienſes, and Luceres. The firſt body had its name from Romulus, the ſecond from Tatius, and the third from the lucus or grove where the aſylum ſtood, this order being formed out of thoſe who had peopled it. Theſe three bodies of horſe were incorporated into the Roman legions, which, from this time, conſiſted, according to the moſt common opinion, of four thouſand men each; whence a legion was called quadrata. As Rome was chiefly indebted to the Sabine women for this happy encreaſe of wealth and power, honourable privileges and marks of diſtinction were allowed them; every one was commanded to give way to them; all immodeſt and too free diſcourſes were forbidden in their preſence; no indecent objects were to be brought into their ſight; in capital cauſes they were exempted from the juriſdiction of the ordinary judges; and laſtly, their children were allowed to wear a golden ball hanging from their necks, and a particular robe, called prætexta, to diſtinguiſh them from the vulgar (F).

foot of the hill Palatinus, over againſt the capitol. Not far from thence the two kings built the temple of Vulcan, where they uſually met to conſult the ſenate about the moſt important affairs.

(F) Authors are divided in their opinions about the form of this ornament, which the Sabine women were allowed to hang about the necks of their children. It was called bulla; and Plutarch ſays (40), that it was like the little bubbles which the drops of rain make, when they fall upon running water. It is therefore probable, that theſe little golden balls were hollow and light. Others think they were but half globes, being on one ſide flat, and on the other globular. Macrobius ſays, that Tarquin the elder extended the right of wearing this ornament to all the children of the patricians, and that he began with his own. The young men, when they attained the age of manhood, quitted the bulla, and made an offering of it to the dii lares, or houſhold gods. As to the prætexta, it had a border of purple round its edges; hence it took its name. This robe was wore by girls till their marriage, and by boys till they were ſeventeen, when they took the toga virilis, or manly robe. But what in the time of Romulus was a mark of diſtinction for the children of the Sabine women, became afterwards very common; for even even the children of the liberti, that is, of thoſe who were made free, wore robes bordered with purple in their youth. In proceſs of time the graveſt magiſtrates wore them, not only at Rome, but in the colonies and municipia. This prætexta was not only a mark of the quality of the perſon that wore it, but was beſides looked upon as a ſacred habit, and a kind of guard or defence againſt the injuries to which children are expoſed. Thus Perſius calls it cuſtos purpura (41); and Quintilian, in one of his declarations ſtyles it, the ſacred habit of the prætexta, the robe, which raiſes in us a holy reverence and veneration to the helpleſs condition of childhood. In proceſs of time the bulla became as common as the prætexta, all the ſons of the ingenui or free-born being allowed to wear it; but with this diſtinction, that their bulla was not of gold, but of leather, as Juvenal inſinuates in the following verſes:

——Etruſcum puero ſi contigit aurum,
Vel nodus tantum, & ſignum de paupere loro (42).

The poet calls the bulla aurea, Etruſcan gold, becauſe that ſort of ornament was uſed by the Etruſcans long before it was introduced among the Romans. In the account we have given here of the bulla aurea and prætexta, we have followed Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus and Livy; but Macrobius, on the authority of ſome writers, relates the matter in a quite different manner; for he ſays, that Herſilia, being carried away with her daughter, fell in marriage to Hoſtus, an officer of great diſtinction, and was the firſt who bore a child to Rome. To this child alone, who was called Hoſtus Hoſtilius, Romulus granted the privilege of wearing the bulla aurea. Some fanſy, that Tarquinius Priſcus, in a triumph for a victory gained over the Sabines, firſt honoured his own ſon with the prætexta and bulla aurea, for killing one of the enemy's chief commanders with his own hand. Others, without mentioning this victory, pretend, that Tarquin, among other wiſe conſtitutions, took particular care to aſſign the proper habit both to the boys and girls, and appointed the prætexta and bulla aurea for the ſons of the ſenators and patricians, and the prætexta alone for their daughters, and alſo for the ſons of thoſe who had ſerved among the horſe the full time the law required. The figure of a man's heart was memory of their city Cures, or in honour of their god Quiris. The place between the hills Palatinus and Tarpeius became a common market-place for the two united nations, and was called the forum. The union of the two nations ſoon produced a mixture of manners, cuſtoms, and religion. The Sabines adopted the Roman gods, and the Romans thoſe of the Sabines. They unanimouſly inſtituted the feſtival called matronalia, in memory of the peace concluded by the mediation of the women (G). As to martial affairs, the conqueſt of Cameria, a city in the neighbourhood of Rome, was the only military atchievement under the two kings. Four thouſand of its inhabitants were tranſplanted to Rome, and a colony ſent from thence to Cameria. In the ſixth year of Romulus and Tatius, the latter, having provoked the Lavinians, by protecting ſome of his friends who had ravaged their territories, was by them murdered at the foot of the altar, while he was offering a ſacrifice together with Romulus, in the city of Lavinium, to the tutelary gods of the ſtate. Romulus conveyed the body of his collegue to Rome, with great pomp, and cauſed it to be honourably interred on mount Aventine. The Lavinians, fearing the reſentment of Romulus, delivered up the aſſaſſins into his hands; but he ſent them back unpuniſhed, which gave occaſion to ſuſpect, that Death of Tatius.

was ſometimes impreſſed on the bullæ aureæ, to put thoſe who wore them in mind of this moral truth, that men are only valuable for the qualities of their hearts. In like manner the purple colour of the prætexta was to remind them of the modeſty which became them at that age (43).

(G) This feſtival was celebrated on the firſt of March. Ovid (44) gives other reaſons for the inſtitution of it, viz. to obtain of Mars the bleſſing of bearing good children; a bleſſing which he firſt beſtowed on Rhea Sylvia. But, at the ſame time, the poet owns, that the matronalia were chiefly inſtituted in memory of the benefits the Romans had received from the Sabine women. During this feſtival, the Roman women, ſuch as were married, ſerved their ſlaves at table, and received preſents from their huſbands, as the huſbands did from their wives in the time of the ſaturnalia. As the feſtival of the matronalia was conſecrated to Mars, and, as ſome will have it, to Juno Lucina, ſacrifices were offered to both theſe deities. This feaſt was the ſubject of Horace's ode, that he was not, at leaſt, diſpleaſed at the death of his colleague [f].

Romulus defeats the Camerini, Fidenates, and Veientes.

NOT long after, a cruel plague, attended with a great famine, breaking out at Rome, the Camerini laid hold of this opportunity to ſhake off the yoke, and lay waſte the Roman territory. But Romulus marching out againſt them, gave them battle, killed ſix thouſand of them on the ſpot; and returning to Rome, entered the city in triumph, as he had done after the defeat of Acron. The like ſucceſs attended him againſt the Fidenates, whoſe city, ſtanding about forty furlongs from Rome, he took, and made it a Roman colony. This drew new enemies upon him; for the Veientes (H), reclaiming Fidenæ, as a city within their juriſdiction, laid ſiege to it; but their forces being defeated in two battles, and a great number of them taken priſoners, together with their commander, they were forced to prevent their total ruin by a timely ſubmiſſion. They therefore ſent embaſſadors to Rome to ſue for peace; and Romulus granted them a truce for a hundred years, upon the following conditions, viz. that they ſhould deliver to him ſeven ſmall towns on the Tiber, ſome ſalt-pits near the mouth of that river, and ſend fifty of their chief citizens to Rome, to be kept there as hoſtages. A war thus advantageouſly ended procured Romulus the honour of a third triumph, which, as the city was much encreaſed both in riches and inhabitants, exceeded in all likelihood the two former. The priſoners were all ſold for ſlaves; and what was done at this ſale gave riſe to a cuſtom, which prevailed ever after; for when they returned thanks to the gods for any victory, they uſed to dreſs an old man in a purple robe, with a child's bulla about his neck, and cry round him, Sardians to ſell. By this ceremony they alluded to the old king or governor of the Veientes, who, in this war, had behaved like a child; and to the Veientes, who, with the other Hetrurians, were a colony of Lydians, whoſe metropolis was the city of Sardis [g]. Other writers date this cuſtom from the time of the conqueſt of

of Sardinia by Tibrius Sempronius Gracchus, when ſuch a number of ſlaves was brought from that iſland, that nothing was to be ſeen in the markets but Sardinians.

THIS was the laſt war in which Romulus engaged. He employed the remaining part of his life in ſettling the government on the ſureſt foundations. He made many good laws; but we have only ſome fragments of them remaining. The firſt relates to marriages, and forbids a wife to leave her huſband upon any pretence whatſoever; but, at the ſame time, allows the huſband to put away his wife, and even to puniſh her with death, in caſe ſhe were convicted of adultery, poiſoning, making falſe keys, or only of drinking wine. Each huſband was confined to one wife, their goods being in common between them; but under the adminiſtration of the huſband. In relation to children, Romulus gave their fathers an abſolute power over them; ſo that they could, by their own private authority, impriſon them, ſell them for ſlaves, and even put them to death, of whatever age they were, and what ever dignity, office, or employment they held [h]. He appointed no puniſhment for real parricide; but called all murder ſo, thinking the latter a deteſtable crime, but the former impoſſible; and indeed it was unknown in Rome for near ſix hundred years, as divorces were, notwithſtanding the power granted to huſbands, for five hundred and twenty years [i].

The laws of Romulus.

ROMULUS, in the latter end of his reign, whether elated with his former ſucceſſes, or carried away with ſome pleaſing notions of arbitrary power, began to enlarge his prerogative beyond the bounds he had formerly ſet to it, and to pay no longer any deference to his great council. The ſenators were aſſembled indeed; but merely for form-ſake and to ratify his commands. But what moſt of all provoked the fathers was, his ſharing the conquered lands among his ſoldiers, as he pleaſed, without conſulting them, and his reſtoring to the Veientes their hoſtages, againſt their opinion. This haughty and arbitrary carriage they could not brook, and therefore conſpired his deſtruction; which they ſoon after effected. Romulus having appointed a review of his troops on a plain without the city, the ſenate attended him thither. While he was haranguing them, a ſudden ſtorm of hail and thunder diſperſed the army; and the ſenators, remaining alone

Some writers tell us, that, the better to conceal the fact, the ſenators cut him in pieces, each of them carrying away one under his robe (I). However that be, the ſenators took occaſion, from the ſecrecy of the fact and the concealment of the body, to perſuade the multitude, that the king was all on a ſudden ſurrounded by a flame and ſnatched up into heaven; but this ſtratagem did not appeaſe the ſoldiery, till Julius Proculus a ſenator of great diſtinction, having aſſembled the curiæ, told them, that Romulus had appeared to him, and enjoined him to acquaint his people, that it had pleaſed the gods he ſhould return to heaven, from whence he originally came; but that he would be always a propitious god to them, under the name of Quirinus. As Julius Proculus, who was eſteemed a man of great probity, and had been always thought a friend to Romulus, ſwore to the truth of this ſtory, all ſuſpicions were laid aſide; and divine honours decreed to the new deity [k]. His death happened on the ſeventh day of July, in the thirty-ſeventh year of his reign, and ſixtieth, or, as others ſay, fifty-fifth, year of his age. Such was the end of Romulus, the founder and firſt king of Rome. He was thought to be the ſon of Mars, and it does not appear, that he ever acted unbecoming that character, having, in a ſhort time, made his

(I) Hiſtorians differ about the place where Romulus loſt his life; ſome ſaying he was killed in the open field, while he was haranguing his troops; others that he loſt his life in the temple of Vulcan, or in the ſenate. Neither do they agree about the manner in which he was aſſaſſinated; ſome ſay, he was murdered by the people, for ſhewing more favour to thoſe who were newly come to Rome from the conquered cities, than to the antient inhabitants; while others pretend, the ſenators ſtabbed him in full ſenate, and having cut his body in pieces, every one carried a part of it away under his robe. However that be, his death gave riſe, according to Plutarch (44), to the caprotine nones, or populifugium, that is, the flight of the people, a feſtival in the Roman kalendar, on the nones of July. But other authors give another origin to this feſtival; of which we ſhall ſpeak in a more proper place.

his ſmall colony formidable to all the neighbouring nations. Nor was his wiſdom and policy inferior to his courage; for, in a few years, he encreaſed his ſubjects, from three thouſand three hundred men, to forty-ſeven thouſand; and, what is ſtill more ſurpriſing, formed a people out of a gang of ſlaves and profligates, who in proceſs of time became maſters of the world, and yet were long more renowned for their virtue, than for their courage or conqueſts. After the death of his grandfather Numitor, the ſovereignty of Alba devolved upon him; but he reſerved to himſelf no other power over it, than that of naming annually a magiſtrate, with the title of dictator, to govern it in form of a republic; which is ſomewhat ſurprizing in a prince, who was ſo eagerly bent on extending his dominions, and ſubjecting all the ſtates around him.

ROMULUS dying without iſſue, the city was greatly divided about the election of a new king. The Romans did not judge it by any means adviſeable to reſign the regal authority to the Sabines; and, on the other hand, the Sabines thought it was but juſt, that the king ſhould be choſen out of their nation, ſince they had peaceably ſubmitted to Romulus, and contributed, as much as the Romans, to the raiſing of the city to its preſent pitch of wealth and power. During theſe diſputes, the ſenators, to prevent anarchy and confuſion, took the ſovereignty into their own hands. The two hundred ſenators divided themſelves into decuries or tens. Theſe decuries drew lots which ſhould govern firſt, and the decury, to whoſe lot it fell, enjoyed the ſupreme authority for five days, yet in ſuch manner, that one perſon only of the governing decury had the badges of ſovereignty at a time. To theſe another decury ſucceeded, each of them ſitting on the throne in his turn, wearing the crown, &c. This form of government, which was called inter-regnum, laſted little more than a year, when the people, growing weary of ſuch frequent change of maſters, obliged the fathers to reſolve on the election of a king. The inter-rex therefore for the time being, having ſummoned the people, addreſſed them thus: Elect yourſelves a king, O Romans; the ſenate gives their conſent; and, if you chuſe a prince worthy to ſucceed Romulus, the ſenate will confirm your choice. The people were ſo well pleaſed with this condeſcenſion of the ſenate, that they remitted the choice to them. But, as the old difficulty ſtill remained, whether the king ſhould be a Sabine

a Sabine or a Roman, this occaſioned long diſputes, till at length they came to this agreement among themſelves, that the Romans ſhould chuſe the king, but ſhould be obliged to elect a Sabine. There was at this time an auſtere Sabine philoſopher, who led a ſolitary life, and was wholly taken up with the worſhip of the gods. His name was Numa Pompilius, and he was the fourth ſon of Pompilius Pompo, an illuſtrious Sabine. He had married Tatia, the daughter of king Tatius, and, together with her, remained in his native country, preferring the tranquillity of a private life to the ſplendor of a court. Upon the death of his wife, with whom he had lived thirteen years, he gave himſelf up entirely to the ſtudy of wiſdom; and, leaving the city of Cures, confined himſelf wholly to the country, wandering from ſolitude to ſolitude, in ſearch only of thoſe woods and fountains, which religion had made ſacred. This gave riſe to the fable, which was very early received among the Sabines, that Numa lived in familiarity with the nymph Egeria (K). This man both the ſenate and people pitched upon to be their king; and without delay, diſpatched Julius Proculus and Valerius Voleſus, two ſenators of diſtinction, to acquaint Numa with their reſolution, and make him an offer of the kingdom. The Sabine philoſopher rejected at firſt their propoſal; but being at laſt prevailed upon by the arguments and entreaties of the deputies, joined with thoſe of his father and of Martius his near relation, he yielded at laſt; and, having offered ſacrifices to the gods, ſet out for Rome, where he was received by all ranks

Numa Pompilius elected to ſucceed Romulus.

(K) Numa's inclination to ſolitude, and his cuſtom of retiring into the ſecret places of the foreſt of Aricia, gave riſe to ſeveral popular opinions. Some believed, that the nymph Egeria herſelf dictated to him the laws, both civil and religious, which he eſtabliſhed. Of this perſuaſion he took advantage, when he was on the throne, to bring about a reformation of Rome. Others, leſs favourable to Numa's reputation, have thought, that, under this affected paſſion for woods and caves, was concealed another, more real and leſs chaſte. This ſeems to have been the opinion of Juvenal, who, in ſpeaking of this grove, known to the Romans by the name of Lucus Egeriæ, or the grove of Egeria, ſays, ranks of people with loud ſhouts of joy. Spurius Vettius, the inter-rex for the day, having aſſembled the curiæ, he was elected in due form, and the election was unanimouſly confirmed by the ſenate [l].

He diſmiſſes the guard of 300 celeres.

THIS king's reign was no-ways memorable for battles or conqueſts; for he made it his chief ſtudy to quiet all contentions at home, to reform the manners of the Romans, and to eſtabliſh good policy in the city. The firſt thing he did was, to diſmiſs the royal guard of three hundred celeres, ſaying, He would not rule over a people, of whom he conceived the leaſt diſtruſt. In the next place, he applied himſelf to quiet the diſſenſions at Rome, to bring all the citizens to a perfect concord and harmony among themſelves, and to moderate the warlike ardour of the Romans, by impreſſions of religion. Plutarch tells us [m], that he had true notions of the deity, that is, of a firſt principle of all things, impaſſible, inviſible, incorruptible, and purely intelligible; and therefore prohibited the repreſenting of God in the reſemblance of man or beaſt. The ſame author adds, that, for the ſpace of one hundred and ſixty years, there were no painted nor graven images in the Roman temples or ſanctuaries. But tho' Numa had, according to Plutarch, right notions of the deity, yet he did not introduce the true worſhip of the Supreme Being; but authorized both the Sabine and Alban ſuperſtitions, introducing only order and decency in the performance of them. With this view he divided the miniſters of religion into eight claſſes, viz. Curiones, Flamines, Celeres, Augurs, Veſtal Virgins, Salii, Feciales, and Pontifices. The Curiones were the particular prieſts of each curia. The Flamines, ſo called from the faſhion or colour of their caps (L), were prieſts, whoſe miniſtry niſtry was confined to ſome particular god, from whom they took their name, as the Flamen Dialis, the Flamen Martialis, &c. The Celeres were inferior miniſters, whoſe duty it was to take care of the ſacrifices, under the direction of the tribunes, who had commanded them when they were guards to Romulus. The Augurs not only foretold future events by the flying of birds, but had many other kinds of divination under their province. The Veſtals were wholly devoted to the goddeſs Veſta, and obliged, under the ſevereſt penalty, to keep the ſacred fire in her temple perpetually burning. The Salii were the guardians of the ancilia, or twelve ſhields, hung up in the temple of Mars. They took their name from their dancing in the celebration of the annual feſtival inſtituted in memory of a miraculous ſhield, which, Numa pretended, fell down from heaven. The buſineſs of the Feciales was to demand ſatisfaction for the injuries Rome received from her enemies, to proclaim war againſt them, in caſe of refuſal, and to take care, that all treaties with the neighbouring nations were faithfully obſerved. The Pontifices (M) were the moſt venerable of all the claſſes; their office was, to give judgment in all cauſes relating to religion, to enquire into the lives and manners of the inferior prieſts, and to puniſh them, if they ſaw occaſion; to regulate the feaſts, ſacrifices, and all other ſacred inſtitutions; to determine what works ſhould be deemed lawful, and what unlawful, on feſtival days. They had a preſident over them, with the title of Pontifex Maximus, whoſe office was one of the moſt honourable in the commonwealth. Some ſay, that Numa reſerved this eminent dignity for himſelf; and others, that he conferred it on his relation Numa Marcius.

(L) Theſe prieſts were firſt called, as Plutarch informs us, Pileamines, from the Greek word πίλος, or the Latin pileus, which ſignified a ſort of cap which was peculiar to them. Others think they took their names from the flame coloured tufts they had on their caps. They were choſen by the people, and inaugurated by the pontifex maximus. The Flamines could not be depoſed but for very great reaſons. Their wives, who were called Flaminicæ, partook of the prieſthood of their huſbands, and ſhared with them the care of the ſacrifices. A Flaminica could not be divorced on any account; and, upon her death, the Flamen loſt his ſacerdotal dignity.

NUMA's view, in thus multiplying the ceremonies of religion, was the more effectually to divert the Romans from from purſuits of ambition and violence of arms. For the ſame purpoſe, or, at leaſt, to put a check to the haſty temper of ſo fierce a people, ever ready, upon the ſlighteſt occaſions, to begin a war, he dedicated a temple to Janus, the ſymbol of prudence, which looks two ways, and examines what is paſt and what may come. This temple was to ſtand open in time of war, and to be ſhut in time of peace. He likewiſe erected an altar to Bona Fides, or Good Faith, in order to bring the republic to be faithful to her treaties; and the private citizens to their private contracts with one another. The ſame ſpirit of equity made him introduce another kind of deities, under the name of Termini, or Boundaries, which he cauſed to be placed on the borders of the Roman ſtate, and of each man's private lands. In honour of theſe deities he inſtituted a feſtival called terminalia, which was annually celebrated on the twenty-ſecond or twenty-third of the month of February. To remove the Dii Termini was deemed a ſacriledge of ſo heinous a nature, that any man might kill with impunity the tranſgreſſor [n].

(M) The word pontifex is by moſt authors derived from pons and facere, the repairs of the bridges, which were deemed ſacred, being committed to the Pontifices. But Plutarch finds fault with this etymology, and tells us, that the word Pontifex was in uſe at Rome before there were any bridges there. He derives it from the word pontis, which, in old Latin, ſignified powerful. Others take it to be a compound of potis and facere, where facere ſignifies to ſacrifice. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of the functions of each claſs of prieſts in the courſe of this hiſtory.

Dedicates a temple to Janus.

THE reformation of religion was followed by an improvement of the laws, in which he had a particular regard to the preſerving of modeſty in women; nevertheleſs he permitted huſbands to lend their wives after they had children by them. This was a kind of temporary divorce in favour of thoſe men, whoſe wives were barren; but the huſbands ſtill continued to have the ſame power over them, and could call them home, or lend them to others, as he pleaſed. He reformed the law made by Romulus, with relation to the power of parents over their children; for he would not ſuffer a father to ſell his ſon after marriage, thinking it unjuſt, that a woman, who married a freeman, ſhould be obliged to live with a ſlave.

Improves the laws.

FOR the encouraging of agriculture, Numa ſhared the lands, which the late king had obtained by conqueſt, among thoſe who had no other occupation, And the better to keep them conſtantly attentive to the improvement of their farms, he diſtributed them into pagi or villages, over each of which he appointed a chief or ſuperintendant, whoſe buſineſs was to keep a watchful eye over the huſbandmen, to encourage hem when diligent, to puniſh them when ſlothful, and to nake a report of the progreſs of agriculture in his diſtrict to the the king, who often advanced the induſtrious huſbandmen to the firſt dignities in the ſtate. By this means the lands were cultivated, and the city diſburdened of the idle ſoldiery, who had been accuſtomed, under Romulus, to live by rapine [o].

Diſtributes the citizens into diſtinct bodies of tradſmen.

BUT the maſter-piece of Numa's policy was, his diſtributing the citizens of Rome into diſtinct bodies of tradeſmen. The city had been hitherto rent into two factions, occaſioned by the union of the Sabines and firſt Romans; and nothing could be more dangerous than ſuch a diviſion of the ſtate, as it were, into two different nations. Numa therefore, to take away all diſtinction of Roman and Sabine, divided all the inhabitants according to their ſeveral trades and occupations, making every profeſſion a particular company and ſociety, and appointing to each their reſpective courts and privileges. In this diviſion the muſicians had the firſt rank, becauſe employed in the offices of religion. The goldſmiths, carpenters, curriers, dyers, taylors, &c. formed alſo diſtinct communities, and were all allowed to make by-laws among themſelves, to have their own feſtivals, particular ſacrifices, &c. By this means the Romans and Sabines, being intermixed in the ſame ſocieties, forgot their party-names, and were brought to an entire union [p].

THE laſt reformation which Numa undertook was, that of the kalendar. Romulus had divided his year into ten months, which, according to Plutarch, had no certain, or equal, number of days, ſome conſiſting of twenty, ſome of thirty-five, and ſome of more [q]. But Macrobius tells us [r], that he ſettled the number of days with more equality, allotting to March, May, Quintilis, and October, one-and-thirty days; to April, June, Sextilis, September, November, and December thirty, making up in all three hundred and four days. Numa was better acquainted with the celeſtial motions, and therefore, undertaking to reform the kalendar, in the firſt place added the two months of January and February. To compoſe theſe two months, he added fifty days to the three hundred and four, in order to make them anſwer to the courſe of the moon; he then took ſix more from the ſix months that had even days, adding one odd day more than he ought to have done, merely out of ſuperſtition

ſuperſtition, to make the number fortunate (N). However, he could get but eight-and-twenty for February; and therefore that month was always counted unlucky. Beſides this, he obſerved the difference between the ſolar and the lunar courſe to be eleven days; and, to remedy the inequality, he doubled thoſe days after every two years, adding an interſtitial month after February, which Plutarch calls in one place Mercidinus [s], and in another Mercedonius [t] (O). As Numa was ſenſible, that the ſolar year conſiſted of three hundred ſixty-five days and ſix hours, and that the ſix hours made a whole day in four years, he commanded, that the month Mercidinus, after every four years, ſhould conſiſt of twen-

(N) The pagans look on an even number as the ſymbol of diviſion, becauſe it could be divided ino two equal parts; whereas an odd number was, for the contrary reaſon, the ſymbol of concord. This prejudice gave birth to a thouſand ſuperſtitious practices, which, in ſome countries, are ſtill kept up by thoſe whom reaſon and religion ought to have undeceived.

(O) Feſtus ſpeaks of certain days, which he calls mercidonii dies, becauſe they were appointed for the payment of workmen and domeſtics. Perhaps the intercalary month was for the ſame reaſon called mercedonius, from the Latin word merces, ſignifying wages. As for the other months, January had its name from Janus; February was ſo called from the expiations, ſignified by the word februa, which were performed in this month; March, the firſt month of Romulus's year, had its name from Mars, his ſuppoſed father; April, from Venus, called by the Greeks Αφοδιτη; May, from Maia, the mother of Mercury, according to Plutarch (47); tho' Macrobius makes the Maia, to whom May was conſecrated, the ſame with Rhea, Ops, or the earth, and different from Mercury's mother (48); Ovid brings it from the word majores or elders (49). June either comes from juventus, becauſe this is the youthful and gay part of the year (50); or is a contradiction of Junonius, and dedicated to the goddeſs Juno (51). The other months had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, and December. Only Quintilis and Sextilis afterwards changed their names into July and Auguſt, in honour of Julius Cæſar and his ſucceſſor Auguſtus.

ty-three days; but the care of these intercalations being left to the priests, they put in or left out the intercalary day and month, as they fancied it lucky or unlucky, and, by that means, created such a confusion, that the festivals and solemn days came, in process of time, to be kept at a season quite contrary to what they had been formerly [u].

Numa dies. NUMA had now reigned near forty-three years, and was in the eighty-second of his age, when he died of a distemper, which gradually wore him away, without impairing the vigor of his mind. During the time of his long reign, peace had so softened the warlike temper of the Romans, that it might be literally said of them, that their weapons were changed into instruments of husbandry. No intestine seditions, no ambitious desires of the throne, not so much as any murmurs against the person of the king, or his administration, appeared among them. When he died, he was as sincerely lamented by the Romans, as if every man had lost his dearest friend or his own father. Strangers, to whom he was equally dear, upon the news of his death, flocked from all parts to Rome, to celebrate his obsequies, bringing along with them perfumes and crowns to be used at his funeral. As he had forbid the burning of his body, it was put into a stone coffin, and buried, pursuant to his own orders, with the greatest part of the books he had writ, at the foot of the hill Janiculus (P); whither he was carried on the shoulders of his

(P) The books, which he ordered to be buried with him, were dug up again four hundred years after his death, and burnt by a decree of the senate. He therein explained his reasons for the novelties he had introduced into the Roman worship. We are indebted to Varro for this account (52). One Terentius, says he, had a piece of ground near the Janiculum; and a husbandman of his, one day accidentally running his plough over Numa's tomb, turned up some of the legislator's books, wherein he gave his reasons, for establishing the religion of the Romans on the foot on which he left it. The husbandman carried these books to the prætor, and the prætor to the senate, who, after having read his frivolous reasons for his religious establishments, agreed, that the books should be destroyed, according to Numa's intentions; and it was accordingly decreed, that the prætor should throw them into the fire. St. Austin thinks there were some footsteps of magic in these books, of which his ſenators, and followed by all the people, who, with tears and lamentations, bewailed the loſs of ſo good a prince. He left behind him but one daughter, named Pompilia, who was married to Numa Marcius, by whom ſhe had Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome [w] (Q).

THE death of Numa was followed by an inter-regnum, which proved very ſhort, Tullus Hoſtilius being unanimouſly choſen by the people, and accepted by the ſenate. Hoſtus, the grandfather of Tullus Hoſtilius, was originally of Medulia, a city of Latium, but had ſettled at Rome about four years after its foundation. There he married the famous Herſilia, or, as others will have it, her daughter, and had by her Hoſtus Hoſtilius, the father of Tullus Hoſtillus (R). Tullus Hoſtilius. Year of the flood 2333. which Numa had been in his life-time ſuſpected. Aurelius Victor aſſures us, that Numa's motives for the religion he eſtabliſhed at Rome, were found to be ſo trivial, that the ſenate thought fit to ſuppreſs them.

(Q) Some writers have given Numa four ſons, who, they ſay, were afterwards the ſtocks of four illuſtrious families. But the common opinion is, that he had only one daughter, named Pompilia; and ſhe is ſaid to have been born to him of a ſecond wife, by name Lucretia, whom he married after his election to the crown. Ancus Martius, his grandſon, was only five years old when his grandfather died; and therefore paſſed by in the next election, as not being of an age fit to govern.

(R) Hoſtus had ſignalized himſelf under Romulus in his wars with the Sabines and Fidenates. He was the firſt who entered the breach at the taking of Fidenæ, and was on that account rewarded by Romulus with a mural crown. This was the reward beſtowed by generals on the perſon who firſt ſcaled the walls of a beſieged city. In the ſecond battle with the Sabines, Hoſtus was killed, and his death occaſioned the flight of the Romans (53). Nevertheleſs he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf, before the Roman army was put to flight, in ſo eminent a manner, that the remembrance of his gallant behaviour was preſerved by an inſcription on a pillar erected on the field of battle (54). As for Hoſtus Hoſtilius, the ſon of Hoſtus and father of Tullus, we find nothing worth mentioning ſaid of him. But Tullus Hoſtilius appeared both to the Roman people and ſenate to

(53) Plin. l. xvi. c. 4.

Tullus began his reign, by diſtributing certain lands, which were the demeſnes of the crown, among ſuch of his ſubjects as had no lands of their own. This act of generoſity immediately gained him the hearts of his people. As he was of a bold and fiery temper, he was more inclined to tread in the ſteps of Romulus than of Numa; and it was not long before he had a favourable opportunity of ſeconding his martial inclination. Cælius, or, as Livy ſtyles him, Cluilius, who was at the head of affairs in Alba, being jealous of the growing greatneſs of Rome, privately commiſſioned ſome of the moſt indigent among his ſubjects to lay waſte the Roman territory, not doubting, but this would ſoon give occaſion to a war between the two nations: nor was he diſappointed in his expectation; for a Roman army, entering the territories of Alba, attacked the robbers, ſlew many of them, and took a great number of priſoners. Cluilius, having now a plauſible reaſon for engaging his people in a war with the Romans, convened an aſſembly; and by exaggerating the loſſes which Alba had ſuſtained, brought them to this reſolution, that an embaſſy ſhould be firſt ſent to Rome, to demand ſatisfaction; and, in caſe they refuſed it, that war ſhould be declared. When the embaſſadors arrived at Rome, Tullus, gueſſing at their errand, made uſe of various pretences to defer giving them audience, and, in the mean time, ſent an embaſſy to Alba, with orders to require ſatisfaction on the part of Rome. A fecialis was at the head of the embaſſadors, who finding Cluilius in the midſt of the public forum, diſcharged his commiſſion, and put him in mind of the antient treaty between the two nations, whereby it was ſtipulated, that they ſhould never make war upon one another, till a reparation of injuries on either ſide had been previouſly aſked in a friendly manner. To this Cluilius anſwered, That he had already ſent embaſſadors to Tullus, but to no effect; and therefore to be poſſeſſed of all thoſe qualifications, which could be deſired in a ſucceſſor to Numa. What ſome hiſtorians ſay of his education, has no appearance of truth (55), viz. that he was brought up in woods, and there kept ſheep, as a common ſhepherd; it being no-ways credible, that one of the firſt and moſt wealthy of the Roman citizens ſhould employ his ſon in that mean office.

fore declared war againſt him. Hereupon the fecialis, calling the gods to witneſs, that the Romans had been firſt refuſed their demands, and that they might therefore declare war without any infraction of the treaty, left Alba, and ſet out for Rome. Upon the return of the Roman embaſſadors, Tullus ſent for the Alban deputies; and being told by them, that their errand was to demand ſatisfaction of him, and, in caſe of a refuſal, to declare war, the king replied, "Go, tell your maſter, "that the king of Rome calls the gods to witneſs which "of the two nations firſt refuſed the other ſatisfaction, "that they may cauſe all the miſeries of this war to fall "upon thoſe who firſt broke the treaty". Thus did Tullus reduce to bare appearances that ſincerity, which his predeceſſor had laboured to eſtabliſh in Rome [x].

The Roman fecialis had allowed Cluilius the ſpace of thirty days before hoſtilities were to begin; which was no ſooner elapſed, than both armies took the field. But when they came in ſight of each other, whatever was the cauſe of it, their ardor cooled, neither party caring to come to an engagement. This inaction raiſed great murmurs in the Alban army againſt Cluilius, as the author of a mock war; inſomuch, that, not being able to bear their reproaches, he reſolved to offer the Romans battle, or, if they declined it, to force their intrenchments. But the next morning he was found dead in his tent in the midſt of his guards, without any ſigns of violence; which occaſioned various conjectures, ſome imputing his death to the friends of Rome, others to the anger of the Gods, who, they ſaid, had thus puniſhed him for beginning an unjuſt and unneceſſary war; but the greater part looked upon it as a common accident, and therefore choſe in his room one Metius Fuffetius, or, as others call him Suffetius, a man no leſs famous for his hatred to the Roman name than Cluilius. He had been one of the chief promoters of the war; but whether he diſtruſted his own ſkill in the management of it, or did not care to venture an engagement, he continued, under various pretences, in the ſame inactivity which he had blamed in his predeceſſor. In the mean time, he received certain advice, that the Veientes and Fidenates were preparing to fall upon both armies, when they ſhould be weakened by a battle.

tle. This intelligence ſtill encreaſed his delays, and he now thought of nothing but coming to a conference with the king of the Romans, and changing the preparation of war into a ſincere reconciliation. With this view he marched out of his intrenchments; and Tullus, not doubting but his deſign was to offer him battle, went out to meet him: but he was greatly ſurprized to find, that the Alban, inſtead of coming to an engagement, demanded an interview. However, he readily granted him his requeſt, and the two commanders came to a parley at the head of their reſpective armies. After reciprocal ſalutations and proteſtations of friendſhip, as if it it had never been interrupted, Fuffetius acquainted the Roman king with the conſpiracy of the Veientes and Fidenates, and produced the letters he had received from his friends in Fidenæ. Tullus acknowledged that he had received the ſame intelligence, which had induced him to keep within his camp, and prevented his undertaking any thing againſt the Albans. Both conſented to end the quarrel in an amicable manner, and expreſſed a willingneſs to unite the two nations; but, in order to make the union more durable and perfect, Tullus propoſed, that all, or at leaſt the chief, families of Alba ſhould remove to Rome; or, in caſe they were unwilling to leave their native city, that one common-council ſhould be eſtabliſhed to govern both cities under the direction of one of the two ſovereigns. Fuffetius took aſide thoſe who attended him, to conſult with them about this propoſal; but they, though willing to come to an union with the Romans, abſolutely refuſed to leave Alba; ſo that the only difficulty remaining was, to ſettle which city ſhould have the ſuperiority. Fuffetius ſpoke in favour of Alba, alledging that ſhe was the metropolis, or mother-city, whereas Rome was but a colony. Tullus urged in behalf of Rome her ſuperiority in wealth and power, and in the cloſe of his ſpeech propoſed to terminate the diſpute by a ſingle combat between himſelf and Fuffetius. The Alban general, not caring to enter the liſts with Tullus, declined this offer, and made a new propoſal, which was, that three champions ſhould be choſen out of each camp to decide the difference; and to this Tullus agreed. The agreement was no ſooner known in the two armies, than it excited a ſtrong emulation among the young warriors, for the honour of being choſen to this important combat.

combat. But while the choice of the champions was yet in ſuſpence, Fuffetius caſt his eyes upon three Albans, whoſe birth had ſomething wonderful in it. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus[y] gives us the following account of it: Sequinius, an illuſtrious citizen of Alba, had two daughters; one he married to Curiatius, a citizen of Alba, and the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome. Theſe two ſiſters were brought to bed on the ſame day, each of three male children, who were now in the flower of their age, and remarkable for their ſtrength and dexterity. The Alban general therefore, imagining that the gods had brought them into the world on purpoſe to determine the fate of their reſpective countries with their ſwords, communicated his thoughts to the king of Rome, and exhorted him to pitch upon the three Horatii, as he had fixed his choice on the three Curiatii. Tullus accordingly propoſed the matter to the Horatian family, but would lay no reſtraint upon them. The three young heroes anſwered, that they could not diſpoſe of their lives without his conſent, from whom they had received them. Old Horatius, the father of the three brothers, was under no ſmall apprehenſion of a combat, wherein much of the blood of his family would be ſpilt; and, as an additional matter of concern, one of his daughters was betrothed to one of the Curiatii. However, the love of his country getting the better of all other conſiderations, he left his children to their own choice; and when he underſtood that they, following the example of the Curiatii, preferred a glorious death or important victory, to an inglorious life, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and, embracing his children, cried out, 'I am a happy father;' and then commanded them todeclare his conſent to the king.

The Horatii and Curiatii.

And now the combat of the Horatii and Curiatii being proclaimed in both camps, Tullus led the former, and Fuffetius the latter, the people ſtrewing the way, as they paſſed, with flowers, and putting garlands on their heads; for they were looked upon as victims, which had voluntarily devoted themſelves for their country. A great plain lying between the two camps was choſen for the place of the combat; and the two kings advanced with their champions and feciales to the middle of it; and, before the engagement began, concluded a treaty, which ſerved as a pattern for moſt of the treaties that were ever after made by the Romans (S). This done, the Roman and Alban champions advanced with a ſlow pace, each towards his antagoniſt. But when the people expected to ſee them engage, they quitted their arms, and flew

(S) Of this treaty Livy give us the following account: Firſt, one of the college of the feciales, named Marcus Valerius, aſked king Tullus, Whether he gave him orders to conclude a peace with the pater patratus of the Albans? The king anſwered, He did. Give me then, replied the herald, the ſign of my commiſſion: this ſign was to be ſome vervein plucked up by the roots. Yes, anſwered the king, bring me ſome vervein that is pure. At theſe words the fecialis went and gathered ſome vervein on a little hill, brought it, and went on thus: "Do you "then appoint me to be fecialis and plenipotentiary of Rome to "the Albans, and engage to protect my equipage and retinue? "Yes, replied the king, ſo far as is conſiſtent with my intereſt, "and that of the Roman people". Then Valerius, the fecialis, appointed Spurius Fuſius to be pater patratus of the treaty, by crowning him with vervein. His office, as ſuch, was to pronounce aloud the words of the oath in the name of the Roman king and people, and to repeat the whole form of the treaty. After this ceremonial, which paſſed only among the Romans, the new pater patratus read the articles of the convention in the preſence of the Albans, and then expreſſed himſelf thus: "Hear, O Jupiter; hear, O pater patratus of the Alban peo-"ple; hear, O Alban people; of theſe articles, as I have "juſt now read them out of thoſe waxen tablets, without fraud "or deceit, and as they have been from one end to the other "clearly underſtood, the Roman people will never be the firſt "violators. If they ſhould violate them, by public authority and "by fraud, may Jupiter at that inſtant ſtrike them, as I ſhall now "ſtrike this victim! May thy ſtroke, great Jupiter, be as "much heavier, as thy power is greater". At which word he killed a ſow, which was to be offered up as a ſacrifice, in confirmation of the treaty, by a blow on the head with a flint. The heralds of the Albans took the like oaths, and alſo offered their ſacrifices (56).

As to the pater patratus, it is not eaſy to determine whether he was a conſtant officer, and chief of the faciales, or only a temporary miniſter elected for the denouncing of war, or making a peace, which were both done by him. Roſinus makes him the conſtant governor or head of the feciales (57); Feneſtella looks upon him as a diſtinct officer (58). Pomponius Lætus and ſlew to embrace one another with all the marks of the moſt tender and ſincere friendſhip. At this moving ſight the ſpectators, not able to refrain their tears, began to complain of their kings, for engaging ſo near and affectionate relations to ſhed one another's blood. But the tenderneſs of the young heroes did not abate their courage: each of them returned to his arms, and choſe his adv rſary. The eldeſt of the Horatii engaged the eldeſt of the Curiatii, and the other two choſe their adverſaries, in the ſame manner, according to their age (T). The noiſe of their arms was already heard at a great diſtance, and the air rung with a confuſed mixture of ſhouts and acclamations from both camps, as either of the combatants appeared to have the advantage. The ſkill and dexterity of the champions kept the victory long in ſuſpence. At length the eldeſt of the Horatii received a mortal wound, and fell. At this ſight the Albans triumphed, and their joyful acclamations threw the Romans into the utmoſt

(59) and Polydore Virgil (60) are of opinion, that he was only choſen by one of the feciales upon ſuch occaſions as we have juſt now mentioned. No perſon was intruſted with this office, but who had a father and a ſon both alive, and therefore pater patratus is no more than a more perfect ſort of father, as they imagined him to be, whoſe own father was ſtill living after he himſelf had been a father for ſome time. That a pater patratus, that is, one, who had both a father alive, and was himſelf father of children ſtill alive, ſhould be always choſe for the above-mentioned purpoſes, was, according to ſome writers, a political law eſtabliſhed by Numa, that king being well appriſed, that a man, who had a father and children alive, would be more inclined to be faithful to his country, and promote the common intereſt. Some think that the pater patratus was ſo called a patrando jurejurando, that is, from the oath he was obliged to take to atteſt the juſtice of his demand. Feſtus ſays, he was ſo called, becauſe by virtue of his commiſſion he acted as pater patriæ, that is, father of his country:

(T) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, by telling us, that the eldeſt of the Curiatii choſe out the eldeſt of the Horatii, and that the other two choſe their adverſaries according to their age, ſeems to inſinuate, that the two ſiſters had each three children, one after another, and at different births; for he plainly ſuppoſes that they were not all of the ſame age. But this difference of age moſt authors explain by the order in which the laws placed twins.

conſternation, which was ſoon after changed into deſpair, when they ſaw the ſecond Horatius, being run through by another of the Curiatii, expire on the body of his brother. But the three Alban brothers were all wounded, and the remaining Horatius unhurt and vigorous. However, not thinking himſelf a match for the three brothers together, he made uſe of a ſtratagem to ſeparate them: he cunningly retreated, as if he fled; and the Curiatii purſuing him, but at unequal diſtances, as their wounds allowed them, the Roman champion turning ſhort upon them, ſlew them all, before one could come up to the aſſiſtance of the other; and big with this victory, ſeized the ſpoils of the vanquiſhed, while the Roman camp reſounded with joyful acclamations in honour of their hero (U). Thus Rome gained the ſuperiority over Alba, her mother city, which Fuffetius acknowledged on the very field of battle, ſaluting king Tullus as his ſovereign, and aſking him what were his commands? Tullus anſwered, I command you nothing, but to keep the Alban youth in a readineſs to march at my orders, in caſe I make war with the Veientes [y].

Horatius kills his own ſiſter.

As Horatius was returning to the city in a ſort of triumph, he was met by his ſiſter, who, ſeeing him loaded with the ſpoils of the three brothers, among which was a military robe, which ſhe had wrought with her own hands for the Curiatius, to whom ſhe had been betrothed, could not forbear tearing her hair, beating her breaſt, and reviling her brother with the moſt provoking and reproachful words, for imbruing his hands in the blood of his relations. Hereupon Horatius, fluſhed with his late victory, and enraged at his ſiſter's unſeaſonable grief killed her upon the ſpot, and went on ſtrait to his father's houſe, who not only approved of the action, but would not allow his daughter to be buried in the ſepulchre of the Horatian family. However, when Tullus returned to Rome, young Horatius was brought by ſome illuſtrious citizens to his tribunal, to take his tryal there. They thought it dangerous to abate the rigor of the laws in favour

(U) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus ſays, that one of the Curiatii was killed in the beginning of the combat; ſo that there were but two Curiatii left to encounter the Horatius, who was conqueror. favour of conquerors; and therefore inſiſted on his being tried, and condemned, if found guilty. Tullus, being divided between his regard for the laws, and the deſire he had to ſave the young Horatius, and foreſeeing he ſhould be cenſured by ſome for condemning, and by others for acquitting the criminal, dextrouſly turned the affair into a ſtate crime, the cognizance of which did not belong to him, but to two commiſſioners, or duumviri, whom the king was to name. As the crime was notorious and not diſowned by the priſoner, the duumviri, without delay, pronounced ſentence againſt him in theſe words: "We judge you to be guilty of "treaſon; go, lictor, and tie his hands." As ſoon as judgment was given, Horatius, by the king's advice, appealed to an aſſembly of the people, by whom the ſentence againſt the criminal was revoked, rather through admiration of his courage, ſays Livy, than for the juſtice of his cauſe. However, that the crime might not go wholly unpuniſhed, Horatius was condemned to paſs under the yoke, an ignominy with which it was uſual to treat priſoners of war, who had cowardly ſurrendered their arms. The king alſo appointed expiations to pacify the anger of the gods provoked by this violation of the laws. Nor was this all; the pontifices erected two altars, the one to Juno, and the other to Janus, which were ſtill remaining in the time of Auguſtus, together with the yoke, known by the name of Sororium Tigillum, under which they made the criminal paſs [z].

Is condemned by the duumviri, but ſaved by the people.

Tullus, mindful of the ſuſpicious behaviour of the Fidenates, during his war with the Albans, cited them to appear before the ſenate of Rome, and anſwer for their conduct. But they, being conſcious of their guilt, and in private intelligence with Fuffetius, who had ſtirred them up under hand, in hopes of ſhaking off the Roman yoke, refuſed to obey, and, in conjunction with the Veientes, took the field. Fuffetius, in compliance with Tullus's orders, joined him with the Alban troops; but the day before the battle he acquainted his principal officers with his deſign, which was to ſtand neuter, till fortune had declared for one ſide, and then join the conqueror. His project was univerſally approved, and all, who were preſent, bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to conceal his deſign and obey his orders. In the mean time, both armies marched out of their intrenchments, and, while while they were in motion, Fuffetius, leaving the place he had been poſted in, retired with his men to a riſing ground. Tullus being appriſed of his deſertion, in that diſtreſs made privately a vow to add twelve prieſts to the college of the Salii, and to build a temple to fear and paleneſs; and then diſſembling his fear, cried out with a loud voice, which was heard both by his own men and by the enemy; Courage, friends, we have conquered; it is by my order, that the Albans are poſſeſſing themſelves of the hill, whence they are to fall down upon the enemy. The confidence of the king inſpired his troops with courage; and the Fidenates and Veientes on the other hand, looking on the inaction of the Albans as ſuſpicious, began to diſtruſt them. And thus the diſcouragement one army was under, and the valour of the other, decided the day. The Roman cavalry fell upon the Fidenates with great reſolution, and obliged them to retire in diſorder to Fidenæ. Tullus, without loſing time in purſuing them, returned upon the Veientes, who, being diſheartened at the defeat of their allies, after a faint reſiſtance betook themſelves to flight, and periſhed for the moſt part either in the Tiber, while they attempted to ſave themſelves by ſwimming, or on the banks of that river by the ſwords of the Romans, who overtook them [a]. Then Fuffetius, coming down from his hill, fell upon the remains of the diſperſed Fidenates and Veientes. But Tullus, concealing his knowledge of Fuffetius's treachery, went privately in the night to Rome to conſult the ſenate, and returned to the camp by break of day. He then detached Horatius, who had conquered the three Albans, with a choſen body of horſe and foot to demoliſh Alba, as had been concerted with the ſenate. While theſe orders were executing, Tullus commanded both the Roman and Alban troops to attend him unarmed; but with private inſtructions to the Romans to bring their ſwords concealed under their garments. When they were all aſſembled, he laid open the perfidiouſneſs and treachery of Fuffetius in a long ſpeech; and in the concluſion ordered him to be faſtened to two chariots drawn by horſes, and to be torn aſunder. His accomplices were all put to the ſword; but the reſt of the Alban ſoldiers were carried to Rome with the citizens, and the chief men among them were even admitted into the Roman ſenate. Others were promoted to the dignity of knights, and all without exception enjoyed the privileges privileges of Roman citizens [b]. Thus fell the city of Alba, famous for its riches, the number of its inhabitants, and above all for being the mother of Rome. This new encreaſe of inhabitants obliged Tullus to enlarge the limits of the city; he took in mount Cœlius, allowing the Albans to ſettle there and built on the ſame hill his own palace. The next ſpring he marched againſt the Fidenates, defeated them in a pitched battle, and having obliged them to ſhelter themſelves within their walls, by cutting off all ſuccours and proviſions, reduced them to ſuch ſtreights, that they ſurrendered at diſcretion. The ring-leaders of the revolt were puniſhed, but the reſt ſuffered to continue in their native city, under the ſame form of government, only dependent upon Rome. So complete a victory procured him the honours of a triumph, in which the ſpoils of the conquered enemy were carried before him as trophies.

Tullus defeats the Fidenates.

As the power and wealth of Rome were much encreaſed by theſe repeated victories and the deſtruction of Alba, Tullus demanded ſatisfaction of the Sabines, who were a very powerful nation for the inſults which had been formerly offered to ſome Roman citizens at the temple of the goddeſs Feronia, which ſtood at the foot of mount Soracte, upon the banks of the Tiber, and was frequented both by the Sabines and the Romans (W). The Sabines, having ſolicited in vain the neighbouring nations to join them, kept themſelves for ſome time on the defenſive only. But at length, being provoked by Tullus, who laid waſte their country, they came to an engagement, which proved ſo bloody, that both nations, terrified with the numbers of their ſlain, retired into their reſpective countries, without attempting any thing more that campaign. The next year the war was renewed with

[b] Dio. Hal. p. 171. Liv. ibid.

(W) The goddeſs Feronia preſided over foreſts, gardens, and orchards, and is thought by ſome to be the ſame with Flora or Proſerpine. Her temple was frequented by the neighbouring nations, who came to pay their homage, and make offerings to the deity, which they worſhipped in common. A fair was kept annually near her temple, and the preceding years ſome Roman citizens had been on that occaſion robbed, and kept in captivity by the Sabines, who refuſed to ſet them at liberty, when demanded by their country, ſaying, that the Romans had uſed them in the ſame manner, by opening an aſylum, and peopling Rome with their fugitives.

with more fury than before. Both armies met in the neighbourhood of Eretum, a town about thirteen miles from Rome, and fought with incredible fury, victory inclining to neither ſide, till Tullus, giving his men new courage, by making a vow to inſtitute on the ſame day a feſtival in honour of Saturn and Ops (X), gained a complete victory. The conquered had no other recourſe, but to implore the clemency of the conqueror; and Tullus, whoſe bare name made them tremble, granted them a peace upon his own terms [c].

Gains a complete victory.

TULLUS, flushed with ſucceſs, ſummoned all the Latin towns, which had been dependent on Alba, to ſubmit to the Roman laws, and follow the fortune of their metropolis. Upon this it was reſolved in a general aſſembly of the Latins held at Feronium, that they ſhould not by any means ſubmit to Rome, but to the utmoſt of their power maintain their antient independency. Two generals were elected by the aſſembly,

[c] Dio. Hal. p. 175.

(X) The feſtivals of Saturn and Ops, or Rhea, were kept in the month of December, under the name of Saturnalia and Opalia, which were, properly ſpeaking, one and the ſame ſolemnity, continued for ſeveral days together. The feſtival appropriated to Saturn was fixed to the ſixteenth of the calends of January, and that of Ops to the fourteenth. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus aſcribes the origin of them to Tullus Hoſtilius's vow. But Macrobius aſſures us, that they were celebrated in Italy long before the building of Rome (61). Servants had at this time a right of being ſerved by their maſters, wearing their cloaths, and reproving them for their faults. In this ſenſe Horace encourages his ſervant to ſpeak his mind freely, applying himſelf to him thus:

Age, libertate Decembri,
Quando ita majores voluerunt, utere: narra (62).

This, according to ſome, was done in memory of the liberty enjoyed in the golden age, before the names of ſervant and maſter were known. Beſides, friends at this time ſent preſents to one another: no war was to be proclaimed, and no offender executed. One day only was kept at firſt, the fourteenth of the calends of January; but the number was afterwards encreaſed to three, four, five, and, ſome ſay, to ſeven days (63).

aſſembly, viz. Ancus Publicius of Cora and Spurius Vecilius of Lavinium, to whom a full power was granted of declaring war or making peace, as they ſhould think fit. However, the Romans did not think it adviſeable to make war upon them in a regular manner; they contented themſelves with making inroads and incurſions, and deſtroying their harveſt. Medulia alone, which had received a colony in Romulus's time, and had now joined the Latins, was taken, and, as was then thought, put out of a condition of ever taking up arms again [d]. Takes Medulia, a Latin city.

SOME years after, the Sabines, thinking themſelves in a condition to repair their antient loſſes, invaded the Roman territories, and dividing themſelves into ſmall parties, overran the whole country. As they met with little oppoſition, they began to entertain thoughts of laying ſiege to Rome. But Tullus, marching out againſt them, defeated them in a pitched battle, and made them once more ſenſible of the ſuperiority of Rome. Defeats the Sabines a ſecond time.

TULLUS, being now advanced in years, fell into ſuperſtition, and was eaſily impoſed upon by ſtories of prodigies and voices from heaven. Sometimes they told him, that it had rained ſtones on the hill of Alba, and ſometimes that a voice from heaven had been heard there, commanding the Albans to reſume their antient ceremonies. The king believed theſe prodigies, and appointed expiatory ſacrifices for nine days, which gave riſe to the cuſtom of employing nine days to appeaſe heaven as often as men were alarmed with prodigies of this kind. As to the manner of his death, authors diſagree; ſome tell us, that he was killed by lightning, with his wife, children, and his whole family (Y); others are of opinion, that he died by the hands of Ancus Marcius, his ſucceſſor, who ſlew him and his whole family, while they were performing a domeſtic ſacrifice, and then ſet fire to the palace His death.

(Y) He is ſaid by ſome to have ſtudied magic, and to have hid himſelf in a private place to perform a magical ſacrifice; but that, omitting ſome part of the neceſſary ceremonies, he ſo incenſed the god, to whom he was ſacrificing, that the enraged divinity ſet his palace on fire by lightning, and deſtroyed his wife and children in the flames (64).

palace to conceal his crime. He died after a reign of thirty-three years, leaving the city greatly encreaſed, but the dominions much the ſame as they had been in the time of Romulus. As he was looked upon as a man ſtruck by the gods, we find no mention in hiſtory of honours decreed to his aſhes or even of the place of his burial.

Ancus Marcius. Year of the flood, 2366. BeforeChriſt 633. Of Rome, 115.

AFTER a ſhort inter-regnum, the people and ſenate unanimouſly choſe Ancus (Z) Marcius, the grandſon of Numa, by his daughter Pompilia and Marcius his relation, the ſon of that Marcius, who perſuaded Numa to accept of the kingdom, and afterwards killed himſelf, becauſe he was choſe

(Z) Every Roman had, generally ſpeaking, three and ſometimes four, names: the firſt was called prænomen, the ſecond nomen, the third cognomen, and the fourth agnomen. The nomen ſhewed the family, from which he was ſprung; the prænomen and cognomen were often nick-names, taken from the circumſtances of the perſon's birth, or his defects, or bodily qualities; and the agnomen was a title of honour; as Africanus, Germanicus, &c. Thus the prince of the Roman orators was called Marcus Tullius Cicero. The prænomen Marcus ſignified that he was born in the month of March; his nomen, or name Tullius, was that of his family, and his cognomen, or ſurname Cicero, alluded to the mark or wart he had in his face, which was like a vetch, called by the Latin cicer. Valerius tells us, that Marcius had the name of Ancus from the Greek word ἀγκων, becauſe he had a crooked arm, which he could not ſtretch out to its full length. We muſt obſerve here, that the ingenui alone, or thoſe, who were free born, were allowed to take three names. Hence Juvenal,

Si quid tentaveris unquam
Hiſcere, tanquam habeas tria nomina, &c. (65).

For the ſlaves in antient times had no name, but what they borrowed from the prænomen of their maſters; as Lucipor, Publipor, Marcipor, that is, Lucii puer, Publii puer, &c. Or the ſlave of Lucius, of Publius &c. When this cuſtom grew out of faſhion, the ſlaves were uſually called by ſome name of their own, which was often taken from their country, as Syrus, Geta, &c. Upon their manumiſſion they took the prænomen and nomen of their maſters; but inſtead of the cognomen made uſe of their former name, as Marcus Tullius Tiro, the freed-man of Cicero. After the ſame manner it was cuſtomary for any foreigner, who had been made free of Rome, to bear the prænomen and nomen of the perſon by whoſe means he had obtained that privilege.

choſe in his room. The new king began his reign, by endeavouring to reſtore the religious ceremonies, which had been neglected in the laſt reign, to their former uſe, and to revive huſbandry, adviſing his ſubjects to lay aſide all ſorts of violence, and to return to their peaceable employments. Notwithſtanding this ſeeming inclination to peace, Ancus in his heart loved war, and was deſirous of the honours of a triumph. However, the love he affected for the arts of peace, gained him the affections of his ſubjects; but at the ſame time drew upon him the contempt of the neighbouring nations. The Latins were the firſt, who made him give way to his martial inclination. Theſe, pretending that their treaty with the Romans was no longer binding, than while king Tullus lived, made inroads into the territories of Rome. Ancus therefore reſolved to be revenged on them; but, out of reſpect to the laws of Numa, omitted no ceremony in declaring war, which that law-giver had appointed (A). He then took the field with an army conſiſting entirely

His war with the Latins.

(A) The ceremonies were as follow: A fecialis was ſent to the Latins, to demand ſatisfaction; he no ſooner arrived on their borders, but he cried out, Great Jupiter, and ye confines of the Latin nation, hearken to juſtice. I come hither with a deputation from the Roman people in all the legal forms; and I demand that credit be given to what I ſay. After this formal declaration, he laid open his demands; and then, calling Jupiter to witneſs the truth of what he ſaid, he purſued thus: If I have unjuſtly and impiouſly made theſe demands, may'ſt thou, great god, never ſuffer me to return to my own country. He repeated theſe words at his entering the Latin territority; then to the firſt perſon he met; afterwards at the gate of the city; and laſtly, in the market-place. If in about thirty days his demands were not ſatisfied, he added to what he had ſaid before; O Jupiter, [illegible], thou Romulus, and all ye gods of heaven, of earth, and of hell, hearken; I call you all to witneſs, that the Latins are unjuſt. We will therefore enter into deliberations at Rome on the proper means of obliging them to give us juſt ſatisfaction. No ſooner was the fecialis returned, but the king referred the affair to the ſenate, addreſſing himſelf, according to the form preſcribed by Numa, to each particular ſenator in theſe words: Say, what think you of the refuſal, which the pater patratus and the whole nation of the Latins have given the pater patratus of the Romans, of reſtoring and granting us what we demanded of them? To which each ſenator gave this anſwer: Let us again demand our rights by

ly of new-raiſed troops, marched to Politorium (B) a Latin city, and made himſelf maſter of the place before the Latins could relieve it. He ſpared the city, and only tranſplanted the inhabitants to Rome, ſettling them with thoſe of Tillena and Ficana, two other cities of Latium, which he likewiſe took, on the hill Aventinus. The next year he retook Politorium, which the Latins had repeopled, and upon his ſecond reduction demoliſhed it entirely. He then laid ſiege to Medulia, a place of great ſtrength, which he took, after having led his troops four years ſucceſſively againſt it. He likewiſe made himſelf maſter of Ficana, deſtroying it with fire and ſword. This city he had taken in the beginning of the war; but, having neglected to demoliſh it, the Latins had poſſeſſed themſelves of it, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that he reduced it the ſecond time. The Latins, enraged, but not diſcouraged, at their loſſes, made great preparations, and took the field, with all the forces they could draw together. But Ancus, having defeated them in a pitched battle, obliged them to ſue for a peace, and triumphed at Rome for the advantages he had gained over them. The Fidenates, Veientes, and Volſci, felt likewiſe the effects of his martial diſpoſition. The Fidenates had revolted a juſt and lawful war. This is the opinion, for which I declare. When the greater part of the ſenators had thus declared their opinion, the war was conſidered as unanimouſly agreed on. Then the fecialis went to the confines of the enemy's country, carrying in his hand a javelin, which was dipped in blood, and either headed with iron, or burnt at the end. When he arrived on the territories of the Latins, he pronounced the following form of words in the preſence of at leaſt three perſons, not under fourteen years of age: On account of the damages which the Latin nation has done the Roman people, and in obedience to a decree made by the ſenate and people of Rome, importing that war be declared againſt the Latins; I and the Roman people declare it, and begin it. At theſe words he threw a dart upon the enemy's lands (66). 'Tis to be obſerved here, that at this time no uſe was made of the king's name or authority; he never being mentioned, but only the ſenate and people.

(B) It is not eaſy to aſcertain the true ſituation of Politorium, Tillena, and Ficana. All we know of them is, that they were all three of them Latin cities, at a ſmall diſtance from each other, not far from the mouth of the Tiber.

revolted during the Latin war; and it was no ſooner ended, than Ancus marched againſt them, and took their city by ſap; this being the firſt inſtance we meet with in the Roman hiſtory of that kind of attack. The king dug a way under-ground from his camp quite under the walls of Fidenæ; and his men, having by that means got into the city without being obſerved, opened the gates to their companions, and put Ancus in poſſeſſion of the place, in which he left a ſtrong garriſon, after having cauſed thoſe to be put to death, who had been moſt active in the revolt. He next marched againſt the Sabines, who had renewed their hoſtilities, defeated their united forces, and granted them a peace upon honourable terms. Over the Veientes he obtained two complete victories, for which a triumph was decreed him by the ſeuate [e].

The Janiculum taken in.

ROME was greatly enlarged in this king's reign; for he not only carried the walls round the Aventine hill, but alſo incloſed the hill Janiculum, which ſtood on the other ſide of the Tiber, and made it a ſort of citadel for Rome. In order to open a communication between the city and the new citadel, he built the bridge Sublicius (C) over the Tiber, where it waſhes the foot of the Aventine hill. He likewiſe made a large ditch, called Foſſa Quiritium, which was no ſmall defence againſt thoſe who came from the plains. And now, the city having received a vaſt encreaſe, Ancus, to ſuppreſs the licentiouſneſs of ſuch multitudes of people, built a large priſon in the Roman forum. But he did not content himſelf with enlarging the city; he likewiſe extended its dominions; for having taken from the Veientes the Meſian foreſt, the territories of Rome reached quite to the ſea, where he built the port and city of

(C) Some writers derive the name Sublicius from the piles on which it ſtood, that being the import of the Latin word Sublica; others from the antient word licio, which ſignifies to join. Neither iron nor copper were made uſe of in building this bridge; both being equally prohibited, if we believe Plutarch, by an antient oracle. The care of keeping it in good repair belonged firſt to the pontifices, and afterwards to the quæſtors. It was the firſt bridge that was built over the Tiber, and perhaps in Italy.

Oſtia built. of Oſtia to ſecure the advantages of trade to his ſubjects. About this town he cauſed many ſalt pits to be dug; and the diſtribution of ſalt, which he made among his ſubjects at this time, gave riſe to thoſe liberalities, called congiaria, from the word congius, a meaſure uſed among the antient Romans. He rebuilt the temple of Jupiter Feretrius after a more ſtately and magnificent manner, and ſpent the latter years of his reign in improving the city and enriching the citizens. He died after a reign of twenty-four years; during which he ſhewed himſelf no-ways inferior to any of his predeceſſors in the arts either of peace or war. Plutarch ſays, he died a violent death, but is therein contradicted by moſt of the antients. Ancus left two ſons behind him, one an infant, the other near fifteen years of age, both under the tuition of Tarquin, not ſuſpecting that a ſtranger, who had lately ſettled at Rome, could gain

Ancus dies. the ſuffrages of the people in competition with his ſon,

An account of Tarquin's family. and place the crown on his own head. Tarquinius was the ſon of a rich merchant of Corinth, who, to ſecure his great wealth from the rapines of Cypſelus, the tyrant of that place, had left his native country, and ſettled in Tarquinii, one of the moſt famous cities of Hetruria. There he married a woman of diſtinction, and had by her two ſons, to whom he gave Hetrurian names, calling the one Arunx, and the other Leucumo. Arunx, who was the eldeſt, died before his father; and though he left his wife with child, yet his father, not knowing it and dying ſoon after, left his whole eſtate to Leucumo, his ſecond ſon. So that the poſthumous ſon of Arunx was diſinherited before he was born; and therefore took the name of Egerius from egere, to want. Leucumo, being now in poſſeſſion of his father's immenſe riches, aſpired to the higheſt dignities in Tarquinii, his wife Tanaquil, who was o a noble extraction, ſtirring up his ambition. But, being looked upon in Hetruria as a ſtranger, he was debarred from riſing to any conſiderable poſt in the country where h dwelt. Rouzed therefore by the reproaches of the aſpiring Tanaquil, he reſolved to remove to Rome, where tw Sabines had been raiſed to the throne, and where perſona merit was the ſureſt and only means of arriving at th

firſt dignities of the ſtate (D). He was no ſooner admitted citizen of Rome, but he endeavoured to appear entirely Roman, changing the prænomen of Leucumo into Lucius, and the nomen, or name, Damaratus, which ſavoured too much of the Greek, into Tarquinius, borrowed from Tarquinii, where he had been brought up. As for the cognomen of Priſcus, or Old, it was not probably given him till after his death, when it was uſed to diſtinguiſh him from the other Tarquin. The polite and engaging behaviour of the Greek, now become a Roman, ſoon gained him the favour of the people, and made him known in the court of Ancus, into whoſe favour he artfully inſinuated himſelf; and left his immenſe riches ſhould create ſuſpicions, in a city which was yet poor, he offered to depoſit them in the public treaſury to ſupply the wants of the public. As he was well appriſed that military exploits were a ſure ſtep to great honours, he not only coutributed to the expences of the war out of his eſtate, but in all expeditions diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner. In the war with the Latins he fought on foot, and againſt the Veientes ſignalized himſelf at the head of the Roman cavalry; ſo that the king, in conſideration of his gallant behaviour, raiſed him to the rank of a patrician and ſenator. As he was no leſs prudent in council, than formidable in arms, he ſhone in the ſenate from his firſt admiſſion into it; and his advice was always followed by the king in military expeditions [f].

TARQUIN, looking upon the death of Ancus as a critical time to attempt mounting the throne, brought on the election with the utmoſt expediton, and cauſed the curiæ to be ſummoned before young Marcius was quite fifteen. For the greater precaution, he took care to keep his pupil out of the ſight of the people during the comitia; and for that purpoſe ſent him into the country on a hunting match. In the mean time, he carried on his intrigues, and gained ſome by money, others by promiſes. He was the firſt who introduced into Rome the cuſtom of ſoliciting for offices, and making intereſt to obtain them, the Romans having till his time concealed from the world the deſire they had of obtaining the higheſt poſts. But the Greek, who was above theſe timorous ſcruples, plainly begged the kingdom in an harangue, which he made to the people, urging the example of Tatius and Numa, the firſt an enemy as well as a ſtranger, and the ſecond wholly unacquainted with the city; whereas he was not only a friend to the Romans, but had ſpent all his riches among them, and was ſo well acquainted with the laws and cuſtoms of Rome, that the late king had employed him in affairs both civil and military of the greateſt conſequence.

Tarquin elected king. Year after the flood, 2390. Before Chriſt 609. Of Rome 139.

Then he cunningly inſinuated his paſt ſervices, and as the people had a high opinion of his merit, they commanded him, for that was the term then uſed, to take upon him the management of public affairs. In the beginning of his reign, to ſtrengthen his party in the ſenate, and reward thoſe who had ſhewn moſt zeal in his election, he created an hundred new ſenators, who were called Senatores Minorum gentium, becauſe choſen out of the plebeian families. However, they had the ſame authority in the ſenate as the other ſenators, and their children were deemed patricians.

His war with the Latins.

His firſt war was with the Latins, from whom he took the cities of Apiolæ, Cruſtuminum, Nomentum, and Collatia. The inhabitants of Apiolæ were ſold for ſlaves; but thoſe of Cruſtuminum and Nomentum, having ſubmited after their revolt, were treated with great clemency. Collatia, which was more obſtinate, met with a more ſevere treatment: the inhabitants were diſarmed, and obliged to pay a large ſum of money. As for the city, he thought he might diſpoſe of it as he pleaſed, and therefore gave the ſovereignty of it to Egerius, his brother Arunx's ſon, who from thence took the name of Collatinus, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity. Corniculum was likewiſe beſieged, taken by ſtorm, and reduced to aſhes. Tarquin's progreſs alarmed the other cites of Latium; ſeveral of them united their forces againſt the common enemy, but they were defeated defeated in a bloody battle near Fidenæ, and obliged to enter into an alliance with the conqueror. Hereupon a national aſſembly of all the Latins being held at Ferentinum, it was reſolved, that they ſhould employ all their ſtrength to oppoſe the torrent that threatened them. Purſuant to this reſolution, they drew together what forces they could, and, having engaged all Sabinia and great part of Hetruria to join them, took the field with a very numerous army. But Tarquin, having defeated the confederate armies in two actions, forced thoſe Latin cities which had refuſed his alliance, to ſue for it, and ſubmit to a ſort of dependence upon Rome [g]. Tarquin, on his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph. The ſpoils he had taken in the conquered cities of Latium, eſpecially in Apiolæ, he employed in building a circus for the Roman games, otherwiſe called the great games (E). The Circus Maximus built.

[g] Dio. Hal. l. iii. p. 188, 189, 190.

(E) As Tarquin was of a Greek family, he was the firſt who thought of building a circus at Rome in imitation of the chief cities of Greece. For the firſt circus we read of was built at Elis, where the olympic games were celebrated, and ſerved as a pattern for all the reſt. Livy aſſures us, that the Roman games were alſo called the great games, but we muſt not infer from thence, that all the ſports, which were celebrated in the circus, and called Circenſes, were the great games. Some were celebrated in the circus in honour of Ceres, Apollo, &c. which were different from the Roman or great games; as were alſo the Megalenſes. For the former were celebrated before the nones of April, and the latter on the eve of the nones of September. Beſides, the great games were celebrated in honour of the great gods; whence they were called the great games; and the latter in honour of Cybele. Laſtly, the great games were inſtituted by Tarquinius Priſcus, and the Megalenſes not till the time of Junius Brutus, who appointed them in honour of Cybele, then called Μεγαλησια, or the great goddeſs. As to the name of circus, which was given to the magnificent ſtructure raiſed by Tarquin, ſome derive it from the word circulus, a circle, part of it being built in that ſhape. Others will have it to have been ſo named, becauſe the chariots, that diſputed the prize, were obliged to run ſeven times round the poſts, which were at each end of it. The poets mention only ſeven rounds, without expreſsly ſaying, whether they were about ſeveral poſts, or one only. But Caſſiodorus tells us in expreſs words, that it was neceſſary to turn round ſeven different poſts. However, it

The place choſe for the circus was the Myrtian or Murtian valley, which reached from the Aventine to the Palatine hill (F).

Tarquin ſubdues the twelve leucumonies of Hetruria.

THE war with the Latins was ſcarce ended, when all Hetruria combined againſt Tarquin, on account of his detaining it is generally thought, that there was but one poſt, round which the charioteers were obliged to drive ſeven times. From this turning round ſome derive the word circus. But Tertullian (68) pretends, that the Roman Circus took its name from Circe, the fabulous daughter of the ſun, and imagines, that ſhe was the firſt who invented the Circenſian ſports, intending by them to repreſent the courſe of the ſun her father, running round the globe of the earth in a chariot drawn by four horſes.

The circus had four fronts; one at the bottom, where the poſts ſtood; one at the oppoſite end, where the chariots ſtarted, and one at each ſide, whence the ſpectators beheld the ſhews. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus tells us, that this circus was three ſtades and a half long, and four jugera broad, and that one hundred and fifty thouſand men could ſit in it at their eaſe. Pliny (69) tells us, that the Roman ſtadium contained ſix hundred twenty five Roman feet, each of which contained twelve inches, or ſixteen fingers-breadths; ſo that the circus, as it was, according to the above-mentioned writer, three ſtadia and a half long, muſt have been two thouſand one hundred and eighty-ſeven Roman feet in length. As it was four jugera broad, each of which contained, according to Pliny, two hundred and forty Roman feet, it is from thence manifeſt, that the circus was nine hundred ſixty Roman feet broad, and conſequently above twice as long as it was wide. So that the length of the circus was ſomewhat more than three Engliſh furlongs. It was called the great circus, either on account of its vaſt circumference, or becauſe the great games were celebrated in it, or, perhaps, becauſe it was conſecrated to the great gods, viz. to Vertumnus, Neptune, Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, and eſpecially to the Dii Penates of Rome, which were in a ſpecial manner called the great gods This circus was extremely beautified and adorned by the Roman emperors, in whoſe times it was enlarged to ſuch a prodigious extent, that it contained in their proper ſeats two hundred and fifty thouſand ſpectators (70).

(F) This valley was ſo called, according to ſome, from a temple erected to a goddeſs of that name at the foot of the Aventine hill. Others ſtyle it Myrtea from a temple built in that place to Venus, ſurnamed Myrtea, becauſe the myrtle was conſecrated to her.

detaining the embaſſadors, whom they had ſent to demand back ſome priſoners of theirs. It was even decreed in a general aſſembly of the twelve leucumonies, that if any city of Hetruria ſtood neuter, it ſhould be for ever cut off from the general alliance. Having by this means raiſed a conſiderable army, they took the field, ravaged the Roman territory, and made themſelves maſters of Fidenæ by the treachery of ſome of the inhabitants. The king did not appear the firſt year in the field, but quietly ſuffered them to go on without oppoſition, chuſing rather to let them triumph for a time, than to encounter them without the neceſſary preparations. The next year he armed all his legions, and, having applied to his allies for ſuccours, took the field early in the ſpring, aud divided his army into two bodies. The Romans he commanded himſelf, and placed his couſin Collatinus at the head of the allies. Collatinus was defeated, while, preſuming too much on his ſtrength, he divided his army to plunder the enemy's country. But the king with his Romans made a more fortunate campaign, having routed the Hetrurians firſt near Veii, and afterwards under the walls of Cære. As Fidenæ was a key to the Roman dominions, Tarquin marched againſt it with all his forces, put the Hetrurian army, that covered it, to the rout, and made himſelf maſter of that important place. Such of the Fidenates, as were ſuſpected to have been concerned in betraying it to the enemy, were whipped to death, and the reſt ſent into baniſhment, and their lands divided by lot among the Roman ſoldiers. Then Tarquin haſtened to fall upon the Hetrurians once more, before the whole ſtrength of the new army they were raiſing could be got together. He came up with them near Eretum, ten miles from Rome, and overthrew them with great ſlaughter; for which victory the ſenate decreed him a triumph [h]. And now the leucumonies, deſpairing of any future ſucceſs againſt the Romans, ſent deputies to the king, with an unlimited commiſſion to conclude a peace upon any terms whatſoever. As Tarquin was naturally inclined to clemency, and followed that inclination when he found it noways prejudicial to his ambition, he granted them a peace without inſiſting upon any other condition than their owning his ſovereignty over them. The Hetrurians readily agreed to this, and, in proof of their accepting the king of Rome for their ſovereign, ſent him all the enſigns of royalty, which were in uſe among them, viz. a crown of gold, a throne of ivory, a ſceptre with an eagle on the top of it, a tunic embroidered with gold and adorned with figures of palm-branches (G), and a purple robe enriched with

(G) This the Latins called Tunica Palmata, which we ought to diſtinguiſh from the Tunica Picta. The former was not, properly ſpeaking, a long hanging robe, but rather a veſt, which was partly hid under the robe. It had at firſt no ſleeves, and afterwards but very ſhort ones. As all the Romans wore tunics, they ſhewed the difference of their rank by that of their tunics. Some ſewed upon theirs purple flowers, which were ſtuck on like the heads of nails; and hence came the word Laticlavium. Only the chief magiſtrates, ſenators, and generals of the army, were allowed to wear theſe. The inferior magiſtrates, the Roman knights, and ſome other officers in the army, wore indeed tunics with purple flowers; but theſe flowers were ſmaller than the others; and from thence comes the name Angusticlavium. Thoſe who triumphed, inſtead of embroidered flowers, wore purple palm-branches upon their tunics or tunicæ palmatæ. As to the Toga picta, ſome think it was a robe common among the Romans, only of a purple colour: and as to the robe in general, it was nothing but a very long mantle hanging in great folds quite down to the ground, which they put upon their right ſhoulders, throwing one lappet of it over the left. The robes of the ſenators were adorned with great purple flowers, as well as their tunics; and thoſe of the knights with ſmaller. The robes of thoſe who triumphed were probably adorned with palm-branches, as well as their tunics. At leaſt, it is certain, they were made of rich ſtuffs, and were called togæ pictæ. Two peſons only had ever the priviledge of wearing them out of a triumph, viz. Paulus Æmilius and Pompey.

We have followed here the moſt common opinion with relation to the Laticlavium and Angusticlavium, about which critics are ſtrangely divided. Some are of opinion, that the clavi were a kind of flowers interwoven in the cloth; others will have them to be the buttons or claſps by which the tunic was held together. A third ſort pretend, that the Latus clavus was nothing but a tunic bordered with purple. Scaliger thinks the clavi did not belong to the veſt, but hung down from the neck, like chains and ornaments of that nature. Rubenius endeavours to refute all theſe conjectures, and to prove that the clavi were no more than purple lines or ſtreakes in the middle of the garment. According to that author they did not receive the name of clavi, as an immediate alluſion to the heads of nails, to which he ſays, they bore no reſemblance, but were ſo called from their being with flowers of ſeveral colours. However, Tarquin deferred wearing theſe ſtately ornaments, till ſuch time as the people and ſenate had conſented to it by an expreſs law. He then applied theſe regalia to the decoration of his triumph, and never after laid them aſide. In his triumph he appeared in a gilt chariot drawn by four horſes, cloathed in a purple robe and a tunic embroidered with gold, attended by twelve lictors, with their axes and faſces, with a crown on his head, and a ſceptre in his hand. Thus ended the war with the Hetrurians, after it had laſted nine years.

His triumph.

TARQUIN having now an interval of reſt from his wars, applied all his thoughts to the beautifying, cleanſing, and fortifying of the city. He built the walls of Rome with hewn ſtone, and thoſe famous common-ſewers, which have been ſince looked upon as one of the wonders of the world (H). He likewiſe adorned the forum, ſurrounding being of a different colour from the reſt of the garment. For the Romans, ſays that writer, uſed to inlay their cups, and other precious utenſils, with ſtuds of gold, or other ornamental materials. Theſe, from their likeneſs to nail-heads, they called in general clavi. So that it was very natural to bring the ſame word to ſignify theſe lines of purple, or other colours, which were different from all the reſt of the garment, as thoſe clavi were of a different colour and figure from the veſſels, which they adorned. A modern critic, of no mean character (71). tells us, that the clavi were nothing elſe but purple galoons, with which they bordered the fore-part of the tunic on both ſides in the place where it came together. The broad galoons, ſays he, made the Laticlavium, and the narrow the Angusticlavium. As to the name of clavi, he thinks the antients gave that name to any thing that was made with a deſign to be put upon another.

(H) Pliny, who did not examine them till near eight hundred years after they were built, could not ſpeak of them without admiration (72). Rome contained at that time four hills within its compaſs, viz. Palatinus, Tarpeius, Quirinalis, and Cœlius. In the vallies between theſe hills the rain-water and ſprings uniting, formed great pools, which laid under water the ſtreets and public places. The mud likewiſe made the way impaſſable, infected it with galleries, in which were ſhops for tradeſmen, and building temples in it with ſchools for the youth of both ſexes, and halls for the adminiſtration of public juſtice.

His war with the Sabines.

THE king had ſcarce ended theſe works, when he engaged in a war with the Sabines, under pretence that they had aſſiſted the Hetrurians. Both armies took the field, and came to an engagement on the confines of Sabinia, which laſted the whole day without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide; inſomuch, that the generals, ſtanding in awe of each other, retired to their reſpective camps, and ſoon after returned home, without attempting any thing elſe that campaign. Tarquin employed the winter in making the neceſſary preparations againſt the next year. He conſidered, that he had been often prevented from purſuing the advantages of a victory for want of horſe. For though the infantry was very numerous, the cavalry continued on the ſame foot, on which Romulus had left it. He therefore reſolved to add ſome new bodies of knights to thoſe of the firſt inſtitution. In any ſtate leſs ſuperſtitious than that of the Romans, this deſign would have been put in execution without any diſpute. But in Rome the innovation, which Tarquin had a mind to introduce, met with great oppoſition. As the firſt diviſion of the horſe into three bodies had been determined by auguries. Actius Nævius, the moſt famous augur infected the air, and rendered the city unhealthy. This prompted Tarquin to undertake the cleanſing of the city from its filth, by conveying off the waters through ſubterraneous canals into the Tiber. He made all the arches of theſe common-ſewers of hard ſtone, and ſpared neither expence nor labour to make the work durable. Their height and breadth were ſo conſiderable, that a cart loaded with hay could eaſily paſs through them under-ground. But what moſt encreaſed the difficulty of the work, was the conveying of the waters, which through theſe ſewers were to carry off the filth, into the Tiber. It was neceſſary to cut through hills, and under the city through rocks, a channel large enough for a navigable ſtream and covered with arches ſtrong enough to bear the weight of houſes, which were often built upon them, and ſtood as firm as on the moſt ſolid foundations. The expence of this great work was never ſo well underſtood, as when it came to be repaired. For the cenſors gave no leſs than a thouſand talents to the perſon who undertook the cleanſing of it.

augur of that time, obſtinately withſtood the king's will, and took upon him the defence of Romulus's inſtitution. Tarquin could not perſuade himſelf, that the augur was ſerious in his oppoſition; and therefore commanded him to be brought into his preſence, fully reſolved to confound and diſcredit the diviner in the art, which ſuperſtition maintained to the diminution of the royal authority. As ſoon as Nævius appeared before Tarquin, in the midſt of the forum, and in the ſight of all the people; "Canſt thou diſcover by thy "art, diviner," ſaid the king, "whether what I am think-"ing of can be done, or not? Go and conſult thy birds." The augur did as he was ordered, and returning quickly, anſwered with great compoſure; "Yes, Tarquin, my art "tells me, that what you are thinking of may be done." Upon this the king, pulling out a razor from under his robe, and taking a flint in his hand, replied with a contemptuous ſmile; "I was thinking whether it was poſſible to "cut this flint with this razor. I have taken thee in thy "own craft; the introducing of the gods into thy deciſions "is all cheat and impoſture. If thou canſt perform what "is impoſſible, do. At theſe words the people burſt out a laughing. But Nævius, without diſcovering the leaſt ſurpriſe, addreſſed the king with an air of aſſurance, and ſaid "Put the razor to the flint, and try; I readily ſubmit "to any puniſhment, if you don't do what you thought "on." The king did as he was directed, and ſaw, to his great ſurprize, the flint give way to the edge of the razor, which cut through it with ſo much eaſe, that it reached the king's hand, and drew blood from it [i]. Livy ſays, that Nævius took the flint into his own hand, and cut it in Tarquin's preſence [k]. Be that as it will, the people teſtified their ſurpriſe by loud acclamations; and Tarquin, turning his contempt for augury into admiration, laid aſide his project of encreaſing the number of the corps of horſe, and contented himſelf with augmenting the number of the knights of each corps, making the Roman cavalry amount in all to eighteen hundred men. From this time no determination was made, either in the camp or city, without the approbation of the augurs. As for Nævius, Tarquin erected a ſtatue of braſs to his memory in the comitium, which continued there till Auguſtus's time. The razor and and flint, which were kept as monuments of the miracle, were buried near it, under an altar, at which witneſſes were afterwards ſworn in civil cauſes. This event, tho' related with ſo many circumſtances, atteſted by all the writers of the Roman hiſtory, and adopted by ſome of the fathers of the church, who impute it to magic, is without all doubt a mere fabulous invention, and was looked upon as ſuch by Tully, who, though himſelf an augur, writes of it thus: "Look with contempt (he ſpeaks to his brother "Quintus) on the razor and flint of the famous Attius; "when we reaſon as philoſophers, we ought to lay no "ſtreſs upon fables [1]."

Tarquin renews the war with the Sabines.

TARQUIN early in the ſpring took the field againſt the Sabines, who, having received conſiderable reinforcements from Hetruria, were beforehand with him, and had encamped near the conflux of the Anio and the Tiber. The Hetrurians were poſted on one bank of the Tiber, and the Sabines over-againſt them on the other. The confederate armies had a communication by a bridge of boats; and this Tarquin, who had encamped on a hill near the banks of the Anio, found means to ſet on fire, by ſending down the river flat-bottom'd boats, loaded with dry wood, ſulphur, and roſin. The Sabines haſtened to extinguiſh the flame, leaving, as is very frequent on ſuch unforeſeen and ſudden accidents, their camp unguarded. Then Tarquin, laying hold of this opportunity, attacked, and made himſelf maſter of it; while a detachment, which he had ſent out, having paſſed the Tiber in the night, came and fell ſuddenly on the camp of the Hetrurians. The enemy being thus attacked on both ſides, betook themſelves to flight, and in that confuſion periſhed, ſome by the flames, ſome by the ſword, and others by leaping into the river. By this means the arms of the enemy, which came floating down the ſtream, brought the news of the victory to Rome before the arrival of the couriers diſpatched by the king. After this victory, Tarquin, without allowing the enemy any reſpite, entered the territory of the Sabines; who, having with incredible expedition drawn together another army faced him a ſecond time; but being once more routed with great ſlaughter, they had at laſt recourſe to the clemency of the conqueror, and ſued for peace; but Tarquin did not think fit to grant them more than

than a truce, which was no ſooner expired, than they paſſed the Anio, and made incurſions on the Roman lands. Hereupon Tarquin, leaving the city, fell upon the free-booters, and having taken their booty from them, encamped with the few forces he had then with him over-againſt the enemy, while the reſt of the army haſtened after him. The Sabines, whoſe courage was not in the leaſt abated by their former misfortunes, did not fail to offer him battle; and the king, as ſoon as he was joined by the forces he expected, accepted the challenge. As the Sabines were no-ways inferior to the Romans, either in numbers or bravery, the victory continued doubtful, till a body of horſe, which Tarquin had detached before the battle, having taken a great compaſs, fell unexpectedly on the enemy's rear in the heat of the action. Then the Sabines, ſeized with a ſudden panic, betook themſelves to diſorderly flight. Few of them reached the neighbouring cities, their retreat being cut off on one ſide by the main body of the Roman army, and on the other by the detachment of horſe. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſwords of the conquerors, fled to their camp, which, though well fortified, was attacked and taken, almoſt without reſiſtance, by the Romans. Thus ended this campaign. The next year, the Sabines, having choſen a more experienced commander, appeared early in the field, but declined a battle. Tarquin, not thinking it ſafe to attack the enemy's camp, ſurrounded it on all ſides; and, by cutting off their communication with the neighbouring country, reduced the Sabines to the utmoſt extremity. The Romans looked upon them as a ſure prey; but the Sabine general, taking advantage of a dark and ſtormy night, marched his army out of it's entrenchments, and, without being obſerved, got out of the enemy's reach, leaving only in the camp ſome wounded men and a few cattle[m]; and thus the campaign ended.

THE next year, the Romans and Sabines appeared anew in the field, as ſoon as the ſeaſon was fit for acting, and having encamped over-againſt each other, the two generals agreed to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle. As Tarquin had divided his army, which was very numerous, into three bodies, he commanded the Romans himſelf, put his nephew Arunx at the head of the Hetrurians, and gave the the command of the Latins and other allies to Servius Tullius, a foreigner, who from a ſlave was become a Roman citizen. The two armies engaged with the utmoſt fury, and fought the whole day with equal intrepidity and reſolution; but in the end the Romans gained the victory, after Tarquin had inſpired his men with freſh courage, by making a vow to build a magnificent temple in honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. The Sabines being routed and diſperſed, Tarquin entered their country, which now lay open to him; and having plundered their lands and open places, returned to Rome, loaded with booty and crowned with freſh glory. During the winter he made the neceſſary preparations for the beſieging of their fortified places, which was to be the work of the next campaign.

The Sabines ſubdued.

But in the mean time, the Sabines, deſpairing of ſucceſs, humbled themſelves ſo far as to ſend deputies to Tarquin, offering to put him in poſſeſſion of all their ſtrong-holds upon honourable conditions. The king treated them as favourably as he had done the Hetrurians, delivered up to them their priſoners without ranſom, and having taken poſſeſſion of their country, returned to Rome, and entered the city in triumph [n].

TARQUIN, being now advanced in years, thought only of enjoying the ſweets of repoſe, after his great labours and continual victories. However, mindful of the vow he had made to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, he levelled the top of the hill Tarpeius, marked out the plan of the temple, and laid the foundations of that glorious ſtructure, which afterwards became the principal place of the Roman worſhip. And now the celebrated Nævius appeared again upon the ſtage. This augur, being conſulted about what part of Rome Jupiter would like beſt, declared for the hill Tarpeius, formerly Saturnius. But when they came to conſecrate the area, a difficulty aroſe about removing the gods, who had already altars on the hill, without giving them offence. By the help of augury all theſe gods were conſulted, and found willing to be removed, except the god Terminus and the goddeſs Youth, who inſiſted upon not being diſplaced, and were conſequently incloſed within the walls of the temple, which was afterwards conſecrated to Jupiter, his wife Juno, and his daughter Minerva. Not long after Nævius

Nævius diſappeared; and as the manner as well as the author of his death were utterly unknown, the ſons of Ancus Martius endeavoured to fix the calumny on the king, and by that means ſtir up the people againſt him. But their accuſation being found groundleſs, the ſons of Ancus were deteſted for having calumniated their king, and delivered up to him by the incenſed multitude. Tarquin, who was naturally inclined to mercy, pardoned them, in conſideration of the favours he had received from their father. Motives of religion prompted him to be more ſevere on a proſtitute veſtal, by name Pinaria, whom he condemned to be buried alive. As this is the firſt inſtance we meet with of this kind of puniſhment, Tarquin is thought to have been the author of it. It was ever after inflicted on ſuch of thoſe prieſteſſes as diſhonoured their conſecration. However, the king did not ſhew leſs eſteem to the college of the veſtals, but on the contrary added two to their number, and encreaſed it to ſix °.

The ſons of Ancus conſpire the death of Tarquin.

As Tarquin was now about eighty years of age and drew near his end, the ambition of the ſons of Ancus grew daily more active. They had not forgot the arts, by which Tarquin had ſecured to himſelf their father's kingdom, and had long watched an opportunity of ſeizing it for themſelves. But finding it impoſſible to put their deſign in execution, they lived quietly under the government of Tarquin, till ſuch time as he began to take proper meaſures for the continuing of the crown in his family, by marrying one of his daughters to Servius Tullius. Then they ſet no bounds to their reſentment, but reſolved to put the king to death, before the intereſt of his ſon-in-law was well eſtabliſhed among the people. The method they took for the execution of their deſign was this: They hired two young men, who dreſſing themſelves like peaſants, with hatchets on their ſhoulders, as if they were wood-cleavers, began a feigned quarrel near the king's palace. Many of the conſpirators crouded about them under pretence of putting an end to the diſpute, which ſtill continued, till they got to the gate of the palace. Then they called out on the king for juſtice, and were brought before him by the officers of the court. At firſt they began to bawl and rail at each other, till they were reſtrained reſtrained by a lictor, and ordered to ſpeak by turns. Then one of them began to tell his ſtory, and while the king was wholly intent on what he ſaid, the other gve him a great blow on the head with his hatchet, and, leaving his weapon in the wound, fled with his companion out of the palace. But while ſome of the king's attendants haſtened to his aſſiſtance, others, purſuing the aſſaſſins, ſeized them. When they were put to the torture, they confeſſed that they had been employed by the ſons of Ancus. Queen Tanaquil, who had courage and wiſdom above her ſex, did not loſe her preſence of mind even at the ſight of her dying huſband. She immediately commanded the palace to be cleared of the crowd, and gave ſtrict orders, that no perſon whatſoever ſhould be admitted within the gates. Then ſhutting herſelf up in the apartment of the expiring king, with her ſon-in-law Servius Tullius, his wife, and Ocriſia his mother, ſhe encouraged Servius to aſcend the throne. She then opened the window which looked into the ſtreet, where this ſudden accident had brought the people together; and, with an air of aſſurance, told them, that the wound was not deep; that the king was ſtunned with the ſudden blow, but was come to himſelf again, and hoped to have the pleaſure of ſeeing his people again very ſoon; but, in the mean time, ordered them to obey Servius Tullius, who would adminiſter juſtice to them, till the king was perfectly recovered. This wiſe diſſimulation of Tanaquil had all the ſucceſs ſhe could expect from it. The ſons of Ancus, believing that the king was ſtill alive, went of their own accord into baniſhment; ſo that the plot which perhaps would have ſucceeded, had the people ſeen Tarquin dead, was quite defeated, upon their believing that he was ſtill alive. The ſecond day after the murder of Tarquin, Servius Tullius heard cauſes from the throne in the royal robes, and attended by the lictors. But as he pretended only to ſupply the king's place, when any difficult caſe occurred, he promiſed to report it to the king. As he thought it incumbent upon him to enquire into the wicked attempt upon the king, and revenge it, he cited the ſons of Ancus to appear before his tribunal; and upon their non-appearance cauſed them to be declared infamous, and their eſtates to be confiſcated. After he had thus managed affairs for ſome time, and by his prudent adminiſtration gained the hearts of the people, the death of Tarquin quin was publiſhed, as a thing recent, with great lamentations in the palace; and Servius, after having performed his obſequies with great pomp, appeared in public with a ſtrong guard and all the marks of royalty, without waiting for the election either of the ſenate or people [p]. Livy indeed tells us, that he took poſſeſſion of the kingdom with the conſent of the ſenators. But as he was not duly elected, the people looked upon him rather as governor, than king, of Rome [q].

Servius Tullius. Year after the flood, 2427. Before Chriſt, 572. Of Rome 176.

THE moſt probable account authors give of the birth and education of Servius Tullius, is, as follows: He was the ſon of Ocriſia, a native of Corniculum, who was made captive by the Romans at the taking of that place. But who his father was, is uncertain. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus tells us, that one Tullius an officer of royal extraction, who was killed in the defence of his country, was the huſband of Ocriſia, whom he left with child at his death. Tarquin made a preſent of this beautiful captive to his queen Tanaquil, who, being appriſed of her extraction and taken with her polite behaviour, reſtored her to her antient freedom. But as her ſon was born while ſhe was ſtill in a ſtate of ſlavery, the name of Servius was added to that of Tullius, which he received from his father. This is Dionyſius's account [r]. But Plutarch pretends, that Ocriſia was very young when ſhe was carried into captivity, and that ſhe was afterwards married to one of Tarquin's clients, by whon ſhe had Servius [s]. Some have given this prince a divine origin, and made him the ſon of Vulcan, or at leaſt of the Lar, or houſhold god, of Tarquin's palace. Perhaps by the god of the royal palace they meant Tarquin himſelf. But however that be, it is certain, that Tarquin ſhewed all the tenderneſs of a father for Servius and took particular care of his education. Tanaquil, who was no leſs fond of him than her huſband, in order to gain him the greater veneration and eſteem among the people, with what political view is not known, ſpread the following report, which the credulous people believed; viz. that a ſudden flame, in form of a crown, ſurrounded the head of Servius, while he was a child and aſleep in her apartment [t]. However, notwithſtanding the great favour ſhewn ſhewn him by the king and queen, it was chiefly by an uniform and wiſe conduct, that he raiſed himſelf to the throne. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the army by his gallant behaviour; and his extroardinary abilities in council ſo gained him the eſteem and affection of the people, that he was unanimouſly raiſed to the rank of a patrician and a place in the ſenate. The king then married him to an illuſtrious Roman lady, by name Gegania; and upon her death, as his merit and fame daily encreaſed, Tarquin thought it no diſhonour to his family to give him his daughter Tarquinia in marriage. From this time the court ſet no bounds to the favours they beſtowed upon him. The king repoſed an entire confidence in him, truſting him with the management both of his domeſtic concerns and the affairs of the republic; in which latter he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that the people were no leſs ſatisfied with his conduct, than with the king's; and this, upon the death of his father-in-law, paved him the way to the throne.

The honours he pays to the goddeſs Fortune.

As Servius, notwithſtanding his ſuperior merit, looked upon himſelf as chiefly indebted to fortune for his grandeur, he erected an incredible number of temples and altars to her under the names of Fortuna Primigenia, Fortuna Obſequens, Fortuna Privata, Fortuna Virgo, Fortuna Virilis, &c. As he propoſed Numa for his pattern, and deſigned to eſtabliſh as much order in the civil, as that wiſe prince had done in the religious, polity of Rome, to gain himſelf reſpect from the people, he pretended to have a private correſpondence with the goddeſs Fortuna, as Numa had had with Egeria [u]. However, the beginning of his reign was not without diſturbances and diſſenſions. The ſons of Ancus Marcius had a ſtrong party among the patricians, who thought it beneath them to be governed by a man born in ſlavery. Beſides, it had been hitherto cuſtomary in Rome not to proceed to the election of a king, till after an inter-regnum; and this order, eſtabliſhed ever ſince Romulus's time, Servius had broken through, taking the power into his own hands, without the order or conſent of the people. Complaints of this nature were at firſt dropped, as it were accidentally, in private aſſemblies; but at laſt brought on an almoſt general conſpiracy. The ſenators agreed among themſelves to force the new king, the firſt time they aſſembled, to lay lay down his authority, to eſtabliſh an inter-regnum, and then to proceed to the free election of another king. Servius, in this emergency, made it his ſtudy to gain the people, and make uſe of them againſt the ſenate. As he was therefore a man of great eloquence, inſtead of calling the ſenate together, he aſſembled the people, and placing one of the two grandſons of the late king on each ſide of him, made an artful and moving ſpeech to the multitude, entreating them to be joint guardians with him of the off-ſpring of a prince, whoſe memory ought to be dear to them, and promiſing to protect the people againſt the patricians, to pay all their debts, and to divide the lands taken from the enemy among them. Nor were his promiſes empty words; a few days after he commanded all thoſe who were in debt, to ſend him an account of their debts and the names of their creditors; and opening compting-houſes in the forum, paid there all the debtors bills with his own money. Nor was this all; he publiſhed an edict, commanding all thoſe who had uſurped lands belonging to the public, to quit them at an appointed time, and ordered the Roman citizens, who had no lands of their own, to petition for them. In ſhort, he revived many of the laws of Romulus and Numa, which diſuſe had aboliſhed, and made ſeveral new ones in favour of the common people, who were in many things put upon an equality with the ſenators and patricians [w].

He defeats the Hetrurians.

THOUGH Servius was naturally more inclined to works of peace than to military exploits, yet he found himſelf obliged to embarque in a long war with the Veientes and the reſt of the Hetrurians, who had ſhaken off the yoke, pretending, that their obligations to be ſubject to Rome, were dead with Tarquin, who had ſubjected them. But Servius, taking the field, ſoon ſubdued them anew, and depriving them of their lands, transferred the property of them to ſuch of the new citizens of Rome as had yet no lands of their own. For this victory he obtained, by the favour of the people, in ſpite of the ſenate, the honours of a triumph, and entered Rome with all the pomp, which Tarquin had introduced in ſuch public ſhews [x].

SERVIUS, now finding the people entirely attached to his intereſt, reſolved to take advantage of their preſent favour, to render his title to the throne leſs diſputable. Accordingly, he aſſembled the citizens, and in a moving ſpeech, which drew tears from their eyes, complained of a deſign formed by the patricians to take away his life, and to bring back the ſons of Ancus; and this for no other reaſon but becauſe he was too kind to the common people. In the cloſe of his ſpeech, he left the kingdom to their diſpoſal, begging them to determine between him and his pupils on one ſide, and their competitors on the other. He had no ſooner ended his ſpeech, than he came down haſtily from the tribunal, in order to leave the aſſembly; but they even uſed violence to ſtop him, entreating him to be their king, and encouraging him not to fear the plots of his enemies. Then ſome whom the king had diſperſed among the multitude for that purpoſe, cried with a loud voice, 'Let the curiæ be aſſembled without delay, that 'we may elect Servius to be our king.' In the mean time the prince, though at the bottom of the whole intrigue, affected to act only in compliance with the inclination of the people. 'I am glad' ſaid he, 'to find you have 'gratitude for the good offices I have done you. You 'may' continued he, with an air of indifference 'do 'juſt as you pleaſe.' Accordingly, a day was appointed, and Servius elected by the curiæ by a greater unanimity than any of his predeceſſors [y]. However, as the ſenate, whoſe faction was formidable, could never be brought to confirm the election, Servius deliberated with himſelf, whether he ſhould not renounce the dignity conferred on him by the people. But having imparted his uneaſineſs and perplexity to Tanaquil, ſhe removed his apprehenſions, and even prevailed upon him to take an oath, whereby he engaged never to reſign the crown. This great queen died ſoon after, and Servius omitted nothing that could contribute towards tranſmitting the remembrance of her noble actions to poſterity. To immortalize her domeſtic virtues, the true glory of a woman, he hung up her diſtaff in the temple of Hercules [z].

He is legally elected by the Curiæ.

Servius ſoon after his election marched againſt the rebellious Hetrurians, reduced them, and was on that account honoured with a ſecond triumph. After this victory he applied all his thoughts to the adorning and enlarging of the city. To the hills Palatinus, Tarpeius, Quirinalis, Cœlius, lius, Aventinus, he added the Eſquilinus and Viminalis, incloſing them within the limits of the city, and fixing his own palace on the Eſquilinus, in order to draw inhabitants thither. He likewiſe added a fourth tribe to the three originally eſtabliſhed by Romulus, calling it Tribus Eſquilina. The public impoſts and taxes were raiſed by laying a certain ſum on every tribe, and hence the public ſubſidies were called tributes; and thoſe who commanded the tribes in war, were from them named tribunes, though that name was afterwards given to ſeveral ſorts of magiſtrates. The law which obliged each inhabitant to continue in the tribe in which he was born, eſtabliſhed great regularity in levying both the militia and the taxes. Servius made likewiſe a law, that a piece of money ſhould be paid upon every death, into the temple of the goddeſs Libitina, who preſided over funerals; another into the temple of Juno Lucina, upon every birth; and another into the temple of Youth, as ſoon as any perſon was paſt the ſtate of childhood. By this means the number of Roman citizens were known, eſpecially of ſuch as were able to bear arms. No regard had hitherto been had at Rome to ſlaves; but Servius, perhaps to do honour to his firſt condition, extended his care even to them, ordering little wooden oratories to be erected in all the croſs-ways of the ſeveral quarters of the city; theſe he conſecrated to the Dii Compitales, or gods of the croſs-ways, and appointed ſlaves only to be prieſts of theſe gods, who had their particular feſtival, on which maſters gave their ſlaves reſt from all labour, and by this act of humanity gained their good-will.

Adds a fourth tribe to the three old ones.

Inſtitutes the Compitalia.

THAT an equal order might be eſtabliſhed in the country, as well as in the city, the king divided the whole Roman territory into diſtinct tribes, commanding, that there ſhould be at leaſt one place of refuge in each tribe, ſituated on a riſing ground, and ſtrong enough to ſecure the effects of the peaſants, in caſe of a ſudden alarm. Theſe ſtrong-holds he called 'Pagi,' that is, 'villages,' and commanded that each of them ſhould have their peculiar temple, tutelary god, and magiſtrates. Each of them had likewiſe their particular feſtival, called paganalia, when every perſon was to pay, into the hands of thoſe who preſided at the ſacrifices, a piece of money, the men of one kind, the women of another, and the children of a third.

Divides the Romans into tribes.

By this means an exact computation was made of the men, women, and children in each tribe [a].

Marries his two daughters to the grandſons of the late king

IN the mean time his two wards, Lucius Tarquinius and Aruns, the grand-children of Tarquin being grown up, in order to ſecure their fidelity, he married them to his two daughters. And though the elder of theſe daughters, who was of a mild and tractable diſpoſition, reſembled in character the younger of his pupils, as the elder of his pupils did the younger of his daughters, who was of a violent and vicious temper, yet he thought it adviſeable to give his elder daughter to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns; for by that means he matched them according to their ages, and at the ſame time hoped, that the elder Tullia's ſweet diſpoſition would temper Tarquin's impetuoſity, and the younger Tullia's vivacity rouſe the indolence of Aruns [b].

DURING the public rejoicing for this double marriage, the twelve leucumonies of Hetruria, uniting their forces, attempted to ſhake off the Roman yoke; but were in ſeveral battles defeated by Servius, and obliged to ſubmit to him on the ſame conditions, on which they had ſubmitted to his predeceſſor. For this ſucceſs Servius was honoured with a third triumph [c].

THE king, being thus diſengaged from a troubleſome war, returned to the purſuit of his political ſchemes, and put in execution that maſter-piece of policy, which Rome made uſe of ever after, and which eſtabliſhed a perpetual order and regularity in all the members of the ſtate, with reſpect to wars, to the public revenues, and the ſuffrages of the comitia. The public ſupplies had hitherto been raiſed upon the people at ſo much a head, without any diſtinction of rich and poor. Whence it likewiſe followed, that when levies were made for the war, the rich and poor were equally obliged to take the field, according to the order of their tribe; and as they all ſerved at their own expence, the poorer ſort could, with much ado, bear the charges of a campaign. Beſides, as the moſt indigent of the people ſaw themſelves burdened with the ſame taxes as the rich, they pretended to an equal authority in the comitia: ſo that the election of kings and magiſtrates, the making of peace or war, the judging of cri-criminals, were given up into the hands of a populace, who were eaſily corrupted, and had nothing to loſe. Servius formed a project to remedy theſe evils, and put it in execution, by enacting a law, enjoining all the Roman citizens to bring in an account in writing of their own names and ages, and of thoſe of their fathers, wives, and children. By the ſame law all heads of families were commanded to deliver in upon oath a juſt eſtimate of their effects, and to add to it the places of their abode, whether in town or country. Whoever did not bring in an account of his effects, was to be deprived of his eſtate, to be beat with rods, and publicly ſold for a ſlave. Servius from theſe particular accounts, which might be pretty well relied on, undertook to eaſe the poor by burdening the rich, and at the ſame time to pleaſe the latter by encreaſing their power.

Divides the Roman citizens into ſix claſſes, and theſe into centuries.

To this end he divided the Roman people into ſix claſſes: the firſt claſs conſiſted of thoſe, whoſe eſtates and effects amounted to the value of ten thouſand drachmæ, or an hundred thouſand aſſes of braſs; the firſt way of computing being uſed by the Greeks, and the latter by the Latins. This claſs was ſubdivided into fourſcore centuries, or companies of foot. To theſe Servius joined eighteen centuries of Roman knights, who fought on horſeback, and appointed, that this conſiderable body of horſemen ſhould be at the head of the firſt claſs; becauſe the eſtates of theſe knights, without all doubt, exceeded the ſum neceſſary to be admitted into it. However, the public ſupplied them with horſes, for which a tax was laid upon widows, who were exempt from all other tributes. The firſt claſs including infantry and cavalry, conſiſted of ninety-eight centuries. The ſecond claſs comprehended thoſe, whoſe eſtates were valued at ſeven thouſand five hundred drachmæ, or ſeventy-five thouſand aſſes of braſs. It was ſubdivided into twenty centuries, all foot. To theſe were added two centuries of carpenters, ſmiths, and other artificers. In the third claſs were thoſe, who were eſteemed worth five thouſand drachmæ, or fifty thouſand aſſes. This claſs was ſubdivided into twenty centuries. The fourth claſs was of thoſe whoſe effects were rated at the value of five hundred drachmæ, or twenty-five thouſand aſſes, and was divided into twenty centuries; to which were added two other centuries of trumpeters and blowers of the horn, who ſupplied the whole army with this martial tial muſic. The fifth claſs included thoſe only, whoſe whole ſubſtance did not amount to more than twelve hundred and fifty drachmæ, or twelve thouſand five hundred aſſes; and this claſs was divided into thirty centuries. The ſixth claſs comprehended all thoſe who were not worth ſo much as thoſe of the fifth claſs. They exceeded in number any other claſs, but nevertheleſs were reckoned but as one century [d].

THE wiſe king drew from theſe regulations all the advantages he had expected. Levies for the army were no longer raiſed by tribes, nor were taxes laid at ſo much a head, as formerly; but all was levied by centuries. When, for inſtance, an army of twenty thouſand men, or a large ſupply of money, was wanted for the war, each century furniſhed its quota both of men and money; ſo that the firſt claſs, which contained more centuries, though fewer men, than all the other together, furniſhed more men and more money for the public ſervice, than the whole Roman ſtate beſides. And by this means the Roman armies conſiſted, for the moſt part, of the rich citizens of Rome, who, as they had lands and effects to defend, fought with more reſolution, while their riches enabled them to bear the expence of a campaign. As it was but juſt the king ſhould make the firſt claſs amends for the weight laid on it, he gave it almoſt the whole authority in public affairs, changing the comitia by curiæ, in which the majority was not reckoned by ſingle perſons, but by centuries, how few ſoever there might be in a century. Hence the firſt claſs, which contained more centuries than the other five taken together, had every thing at its diſpoſal. The votes of this claſs were firſt taken; and if the ninety-eight centuries happened to agree, or only ninety-ſeven of them, the affair was determined, becauſe theſe made the majority of the hundred and ninety-three centuries, which compoſed the ſix claſſes. If they diſagreed, then the ſecond, the third, and the other claſſes in their order, were called to vote; though there was very ſeldom any occaſion to go ſo low as the fourth claſs for a majority of votes. So that, by this good order, Servius brought the affairs of the public to be determined by the judgment of the moſt conſiderable citizens, who underſtood the public intereſt, much better than

AND now the ſtate being thus divided into different orders, according to the cenſus or valuation of their eſtates, Servius reſolved to ſolemnize this prudent regulation by ſome public act of religion, that it might be the more reſpected and the more laſting. Accordingly, all the citizens were commanded to appear, on a day appointed, in the campus Martius, which was a large plain, lying between the city and the Tiber, formerly conſecrated by Romulus to the god Mars. Here the centuries being drawn up in battalia, a ſolemn luſtration, or expiatory ſacrifice, was performed in the name of all the people. The ſacrifice conſiſted of a ſow, a ſheep, and a bull, whence it took the name of Suove-taurilia. The whole ceremony was called luſtrum, à luendo, that is, from 'paying, expiating, clearing,' or perhaps from the goddeſs 'Lua' (I), who preſided over expiations, and to whom Servius had dedicated a temple. This wiſe king conſidering that in the ſpace of five years there might be ſuch alterations in the fortunes of private perſons, as to intitle ſome to be raiſed to a higher claſs, and reduce others to a lower, enjoined, that the cenſus ſhould be renewed every five years. As the cenſus was uſually cloſed by the luſtrum, the Romans henceforth began to compute time by luſtrums, each luſtrum containing the ſpace of five years. However, the luſtrums were not always regularly obſerved, but often put off, though the cenſus had been made in the fifth year. Some writers are of opinion, that Servius at this time coined the firſt money which had ever appeared at Rome, and add, that the circumſtances of the luſtrum probably led him to ſtamp the figures of the animals there ſlain on pieces of braſs of a certain certain weight. It is paſt all doubt, that money was called 'pecunia,' from the word 'pecus' which ſignifies 'cattle,' a name which continued to be given to all coins, when the impreſſions on them were changed into more noble figures [c].

(I) The name of this goddeſs was loſt through the ignorance of editors; but brought to light again by Juſtus Lipſius in his commentaries on Tacitus. For that antient writer tells us, that Servius Tullius conſecrated an altar to the goddeſs Lua. But the editors, not knowing who this goddeſs was, changed the word Lua into Luna, as if Servius had dedicated an altar to the moon. Lipſius corrects this miſtake, and ſhews that Lua was the goddeſs, to whom the ſacrifice of the luſtrum was offered. As ſhe was the goddeſs of expiations, the luſtrum probably took its name from her, as ſhe did hers from the word luo, which ſignifies to pay, becauſe on that day every one paid his quota of the tax laid on his century.

He gives the freedmen the privilege of Roman citizens.

THE government of the city being thus eſtabliſhed in ſo regular a manner, Servius, remembering his former ſervile condition, and touched with compaſſion on thoſe, whom the misfortunes of an unſucceſsful war had reduced to ſlavery, thought, that ſuch of them as had by long and faithful ſervices deſerved and obtained their freedom, were much more worthy of being made Roman citizens, than untractable vagabonds from foreign countries, who were admitted without diſtinction. He therefore gave the freedmen their choice, either to return to their own country, or continue at Rome. Thoſe who choſe to continue there, he divided into four tribes, and ſettled them within the city; and though they were diſtinguiſhed from the plebeians by their old name of liberti, or freed-men, yet they enjoyed all the privileges of free citizens. The ſenate took offence at the regard which the king ſhewed to ſuch mean people, who had but lately ſhaken off their fetters; but Servius, by a moſt humane and judicious diſcourſe, entirely appeaſed the fathers, who paſſed his inſtitution into a law, which ſubſiſted ever after.

Reforms the royal power.

THE wiſe king having thus eſtabliſhed order among the people, undertook at laſt to reform the royal power itſelf, his equity, which was the main ſpring of all his reſolutions, leading him to act contrary to his own intereſt, and to ſacrifice one half of the royal authority to the public good. His predeceſſors had reſerved to themſelves the cognizance of all cauſes both public and private; but Servius, finding the duties of his office too much for one man to diſcharge well, committed the cognizance of ordinary ſuits to the ſenate, and reſerved that only of ſtate-crimes to himſelf.

Secures the fidelity and friendſhip of the Latins and Sabines.

ALL things being now regulated at home, both in the city and country, Servius turned his thoughts abroad, and formed a ſcheme for attaching the Sabines and Latins to the Romans by ſuch ſocial ties, as ſhould be ſtrengthened by religion. He ſummoned the Latin and Sabine cities to ſend their deputies to Rome, to conſult about an affair of great great importance. When they were come, he propoſed to them the building a temple in honour of Diana, where the Latins and Sabines ſhould meet once a year, and join with the Romans in offering ſacrifices to that goddeſs; that this feſtival ſhould be followed by a council, in which all diſputes between the cities ſhould be amicably determined; that there proper meaſures ſhould be taken to purſue their common intereſt; and laſtly, that, in order to draw the common people thither, a fair ſhould be kept, at which every one might furniſh himſelf with what he wanted. The king's deſign met with no oppoſition. The deputies only added to it, that the temple ſhould be an inviolable aſylum for the united nations, and that all the cities ſhould contribute towards the expence of building it. It being left to the king to chuſe a proper place for it, he pitched upon the Aventine hill, where the temple was built, and aſſemblies annually held in it. The laws which were to be obſerved in theſe general meetings were engraved on a pillar of braſs, and ſtill to be ſeen in Auguſtus's time, in the Latin tongue, but in Greek characters [f].

The wicked intrigues of Tarquin, and the younger Tullia.

BUT now Servius was grown old, and the ambition of Tarquin, his ſon-in-law, revived in proportion, as the king advanced in years. His wife uſed her utmoſt endeavours to check the raſhneſs and fury of her huſband, and to divert him from all criminal enterprizes; while her younger ſiſter, a domeſtic fury, was ever inſtigating Aruns, who placed all his happineſs in a private life, to the moſt villainous attempts. She was continually lamenting her fate in being tied to ſuch an indolent huſband, and wiſhing ſhe had either continued unmarried, or were become a widow. Similitude of temper and manners formed by degrees a great intimacy between her and Tarquin. At length ſhe propoſed to him nothing leſs than the murdering of her father, ſiſter, and huſband, that they two might meet and aſcend the throne together. Soon after they paved their way to an inceſtuous marriage, he by poiſoning his wife, and ſhe her huſband, and then had the aſſurance to aſk the king and queen's conſent to their marriage. Servius and Tarquinia, though they did not give it, were ſilent, through too much indulgence for a daughter, in whom now was their only hope of poſterity. But theſe criminal nuptials were only the firſt ſtep towards a yet greater iniquity. The wicked ambition of the new-married married couple firſt ſhewed itſelf againſt the king; for they publicly declared, that the crown belonged to them; that Servius was an uſurper, who being appointed tutor to Tarquin's grandchildren, had deprived his pupils of their inheritance; that it was high time for an old man, who was but little able to ſupport the weight of public affairs, to give place to a prince, who was of a mature age, &c. The patricians, whom Servius had taken great pleaſure in humbling during the whole time of his reign, were eaſily gained over to Tarquin's party; and by the help of money many of the poor citizens were alſo brought over to his intereſt. The king being informed of their treaſonable practices, endeavoured to diſſuade his daughter and ſon-in-law from ſuch proceedings, which might end in their ruin, and exhorted them to wait for the kingdom till his death. But they, deſpiſing his counſels and paternal admonitions, reſolved to lay their claim before the ſenate, which Servius was obliged to ſummon; ſo that the affair came to a formal proceſs. Tarquin reproached his father-in-law with having aſcended the throne without a previous inter-regnum, and with having bought the votes of the people, and deſpiſed the ſuffrages of the ſenate. He then urged his own right of inheritance to the crown and injuſtice of Servius, who, being only his guardian, had kept poſſeſſion of it, when he himſelf was of an age to govern. Servius anſwered, that he had been lawfully elected by the people, and that, if there could be an hereditary right to the kingdom, the ſons of Ancus had a much better one than the grandſons of the late king, who muſt himſelf have been an uſurper. He then referred the whole to an aſſembly of the people, which being immediately proclaimed all over the city, the forum was ſoon filled, and Servius harangued the multitude in ſuch a manner, as gained all their affections. They all cried out with one voice; "Let Servius reign; let him conti-" nue to make the Romans happy." Amidſt their confuſed clamours, theſe words were likewiſe heard; "Let "Tarquin periſh; let him die; let us kill him. This language frightened him ſo, that he retired to his houſe in great haſte, while the king was conducted back to his palace with the acclamations of the people [g].

Tarquin regains the king's favour

part. He undertook to regain the favour of his father-in-law, by careſſes, ſubmiſſions, and proteſtations of a ſincere regard and affection for him; inſomuch, that the king, who judged of the probity of others from his own, was ſincerely reconciled to him, and tranquillity re-eſtabliſhed in the royal family. But it was not long, ere Tarquin, rouſed by the continual reproaches of his wife, began to renew his intrigues among the ſenators; among whom he had no ſooner gained a conſiderable party, than he put in execution a ſtratagem, which ſurprized the people by its novelty, and ſucceeded by the boldneſs of its execution. He cloathed himſelf in the royal robes, and cauſing the faſces to be carried before him by ſome of his domeſtics, croſſed the Roman forum, entered the temple, where the ſenate uſed to meet, and ſeated himſelf on the throne. Such of the ſenators as were of his faction he found already in their places, for he had given them private notice to be there early; and the reſt, being ſummoned to aſſemble in king Tarquin's name, made what haſte they could to the appointed place, thinking that Servius was dead, ſince Tarquin aſſumed the title and functions of king. When they were all aſſembled, Tarquin made a long ſpeech, reviling his father-in-law, repeating the invectives againſt him, which he had ſo often uttered, called him a ſlave, an uſurper, a favourer of the populace, and an enemy to the ſenate and patricians. While he was yet ſpeaking, Servius arrived; and raſhly giving way to the motions of his courage, without conſidering his ſtrength, drew near the throne to pull Tarquin down from it. This raiſed a great noiſe in the aſſembly, which drew the people into the temple; but no-body ventured to part the two rivals. Tarquin therefore, being more ſtrong and vigorous, ſeized the old man by the waiſt, and hurrying him through the temple, threw him down from the top of the ſteps into the forum. The king, who was grievouſly wounded, raiſed himſelf up with ſome difficulty; but all his friends had abandoned him; only two or three of the people, touched with compaſſion, lent him their arms to lead him home to his palace. As they were dragging him on ſlowly, the cruel Tullia appeared in the forum, whither ſhe had haſtened in her chariot on the firſt report of what had paſſed in the ſenate. She found her huſband on the top of the ſteps of the temple, and tranſported with joy, was the firſt who ſaluted him king; and her example was immediately followed by the ſenators of Tarquin's party. Nor was this enough for the unnatural daughter. She took a ſide her huſband, and ſuggeſted to him, that he would never be ſafe ſo long as the uſurper of his crown was alive. Hereupon Tarquin inſtantly diſpatched ſome of his domeſtics to take away the remains of the unfortunate king's life. The orders for the wicked parricide were no ſooner given, than Tullia mounted her chariot again, with an air of triumph, to return home. The way to her houſe was through a narrow ſtreet called Vicus Cyprus (K), or, the good ſtreet. There the aſſaſſins had left the king's body, which was ſtill panting. At this ſight the charioteer, ſtruck with horror, checked his horſes, and made a ſtop: Why don't you go on? cried Tullia to him. What ſtops you? The charioteer turning about to her, Alas! ſaid he, it is the body of the king your father. At theſe words Tullia, catching up a ſtool that was in the chariot, and throwing it at his head, Go on, ſhe cried, and don't be afraid of driving over a dead body. The charioteer obeyed, and the blood of the father is ſaid to have dyed the wheels of the chariot, and even the cloaths of the inhuman daughter. And hence the ſtreet was called ever after Vicus Sceleratus. Such was the end of Servius Tullius, after he had lived ſeventy-four, and reigned forty-four, years. He was a prince of eminent juſtice and moderation, and made Rome more formidable by a peace of twenty years, than his predeceſſors had done by many victories. He was beloved by the people, eſteemed by the patricians, and perhaps would have had no enemies, if he could have preſerved the affections of his own family. Tarquin not ſuffering his obſequies to be performed with the uſual pomp, leſt the people might on that occaſion riſe up in arms and revenge his death, Tarquinia conveyed the body of her huſband privately by night to his tomb, and the night following died herſelf, but whether of grief, or by her own hands, or by the wickedneſs of Tullia, is uncertain. The veneration which the people had for this king's memory, ſeems to have placed him among the gods; for the ſlaves annually celebrated his feſtival in the temple of Diana Aventina on the day he loſt his life.

Tarquin II. Year of the flood 2471. Before Chriſt 528. Of Rome 220.

TARQUIN, having thus poſſeſſed himſelf of the throne by a moſt wicked parricide, behaved himſelf during the whole time of his reign like a moſt cruel and deſpotical tyrant. In the very beginning of it the ſurname of proud was given him, on on account of his capricious humour and haughty behaviour. As he had aſcended the throne without a previous inter-regnum, and deſpiſed the ſuffrages of the people and approbation of the ſenate, he communicated no affairs of ſtate either to the ſenate or people. All controverſies whatſoever he decided himſelf, aſſiſted by his intimate friends, and baniſhed, fined, and even executed whom he pleaſed. To prevent the natural conſequences of his tyranny, he kept conſtantly a ſtrong guard about his perſon, moſtly conſiſting of ſtrangers, who were ready on all occaſions to execute his pleaſure. Wealth and merit became unpardonable crimes, as plainly appeared in the murder of M. Junius, a venerable old man, the father of the famous Brutus, who afterwards deſtroyed the regal power. This Junius was deſcended of a noble family, and had an ample patrimony, on which conſiderations Tarquin the elder had given him his daughter in marriage. The new king, to get poſſeſſion of his eſtate, cauſed both him and his other ſon to be aſſaſſinated, Brutus eſcaping by counterfeiting madneſs. The flower of the ſenate retired from the city into voluntary baniſhment, to avoid the effects of the king's cruelty and avarice. The people, who had rejoiced at firſt to ſee the ſenate humbled, were in their turn as ill treated as the ſenators, and all the laws made in their favour annulled. Informers were diſperſed all over the city to watch the words and behaviour of every citizen, and the worſt conſtruction was put upon every thing. All aſſemblies of the people, even for diverſion and recreation, were prohibited both in the city and country. But, as he was well appriſed that the people would ſooner or later attempt to ſhake off the yoke, and recover their antient privileges and freedom, h turned his thoughts to gain a ſtrong party among foreigners; and with this view married his daughter to Octavius Mamilius, a man of great intereſt among the Latins. Mamilius indeed did his utmoſt to bring over a great many leading men of his country to the intereſt of his father-in-law, and his ſolicitations ſucceeded. But the king had like to have loſt them again by his haughty behaviour. He had invited the Latins to meet in a national aſſembly at Ferentinum, on a day appointed by himſelf. The deputies came and took their places in the ſacred grove. But, as Tarquin did not appear after they had waited ſome hours, the aſſembly grew impatient, and Herdonius, an enterprizing man, who hated Tarquin, took this occaſion of inveighing againſt him.

His

His ſpeech made no ſmall impreſſion upon the aſſembly; but Mamilius prevailed upon them to adjourn the council to the next day. Then Tarquin appeared, and, having firſt made a frivolous excuſe for his abſence, acquainted the aſſembly, that his buſineſs with them was to demand his right of commanding the Latin armies, a right which he derived by inheritance from his grand-father. Upon this a profound ſilence enſued, till Herdonius, ſtepping forth into the midſt of the aſſembly, made a bitter invective againſt Tarquin, and repreſented the fatal conſequences of admitting his propoſal. Tarquin, diſconcerted by the boldneſs of the orator, deſired, that the aſſembly might ſit again the following day, when he promiſed to anſwer the invectives of Herdonius. In the mean time, having corrupted ſome of his domeſtics, he engaged them to hide a great quantity of arms in their maſter's baggage. The next morning he entered the aſſembly with an air of confidence, and after having told them that the malice of Herdonius againſt him was wholly owing to his having refuſed him his daughter in marriage, he accuſed his adverſary of having laid a plot to cut off all the deputies there preſent, and to uſurp a tyranny over the Latin cities. In proof of this, he informed them of the arms concealed in Herdonius's baggage. The accuſed, knowing nothing of theſe arms, conſented to be adjudged guilty, if upon examination the fact alledged ſhould be found true. Accordingly, his baggage was ſearched, and the arms being found and brought into the aſſembly, the innocent Herdonius was immediately ſentenced to be thrown into a baſon at the head of the ſpring of Ferentinum; where, a hurdle being laid upon him, and ſtones heaped upon it, he was preſſed down into the water and drowned [h].

His treacherous contrivance to deſtroy Turnus Herdonius.

The Latins, not doubting but Herdonius was guilty of the crime laid to his charge, looked upon Tarquin as their deliverer, renewed the treaty made with his grand-father, and declared him general of the Latin armies. Not long after the Hernici and two cantons of the Volſci entered into an alliance with him upon the ſame terms. Tarquin, to ſecure the fidelity of his new allies, erected, with their approbation, a new temple in the midſt of them, on a hill near the ruins of Alba, which he conſecrated to Jupiter Latialis. There the diets of the confederate cantons were to aſſemble; and theſe aſſemblies were called La-

tia. The twenty-ſeventh of April was the day appointed for their annual meeting, and had the name of Feriæ Latinæ. The Romans, as the chief members of the alliance, always preſided at the ſacrifices and deliberations. The diet conſiſted of forty-ſeven deputies from ſo many cities, who formed the Latin aſſociation, which was afterwards the beſt part of the Roman ſtrength, and contributed more than all the reſt of Italy to the conqueſt of the world.

The Feriæ Latinæ.

WITH the aſſiſtance of the Latins, Tarquin thought himſelf in a condition to make war upon thoſe Volſci, who had refuſed to enter into an alliance with him. But as he could not depend upon the fidelity of the Romans, he blended them in the ſame legions with the Latins, who till his time had been a ſeparate corps. The inhabitants of Sueſſa Pometia (L), one of the moſt flouriſhing cities of the Volſci, were the firſt who felt the effects of this new alliance. They had plundered the territories of their neighbours, and Tarquin, laying hold of this pretence to begin the war, marched againſt them, defeated their army, laid ſiege to their city, and, having taken it by ſtorm, gave the plunder of it to his troops, reſerving only the tenth part of the ſpoil towards the expence of finiſhing the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. He then turned his arms againſt the Sabines, who had committed ſome depredations in the Roman territories, gained two complete victories over them, and made the whole Sabine nation tributary. Upon his return to Rome, where we are told he triumphed twice [i], he undertook the finiſhing of the common ſewers and the great circus, and, having obliged the idle populace to work without any other reward, but that of a poor maintenance, ſoon brought to perfection thoſe two ſtructures, which his grandfather had begun [k].

Aſſiſted by the Latins, he defeats the Volſci, and ſubdues the Sabines.

IN the mean time, many of the diſcontented patricians, abandoning their native country, took refuge at Gabii, a city of Latium, about an hundred furlongs from Rome, and prevailed upon the inhabitants to eſpouſe their cauſe and make

His war with the people of Gabii.

(L) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus reckons Sueſſa Pometia among the moſt wealthy cities of the Volſci. It was called Pometia, to diſtinguiſh it from another Sueſſa in the country of the Aurunci beyond the Liris. It ſtood between Cora and Velitræ, at a ſmall diſtance from theſe two cities.

make war upon Tarquin. This war laſted ſeven years with various ſucceſs, during which time the Romans, who could neither ſow nor reap, being afflicted with a great famine, began to murmur, and at length to demand of Tarquin, in a tumultuous manner, either a peace or proviſions. Their complaints and murmurs being fomented by emiſſaries ſent privately from the exiles at Gabii, the whole city was in the utmoſt confuſion, and ſeemed only to wait for a favourable opportunity to take up arms, and drive out Tarquin, the cauſe of all their misfortunes. The king, being on one ſide unwilling to make a ſhameful peace, and apprehending on the other a general revolt of his ſubjects, was at a loſs what reſolution to take, and under the greateſt uneaſineſs.

The ſtratagem by which he became maſter of that city.

But his ſon Sextus Tarquinius found out an expedient, no leſs diſhonourable than artful, for extricating him out of this difficulty. He pretended to be upon very ill terms with his father, and openly inveighed againſt him as a tyrant. Hereupon the king, as it had been agreed on before-hand, commanded him to be publicly beaten with rods as a rebel. This was no ſooner known at Gabii, but the inhabitants, deſirous to have Sextus among them, made him privately great offers; which he readily accepted, after they had ſolemnly promiſed never to deliver him up to his father upon any pretence whatſoever. It is not to be imagined, how agreeable Sextus's arrival was to the Gabini, or what hopes they founded on their gaining over a prince, who was ſo much valued by the Romans. From that time they looked upon Rome as already reduced. And indeed the artful Sextus played his game with all imaginable dexterity. His public and private diſcourſe turned upon nothing but the tyranny of the king of Rome. From words he proceeded to actions. No enemy Rome ever had was more active. He often ravaged the Roman lands, and returned to Gabii loaded with booty. His father took care to facilitate his military exploits, and ſacrificed ſuch ſoldiers and officers as he ſuſpected, to the glory of his ſon. His reputation being thus encreaſed by the craft of his father, without the leaſt ſuſpicion of any intelligence between them, the Gabini placed ſo much confidence in his fidelity and valour, that they appointed him commander in chief of their army. His authority being now ſufficiently eſtabliſhed in Gabii, he diſpatched a ſlave, in whom he could confide, privately to Rome, to enquire of his father what he ſhould do. The king king, not thinking fit to anſwer, either in writing or by word of mouth, took the ſlave into a garden, and there ſtruck off the heads of all the talleſt poppies. This done, he ſent back the meſſenger. Sextus underſtood the hint, and, having aſſembled the Gabini, pretended to have diſcovered a plot to deliver him up to his father. The people preſſed him to declare the conſpirators, and extorted from him, as it were, by force, the name of Antiſtius Petro, a man whoſe merit had made him the moſt conſiderable perſon in his country. Sextus had bribed his ſervants to convey among his papers ſome letters from the king of Rome, which being produced and read, the incenſed multitude, without further examination, immediately ſtoned him, and committed to Sextus the care of diſcovering his accomplices, and inflicting on them ſuch puniſhments as he ſhould judge proper. Upon this he ordered the gates of the city to be ſhut, and having ſent officers into the ſeveral quarters of it, cauſed all the eminent men in Gabii, who gave him umbrage, to be inhumanly maſſacred. In the midſt of this deſolation and confuſion, he opened the gates to his father, whom he had acquainted with his deſign, and put him in poſſeſſion of the city. The Gabini ſunk into the utmoſt deſpair at the ſight of the tyrant, who now had their lives, their eſtates, and their liberty, at his diſpoſal. But Tarquin, on this occaſion conſulting good policy more than revenge, treated them with great humanity, and even entered into an alliance with them, the articles of which were written on a ſhield made of the hide of an ox ſacrificed on that occaſion. This treaty was ſtill to be ſeen at Rome in Auguſtus's time, in the temple of Jupiter Piſtius, or Sancus, that is, the god of fidelity [1].

As Tarquin was jealous even of his own children, he took care to keep them at a diſtance from Rome. With this view he left Sextus at Gabii, declaring him king of that city, and ſent Titus and Arunx to found two new colonies, the one at Signia, the other at Circæum, a promontory on the coaſt of the Tyrrhenian ſea. As for his fourth ſon Lucius Tarquinius, he kept him in Rome, he not being yet of an age to give him umbrage.

THE Romans, being now accuſtomed to the yoke of an imperious maſter, bore it with great patience, and allowed Tarquin to enjoy a profound peace. It was at this time, The [illegible] of th [illegible].

that an unknown woman appeared at court, loaded with nine volumes, which ſhe offered to ſell, but demanded a very conſiderable price. Tarquin refuſing to purchaſe them at her rate, ſhe withdrew and burnt three of them. Some time after ſhe returned, and demanded the ſame price for the remaining ſix. She was therefore looked upon as a mad woman, and driven away with ſcorn. However, having burnt the half of them, ſhe ventured to return a third time, aſking as much for the remaining three as ſhe had done for the whole nine. Tarquin, ſurpriſed at the novelty of this proceeding, cauſed the books to be put into the hands of the augurs, who, finding them to be the oracles of the Sibyl of Cuma, declared them to be an invaluable treaſure, and adviſed the king to buy the three at the ſame price, which the woman had asked for the nine. Tarquin followed their directions, and the woman, having received the ſum ſhe demanded, ſoon after diſappeared, having firſt exhorted the Romans to preſerve her books with great care. Tarquin appointed two perſons of diſtinction, ſtyled Duumviri, to be guardians of them (M); and ordered them to be locked up in a vault under the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, as ſoon as that building was finiſhed; and there they were kept, till they were burnt with the temple itſelf [m].

ROME

(M) Theſe officers were afterwards encreaſed to ten, and then to fifteen; and, as their number encreaſed, were called Decemviri, Quindecemviri, ſacris faciundis. It was their buſineſs to conſult the Sibylline books, when the ſenate thought proper. But recourſe was never had to them, unleſs the republic was under, or threatened with, ſome great calamity; as when a dangerous ſedition was like to break out, when the Roman armies had been defeated, or when any of thoſe prodigies appeared, which were thought fatal to Rome. Then the Duumviri had the care of putting in execution whatever they thought commanded by the books of the Sibyls. They alſo preſided over the ſacrifices and public ſports, which they appointed to appeaſe the wrath of heaven. And laſtly, they ordered every thing that related to the Ludi Seculares. Their office was for life, and they were exempted from taxes, and from all civil and military employments. This magiſtracy continued at Rome from the time of Tarquin the Proud to the reign of the emperor Theodoſius, when this and many other antient ſuperſtitions were entirely abolished.

The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus

ROME ſtill continuing to enjoy peace, though the people were as much diſcontented as ever, Tarquin, in order to keep them employed, undertook the finiſhing of the temple of the capitol, which his grand-father had begun. He hired for this purpoſe architects and ſkilful workmen out of Hetruria, and obliged his own ſubjects to perform the laborious part, making them the drudges, as he had done in ſo many other undertakings. This temple, which was dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus, ſtood on the top of the hill Tarpeius, made ſometime ſince a part of Rome. The original of the new name of Capitol is by hiſtorians ſaid to be this: As the workmen were digging the foundations of the temple of Jupiter, they are ſaid to have found very deep in the earth the head of a man, whoſe features were preſerved entire, and the blood as red and freſh as if it had been but newly ſhed. The Romans, looking upon this as a prodigy, conſulted the augurs, who declared it to preſage, that Rome would ſome time or other become the miſtreſs and head of Italy (N). This anſwer encouraged Tarquin to ſpare no pains or expence in raiſing a ſtructure to the honour of thoſe gods, who were the authors of ſo glorious a deſtiny. Accordingly the foundations were laid, and the temple built in a moſt ſtately manner. It ſtood upon eight acres of ground, and was two hundred foot broad, and about two hundred and fifteen long. The front of this magnificent ſtructure was to the ſouth, facing the hill Palatinus and the Forum Romanum. An hundred ſteps led up to it from the forum, which were divided at certain diſtances by large landing-places. This front conſiſted of three rows of pillars, and the two ſides of the temple were adorned with a periſtyle, conſiſting of a double row of pillars. It was in after-ages burnt down more than once (O); but the Romans always rebuilt it, ſtill preſerving

(N) Macrobius tells us (73). that the name of the man, to whom this head belonged, was Tolus; ſo that the word Capitol is, according to him, compounded of caput and Tolus. Other writers ſay, that the hill Tarpeius was called Capitol, becauſe it was the capital or chief fortreſs in Rome.

(O) It was burnt in Sylla's time by the negligence of thoſe who kept it; but Sylla rebuilt it in a more magnificent manner. It was burnt a ſecond time in the reign of Vitellius, and repaired ſerving the ſame proportions. The whole arch of this prodigious building was gilt both within and without (P). It contained three chapels, or rather three temples, under the ſame roof, one dedicated to Jupiter, another to Juno, and the third to Minerva (Q). As this was a religious undertaking, the Romans aſſiſted Tarquin in carrying it on with more chearfulneſs than uſual; but the honour of putting the laſt hand to this ſtately work, and conſecrating it, was reſerved for a Roman conſul in the time of the republic.

Tarquin ſends his two ſons with Brutus to conſult the oracle of Delphos.

WHILE Tarquin and the Romans were thus employed, a cruel plague breaking out Rome, the king ſent his two ſons, Titus and Arunx, to conſult the oracle of Delphos about the cauſe and cure of the contagion. The princes prepared magnificent preſents for Apollo, and Junius Brutus, who was to attend them for their amuſement, reſolved to carry his offering too. He was the ſon of that venerable patrician, whom Tarquin had cauſed to be murdered in the very beginning of his reign, and had long acted the part of an idiot at court, which procured him the name of Brutus. His affected follies had ſomething inexpreſſibly amuſing in them, and he knew how to make uſe of them at proper times, and ſuppreſs them when unſeaſonable. He had been brought up ever ſince his father's death, in the king's palace, with the princes his couſins, who were greatly diverted with his follies. He was therefore appointed to attend them to Delphos. The preſent he choſe for the god was an elder-ſtick; which was matter paired by Veſpaſian, It underwent the ſame misfortune under Titus, and was rebuilt by Domitian; but always on the old foundations of Tarquin.

(P) The gilding of the whole arch of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was a work undertaken by the Romans, as Pliny informs us (74), after the deſtruction of Carthage. This undertaking, if Plutarch is to be credited (75), coſt twelve thouſand talents, a ſum, which ſeems to exceed all belief. The gates of the temple were of braſs, covered with large plates of gold. The inſide of the temple, and the columns which ſupported it, were all of marble.

(Q) The inſide of the temple was divided into three parts by two rows of columns, which made the nave and the two iſles. The nave formed the chapel of Jupiter, and the two iſles the chapels of Juno and Minerva.

ter of diverſion for the whole court. However, as he was well appriſed, that the gods of thoſe times, or their miniſters, were affected with the value of the preſents, he had the precaution to incloſe a rod of gold in his ſtick without any body's knowledge. This was a true ſymbol of his own mind and conduct; for he concealed the moſt valuable gifts of nature under a contemptible outſide. All things being got ready, they ſet out for Delphos, and the young princes, having executed their father's commands, enquired of the oracle, which of them ſhould be prince of Rome? The god anſwered, that the government of Rome was reſerved for him who ſhould firſt kiſs his mother; which the princes miſunderſtanding, agreed to do it both together, and reign jointly. But Brutus, knowing the meaning of the oracle, as ſoon as they arrived in Italy, pretended to fall down by chance, and kiſſed the earth, the common mother of all men [n].

The rape of Lucretia.

THE two princes on their return to Rome found the city in a great commotion, on account of the war, which the king had declared with the Rutuli, under pretence that they had entertained ſome Roman exiles. He had already inveſted Ardea their metropolis, which lay ſixteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Rome. While they lay before this place, the officers, having a good deal of leiſure, uſed to make mutual entertainments for one another in their quarters. One day, when Sextus Tarquinius was entertaining his brothers and his kinſman Collatinus, the converſation happened to turn upon the merit of their wives, every one extolling the good qualities of his own. This occaſioned a kind of quarrel, and, in order to end it, they agreed to mount their horſes, as they were heated with wine, and go and ſurprize their wives. She, whom they ſhould find employed in the manner moſt agreeable to her ſex, was, by common conſent, to have the preference. Away therefore they poſted firſt to Rome, where they found the kings' daughters-in-law ſpending their time in feaſting and diverſions. From Rome they haſtened to Collatia, where they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, in the midſt of her maids ſpinning and working in wool, though the night was far advanced before their arrival. Hereupon they unanimouſly gave her the preference, and, after a noble entertainment, returned the next day to the camp before Ardea. Sextus, captivated with her beauty, found a pretence to return very ſoon to Collatia, where he was entertained by Lucretia, in her huſband's abſence, with great civility and reſpect. At midnight he found means to convey himſelf into her bed-chamber, approached her bed with his drawn ſword, and laying his hand on her breaſt, threatened her with preſent death, if ſhe offered to ſtir or ſpeak. Lucretia awaking and ſeeing death ſo near, was in the greateſt confuſion imaginable, while Sextus declaring his paſſion, endeavoured by entreaties, mixed with menaces, to make her yield to his deſires. But when he found that all was in vain, and that even the fear of death could not prevail upon her to conſent, he threatened her with ignominy, telling her, that if ſhe would not yield, he would firſt kill her, then lay one of her ſlaves dead by her ſide, and declare to all the world, that he had only revenged the injured honour of Collatinus. The dread of infamy got the better of Lucretia's conſtancy; and Sextus, having obtained his wiſhes, returned early the next morning to the camp. Lucretia, not being able to endure the thoughts of life after the violence ſhe had ſuffered, wrote to her huſband to meet her at her father's houſe; and then came to Rome in her chariot. Livy tells us, that ſhe deſired her father and huſband to meet her at her own houſe. With her father Lucretius came Publius Valerius, afterwards Poplicola, and with her huſband Lucius Junius Brutus, and many other Romans of diſtinction; for Lucretia had acquainted them, that ſhe had an affair of the utmoſt conſequence to impart to them. When the aſſembly was pretty numerous, ſhe diſcloſed in few words the whole matter, declared her firm reſolution not to outlive the loſs of her reputation, and conjured them not to let the crime of Sextus Tarquinius go unpuniſhed. They all endeavoured to comfort her, telling her, that there could be no guilt where the heart was innocent. But the Roman heroine, embracing her father and huſband with a flood of tears, plunged a dagger, which ſhe had concealed under her garment, into her breaſt, and fell dead at their feet. While ſo tragical a ſight filled the ſpectators with grief and conſternation, Brutus, throwing off his long diſguiſe, drew near the body of Lucretia, and, ſnatching the poniard out of her boſom, told her relations there preſent, that tears and lamentations could never be heard, whilſt vengeance cried ſo loud. Then ſhewing the bloody poniard to the aſſembly, "I ſwear" ſaid he, "by this blood, which was "once

" once ſo pure, and which nothing, but the deteſt-
" able villainy of Tarquin, could have polluted, that " I will purſue Lucius Tarquinius the proud, his
" wicked wife, and their children, with fire and ſword;
" nor will ever ſuffer any of that family, or any other
" whatſoever, to reign at Rome. Ye gods, I call you to
" witneſs this my oath". At theſe words he preſented the dagger to Collatinus, Lucretius, Valerius, and the reſt of the company, and engaged them to take the ſame oath. Theſe noble Romans, ſurpriſed at the ſudden and unexpected appearance of ſo much wiſdom in an idiot, thought him inſpired, and gave themſelves entirely up to his counſels. He then let them know, that his folly had been feigned, exhorted them to revenge the death of Lucretia, and encouraged them to ſhake off the ſhameful yoke, under which they had ſo long groaned. Finding them all reſolved to ſubmit to his conduct, and take what meaſures he ſhould judge moſt proper for the execution of their deſign, he commanded the gates to be ſhut, that all might be kept ſecret from Tarquin, till ſuch time as the people might be aſſembled, the dead body expoſed, and a public decree paſſed for the baniſhing of the king. The ſenate being aſſembled, no one oppoſed the baniſhment of Tarquin; but as they were divided in their opinions with reſpect to the new form of government, Brutus repreſented to them the abſolute neceſſity of coming to a ſpeedy reſolution, ſhewing them, that the regal power was not conſiſtent with the ſecurity of the ſtate and ſafety of the people, and therefore was not to be truſted with one man; but two were to be choſen, who ſhould govern with equal authority and power. Then becauſe names alone gave ſome people offence, he adviſed them to change the name of the kingdom for that of commonwealth, and, inſtead of the title of king and monarch, to give thoſe, who ſhould govern, ſome more modeſt and popular name. He added, that the main thing to keep theſe magiſtrates in awe was to prevent their perpetual power, and that, if they were annual, after the manner of Athens, they might learn both how to obey, and how to command. Laſtly, that the name of king might not be wholly loſt, he was for giving it to one, who ſhould be charged with the care of religious matters, and be called Rex Sacrorum (R). This employ-employment was to be for life, and attended with immunity from warfare; but the Rex ſacrorum ſhould only concern himſelf with thoſe religious rites, which the king had charge of before. The particulars of his ſpeech were all approved of by the ſenate; and a decree was immediately iſſued out, baniſhing the king and all his poſterity [o].

BRUTUS, having thus gained the ſenate, cauſed the yet bleeding Lucretia to be carried to the place where the comitia were uſually held; and placing the dead body where it might be ſeen by all, he ordered the people to be called together. When the multitude were aſſembled, he began his ſpeech to them by explaining the myſtery of his paſt conduct, and the neceſſity he had been under, for more than twenty years together, of counterfeiting folly, as the only means of preſerving his life, after the murder of his father and elder brother. Then he proceeded to acquaint them with the reſolution the patricians had taken to depoſe the tyrant, and preſſed them in the ſtrongeſt terms to concur in that deſign. He enumerated the many crimes which had rendered Tarquin odious to his ſubjects; that he had poiſoned his own brother and wife, murdered his lawful ſovereign, and filled the common ſewers with the bodies of the nobility; that he came to the commonwealth thought it very proper to keep always up the name of king in the city. Upon this account they ordered the augurs and pontifices to chuſe a fit perſon, who ſhould engage never to meddle with civil affairs, but devote himſelf wholly to the care of the public worſhip and to the ceremonies of religion, with the title of Rex Sacrorum (75). Livy informs us, that this dignity was inferior to that of Pontifex Maximus, the eſtabliſhers of the commonwealth having made the Rex Sacrorum but a ſubordinate officer even in affairs of religion, leſt the name of king, which had been formerly ſo odious to the people, ſhould ſtill in ſome meaſure prove prejudicial to their liberty (76). His wife was called queen, and was one of the chief prieſteſſes. None but patricians were admitted to this dignity. The Rex Sacrorum was always choſen in the comitia of the people, aſſembled in the campus Martius by centuries. As he was not allowed to have any hand in civil affairs, when the uſual ſacrifices before the electing of magiſtrates or generals were over, he was obliged to withdraw. So jealous were the Romans even of the ſhadow, we may ſay, of a king.

the throne as an uſurper, and continued on it as a tyrant; being treacherous to his beſt friends, and inhuman to all his ſubjects; that his three ſons were of a temper as tyrannical as himſelf, eſpecially the elder, of which they had a diſmal inſtance before their eyes; that ſince the king was abſent, and the patricians reſolved to ſhake off the yoke, neither men, money, nor foreign aid, ſhould be wanting, had they but courage for the enterprize. He urged in the end of his ſpeech, that it was ſhameful in them to think of commanding the Volſci, the Sabines, and other nations abroad, while they were ſlaves at home; and to maintain ſo many wars, in order to gratify the ambition of a tyrant, while they had not courage enough to undertake one for their own liberty. As for the army before Ardea, he told them, that he did not doubt, but they would readily join in whatever ſhould be agreed on in the city [P].

THE multitude, tranſported with joy at the thoughts of liberty, gave their conſent with loud acclamations, and called out for arms. But Brutus did not think fit to arm the people, till they had confirmed by their ſuffrages the decree of the ſenate baniſhing Tarquin. This decree deprived him of all the prerogatives belonging to the regal authority, condemned him and all his poſterity to perpetual baniſhment, and devoted to the infernal gods every Roman, who ſhould by word or deed attempt his reſtoration. The curiæ being aſſembled and the decree propoſed, they were all unanimous in confirming it. And now the adminiſtration being reduced to an inter-regnum Lucretius was by the ſuffrages of the people declared inter-rex; ſo that it w his buſineſs to prepare every thing for the election of the new magiſtrates. He therefore called the people together once more, not by curiæ, but by centuries, and directed them to come armed into the campus Martius, in order to elect their new governors, who, according to the plan of government, propoſed by Brutus and approved by the people, were to be called conſuls (S). The inter-rex propoſed

(S) Pomponius the civilian is of opinion, that the name of conſul was taken from the word conſulere, as ſignifying to watch for the public good. Varro derives it from the ſame word, but in a different ſignification, viz. as importing to conſult or aſk counſel; becauſe the intent of thoſe who firſt inſtituted the poſed to the people Junius Brutus, the head of the conſpiracy, and Tarquinius Collatinus, the huſband of Lucretia; and they were unanimouſly elected to the new dignity and proclaimed conſuls. In the mean time, Tarquin being informed by ſome who had got out of the city before the gates were ſhut, that Brutus was raiſing commotions to his prejudice, haſtened to Rome, attended only by his ſons and a ſmall number of his moſt truſty friends; for he was little apprehenſive of a conſpiracy carried on by one whom he deſpiſed as an idiot. But finding to his great ſurprize, the gates ſhut, and the people in arms upon the walls, he returned with all expedition to the camp. There the army, during his ſhort abſence, had been gained over by the conſpirators to their party. Livy tells us, that Brutus went in perſon to the camp, and that he arrived before Ardea at the the conſuls was, that they ſhould do nothing without the advice of the people and ſenate. The law, which placed them at the head of the republic, calls them prætors and judges. We have this law ſtill remaining, as quoted by Tully in the third book of laws. When it was made in the comitia, which changed the monarchy into a republic, it was couched in the following words: Reges imperio duo ſunto, iique præeundo, judicando, & conſulendo, prætores, judices, conſules, appellentur. Militiæ ſummum jus habento. Nemini parento. Ollis ſalus populi ſumma lex eſto. They were indeed allowed the common uſe of the ſceptre, crown, and an habit of diſtinction. But Livy aſſures us, that on the days of their triumphs, in the public [illegible]rts, and at ſolemn ſacrifices, they wore a crown of gold, [illegible] ivory ſtaff or ſcepter, and an habit ſtriped with purple, as [illegible]he kings did (77). Valerius Maximus (78) tells us, that they retained firſt as many lictors as the kings, viz. twenty-four; he adds, that the conſul Poplicola reduced them to twelve. But each conſul was not attended by twelve lictors, neither did they divide them ſo as to have ſix apiece. They were only guarded by twelve lictors alternatively, each in his month. This ceremonial began with the two firſt conſuls; the conſul who was the oldeſt, or had moſt children, or moſt ſuffrages for the conſulſhip, had the lictors the firſt month. Brutus was attended with the faſces before his collegue Collatinus, as appears from the following verſe of Virgil:

the ſame time that Tarquin appeared at the gates of Rome. Others ſay, that the new conſuls ſent letters to the camp, giving an account of the reſolutions taken at Rome, and exhorting the troops to ſhake off the tyrannical yoke. However that be, it is certain, that, before Tarquin returned, the ſoldiers, being convened by centuries, had unanimouſly agreed to receive the decree paſſed in the city; ſo that when Tarquin returned, they refuſed to admit him. The tyrant being thus driven from his capital and abandoned by his troops, was forced, at the age of ſeventy-ſix, to fly with his wife and children to Gabii, or, as Livy will have it, to Cœre in Hetruria. Titus Herminius and Marcus Horatius, who commanded the army under Tarquin, made a truce with the Rutuli for fifteen years, and, having raiſed the ſiege of Ardea, returned to Rome with all their forces [q]. Thus ended the regal ſtate of Rome, two hundred and forty-three, or two hundred and forty-five years, according to the common computation, after the building of the city (T); and a new form of government was introduced, which,

[q] Dio. Hal. ibid. Liv. l. i. c. 60.

(T) We have followed the common computation with regard both to the ſeven kings of Rome and to the fourteen kings of Alba. But we cannot help thinking Sir Iſaac Newton's computations to be better grounded, and nearer the truth. We ſhall deliver his opinion in his own words: When the Greeks and Latins, ſays that writer, were forming their technical chronology, there were great diſputes about the antiquity of Rome. The Greeks made it much older than the olympiads; ſome of them ſaid it was built by Æneas; others by Romus the ſon or grandſon of Latinus, king of the Aborigines; others by Romus the ſon of Ulyſſes, or of Ancanius, or of Italus; and ſome of the Latins fell in at firſt with the opinion of the Greeks, ſaying, that it was built by Romulus, the ſon or grandſon of Æneas. Timæus Siculus repreſented it built by Romulus, the grandſon of Æneas, above an hundred years before the olympiads; and ſo did Nævius the poet, who was twenty years older than Ennius, and ſerved in the firſt Punic war, and wrote the hiſtory of that war. Hitherto nothing certain was agreed on; but about a hundred and forty or a hundred and fifty years after the death of Alexander the Great, they began to ſay, that Rome was built a ſecond time by Romulus in the fifteenth age after the deſtruction of Troy; by ages they meant the reigns of the Latins at Alba, and reckoned the firſt fourteen reigns at about four hundred and thirty-two years, and the following reigns of the ſeven

ſeven kings of Rome at two hundred and forty-four years; both which numbers made up the time of about ſix hundred and ſeventy-ſix years from the taking of Troy, according to thoſe chronologers; but are much too long for the courſe of nature: and by this reckoning they placed the building of Rome upon the ſixth or the ſeventh olympiad. Varro placed it on the firſt year of the ſeventh olympiad, and was therein generally followed by the Romans. But this can ſcarce be reconciled to the courſe of nature; for I do not meet with any inſtance in all hiſtory, ſince chronology was certain, wherein ſeven kings, moſt of whom were ſlain, reigned two hundred and forty-four years in continual ſucceſſion. The fourteen reigns of the kings of the Latins at twenty years a piece, one with another, amount to two hundred and eighty years; and theſe, counted from the taking of Troy, end in the thirty-eighth olympiad: and the ſeven reigns of the kings of Rome, four or five of them being ſlain, and one depoſed, may, at a moderate reckoning, amount to fifteen or ſixteen years a piece, one with another. Let them be reckoned at ſeventeen years apiece, and they will amount to a hundred and nineteen years; which being counted backwards from the regifuge, end alſo in the thirty-eighth olympiad: and by theſe two reckonings Rome was built in the thirty-eigth olympiad, or thereabout. The two hundred and eighty years and the hundred and nineteen years together make up three hundred and ninety-nine years; and the ſame number of years ariſes by counting the twenty and one reigns at nineteen years apiece: and this being the whole time between the taking of Troy and the regifuge, let theſe years be counted backward from the regifuge, An. 1. olymp. 68, and they will place the taking of Troy about ſeventy-four years after the death of Solomon (80). The death of Solomon Sir Iſaac places nine hundred and ſeventy-nine years before Chriſt; ſo that the taking of Troy by the Greeks, after which Æneas began his voyages, will be about nine hundred and five years before Chriſt: and as he makes the building of Carthage by Dido to be eight hundred and eighty-three before the chriſtian æra, there are according to him, little more than twenty years between theſe two laſt-mentioned events. This computation clears Virgil from that monſtrous anachroniſm of near three hundred years, with which he has been ſo often reproached.

CHAP. III.

The conſular ſtate of Rome, from the beginning of the government to the burning of the city by the Gauls.

ROME enjoyed a profound peace in the beginning of the new government. The army, which had ſerved under Tarquin before Ardea, being returned to the city, the conſuls, ſuſpecting they might preſerve ſome inclination for their general, called them together in the campus Martius, and, after having exhorted them to concord, they cauſed the decree, which was paſſed againſt the Tarquins to be renewed in their preſence. After this, the conſuls, ſtanding before the altars, on which the entrails of the victims had been offered, took an oath in the name of their children and all their poſterity, that they would never replace either Tarquin or his ſons, or any of his family, on the throne, nor create any other king of Rome, nor ſuffer any to be elected. Then the conſuls made the people take the ſame oath, and proceeded, after that ſolemn ceremony was over, to the election of a Rex Sacrorum, when Manius Papirius, a man of patrician extraction, was by the ſuffrages of the people raiſed the firſt to that dignity. The conſuls having now nothing to fear from the people, who were reſtored to all their antient rights, employed their thoughts about ſecuring the ſenators, among whom Valerius had great intereſt. He had expected to be named conſul at the firſt election; and the preference, which the people gave to Collatinus, had diſpleaſed him to ſuch a degree, that he had abſented himſelf from the ſeenate and public affairs; inſomuch, that he began to be ſuſpected of favouring the baniſhed king. But the public apprehenſion ceaſed, when he appeared in the ſenate on the day appointed for the ſenators to take the ſame oath which the people had taken. He then ſignalized anew his love for liberty, and ſwore the firſt, that he would never favour the pretenpretenſions of the Tarquins, nor ſuffer them, or any ot ever to reign at Rome[r].

The inhabitants of Tarquinii ſend an embaſſy to Rome in favour of the Tarquins.

THUS Rome was in tranquillity at home, but Tarc was raiſing her many enemies abroad. He had made T quinii in Hetruria his place of reſidence, and prevailed u the inhabitants to ſend an embaſſy to Rome with a letter fr him to the Roman people. The embaſſadors delivered letter to the ſenate, demanding that it might be read to people aſſembled in the comitia. But Valerius ſtrenuo oppoſed ſo dangerous a proceeding, and, by his intereſt the ſenate, defeated the firſt attempt of the artful Tarq As this body of the new commonwealth was above all otl concerned to exclude kings, by whom they had been k in a ſtate of dependence, the conſuls thought it neceſſary reſtore the ſenate to its antient majeſty and to gain the ſpect of the people, as well by the number of the ſenat as by their dignity. With this view the antient number three hundred was once more completed, the vacant pl being filled up by men of prudence and intereſt, choſen fr among the Roman knights. Theſe new ſenators were ca Conſcripti, that is, perſons written or inrolled on the ſa liſt, for they were added to the old ſenators.

BUT though Tarquin himſelf was hated both by the p ple and patricians, yet his ſons had a great number of yo debauchees in their intereſt. The Tarquins building th hopes on theſe young noblemen, who regretted the loſs their companions and the ſupporters of their extravagar prevailed with the Tarquinienſes to ſend a ſecond emb to Rome, under pretence of demanding the eſtates of exiles; but in reality to ſtir up a faction againſt the conſ The embaſſadors being admitted into the ſenate, ſpoke v great modeſty and reſerve; they only deſired, that the k might have his paternal eſtate reſtored to him, that at le which had been tranſmitted to him by his grandfather T quinius Priſcus, who had deſerved no ill treatment at t hands. The affair being laſt referred to the people, it was carried by one vote in the comitia, that the Tarquins ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of their paternal eſtates [a].

WHILE the people were employed in loading carriages with the effects of the exiles, and ſelling what could not be carried off, the embaſſadors laid hold of that opportunity, to engage ſome young noblemen in a plot againſt the conſuls. Among theſe were three of the Aquilian family, the ſons of Collatinus's ſiſter, and two Vitellii, whoſe ſiſter Brutus had married. The latter engaged in the ſame conſpiracy Titus and Tiberius, the two ſons of Brutus. The conſpirators met at the houſe of the Aquilii, and there the reſolution of putting the conſuls to death, and letting the Tarquins into the city by night, was taken in the preſence of the embaſſadors. They all bound themſelves by ſolemn oaths, with the deteſtable ceremony of drinking the blood of a murdered man, and ſwearing over his trembling bowels, that they would do all that lay in their power to deſtroy the conſuls and reſtore the king. After the ceremony was over, each of them wrote a letter to the king, as an authentic proof of their zeal for his intereſt, and put them into the hands of the embaſſadors. But, in ſpite of all the precaution uſed by the conſpirators to keep the ſecret from their ſervants, Vindicius, or, as Plutarch calls him, Vindex, a ſlave of the Aquilii, ſuſpecting his maſter's deſign, ſtaid at the door of the apartment, and through a crevice ſaw all the myſteries of the conſpiracy. However, he was afraid to diſcloſe the ſecret to either of the conſuls, apprehending that Brutus, to ſave his ſons, and Collatinus, to ſecure the lives of his nephews, might think fit to deſtroy the ſingle evidence of their crime. He went therefore ſtrait to P. Valerius, whoſe houſe was always open to the meaneſt of the people, and unburdened his mind to him. Valerius took the ſlave under his protection, and having ſhut him up in a room under the care of his wife, he went out attended by his friends, clients, and domeſtics, whom he divided into two bands; one he poſted, under the conduct of his brother M. Valerius, at the entrance of the houſe of the Aquilii, while he himſelf with a ſtrong guard entered the apartment of the embaſſadors, who lodged in the ſame houſe, and there found and ſeized the letters, which the conſpirators had writ the night before. As he was coming out, he met the Aquilii, who being ſurprized to ſee him and ſuſpecting that their letters were ſeized, endeavoured to force them from him. But all their endeavours were in vain; for Valerius not only kept them, but with the aſſiſtance of his attendants took all the heads of the conſpiracy priſoners. M. Valerius, his brother, had alſo the good luck to intercept other letters, concealed among ſome cloaths, which the domeſtics of the Aquilii were carrying away [t].

EARLY the next morning, the people were ſummoned to the comitia, where Brutus and his collegue ſat on the tribunal of juſtice. The priſoners, being brought before their judges, were, one after another, tied to ſtakes with their hands bound behind them. This was ſo melancholy a ſight, that the people could ſcarce refrain from tears, when they beheld in that condition the ſons of Brutus, whom they looked upon as their deliverer. The minds of the multitude were in ſuſpenſe about the ſentence, which the conſuls were to pronounce, the one againſt his ſons, the other againſt his nephews. But Brutus, without betraying the leaſt concern, began the trial with the examination of his ſons. Vindicius appeared againſt them; and his teſtimony was found unanſwerable. Then Brutus ordered the letters to be read, which his ſons had wrote to the Tarquins. The proof being clear, the priſoners made no defence but with their tears. "Titus," ſaid he, ſpeaking coldly to the two priſoners without calling them ſons, "and you, Tiberius, what have you to offer "in your defence?" They were thrice called upon to make their defence; but tears were ſtill their only anſwer. Upon which the greater part of the ſenators were moved with compaſſion, and a confuſed murmur was heard among them, "baniſh them; baniſh them." Collatinus wept, and Valerius, ſevere as he was, did not utter a ſingle word. This favourable diſpoſition gave the two guilty youths ſome hopes. But the whole aſſembly trembled, and expected the deciſion with horror. As the two criminals offered nothing in their defence, Brutus at length roſe up to give ſentence. Upon which enſued a profound ſilence, every one preſent being concerned for the young men as for their own children. But Brutus with a ſteady voice, not interrupted by a ſingle ſigh, turning to the lictors, who were the executioners, "To you, "lictors," ſaid he, "I deliver them, execute the law upon "them."

" them." At theſe words a loud ſhriek was heard in the aſſembly, diſtreſs ſhewed itſelf in every face, and the mournful looks of the people pleaded for pity. But the conſul ſhewing no regard to their tears, the whole aſſembly cried out, with one voice, " We give them back to their country " and to their family." But neither theſe interceſſions, nor the bitter lamentations of the young men, who called upon their father with the moſt indearing names, could ſoften the inflexible judge. He would not even abate of the puniſhment which was in ſuch caſes inflicted on the greateſt criminals. The lictors ſeized them, and having ſtripped them naked, and tied their hands behind them, they firſt beat them with rods, and then ſtruck off their heads, Brutus all the time gazing on the cruel ſpectacle, with a ſteady look and an unaltered countenance. When this execution was over, Brutus came down from the tribunal, quitted the comitia, and left the reſt of the criminals to the diſcretion of his colleague [u]. Collatinus, inclined to ſpare his nephews, allowed them one day to clear themſelves, and even ordered, that Vindicius ſhould be taken out of the hands of the accuſers, and delivered up to his maſters. This rouſed the zeal of Valerius, who had promiſed to protect the evidence. The lictors attempted in vain to force the important witneſs from him, and the people called for Brutus, inſiſting upon his coming back to the comitia. The unfortunate father had had but a few minutes to recollect himſelf, and ſecretly bewail the misfortunes of his family. However, he appeared again with the ſame firmneſs of mind he had ſhewn before, and, aſcending the tribunal, told the multitude, that what he had done was by virtue of his paternal authority over his children; but that for the reſt of the delinquents, it belonged to them to determine their fate, and either condemn his ſeverity by inſtances of lenity, or approve his firmneſs by examples of juſtice.

Collatinus is inclined to ſpare his nephews.

THUS three articles of great importance to the riſing commonwealth were left to the deciſion of the curiæ, viz. 1. What puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on the reſt of the conſpirators; 2. What puniſhment the embaſſadors of the Tarquinienſes had deſerved; 3. What reward ſhould be given to the diſcoverer of the conſpiracy. As to the firſt, they determined, that the conſpirators ſhould, without exception, ſuffer as rebels; which decree was accordingly executed. As to the ſecond ſecond, the embaſſadors were ſpared out of reſpect to the law of nations. In the third place, it was decreed, that Vindicius ſhould enjoy that liberty which he had ſecured to the Romans (U), and beſides, that he ſhould be rewarded with all the privileges of a Roman citizen, and with twenty-five thouſand aſſes of braſs, to be paid him out of the public treaſury. And now, though the people had formerly decreed, that the eſtates of the Tarquins ſhould be reſtored to them, the

(U) It is commonly believed, that the Latin phraſe, vindicare in libertatem, that is, to ſet free, had its riſe from the name of Vindicius. Some indeed derive it from the word vindicta, which ſignifies a wand, with which the prætor uſed to ſtrike the ſlave, whoſe maſter had a mind to ſet him at liberty. But in all likelihood the vindicta, or wand itſelf, took its name from Vindicius. The ceremony of granting freedoms publicly was thus performed: the ſlave was brought before the conſul, and in after-ages before the prætor, by his maſter, who, laying his hand upon his ſlave's head, ſaid to the prætor, hunc hominem liberum eſſe volo, and with that took him by the hand, and immediately let go his hold; whence came the Latin word manumiſſio, and the phraſe è manu emittere. Then he gave him a blow on the cheek, and preſented him to the conſul or prætor, who, ſtriking him gently with his vindicta or wand, pronounced theſe words, aio te liberum eſſe more Quiritium. Hence Perſius.

Vindicta poſtquam meus a prætore receſſi.

This ceremony being ended, the ſlave was regiſtered upon the roll of freed-men. Then he was ſhaved, and received a cap in token of his liberty. But this ceremony of taking the cap was performed in the temple of Feronia, the goddeſs of freed-men. In this temple there was a ſeat of ſtone with this inſcription, Bene meriti ſervi ſedeant, ſurgant liberi. The pileus, or cap was among the Romans, as is well known, a ſymbol of liberty. Another way of conferring freedom was by teſtament. A ſlave was ſaid to be free by teſtament, when his maſter, in conſideration of his faithful ſervice had left him free by his laſt will. This kind of liberti or freed-men were ſtiled Orcini, becauſe their maſters were gone to Orcus, or the infernal regions. In alluſion to this cuſtom, thoſe ſenators were merrily diſtinguiſhed by the name of Senatores Orcini, who, upon the death of Julius Cæſar, thruſt themſelves into the ſenate without any juſt claim to the ſenatorial dignity (81). From theſe two manners of conferring freedom came the Latin expreſſions, liber manumiſſione, liber teſtamento.

the ſenate refuſed to the declared enemies of Rome thoſe means which they deſigned to make uſe of for its deſtruction; ſo that their palace, with its beautiful portico, was deſtroyed, and their lands diſtributed among thoſe indigent citizens who had none of their own. The public kept only a piece of ground, lying between the city and the Tiber, and bordering on the campus Martius, which the king had, by an incroachment on the city, added to his demeſnes, and cultivated for his own profit. This piece of ground was conſecrated to Mars, and became afterwards a common field, where the Roman youth exerciſed themſelves in running and wreſtling. After the field was conſecrated, the Romans ſcrupled making any advantage of the corn, which they found ready reaped to their hands, and therefore threw it, together with the trees which encompaſſed the field, into the Tiber. The water being at that time very low, the trees and ſheaves of corn, ſtopping in a muddy place, began to form that iſland, which, from the many temples built on it, was afterwards called the holy iſland [w] (W).

In the mean time, the weakneſs which Collatinus had betrayed at the trial of the conſpirators, had turned the ſuſpicions, which the people entertained of him, into hatred. Brutus, obſerving this, took advantage of the diſpoſition of the multitude to get him depoſed. In a numerous aſſembly of the people he made a ſpeech, in which he bitterly inveighed againſt him, as if he had attempted the deſtruction of that liberty, which his honour obliged him to defend. He ended his harangue with theſe words; 'His ſoliciting you to reſtore 'to the enemies of Rome their eſtates, and to grant impu-'nity to cruel conſpirators, have unmasked a partiſan of the 'Tarquins, concealed under the appearance of a conſul. Let 'us prevent, O Romans, the evils, which a domeſtic enemy 'is preparing for us. Let us deprive him of that authority 'which he abuſes, and wreſt that ſword out of his hand with

(W) The Romans built ſeveral temples on the iſland, particularly three frequently ſpoke of by the antients, viz. one dedicated to Faunus, another to Jupiter, and the third to Æſculapius, which was a very magnificient ſtructure. From theſe temples it was called the ſacred iſland. It was joined to the city, and to the Janiculum by two bridges, whence it took the name of the iſland of the two bridges.

'which he threatens us. In my judgment he ought to be 'depoſed. I therefore order you to aſſemble by curiæ, to 'determine by your ſuffrages, whether Collatinus or Brutus 'is to be your conſul; you cannot have both, for I from this 'moment renounce the conſulſhip, if Collatinus is to ſhare 'the government with me.' Theſe words made ſo deep an impreſſion on the minds of the multitude, that they would not hear Collatinus, when he began to ſpeak in his own defence. His only reſource was to forbid the people, by virtue of his authority as conſul, to hold the aſſembly, which his collegue had appointed; but this prohibition was a new provocation, which raiſed the indignation of the people to ſuch a height, that they cried out to have their votes inſtantly taken, and were going to depoſe Collatinus with ignominy, and baniſh him by a public decree. But Spurius Lucretius, his father-in-law, having obtained leave of the conſuls to ſpeak to the aſſembly, adviſed Collatinus voluntarily to reſign into the hands of the people that authority which he had received from them. Then he exhorted Brutus not to inſiſt on the diſgraceful baniſhment of a collegue, who, jointly with him, had been one of the principal authors of the common liberty, adding, that if Collatinus ſhould, of his own accord, deveſt himſelf of the conſulſhip, it would be but reaſonable, that the Romans ſhould mitigate the uneaſineſs of his voluntary retirement by their liberality, ſo as to enable him to ſupport the dignity of a Roman conſul in his retirement. This advice was received with univerſal applauſe. Collatinus reſigned the conſulſhip; and Brutus, after having commended his wiſdom, to ſhew that he had no perſonal enmity to him, procured him a preſent of twenty talents out of the public treaſury, to which he added five talents of his own. Collatinus retired to Lavinium, where he led a quiet life, and died in a very advanced age [x] (X).

Collatinus is forced to abdicate the conſulſhip.

[x] Dio. Hal. p. 287. Plut. ibid.

(X) Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus differs in his account of this whole matter from Plutarch, whom we have followed, thinking his relation of theſe tranſactions more agreeable to the temper of Brutus. The former writer tells us, that Brutus, immediately after the execution of his children, cauſed the Aquilii to be brought before him, and gave them leave to make their defence; and that they, after their letters were read aloud, having recourſe to tears and entreaties only, owned the crimes

BRUTUS, that the people might have no room to ſuſpect that he intended to govern ſingly, immediately aſſembled the people by centuries in the campus Martius, for the election of a new conſul, when Publius Valerius was choſen, a man remarkable for his eloquence, for the talent of reconciling differences, an exceſſive abſtemiouſneſs, ſeverity to himſelf, and compaſſion for the miſeries of other men (Y). As the two conſuls were equally eminent for their love of virtue and of the

that were laid to their charge. Whereupon the inflexible Brutus ordered the lictors to ſeize them, and execute the law upon them. Collatinus ſuſpended the execution, and made the warmeſt remonſtrances in favour of the conſpirators; but being piqued at the obſtinacy of Brutus, he had recourſe to his authority and pardoned the criminals. This ſo exaſperated Brutus, that he committed the Aquilii to priſon, in ſpite of the oppoſition of his collegue, and accuſed him before the people of treaſon and perfidiouſneſs. Collatinus, finding the people obſtinately bent againſt him and thoſe whoſe defence he had undertaken, thought he could no longer exerciſe the office of conſul with dignity, and therefore abdicated. Brutus, upon his abdication, put all thoſe to death, who had been any-ways concerned in the conſpiracy. Livy ſays, that Collatinus was obliged to lay down the conſulſhip, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had the misfortune to be deſcended from the Tarquins. The ſame author places the conſpiracy of the Vitellii and Aquilii in the conſulſhip of Brutus and Valerius, after Collatinus was depoſed; but therein he is contradicted both by Plutarch and Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, who place the circumſtances of the conſpiracy in the order we have related them.

(Y) Valerius was originally a Sabine, and ſtill preſerved that auſterity of manners, which was profeſſed in the country of his anceſtors. The firſt of his family, who ſettled at Rome, was Valerius Voleſus, or, as Feſtus and the Faſti Capitolini call him, Veluſus. Plutarch gives him the honour of negotiating the peace between Romulus and Tatius. Valerius Voleſus, father of P. Valerius, left him a great eſtate, the beſt part which he applied to the relief of the indigent in the time of the kings, when his liberality could not proceed from any hopes of preferment. He was a man of great eloquence, conſidering the ruſticity of the Romans in thoſe days; but is ſaid never to have made uſe of the art of perſuaſion but to defend the oppreſſed, as he made no other uſe of his great wealth, but to relieve the miſerable. However, he was not free from ambition, and had taken it very much amiſs, that the people, in the former election, had preferred to him one of the blood of the Tarquins.

public good, there was a perfect harmony between them. They began their adminiſtration by paſſing a law, which granted a general amneſty to all thoſe who had followed the fortune of the Tarquins, provided they returned to the city within twenty days. This wiſe precaution deprived the baniſhed king of a great number of friends and ſoldiers, and brought back to Rome many perſons of eminent parts[y]. However, Tarquin was not ſo diſcouraged by the deſertion of the Romans, as to loſe all hopes of recovering the kingdom, and getting by force what he could not carry by ſtratagem. He had recourſe to the Veientes, the old enemies of Rome, and having engaged them and the Tarquinienſes to unite their forces in the ſupport of his cauſe, he advanced towards Rome. The conſuls, without delay, marched out to meet him. Brutus commanded the horſe, and Valerius the foot, drawn up in a ſquare battalion. When the two armies were in ſight of one another, a motion was made on both ſides to begin the onſet. Brutus advanced with his cavalry, and Aruns, one of Tarquin's ſons, at the ſame time came forward at the head of the enemy's horſe. Aruns no ſooner diſcovered Brutus, attended with lictors, but, inflamed with rage, he cried out, "There he is, the enemy of my "family, the uſurper of my father's throne." This ſaid, he puſhed on his horſe, and Brutus flew to meet him. As the two champions were hurried on more by hatred and rage, than the love of glory, paſſion left no room on either ſide for ſkill or precaution. They ruſhed on to the encounter with ſuch fury, that they were both run through the body. Their horſes, meeting each other with a violent ſhock, threw their dying riders; and the death of theſe generals was the prelude to the battle, which continued till night with dubious ſucceſs, it not being known in either camp which ſide had gained the victory, or which had loſt the greater number of men; but in the night the Hetrurians, being terrified by a voice which was heard out of the neighbouring wood of Arſia, declaring the Romans conquerors, without doubt a ſtratagem of Valerius, abandoned their camp in great confuſion, diſbanded, and returned into their own country. Hereupon Valerius, remaining maſter of the field, plundered the enemy's camp; and, having cauſed the ſlain to be numbered, found, that the Hetrurians had loſt eleven thouſand three hundred men, and the Romans but one man ſhort of that number. For this this victory Valerius triumphed on his return to the city, after a more magnificent manner than any before him. Soon after he buried his collegue Brutus with great pomp, and gave Rome the firſt example of thoſe funeral orations, which were ever after made in commendation of great men. The women diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion, for looking upon Brutus as the avenger of the honour of their ſex, they mourned for him a whole year (Z). As Valerius deferred ſome time convening the centuries for the election of a new conſul, the Romans, who carried their love of liberty to an exceſs, began to put a bad conſtruction upon his delays; and their jealouſy was in ſome meaſure countenanced by his building at that time a fine houſe, on a ſteep part of the hill Palatinus, which commanded the forum. But Valerius, being informed of their uneaſineſs, cauſed the houſe to be levelled with the ground the very next night; and having called the people together as ſoon as it was day, he expoſtulated with them about their groundleſs ſuſpicions, bid them go ſee the ruins of that building which had given them umbrage, and told them, that he deſigned to fix his habitation in the valley, that they might, from the top of the hill, cruſh him with ſtones, if he was ſtill the object of their jealouſy. When he had ended his ſpeech, he ordered the comitia to aſſemble for the election of a new conſul. On this occaſion Rome gave a freſh proof of her gratitude to the firſt authors of her liberty; for Sp. Lucretius, the father of Lucretia, was unanimouſly choſen to ſucceed Brutus. He was the only perſon who remained unrewarded of the four patricians, who had bound themſelves by oath to deliver their country from ſlavery. He was

(Z) Brutus is deſervedly counted by all the antients among the moſt illuſtrious heroes we find mentioned in hiſtory. He reſtored liberty to his country, ſecured it with the blood of his own ſons, and died in defending it againſt an uſurper. The Romans looked upon him as a ſecond founder of their city, and owned, that he had undergone more hardſhips and dangers in eſtabliſhing the commonwealth, than Romulus had done in founding the kingdom. The Romans afterwards erected his ſtatue in the capitol, where he was placed in the midſt of the kings of Rome, with a naked ſword in his hand. It plainly appears, that he left no iſſue; and yet Tully mentions Marcus Brutus, one of the chief conſpirators againſt Cæſar, as lineally deſcended from the firſt conſul; but herein he is contradicted by moſt of the antients, who tell us, that Junius Brutus left no children behind him.

was therefore pitched upon for the conſular dignity; but the new conſul died a few days after his election; ſo that Valerius was once more ſole governor. And now the many proofs which he gave the people of his zeal for their intereſt, gained him the name of Poplicola, or Popular, which he ever after retained. He began his adminiſtration by ordering the axes, which were ſo apt to ſtrike terror, to be taken out of the faſces, which he obliged the lictors to lower in the aſſemblies of the people. He made ſeveral laws in favour of the people, which greatly retrenched the conſular power. By one he allowed an appeal from the conſuls to the people. By another he exempted artificers, widows, and old men, who had no children to relieve them, from paying tribute. A third law preſcribed an abſolute ſubmiſſion to the orders of the conſuls; but limited the fine laid upon thoſe who diſobeyed them, to the value of five oxen and two rams. He alſo publiſhed a fourth, making it lawful to kill, without waiting for a legal condemnation, any perſon who ſhould aſpire to the ſovereign power. Impunity was promiſed to the murderer, provided he could prove the ill deſigns of the perſon he had killed. The laſt law he enacted was, with relation to the public money, which he ordered to be removed from his own houſe to the temple of Saturn, where it was committed to the care of two ſenators of probity, choſen by the people, and afterwards called quæſtors[z] (A). Poplicola had no ſooner enacted

[z] Liv. l. ii. c. 7.

(A) According to Plutarch, there were no quæſtors in Rome till Poplicola's time; and this office was originally annexed to that of the conſuls, or rather a branch of it. But Ulpian, on the contrary, pretends, and quotes ſeveral authors to ſupport his opinion, that there were quæſtors even in Tullus Hoſtilius's reign. To reconcile theſe two opinions, it is to be obſerved, that the name of quæſtors among the Romans had two different ſignifications; ſometimes it ſignified commiſſioners, by whom capital crimes were cognizable, and ſometimes magiſtrates, who were put in commiſſion for managing the public money. Ulpian might ſpeak of the former ſort of quæſtors, as being in the time of the kings; and Plutarch of the other, which was introduced by Poplicola in the time of the commonwealth. The office of the quæſtors was to take care of the public treaſure, for which they were accountable when their year was out; for their office laſted no longer; to furniſh the neceſſary ſums for the ſervice of the public; and to receive embaſſadors, attend them, and provide them with lodgings and

ed thoſe laws, and made ſeveral other regulations very advantageous for the people, but he aſſembled the comitia for the election of a new conſul, which he had deferred, only becauſe he apprehended, that a collegue might poſſibly oppoſe his deſign

and other neceſſaries. When the army returned from any war, the military enſigns were put into their hands, to be depoſited by them in the temple of Saturn. A general could not obtain the honours of a triumph, till he had given them a faithful account of the ſpoils taken from the enemy, and ſwore to it. Tho' the quæſtors had no juriſdiction, that is, could not cite any perſon to appear before them, or impriſon a man; Neque vocationem, neque prehenſionem habebant, atque ad prætorem in jus vocari poterant, ſays Aulus Gellius (82); yet the moſt illuſtrious patricians, and even thoſe who had been conſuls, did not think this office beneath them. We find in the antient annals, that Titus Quinctius Capitolinus and M. Valerius were quæſtors, after they had enjoyed the honour of the conſulſhip three times. Cato the elder accepted the quæſtorſhip after he had triumphed, and diſcharged the firſt and moſt honourable employments of the republic. There were at firſt two quæſtors only, and thoſe of the patrician order; but, as their buſineſs encreaſed, it was thought adviſeable to create two more, whoſe province was confined to the paying of the armies abroad, and the ſelling of the plunder and booty. When this regulation came to be paſſed into a law by the people, the tribunes inſiſted, that it ſhould not paſs, but upon condition, that two of the four quæſtors ſhould be plebeians. This the ſenate and conſuls oppoſed at firſt, but were at length obliged to yield to the demands of the tribunes. Theſe new quæſtors were called quæſtores conſulares, militares, and peregrini. They attended the Roman armies, paid the troops, and ſold the ſpoils and priſoners taken from the enemy. The other quæſtors were called quæſtores ærarii and urbani, becauſe they were quæſtors of the treaſury, and reſided at Rome. In the laſt conſulſhip of Fabius Gurges, that is, about the year of Rome 488, the great encreaſe of the republic cauſed the number of the quæſtors to be doubled. The four new ones were called provincial quæſtors, and each of them had his province, where he reſided, thoſe parts of Italy, which were ſubject to Rome, being divided into four large provinces or diſtricts. The provincial quæſtors were afterwards multiplied, in proportion as the republic enlarged her conqueſts. The military quæſtors and the urbani, or thoſe who reſided in Rome, had neither curule chairs, nor lictors, nor apparitores, nor any other marks of diſtinction annexed to their office; nay, they were obliged to appear before the prætor, when ſummoned by the meaneſt of the citizens; but the provincial quæſtors, to encreaſe the ſtate of the Roman people, were allowed to appear in their provinces with the pretexta, and guarded by lictors with their faſces. This is plain from ſeveral paſſages in Tully. In his third oration againſt Verres, The two Sicilian quæſtors, ſays he, came before me with their faſces; and in his oration for Plancius, he acknowledges it as a favour, that Plancius, tho' then quæſtor, came to receive him at Dyrrachium without his lictors and the uſual marks of his dignity. The office of the provincial quæſtors was to take the ſame care of the revenues of the provinces, which the quæſtores ærarii had of the revenues at Rome. They were particularly concerned in all caſes relating to proviſions; and no contract for corn could be made without them. The four provincial quæſtorſhips were ſought for by the moſt ambitious, before Rome had extended her conqueſts beyond Italy; but when ſhe had brought the eaſt and weſt under ſubjection, and great kingdoms were become ſo many provinces, the four Italian ones began to be deſpiſed. The proconſuls and proprætors, that is, the governors of thoſe provinces and kingdoms, had each his quæſtor to take care of the revenues; and then the quæſtorſhips of the large and diſtant provinces were moſt greedily ſought for by thoſe who were qualified to ſtand candidates for them. They were there out of the ſight of the ſenate, and ſometimes in rich governments, where they could raiſe more money, and were more honoured and reſpected; for this reaſon, when the quæſtors drew lots in the preſence of the Roman tribes for the quæſtorſhips, the perſon, to whom any of the Italian ones fell, became the jeſt of the people. He goes to the waters, ſaid the people, meaning, that he was going to live quietly near Rome, as thoſe Romans did, who went to Baia or Puteoli for the waters. Some think, that this proverb alludes to the office of the Italian quæſtors, who were often obliged to go to the ſea-ports to collect the impoſts the republic had laid on exported goods. The quæſtors were firſt choſen by the people, and afterwards by the conſuls, the quæſtorſhip being originally a branch of their office. In Tully's time they were again choſen by the people in the comitia by tribes; of which more hereafter. The office of quæſtor, tho' often diſcharged by perſons who had been conſuls, was the firſt ſtep to great employments. None could ſtand for the quæſtorſhip till they attained to a certain age; but to determine the exact age the laws required, is no eaſy matter. Some pretend, that none could undertake this office till they were twenty-ſeven, and quote Polybius in favour of their opinion; for brother of the famous Lucretia. The new conſuls revived the cenſus and the luſtrum, and on that occaſion found one hundred and thirty thouſand men in Rome, who were at, or paſt, the age of puberty [a].

In the mean time, Poplicola's ſecond conſulſhip being expired, he was choſen a third time, and with him Horatius Pulvillus, who had before been conſul for a few months. During their conſulſhip, Porſena, king of the Cluſini, one of the twelve nations of Hetruria, being gained by the great promiſes of Tarquin, eſpouſed his cauſe, and, at the head of a prodigious, but ſomewhat confuſed, multitude of Hetrurians, advanced to the banks of the Tiber. The firſt poſt he attacked was the fort of the Janiculum, which he made himſelf maſter of, obliging the Romans to retire over the bridge into the city. This firſt ſhock put them into confuſion; but the conſuls, encouraging their men, made them paſs the river with the utmoſt expedition, and drew them up in order of battle beyond the bridge, to ſecure the paſs. Hereupon Porſena advanced to engage them. The victory was long doubtful; but M. Valerius, Poplicola's brother, and T. Lucretius, who were at the head of the left wing, being both wounded and carried out of the field, a general terror ſeized the Roman army. Horatius Cocles, a brave Roman, having endeavoured in vain to rally the terrified legions, reſolved rather to die than abandon his poſt; and being joined by Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, theſe three heroes placed themſelves in the narrow paſs which led to the bridge, and there, calling out to the Romans to break it down, valiantly oppoſed the enemy, till the demolition of the bridge was near completed. Then Horatius, having prevailed upon his companions to croſs the river on a few planks which remained, ſuſtained for ſome time for that author writes (83), that the quæſtorſhip was not to be obtained till after ten years ſervice in the army; and the Romans uſually entered into the army at the age of ſeventeen. Others think, that the age fixed by the law was twenty-four or twenty-five. In proceſs of time, when honours were obtained by intrigues and favour, theſe laws were neglected; for Cæſar and Pollio were quæſtors, as Quintilian informs us (84), long before they were of the age the law required.

time alone the attack of the enemy. At length, being wounded in the thigh, upon a ſignal given him that the bridge was quite demoliſhed, he leaped into the river, and gained the oppoſite bank, through a ſhower of darts. Thus, by the wonderful bravery of one man, was the city and republic ſaved from impending ruin. The whole city was ſo ſenſible of this, that they all haſtened to pay their acknowledgments to their deliverer. They crowned him at his arrival, carried him on their arms from the place where he landed into the city, and erected a ſtatue of braſs to him in the temple of Vulcan. The ſenate gave him as much land as one plough could encloſe within a circular furrow in one day; and tho' there was a great ſcarcity in Rome, yet the inhabitants, to the number of three hundred thouſand, aſſeſſed themſelves, to make him a preſent of as much proviſions as each of them conſumed in a day. However, as Horatius had but one eye, whence he was ſirnamed Cocles, and continued lame the remainder part of his life, theſe defects prevented his ever being elected conſul.

As Porſena was maſter of the country on both ſides of the river, it was very difficult to find proviſions for ſo great a number of inhabitants. A famine therefore began to be felt, and many of the indigent populace, who, in ſuch caſes, are the firſt ſufferers, went to ſeek bread in the enemy's camp; but the conſuls kept up the courage of the beſt citizens, by aſſuring them, that a convoy of corn would ſoon arrive in the camp from Pometia: and their expectations were not diſappointed; many boats loaded with corn ſafely entered the port of Rome in the night. But in a ſhort time the city was again reduced to great ſtreights; which Porſena having notice of, ſent the Romans word, that he would deliver them from the hunger they ſuffered, if they would receive their old maſters; but they, notwithſtanding their preſent diſtreſs, returned this anſwer, That hunger was a leſs evil than ſlavery and oppreſſion.

In the mean time, the conſuls formed a ſcheme for drawing the enemy into an ambuſcade; and for that purpoſe ſpread at Rome a report, which was ſoon carried into the Hetrurian camp by the ſlaves who deſerted, that the next day all the cattle brought thither from the country, would be ſent to graze in the fields under a guard. This bate drew the enemy into an ambuſh, in which five thouſand of them were cut in pieces; but, notwithſtanding this and ſome other ſmall advantages, Rome was almoſt wearied out with ſo long a ſiege

a ſiege, when Mucius Cordus, a young Roman of an illuſtrious birth, formed a deſign, which raiſed the courage of the people. He prevailed upon the conſuls to conſent to it, and imparted it to the ſenators, leſt his leaving Rome ſhould be looked upon as a deſertion; but all he told them was, that he intended to croſs the Tiber, enter the enemy's camp, and there execute ſome great exploit. The conſuls and ſenate having encouraged him to undertake any thing in the preſent deplorable ſtate of Rome, he went out of the city with a poniard under his garment, and, being dreſſed in the Hetrurian habit, entered the enemy's camp undiſcovered, mixed with the Hetrurian ſoldiers, whoſe language he had learned from his infancy, and made his way quite to the king's tent. It happened to be the day on which the troops were all reviewed and paid, and Porſena's ſecretary, magnificently dreſſed, was ſitting on the ſame tribunal with the king, giving audience and receiving petitions. Mucius, miſtaking him for the king, leaped upon the tribunal, and, with one ſtroke of his poniard, laid him dead at the king's feet. He then attempted to make his eſcape through the multitude that ſtood amazed at ſo bold and unexpected an attempt; but being ſeized and brought back to the tribunal, which he had juſt ſtained with blood, "Thou execrable "aſſaſſin", ſaid the king, "who art thou? whence comeſt "thou? who are thy accomplices"? To which words Mucius, leſs terrified than his judge, made this reply; "I "am a Roman, and my name is Mucius Cordus. My de- "ſign was to deliver Rome from her moſt cruel enemy; "diſcharge therefore all thy fury upon me. Thou haſt "been an eye-witneſs of my courage, now try my con- "ſtancy with tortures; and then thou wilt be forced to "confeſs, that Roman bravery has made me capable both "of attempting whatever man can do, and ſuffering what "human nature can endure". This diſcourſe filled Porſena with amazement; but he was ſtill more ſurprized when he ſaw the Roman, with a ſteady countenance, and a look, which teſtified his inward rage at having miſſed his blow, thruſt his right hand into a pan of burning coals, and there hold it a great while without ſhewing any ſigns of pain. So ſurpriſing a ſight changed the king's reſentment into admiration. Porſena granted him his life and liberty, and reſtored him the dagger, which he had made uſe of with a deſign to ſtab him. Mucius, who had now loſt the uſe

MUCIUS was in his turn charmed with the generoſity of his enemy; but had the preſence of mind to invent a ſtory for the ſervice of his country. He pretended to diſcover to the king a plot, which, he ſaid, was formed at Rome againſt his life by three hundred young Romans, all as reſolute as himſelf, who were diſperſed in the Hetrurian camp, and had bound themſelves, by the moſt ſacred oaths, to attempt his life, one after another, at the ſame hazard as he had done. Porſena, ſtruck with terror at his pretended diſcovery, as ſoon as Mucius was retired, called a council to deliberate about the means of preſerving himſelf from the dangers which threatened him. His friends and counſellors ſuggeſted various precautions; but none of them ſeeming ſufficient to remove his uneaſineſs, his ſon Aruns, a great admirer of the Roman virtue, adviſed him to render all precautions needleſs, by abandoning the cauſe of a few exiles, and concluding a peace with the Romans. His advice made an impreſſion on Porſena; and, as the Hetrurians had already begun to complain of the length of the ſiege, he ſent deputies to Rome, whoſe demands ſhewed, that their maſter had much abated of his former pretenſions; for they did not inſiſt on the reſtoration of the Tarquins, but only on the reſtitution of their eſtates, or an equivalent. And, in regard of their own nation, they required the Romans to reinſtate the Veientes in the poſſeſſion of ſeven villages, which they had taken from them in former wars. The embaſſadors were received at Rome with joy; and their demands being heard in the ſenate, Poplicola prevailed upon the ſenators to comply with them; but the people would not conſent to the firſt article, till Porſena had heard the ſtrong reaſons they had to offer againſt it; after which they were willing to leave it to his arbitration. As to the other article, they readily agreed to it, and offered hoſtages to ſecure the performance of it. A truce being agreed on, the Romans ſent their deputies to Porſena's camp, to plead their cauſe againſt the Tarquins, and with them the hoſtages they had promiſed, ten young men, and as many virgins, of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome. Among theſe were the ſon of Horatius the conſul, Valeria the daughter of Poplicola, and the famous Clælia. The reception Porſena gave the Roman man envoys, raiſed the jealouſy of the Tarquins, who, ſtill retaining their antient pride, refuſed to admit Porſena for a judge between them and the Romans. But the king, without any regard to their oppoſition, reſolved to ſatisfy himſelf, by an exact enquiry, whether the protection he had given the Tarquins was juſt? But while the cauſe was ready to be opened before the Roman deputies, news was brought, that the young women, whom the Romans had ſent as hoſtages, had ventured to ſwim croſs the Tiber and were returned to Rome. They had gone to bathe in the river; and Clælia happening to turn her eyes towards her native city, that ſight raiſed in her a deſire of returning to it. She therefore ventured to ſwim croſs the river; and having encouraged her companions to follow her, they all got ſafe to the oppoſite ſhore, and returned to their fathers houſes (B). The return of the hoſtages gave the conſul Poplicola great uneaſineſs; he was afraid leſt this raſh action might be imputed to want of fidelity in the Romans. To remove therefore all ſuſpicions, he ſent a deputation to the Hetrurian camp, aſſuring the king, that Rome had no ſhare in the fooliſh attempt of the young women, and promiſing to ſend them immediately back to the camp from whence they had fled. Porſena was eaſily appeaſed; but the news of the ſpeedy return of the hoſtages being known in the camp, the Tarquins, without any regard to the truce, or reſpect to the king their protector, lay in ambuſh on the road to ſurprize them. Poplicola, having put himſelf at the head of the Roman troops who eſcorted them, ſuſtained the attack of the Tarquins, tho' ſudden and unexpected, till his daughter Valeria rode full ſpeed to the Hetrurian camp, and gave notice of the danger her father and companions were in; and then

(B) Authors vary as to the circumſtances of this fact; for Livy ſays, that the young women croſſed the river in ſight of the Hetrurians, who lined the ſhore, and in the midſt of the darts, which were diſcharged at them from all parts. Aurelius Victor and Florus tell us, that Clælia, having accidentally found a horſe, croſſed the river on horſe-back. Porſena, as we have ſaid, preſented her with a fine horſe; which might give riſe to this fable. An equeſtrian ſtatue was erected to her memory in the via ſacra, which, according to Plutarch, was to be ſeen in his time (85). Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus ſays it was conſumed by fire.

then Aruns, the king's ſon, flying with a great body of cavalry to their relief, put the aggreſſors to the rout. This notorious piece of treachery in the Tarquins, gave Porſena ſtrong ſuſpicions of the badneſs of their cauſe. He therefore aſſembled the chief commanders of the Hetrurians, and having heard in their preſence the complaints of the Romans, and the juſtification of their proceedings againſt the Tarquins, he was ſo ſtruck with horror at the recital of the crimes the Tarquins were charged with, that he immediately ordered them to leave his camp, declaring, that he renounced his alliance with them, and would no longer continue the hoſpitality he had ſhewn them. He then commanded the ten young virgins to be brought before him, and enquired, who was the firſt author and chief manager of the enterprize? They all kept ſilence, till Clælia herſelf, with an air of intrepidity, confeſſed, that ſhe alone was guilty, and that ſhe had encouraged the others by her advice. Upon this, the king, extolling her reſolution above the bravery of Horatius and the intrepidity of Mucius, made her a preſent of a fine horſe with ſumptuous furniture. After this he concluded a peace with the Romans, and reſtored to them all their hoſtages, declaring that their bare word was to him ſufficient ſecurity for the performance of the articles [c].

Porſena renounces his alliance with the Tarquins.

His generoſity towards the Romans

And now Porſena, being to return to Cluſium, gave, before his departure, a further teſtimony of his reſpect and friendſhip for the Romans. He knew, that Rome was greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; but being afraid to offend the inhabitants by relieving them in a direct manner, he ordered his ſoldiers to leave behind them their tents and proviſions, and to carry nothing with them but their arms. As his camp abounded with all ſorts of proviſions, Rome was hereby much relieved in her wants. The moveables and corn of the Hetrurians were ſold by auction to private perſons; and on this occaſion the Romans took up the cuſtom of making a proclamation by an herald, when any effects belonging to the public were to be ſold, in the following words, "Theſe are Porſena's goods." The deſign of this was to preſerve the memory of that prince's kindneſs. The ſenate, not ſatisfied with this, erected a ſtatue of the king near the comitium, and ſent an embaſſy to him with a preſent

AFTER the departure of Porſena, the Romans firſt rewarded thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves during the ſiege, eſpecially Mucius Scævola, to whom they gave a large piece of ground belonging to the public. Their next care was to ſhew their gratitude to the gods, by ſome public act of religion; and as the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus had not yet been conſecrated, the ſenate ordered the conſecration of it. It naturally belonged to one of the conſuls to perform the ceremony; but it was the right of the ſenate to appoint which of the conſuls they pleaſed. The patricians had been long jealous of the glory, which Poplicola had acquired in his three conſulſhips; and therefore in order to rob him of this mark of diſtinction, ordered him to march out againſt ſome Latin troops, that committed ravages in the Roman territory, and in his abſence, appointed his collegue Horatius Pulvillus to perform the ceremony. As he was beginning the conſecration, Poplicola's brother, Marcus, cried out, "I give you notice, that your ſon has "loſt his life in a battle." This was falſe; but he hoped by theſe words to interrupt the ceremony. But Horatius, without ſhewing the leaſt concern, coldly replied, "Then "let him be buried," and finiſhed the conſecration. Thus Poplicola ended the glorious year of his third conſulſhip, with receiving a mortification, which could not but ſenſibly affect him. Spurius Lartius and T. Herminius, who had ſo valiantly defended the bridge, were choſen conſuls for the next year; which proved a year of peace.

IN the conſulſhip of M. Valerius, brother to Poplicola, and P. Poſthumius, who ſucceeded the above-mentioned conſuls, the Sabines, invading the Roman territories, committed great devaſtations. Whereupon the two conſuls took the field; and having divided their forces into two bodies, Poſthumius with one of them encamped at a ſmall diſtance from Rome, to prevent a ſurprize from the Tarquins; while Valerius poſted himſelf at Tiber upon the Anio. As the Sabines were encamped on the oppoſite bank, Valerius, by the advice of his brother Poplicola, croſſing the river, offered them battle; which they not declining, a bloody engagement enſued, wherein Valerius gained ſome advantage with his right, but his left being almoſt puſhed into the river, he was very near loſing the day, when his collegue who had notice of the action, coming ſeaſonably to his relief, attacked the enemy in flank, and put them to flight. The Sabine troops would have been entirely cut off, if night coming on had not given them an opportunity to eſcape. For this victory the conſuls were decreed a triumph, and they both entered Rome in the ſame chariot. Valerius is ſaid to have gained the ſame year a ſecond victory over the Sabines, and to have killed thirteen thouſand of them, without the loſs of one Roman. The republic therefore, to reward him according to his merit, built him a houſe, and, to diſtinguiſh it from all others, ordered the door to be ſo hung, as to open outwards to the ſtreet; whereas the doors of all other houſes opened inwards. As for Poſthumius, he was allowed to have a burial-place for himſelf and his family within the walls of Rome; a privilege never before granted to any [e].

Appius Claudius ſettles at Rome.

THE next year, when Poplicola was conſul the fourth time, the Sabines renewed the war. Actius Clauſus, the moſt eminent man in Sabinia, for riches, valour, and eloquence, firſt retarded their preparations, by ſpeaking in all their diets againſt a war with Rome, and then came over to the Romans, with five thouſand families of his friends and dependents. On his arrival at Rome, he changed his name to Appius Claudius, was immediately declared a patrician, and took his place in the ſenate. Twenty-five acres of land were given him in fee, and a quarter in the city aſſigned for his friends and followers, to each of which were granted two acres of ground, with all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens. Theſe donations were made irrevocable by a decree of the ſenate, confirmed by the ſuffrages of the people. The family of the Claudii became afterwards one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Rome. The Sabines, enraged at the departure of Clauſus, took the field with a very conſiderable army; and it was very lucky for Rome that they determined to come to a battle before the year of Poplicola's conſulſhip was out. The

Sabine army was divided into two bodies, one of which encamped in the open field near Fidenæ; the other kept within the walls of that city, to guard it, and ſecure a retreat to the other body, in caſe they were defeated. On the other hand, the conſuls, having likewiſe divided their army army into two bodies, marched out againſt the enemy. Poplicola took his poſt over-againſt the Sabines, while Lucretius, the other conſul, encamped on an eminence within reach of his collegue. The Romans were eager to engage immediately, and end the diſpute at once by a deciſive battle; but the Sabines, not daring to venture an engagement in the day-time, reſolved to make a ſudden attack on the enemy's camp in the dead of the night. With this view they prepared great quantities of faſcines to fill up the ditch, and ſcaling ladders to mount the ramparts. The body of Sabines, which guarded Fidenæ, was ordered to march out of the town on the firſt ſignal, and fetching a large compaſs, to lie in ambuſh behind Lucretius's camp, in order to ſurprize it, when Lucretius ſhould march to the aſſiſtance of his collegue, and then charge him in the rear. But the wiſe Poplicola, receiving timely intelligence of the enemy's deſigns, inſtantly diſpatched his brother Marcus to the other camp, to acquaint Lucretius with the night-expedition reſolved upon by the Sabines. Both conſuls, having taken the neceſſary precautions, waited for the enemy, without ſuffering their troops to ſhew any marks of ſuſpecting their intention. The Sabines marched ſilently out of their camp before midnight, and drawing near the Roman entrenchments, filled up the ditch with faſcines, and paſſed over to ſcale the rampart; but, as faſt as they advanced to it, they were, without any noiſe, ſtabbed by the Romans, who were drawn up in the ſpace between the ditch and the rampart. The ſlaughter continued till the moon roſe, when the Sabines diſcovering the dead bodies of their companions, and the Roman troops, who had ſtrewed the ground with them without being perceived, betook themſelves to a confuſed flight. The Romans purſued them with loud ſhouts; which being heard by Lucretius, he, in his turn, went to attack the body that lay in ambuſh, and gained a complete victory over them. In this action thirteen thouſand Sabines were killed on the ſpot, and four thouſand two hundred taken priſoners[f]. Poplicola, taking advantage of the enemy's conſternation, advanced with all his forces to Fidenæ; and having taken the place by aſſault, put to death the heads of the revolt; but ſpared the other inhabitants, obliging them only to ſurrender part of their lands, for the ſupport of the garriſon he left in the city. Poplicola, on his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph;

but ſoon after died, and was buried at the expence of the public, there not being found money enough in his houſe to defray the charges of his funeral. He was the moſt virtuous citizen, the greateſt general, and the beſt affected conſul to the people Rome had ever had. He had always led a frugal life, and taken more care to tranſmit his virtues to his children, than to enrich them with the goods of fortune. The Romans thought they could not refuſe him a burial-place in the city, and therefore erected a tomb for him near the forum, and gave his family a right of interment in the ſame place. But as the Valerii always affected popularity, they never made uſe of this privilege, but contented themſelves with carrying the bodies of thoſe who died in Rome to the ſepulchre of the founder of their family, and conveying them from thence out of the city, where the aſhes were depoſited in a tomb near the walls. As Poplicola had been one of thoſe who ſtood up in defence of the chaſtity of the Roman women, they mourned a whole year for him, as they had done before for Brutus. But his greateſt glory was compriſed under the name of Poplicola (C), which the Romans gave him, and his tender regard for the people had deſerved [g].

The Sabines renew the war.

THE Sabines were no ſooner informed of Poplicola's death, but they raiſed a more numerous army than they had done the preceding years; and, having made a ſudden incurſion into the Roman territory, advanced to the very gates of Rome. P. Poſthumius, one of the conſuls, being provoked at the inſolence of the Sabines, ſallied out againſt them with a good body of men, drawn together in a tumultuous manner. The Sabines, as ſoon as he appeared, fled to a neighbouring foreſt, where the main body of their army lay concealed. Poſthumius followed them; but, as he drew near the foreſt, the Sabines rallying faced about, and, with loud ſhouts, gave the ſignal to the whole army to fall upon the conſul's troops. Poſthumius made what reſiſtance he could with men out of breath and in diſorder; but was obliged to retire with great loſs. To complete his misfortune misfortune, he was intercepted in his retreat by a body of Sabines poſted on a little hill between him and the city; ſo that he was forced to paſs the night in the open field, ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemy's ſquadrons. As ſoon as the defeat of Poſthumius was known at Rome, Menenius Agrippa, the other conſul, marched at the head of the braveſt youth in the city, to the relief of his collegue. But the Sabines, at his approach, retired into their own country, whence, elated with their late ſucceſs, they ſent a proud meſſage to the Romans, requiring them to receive the king they had baniſhed, to ſubmit to the Sabines, by whom they had been conquered, and to receive their laws. To this demand the Romans returned a ſuitable anſwer, commanding the Sabines to return to their former duty, and to come in a ſuppliant manner to beg pardon of their attempts againſt the authority of their maſters. After theſe mutual bravadoes, the conſuls on one ſide, and the Sabines on the other, took the field again, with all the forces of their reſpective ſtates. Both armies encamped near Eretum, about ten miles from Rome, where they ſoon came to a general engagement, in which Poſthumius, deſirous to redeem his credit, behaved with extraordinary valour, and, together with his collegue, obtained a complete victory. No ſooner did the news of this glorious day reach the ſenate, but they decreed a full triumph for Menenius, and an inferior one, which they called ovation (D), for Poſthumius, whoſe gallant behaviour in the

(C) In ſome editions of the Latin hiſtorians we read Publicola inſtead of Poplicola; but the Faſti Capitolini, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, Plutarch, and Dio, call him conſtantly Poplicola which is an abbreviation of Populicola, a word denoting his regard for the people.

The Romans gain a complete victory over them.

(D) Authors differ in their opinions as to the derivation of this word; ſome derive it from ohè, denoting the admiration of the people in theſe ceremonies; others from the words evan or evoe, with which the Greek bacchanals rung. Plutarch refers the orgin of this word to the kind of victim, which was offered to the gods in the ceremony of the ovation (86); for in the triumph a bull was ſacrificed in the capitol, but in the ovation only a ſheep; ſo that, according to this writer, ovatio comes from the word ovis, ſignifying a ſheep. The perſon, who was honoured with an ovation, entered Rome on foot, or, at moſt, on horſe-back, and was attended by the ſenate only: his crown was of myrtle, not of laurel; and his robe only the prætexta, the common habit of magiſtrates. The ovation of Poſthumius, the firſt that had ever been ſeen in Rome, is marked in the Faſti Capitolini on the third of the nones of April. Two days after, Menenius late action had not, in the opinion of the fathers, ſufficiently attoned for his miſcarriage in the beginning of the war.

THE Sabine war continued under the new conſuls, Sp. Caſſius Uſcellinus and Opiter Virginius Tricoſtus. The former, entering the enemy's country, defeated them in a pitched battle near Cures, ten thouſand three hundred of them being killed and four thouſand taken priſoners. This defeat obliged them to ſue for peace, which, after many ſubmiſſions, they purchaſed with corn, money, and ten thouſand acres of arable land. While Caſſius was thus employed againſt the Sabines, his collegue Virginius reduced Cameria, a city in the neighbourhood of Alba, which had revolted from the Romans; and having beheaded the moſt guilty of the inhabitants, ſold the reſt for ſlaves, and razed the city [h].

They ſubmit at laſt.

TARQUIN, ſtill reſtleſs, and not deſpairing to recover his kingdom, by means of his ſon-in-law Mamilius Octavius, prevailed upon the Latins, who had hitherto ſtood neuter, to eſpouſe his cauſe. During the alarm which this reſolution occaſioned at Rome, the Tarquins, in concert with ſome of the inhabitants of Fidenæ, made themſelves maſters of that city. Hereupon the conſul Manius, marching againſt the rebels, cloſely inveſted the place, and reduced it to great ſtreights. The beſieged, in that extremity, implored the aſſiſtance of the Latins; which occaſioned a general meeting of the deputies from the ſeveral cities of Latium. In this aſſembly it was debated, whether the Latins ſhould declare in favour of the Tarquins and the Fidenates, or adhere to the antient treaties between the two nations. After long debates, it was reſolved, that an embaſſy ſhould be ſent to the Romans with propoſals, which were; 'That they ſhould receive the Tarquins, after they 'had engaged by oath to grant a general amneſty, and that 'they ſhould raiſe the ſiege of Fidenæ.' The embaſſadors were to allow the Romans a whole year to conſider on theſe overtures, and to threaten them with a war, in caſe they refuſed to comply with them. The chief view of Tarquin and his partizans in promoting this embaſſy was, to lay lay hold of that opportunity to raiſe a ſedition in the city. To the embaſſadors therefore of the Latins he joined ſome of his own emiſſaries, who, on their arrival in the city, found two ſorts of people diſpoſed to enter into their meaſures, viz. the ſlaves and the meaner citizens. The ſlaves had formed a conſpiracy the year before to ſeize the capitol, and ſet fire to the city in ſeveral quarters at the ſame time. But, the plot being diſcovered, thoſe, who were concerned in it, had been all crucified; and this execution had highly provoked the whole body of ſlaves. As to the meaner citizens, who were for the moſt part overwhelmed with debt and cruelly uſed by their creditors, they were well appriſed, that there could happen no change in the government but to their advantage. Theſe were the conſpirators pitched upon; and to them were given the following parts to act: the citizens were to make themſelves maſters of the ramparts and gates of the city, at an appointed hour of the night, and then to raiſe a great ſhout as a ſignal to the ſlaves, who had engaged to maſſacre their maſters at the ſame inſtant. The gates of the city were then to be opened to the Tarquins, who were to enter Rome while it was yet reeking with the blood of the ſenators. The conſpiracy was ripe for execution, when Tarquin's principal agents, Publicus and Marcus, both of his own name and family, being terrified with frightful dreams, had not courage enough to proceed in their deſign, till they had conſulted a diviner. However, they did not diſcover to him the conſpiracy; but only aſked him in general terms, what ſucceſs they might expect in a project they had formed? The ſoothſayer, without the leaſt heſitation, returned the following anſwer, 'Your 'project will end in your ruin; diſburden yourſelves of 'ſo heavy a load.' Hereupon the Tarquins, fearing leſt ſome of the other conſpirators ſhould be before hand with them in informing, went immediately to S. Sulpicius, the only conſul then at Rome, and diſcovered the whole matter to him. The conſul greatly commended them, and detained them in his houſe, till, by private enquiries, he was aſſured of the truth of their depoſitions. Then he aſſembled the ſenate, and gave the Latin embaſſadors their audience of leave, with an anſwer to their propoſals; which was, 'that the Romans would neither receive the Tarquins 'nor raiſe the ſiege of Fidenæ, being all to a man ready 'to ſacrifice their lives in defence of their liberty, and 'willing to undergo any dangers, rather than ſubmit to 'the government of a tyrant.' The embaſſadors being diſmiſſed diſmiſſed with this anſwer, and conducted out of the city, Sulpicius laid open to the fathers the dreadful conſpiracy, which ſtruck them with horror; but they were all at a loſs in what manner they ſhould apprehend and puniſh the guilty, ſince, by the law of Poplicola, there was an appeal to the people in all capital caſes, and the two witneſſes, who were ſtrangers, might be excepted againſt by the Roman citizens. In this perplexity they left the whole conduct of this critical affair to Sulpicius, who took a method, which, he thought, would equally ſerve to prove the guilt and puniſh the guilty. He engaged the two informers to aſſemble the conſpirators, and appoint a rendezvous at mid-night in the forum, as if they deſigned to take the laſt meaſures for the execution of the enterprize. In the mean time, he took all proper meaſures to ſecure the city, and ordered the Roman knights to hold themſelves ready, in the houſes adjoining to the forum, to execute the orders they ſhould receive. The conſpirators met at the time and place appointed by the two Tarquins; and the knights, upon a ſignal agreed on before-hand, inveſted the forum, and blocked up all the avenues to it ſo cloſely, that it was impoſſible for any of the conſpirators to make their eſcape. As ſoon as it was light, the two conſuls appeared with a ſtrong guard on the tribunal; for Sulpicius had ſent to his collegue Manius, who was beſieging Fidenæ, deſiring him to haſten to the city with a choſen body of troops. The people were convened by curiæ, and acquainted with the conſpiracy, which had been formed againſt the common liberty. The accuſed were allowed to make their defence, if they had any thing to offer againſt the evidence; but not one of them denying the fact, a decree paſſed in the ſenate, that the conſpirators ſhould be put to death, in caſe the people approved it. This decree of the ſenate being read to, and approved by, the aſſembly, the people were ordered to retire, and the conſpirators were delivered up to the ſoldiers, who put them all to the ſword. The peace of Rome was thought ſufficiently ſecured by this ſtroke of ſeverity; and therefore, tho' all the conſpirators were not puniſhed with death, it was judged proper not to make any further enquiries. The two informers were rewarded with all the privileges of Roman citizens, an hundred thouſand aſſes, and twenty acres of land. Three feſtival days were appointed for expiations, ſacrifices, and public games, by way of thankſ-giving to the gods. But the general joy was diſturbed by a melancholy accident: as the people were conducting Tullius Manius the conſul from the circus to his houſe, he fell from his chariot, and died three days after[i].

THE city of Fidenæ was not yet reduced; it held out during the following conſulſhip of T. Æbutius and P. Veturius; but was taken the next year by T. Lartius, who, together with Q. Clælius, was raiſed to the conſular dignity. The Latins, enraged at the loſs of this town, began to complain of their leading men; which opportunity Tarquin and Mamilius improved ſo far, as to make all the Latin cities, twenty-four in number, enter into an alliance againſt Rome, and to bind themſelves by oath never to violate their engagements. The Latins made vaſt preparations, as did likewiſe the Romans; but the latter could procure no aſſiſtance from their neighbours. As the Latin nation was much ſuperior to them in ſtrength, they ſent deputies to ſollicit ſuccours from the ſeveral ſtates with which they were ſurrounded; but their negotiations proved every-where unſucceſsful: and what was worſe than all, the republic had rebellious ſons in her own boſom, who refuſed to lend their aid in defence of their country. The poorer ſort of people and the debtors refuſed to take the military oaths, or to ſerve, alledging their poverty and the fruitleſs hazards they ran in fighting for the defence of a city, where they were oppreſſed and enſlaved by their creditors. The ſpirit of mutiny ſpread among the inferior claſſes, moſt of them refuſing to liſt themſelves, unleſs their debts were all remitted by a decree of the ſenate; nay, they began to talk of leaving the city and ſettling elſewhere. The ſenate, apprehending a general inſurrection, aſſembled to deliberate on the means of quieting theſe domeſtic troubles. Some were for a free remiſſion of all debts, as the ſafeſt expedient at that juncture; others urged the dangerous conſequences of ſuch a condeſcenſion, adviſing them to liſt ſuch only as were willing to ſerve, not doubting, but thoſe who refuſed their aſſiſtance would offer it of their own accord, when it was no longer deſired. Several other expedients were offered; but at length this prevailed, viz. that all actions for debts ſhould be ſuſpended till the concluſion of the war with the Latins. But this the indigent debtors thought only

ly a ſuſpenſion of their miſery; and therefore it had not the intended effect on the minds of the unruly multitude. The ſenate might indeed have proſecuted the ringleaders of the ſedition; but the law of Poplicola, called the Valerian law, which allowed appeals to the aſſembly of the people, was a protection for the ſeditious, who were ſure of being acquitted by the accomplices of their rebellion. The ſenate therefore, to elude the effect of a privilege that put ſuch a reſtraint upon their power, reſolved to create one ſupreme magiſtrate, who, with the title of dictator, ſhould have an abſolute power for a time; but, as this could not be done without ſtriking at the law of Poplicola, and transferring the power of the people in criminal caſes to a magiſtrate ſuperior to all laws, it was neceſſary to uſe artifice, in order to obtain the conſent of the curiæ. They therefore repreſented to them in a public aſſembly, that, in ſo difficult a conjuncture, when they had their domeſtic quarrels to decide, and at the ſame time a powerful enemy to repulſe, it would be expedient to put the commonwealth under a ſingle governor, who, ſuperior to the conſuls themſelves, ſhould be the arbiter of the laws, and, as it were, the father of his country; that his power ſhould have no limits; but, however, leſt he ſhould abuſe it, they ought not to truſt him with it above ſix months. The people not foreſeeing the conſequences of this change, agreed to it; but the greateſt difficulty was, to find a man duly qualified in all reſpects for ſo great a truſt. T. Lartius, one of the conſuls, ſeemed to be of all men the moſt unexceptionable; but the ſenate fearing to offend his collegue by an invidious preference, gave the conſuls the power of chuſing a dictator, and obliged them to name one of themſelves, not doubting but Cloelius would yield to the ſuperior talents of his collegue; nor were they diſappointed in their expectation. But Lartius, with the ſame readineſs, named Cloelius; and the only conteſt was, which of the two ſhould raiſe the other to the ſupreme authority. Each perſiſted obſtinately in remitting the dignity to his collegue, till Cloelius, ſtarting up on a ſudden, abdicated the conſulſhip, and, after the manner of an inter-rex, proclaimed Titus Lartius dictator (E), who there-

LARTIUS indeed took as much ſtate upon him, after he had entered upon his office, as he had ſhewn modeſty in refuſing it. As to the perpetual dictatorſhips of Sylla and Julius Cæſar, they were notorious uſurpations and violations of the laws of their country. The dictator was not allowed to march out of Italy, leſt he ſhould take advantage of the diſtance of the place, to attempt ſomething againſt the common liberty. He was always to march on foot, except in caſe of a tedious or ſudden expedition, and then he formally aſked leave of the people to ride (87). In all other things his power was abſolute and uncontrouled. He might proclaim war, levy forces, lead them out, diſband them, &c. without conſulting the ſenate. He could puniſh as he pleaſed; and from his judgment lay no appeal. To make his authority more awful, he had always twenty-four faſces with axes carried before him, if we believe Plutarch (88) and Polybius (89). Livy aſcribes the firſt riſe of this cuſtom to Sylla (90). The authority of all other magiſtrates ceaſed, or were ſubordinate to him. He had the naming of the general of the horſe, who was wholly at his command. When his authority was expired, he was not obliged to give an account of any thing he had done during his adminiſtration. In ſhort, the dictatorſhip was a kind of abſolute monarchy, tho' not durable, and was looked upon as the only refuge of the commonwealth in time of danger, till Sylla and Cæſar, converting it into a tyranny, rendered the name of dictator odious; inſomuch that, upon the murder of the latter, a decree paſſed in the ſenate, forbidding the uſe of that dignity upon any account whatſoever for the future (91).

(F) As the regal power was revived in the dictator, he was allowed to create a chief officer in the army, under the name of magiſter equitum, that is, maſter or general of the horſe; which ful and honoured with a triumph, was the perſon he advanced to this ſecond ſtation in the republic. Lartius, having by this means ſecured the Roman knights, reſolved, in the next place, to make the people reſpect and fear him. With this view he never appeared in public, but attended by twenty-four lictors, to whoſe faſces he added again the axes, which Poplicola had cauſed to be taken from them. The novelty of this ſight was alone ſufficient to awe the ſeditious, and, without executions, to ſpread conſternation throughout Rome. The murmurs of the inferior claſſes being by this means ſilenced, the dictator commanded a cenſus to be taken, according to the inſtitution of king Servius. Every one, without exception, brought in his name, age, the particulars of his eſtate, &c. and there appeared to be in Rome one hundred and fifty thouſand ſeven hundred men, who were paſt the age of puberty. Out of theſe the dictator formed four armies; the firſt he commanded himſelf; the ſecond he gave to Clœlius his late collegue; the third to Sp. Caſſius his general of the horſe; and the fourth he left in Rome, under the command of his brother Sp. Lartius, who was to guard the city. The Latins not being ſo forward in their preparations as was expected, all their hoſtilities againſt Rome this campaign amounted to no more than the ſending a detachment into the Roman territory to lay it waſte. The dictator gained ſome advantage over that party; and the great humanity with which he treated the priſoners and wounded, diſpoſed the Latins to liſten the more readily to the overtures, which he at the ſame time made them for a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities. At length a truce was agreed on for a year; and then Lartius, ſeeing the republic reſtored to its former tranquillity, reſigned the dictatorſhip, tho' the time appointed for its duration was not yet expired [1].

THE year of the truce with the Latins expired, when Aulus Poſthumius and T. Virginius took poſſeſſion of the conſulſhip. Both Romans and Latins were buſied in making which anſwered to the office of the Tribunus celerum in the time of the kings. It was the ſecond dignity in the Roman ſtate, but, like the dictatorſhip, temporary. The magiſter equitum ſerved as the dictator's lieutenant-general; but could act nothing without his expreſs order.

ing the neceſſary preparations for war. The nobility of Latium, who were for the moſt part in the intereſt of the Tarquins, having found means to exclude the citizens from the Latin diets, carried all before them in thoſe aſſemblies; whereupon many of the citizens removed with their families to Rome, where they were well received. The Latins being bent upon war, the ſenate, notwithſtanding the perfect harmony that reigned between them and the people, thought it expedient to create a dictator. The two conſuls were therefore impowered to name one of themſelves to that dignity; whereupon Virginius readily yielded it to his collegue Poſthumius, as the more able commander. The new dictator, having created Æbutius Elva, formerly conſul, his general of the horſe, and divided his army into four bodies, left one of them, under the command of Sempronius, to guard the city, and with the other three, commanded by himſelf, Virginius, and Æbutius, marched out againſt the Latins, who, with an army of forty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, under the command of Sextus Tarquinius, Titus Tarquinius, and Mamilius, had already made themſelves maſters of Corbio, a ſtrong-hold belonging to the republic, and put the garriſon to the ſword. Poſthumius encamped in the night on a ſteep hill near the lake Regillus; and Virginius on another hill over-againſt him. Æbutius was ordered to march ſilently in the night, with the cavalry and light armed infantry, to take poſſeſſion of a third hill upon the road, by which proviſions muſt be brought to the Latins. Before Æbutius had fortified his new camp, he was vigorouſly attacked by Lucius Tarquinius, whom he repulſed three times with great loſs, the dictator having ſent him a timely reinforcement. After this, Æbutius intercepted two couriers ſent by the Volſci to the Latin generals, and, by letters found upon them, diſcovered, that a conſiderable army of the Volſci and Hernici were to join the Latin forces in three days. Upon this intelligence, Poſthumius drew his three bodies of troops together, which amounted in all to no more than twenty-four thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, with a deſign to engage the enemy before the arrival of the ſuccours they expected. Accordingly he encouraged his men, and with his army in battle array, advanced to the place where the enemy was encamped. The Latins, who were much ſuperior to the Romans in number, and beſides began to want proviſions, did not decline the engagement. Titus Tarquinius, at the head of the Roman exiles and deſerters, was in the centre, Mamilius in the right wing, and Sextus Tarquinius in the left. In the Roman army the dictator commanded in the centre, Æbutius in the left wing, and Virginius in the right. The firſt body that advanced was that of the dictator, and as ſoon as it began to march, T. Tarquinius ſingling out the dictator, ran full ſpeed againſt him. The dictator did not decline the encounter, but flying at his adverſary, wounded him with a javelin in the right ſide. Upon this, the firſt line of the Latins advanced to cover their general; but he being carried out of the field, they made but a faint reſiſtance when charged by the troops of the dictator. They were deſtitute of a leader, and therefore began to retire, when Sextus Tarquinius taking the place of his brother, brought them back to the charge, and renewed the fight with ſuch vigour, that the victory in the centre was ſtill doubtful. On the ſide of Mamilius and Æbutius, both parties, encouraged by the example of their leaders, fought with incredible bravery and reſolution. After a long and bloody conteſt, the two generals agreed to determine the doubtful victory by a ſingle combat. Accordingly the two champions puſhed on their horſes againſt each other. Æbutius with his lance wounded Mamilius in the breaſt; and Mamilius with his ſword Æbutius in the right arm. Neither of the wounds were mortal; but both generals falling from their horſes put an end to the combat. Marcus Valerius, the brother of Poplicola, ſupplying the place of Æbutius, endeavoured, at the head of the Roman horſe, to break the enemy's battalions; but was repulſed by the cavalry of the Roman royaliſts. At the ſame time Mamilius appeared again in the van with a conſiderable body of horſe and light-armed infantry. Valerius, with the aſſiſtance of his two nephews, the ſons of Poplicola, and a choſen troop of voluntiers attempted to break through the Latin battalions, in order to engage Mamilius; but, being ſurrounded by the Roman exiles, he received a mortal wound in his ſide, fell from his horſe and died. The dead body was carried off by the two ſons of Poplicola, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the exiles, and delivered to Valerius's ſervants, who conveyed it to the Roman camp; but the young heroes, being afterwards inveſted on all ſides and overpowered by numbers, were both killed on the ſpot. Upon their death, the

the left wing of the Romans began to give ground; but were ſoon brought back by Poſthumius, who, with a body of Roman knights, flying to their aſſiſtance, charged the royaliſts with ſuch fury, that they were, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, obliged to give way and retire in the utmoſt confuſion. In the mean time Titus Herminius, one of the dictator's lieutenants, having rallied thoſe who had fled, fell upon ſome cloſe battalions of the enemy's right wing, which ſtill kept their ground under the command of Mamilius, killed him with his own hand, and put that body to flight. But while he was buſy in ſtripping the body of his enemy, he received himſelf a wound, of which he died ſoon after. Sextus Tarquinius in the mean time maintained the fight with great bravery, at the head of the left wing, againſt the conſul Virginius, and had even broke through the right wing of the Roman army, when the dictator attacked him unexpectedly with his victorious ſquadrons. Then Sextus, having loſt at once all hopes of victory, threw himſelf, like one in deſpair, into the midſt of the Roman knights, and there ſunk under a multitude of wounds, after he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a moſt eminent manner. The death of the three generals was followed by the entire defeat of the Latin army. Their camp was taken and plundered, and moſt of their troops cut in pieces; for of the forty-three thouſand men who came into the field, ſcarce ten thouſand returned home. The next morning the Volſci and Hernici came, according to their agreement, to aſſiſt the Latins; but finding, upon their arrival, how matters had gone, ſome of them were for falling upon the Romans, before they could recover from the fatigue of the preceding day; but others thought it more ſafe to ſend embaſſadors to the dictator, to congratulate him on his victory, and aſſure him, that they had left their own country, with no other deſign, than to aſſiſt Rome in ſo dangerous a war. Poſthumius, by producing their couriers and letters, gave them to underſtand, that he was well appriſed of their deſigns and treacherous proceedings. However, out of regard to the law of nations, he ſent them back unhurt with a challenge to their generals to fight the next day; but the Volſci and their confederates, not caring to engage a victorious

The whole Latin nation ſubmits.

THE Latins, having now no remedy but an entire ſubmiſſion, ſent embaſſadors to ſolicit a peace at Rome, yielding themſelves entirely to the judgment of the ſenate. As Rome had long ſince made it a maxim to ſpare the nations which ſubmitted, the motion of Titus Lartius, the late dictator prevailed, and the antient treaties with the Latins were renewed, on condition, however, that they reſtored the priſoners they had taken, delivered up the deſerters, and drove the Roman exiles out of Latium. Thus ended the laſt war, which the Romans waged with their neighbours on account of their baniſhed king; who, being now abandoned by the Latins, Hetrurians, and Sabines, retired into Campania, to Ariſtodemus tyrant of Cumæ, and there died in the ninetieth year of his age, and fourteenth of his exile.

THE freedom, which the Romans recovered by the expulſion of Tarquin, being now ſecured to them by the death of that prince, who was the laſt of his family, and the Latin war ended greatly to the advantage of the republic, Poſthumius laid down his office, the courts of juſtice were again opened, and the creditors began to proſecute their debtors (G) with more vigour than ever, which revived

(G) When the debtor was inſolvent, the creditor had a right to put him in irons, or to ſell him as a ſlave. After a certain number of ſummonſes, the law granted to the debtor thirty days of grace to raiſe the ſum for which he was accountable. The words of the law are; Æris confeſſi, rebuſque jure judicatis, triginti dies juſti ſunto. Poſt dein manum endo jacito——Vincito aut nervo, aut compedibus. After the thirty days were expired, if the debtor had not diſcharged the debt he was led to the prætor, who delivered him over to the mercy of his creditors. Theſe bound him and kept him in chains for the ſpace of ſixty days. Afterwards for three market-days ſucceſſively, the debtor was brought to the tribunal of the prætor; then a public crier proclaimed in the forum the debt, for which the priſoner was detained. It often happened, that rich perſons redeemed the priſoner by paying his debts; but if no-body appeared in behalf of the debtor, after the third market-day, the creditor had a right to inflict the puniſhments appointed by the law; Tertiis nundinis capite vived the complaints and murmurs among the inferior claſſes. To prevent the diſturbances, which this affair might occaſion, the ſenate procured the conſulſhip for Appius Claudius, who had ever oppoſed, with great warmth, the pretenſions of the people; but leſt he ſhould exert too great ſeverity, they gave him for his collegue P. Servilius, a man of a gentle and humane temper, and greatly beloved by the people. The latter exhorted the ſenate, as ſoon as he entered upon his office, to eaſe the people, and reſtrain the ſeverity of the creditors; but Appius maintained, with his uſual conſtancy, that it was a manifeſt injuſtice to relieve the debtors at the expence of the creditors. The ſenate aſſembled daily, in order to ſettle the tranquillity of the city upon a laſting foundation; but met with ſo many difficulties, the conſuls being of different opinions, that they could never come to any concluſion. In the mean time, the oppreſſed populace held ſecret aſſemblies in the night, and ſeemed diſpoſed to riſe up in arms; ſo that the ſenate began to apprehend nothing leſs than a civil war. In the midſt of theſe diſturbances, the Volſci, who were all acquainted with the preſent ſtate of the city, having drawn together what forces they could, advanced towards Rome, promiſing themſelves great advantages from the domeſtic diſorders and univerſal confuſion which reigned in the city. It was therefore neceſſary for the conſuls to raiſe an army; but the Roman youth abſolutely refuſed to ſerve. This diſobedience occaſioned new diſputes between the conſuls, Claudius being for ſeverity, and Servilius for moderation.

capite pœnas dato, aut trans Tiberim peregre venumduito, that is, Let him on the third market-day be puniſhed with death, or ſold beyond the Tiber as a ſlave. If there were ſeveral creditors, they were allowed, in conſequence of this ſevere law, to divide the body of the priſoner into ſeveral parts, and ſhare it among them, in proportion to the ſum they demanded; but, according to Quintilian and Cæcilius, humanity and cuſtom had given preſcription againſt ſo barbarous a law, which was never put in execution. This puniſhment was changed to coercion; that is, the creditors had a right to impriſon their debtors in their own houſes, and make them ſlaves. Theſe were called noxi, and not ſervi, becauſe their ſlavery laſted no longer than till their debts were paid. This coercion was afterwards changed into public impriſonment, which was a leſs rigorous puniſhment, than the ſlavery the debtors underwent in the creditors houſes, where they were often cruelly treated, and whipped unmercifully.

As the time drew near to take the field againſt the Volſci, the ſenate decreed, that Servilius ſhould command the army, and Claudius govern the city. But tho' Servilius was looked upon as a friend to the people, yet they refuſed to liſt themſelves, unleſs the ſenate came firſt to ſome determination about the important affair of debts. Servilius was therefore obliged to march againſt the enemy with ſuch only as offered to ſerve out of a perſonal affection to him. The Volſci, depending on the civil broils at Rome, had not been ſo expeditious in their preparations for the war, as to be in a condition to face a Roman army in the field; and therefore they had recourſe to entreaties, by which they prevailed upon the goodnatured conſul to favour them and grant them a peace, upon condition that they ſupplied his troops with cloaths and proviſions, and delivered to him three hundred hoſtages of the beſt families [n].

Not long after the return of Servilius, the ſenate was informed from Latium, that the Volſci were making new preparations for war; that they had engaged the Hernici and Sabines to join them againſt Rome, and ſent deputies to their nation for the ſame purpoſe. Theſe deputies the Latin embaſſadors brought with them, and delivered them up to the ſenate. Such a treacherous proceeding in the Volſci, after they had been ſo kindly treated by the conſul Servilius, fired the ſenate, and war was immediately declared; but while the ſenators were yet ſitting, a plebeian, loaded with chains, appeared in the forum. He was advanced in years, tall of ſtature, lean, pale, with his eyes ſunk into his head, a long beard, and his hair in diſorder. At his clamours and geſtures the people crouded about him, and all looked on him with great attention, till at length ſeveral knew him, and remembered to have ſerved with him in the wars, and to have ſeen him fight in the firſt ranks of the legions with great valour. The bare ſight of him raiſed the compaſſion of the multitude; but when they had heard him give an account of his misfortunes, they were all filled with rage and indignation. He told them, that he was born fr[illegible]; and that he had, in eight-and-twenty battles, expoſed his life for the good of his country; that in the laſt war with the Sabines, he not only only had been hindered from cultivating his little inheritance, but that the enemy, in an incurſion, after having plundered his houſe, had ſet it on fire; that the neceſſities of life and the tributes, which, notwithſtanding his misfortunes, he was obliged to pay, had forced him to contract debts; that, the intereſt been grown by degrees to an exceſſive ſum, he was reduced to the melancholy expedient of yielding up his inheritance to diſcharge part of it; but that the mercileſs creditor, not being yet quite paid, had dragged him to priſon, with two of his children; that to oblige him to haſten the payment of the reſidue, he had delivered him over to his ſlaves, who, by his order, had tore his body with whips. At the ſame time he flung off his garment, and diſcovered his back ſtill bloody; and on his breaſt the ſcars of the honourable wounds, which he had received in fighting for his country. At this ſight, the people, already ripe for ſedition, uttered a thouſand curſes againſt the patricians, and made ſuch outcries, as terrified the ſenate, which was then ſitting. The people flocked from all quarters of the city into the forum; the artificers left their ſhops; and thoſe, who were confined for debt, having found means to eſcape from their creditors, with the frightful figure they made, with their ragged cloaths; and the noiſe of their chains, raiſed both pity and indignation. Theſe unhappy wretches ſpread themſelves all over the city; and if any one offered to ſtop them, he was immediately maſſacred by the enraged multitude. The conſul Appius, ſeeing that the fury of the mutineers was like to fall upon him, left the ſenate, and, by favour of the tumult, got ſafe to his own houſe. Servilius, having pulled off his robe, that he might be thereby more agreeable to the people, ran into the thickeſt of the croud; and tho' he embraced ſome, threw himſelf at the feet of others, and ſhewed great compaſſion for all, yet he could not prevail upon them to ſuſpend all acts of violence to the next day, till he had promiſed, that the ſenate ſhould have regard to their complaints; nay, he went further, and proclaimed by a herald that no one ſhould moleſt any Roman citizen for debt, till the ſenate had decreed otherwiſe.

THE next day the forum was ſoon filled, both with citizens and country-people, brought thither by their common intereſt. The ſenate aſſembled, and Servilius laid before them the neceſſity, in ſuch a conjuncture, of abating ſomewhat of the ſeverity of the laws. On the other hand

Appius pretended, that this project tended to the ruin of the ſubordination neceſſary in a well-governed ſtate; and that the condeſcenſion, which Servilius was for ſhewing to the neceſſities of the people, would be looked upon by the ſeditious, only as a diſguiſed weakneſs, and ſo breed new pretenſions. As Appius could not bear contradiction, his ſpeech was tinctured with the harſhneſs of his manners; he even came to perſonal reflections, and repreſented his collegue as a vile flatterer of the plebeians and a favourer of the revolt. Servilius, in his turn, reproached him with the obſtinacy of his temper, his pride, and the animoſity he ſhewed againſt the people. The ſenators were divided between theſe two great men; ſo that there was no end of their diſputes. In the mean time, the people expected with impatience a decree in their favour, and there not being a ſufficient number of ſenators aſſembled for that purpoſe, they imputed their abſence to the conſul's management, in order to fruſtrate their hopes. While the people were yet in the forum, they ſaw ſome horſemen come full ſpeed to acquaint the Romans, that the Volſci were advancing with a deſign to beſiege Rome. The plebeians were overjoyed to ſee their own country in danger; and when the debtors were invited to take up arms in defence of the common liberty, they ſhewed the chains, with which their creditors had loaded them. 'Is it not the ſame thing to us,' ſaid they, 'whether theſe chains are put upon us by the enemy, or 'by our own countrymen? Let the patricians expoſe their 'lives, ſince they alone reap advantage from our victo-'ries. Shall we make a rampart with our bodies, only to 'hinder the enemy from pulling down our priſons, and 'carrying away our chains?' It was neceſſary, in this extremity, that ſomething ſhould be done to quell the tumult, and induce the people to lend their aſſiſtance againſt an inſulting enemy. Appius was obſtinate and inflexible; but Servilius was prevailed upon by his friends to make the people ſuch promiſes in the name of the ſenate, as the ſenators were firmly reſolved never to perform. He told them, that it was not conſiſtent with the dignity of the ſenate to comply with their demands, as it were out of fear; but that when the war ſhould be ended, the ſenate would in gratitude remit all their debts. This diſcourſe abated the fury of the populace; and the reading a decree, which paſſed the ſame day, entirely quelled it. All creditors were thereby forbidden to proſecute any Roman citizen for debt, who was willing to ſerve, or to ſeize his children

dren or his goods; but the creditors, were commanded to proſecute all ſuch debtors with the utmoſt ſeverity, as either ſhould refuſe to ſerve, or deſert after they were inrolled. To this wiſe law Rome owed her preſervation; for it was no ſooner publiſhed, than multitudes crouded to the capitol, and even made intereſt to be admitted into the legions. When the levies were completed, Servilius marched to meet the enemy, and encamped near the Pontine lake (H); where the Volſci, attempting to ſurprize his camp, were entirely defeated. The conſul, to reward his ſoldiers, gave them all the ſpoil, that they might have wherewithal to pay their debts (I). He then marched to Sueſſa Pometia, the capital of the Volſci, took it by aſſault, and put all to the ſword who were able to bear arms. He gave likewiſe this wealthy city up to be plundered by the ſoldiers, without reſerving any part of the ſpoil for the public treaſury. In the mean time, Appius, who had been left in Rome, beheaded

And defeats the Volſci.

(H) The Pontine lake took its name from the city of Pometia, formerly one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Latium. This part of Latium, before it was laid under water by the overflowing of the Nymphæus, the Amaſena, the Aſtura, and the Ufens, was thought the garden of Italy. There were, according to Pliny (2), twenty-three cities in it, which are ſuppoſed to have been drowned by inundations, or overturned by earthquakes; for there were no remains of them to be ſeen in the time of Dionyſius Harlicarnaſſeus.

(I) It was cuſtomary, in the beginning of the commonwealth, to divide the ſpoils between the victorious army and the public treaſury. The product of theſe ſpoils was generally applied to the building of temples, the celebrating of public games, or the adorning of the city. Servius tells us (3), that the generals thought themſelves obliged to appropriate part of the fruit of their victories to the god, whoſe protection they had invoked. Agreeable to this cuſtom, adds the ſame writer, there was a temple in Rome, conſecrated to Jupiter the plunderer, Jovi prædatori. Servilius was accuſed by his collegue of having acted contrary to the law, which ordained, that the general, who returned from any military expedition, ſhould not diſpoſe of the ſpoil as he pleaſed. This law made him accountable for it; but nevertheleſs the republic often diſpenſed with it, and left it to the diſcretion of the general to diſtribute ſuch military rewards among his ſoldiers, as he thought fit; provided he gave an account of his adminiſtration to the people, and did not appropriate to his own uſe the fruits of the conqueſts he had made in the name of the republic.

the three hundred hoſtages, which the Volſci had given to the Romans upon Servilius's firſt expedition [n].

So glorious a campaign had merited the honours of a triumph for the conſul, who returned to the city with hopes of obtaining it; but, on his arrival, he was informed, that his collegue Appius had perſuaded the ſenate to refuſe him it, under pretence, that he was a ſeditious man, who aimed at popularity, by an exceſſive indulgence and profuſeneſs to his ſoldiers. Servilius, being ſenſibly affected with the unjuſt proceedings of the ſenate, took a bold ſtep, which afterwards proved a fatal precedent to his country. He no ſooner came before Rome, which none were allowed to enter who demanded a triumph, but he cauſed the people to be called together in a field without the walls, and there complained to them, both of the jealouſy of his collegue and the injuſtice of the ſenate; upon which the people encouraged him by their acclamations to attempt whatever he pleaſed. Without regard therefore to the deciſion of the ſenate, he decreed himſelf a triumph, and marched, with the uſual pomp, to the capitol, followed by his army, and attended by all the people [o].

But triumphs in ſpite of the ſenate.

WHILE the people were taken up with public games and rejoicings, on account of the victory over the Volſci, embaſſadors arrived from the Aurunci, demanding, that the Roman garriſon in Ecetra, a Volſcian town which had lately ſubmitted to Rome, ſhould be removed from thence, and adding threatenings, in caſe of refuſal. As Ecetra ſtood on the confines of the country of the Aurunci, they had taken umbrage at the neighbourhood of that garriſon. The ſenate therefore ſent the envoys back with this anſwer, Go, tell your maſters, that it is a dangerous thing to attack thoſe, whoſe very neighbourhood is formidable to them. The Aurunci, provoked at this anſwer, entered Latium, and advanced as far as Aricia, where they were met by the Roman army, under the command of Servilius and the famous Poſthumius, ſirnamed Regillenſis from the victory he had gained over the Latins at the lake Regillus. The battle which enſued was very bloody; but the Romans, though at firſt greatly diſheartened at the gigantic ſtature, fierce looks, and martial martial air of the enemy, gained at length a complete victory, and made themſelves maſters of the camp of the Aurunci, who retired into their own country. Of all the plebeians, who ſerved in this and in the late war with the Volſci, none behaved with more gallantry than thoſe who were moſt in debt. The people therefore thought, that, after ſo many victories, they might demand of the ſenate the performance of Servilius's promiſe. But the inflexible Appius even doubled the ſeverity of the judgments he gave againſt ſuch debtors as were brought before his tribunal; he ordered all thoſe, who had been ſet at liberty during the war, to be brought back to their creditors priſons by force. Thoſe who were arreſted appealed to Servilius, urging the promiſes he had made before the campaign, and the ſervices they had done in the war; but Appius having got the aſcendent in the ſenate, Servilius had not intereſt enough to prevail upon them to make good his word given in their name, or to protect the unhappy wretches; ſo that he became as much deſpiſed, as Appius was hated. This appeared very remarkably, when the time came to conſecrate a temple, which had been erected to Mercury. The conſecrator was to enjoy conſiderable powers and privileges; and on this account the ſenate, unwilling to diſguſt either Appius or Servilius, referred the whole matter to the people. The curiæ were therefore aſſembled, with full power to chuſe whom they pleaſed; and they, to ſhew how much they were diſpleaſed with both the conſuls, beſtowed the honour of conſecrating the temple on one Lætorius, who was only a centurion. Hereupon Appius and Servilius, equally enraged, joined with the ſenate in putting in execution the laws againſt debtors with the utmoſt ſeverity; but the people, paying no regard to their authority, when any plebeian was proſecuted for debt, crouded into the forum, and made ſuch a noiſe, that the ſentence pronounced by the judges could not be heard. They no longer endeavoured to appeaſe their creditors, or mollify the ſenate by entreaties, but inſulted both; ſo that the patricians, and not the plebeians, were now in danger of impriſonment and ſlavery [p].

The Sabines revolt, but the people refuſe to ſerve.

IN the mean time, the Sabines, encouraged by theſe inteſtine broils, revolted, and engaged the Roman colony of Medulia to enter into an alliance with them; which was confirmed by mutual oaths. The new conſuls, A. Virginius and T. Veturius, both men of little note, ſummoned the tribes, in order to raiſe an army for the war, which threatened them; but the people obſtinately refuſed to liſt themſelves, till ſuch time as all debts ſhould be cancelled. Hereupon the conſuls, aſcended their tribunal, called upon one of the moſt factious by name to come and be enrolled. As the man did not anſwer the ſummons, he was inſtantly ſeized; but the populace tore him out of the lictors hands, and inſulted both the conſuls, and patricians who attended them. While the city was thus rent into factions, and all things ſeemed to tend to a civil war, envoys arrived from the Latins and Cruſtumini, complaining of the hoſtilities of the Æqui and Sabines, and at the ſame time embaſſadors from the Volſci, demanding reſtitution of the lands, which had been taken from them in the late war. Theſe embaſſies filled the Romans with conſternation or joy, according to the party each had embraced. As it was neceſſary to give all theſe deputies proper anſwers, the ſenate aſſembled, and after long debates, returned the following anſwer to the embaſſadors of the Volſci, viz. That it was not conſiſtent with the honour of the republic to comply with their demands. As to the Latins and Cruſtumini, who were in alliance with Rome, they were aſſured, that the republick would not leave them expoſed to the inſults of their enemies, without ſending them ſuccours. With theſe anſwers the embaſſadors were diſmiſſed; but, as Rome could neither protect her allies, nor repulſe her enemies, unleſs peace were firſt eſtabliſhed at home, the ſenate met again the next day, to deliberate about the methods neceſſary to procure that happineſs. The conſul Virginius was for protecting thoſe debtors, who had fought ſo ſucceſsfully the laſt year, and for leaving the others to the ſeverity of the law. Titus Lartius, that venerable ſenator who had been formerly dictator, pleaded in behalf of all debtors. Appius, when it came to his turn to ſpeak, enumerated all the motives, which had engaged him to ſide with the patricians; declared, that he could not change his opinion; urged the dangerous conſequences of violating contracts between debtors and creditors; and, in the cloſe of his

ſpeech, propoſed the naming of a dictator in the preſent extremity. This expedient was thought dangerous by ſome of the oldeſt ſenators; but the motion was carried by a majority, and Manius Valerius, a man of ſeventy years of age, brother to the famous Poplicola, was nominated by one of the conſuls, contrary to the law, which required, that the dictator ſhould be choſen out of ſuch as had been, or were actually, conſuls; but, as no man was judged more proper for that ſtation at this time, the neceſſity of the caſe made the ſenate overlook rules. Valerius, as ſoon as he was proclaimed dictator, named for his general of the horſe Quintus Servilius, brother to the laſt year's conſul; and finding the minds of the people well inclined to his government, he aſcended the tribunal, and harangued the multitude, putting them in mind of the great zeal his family had always ſhewed for their intereſt, and deſiring in return their confidence. He promiſed, that, if they would lend their aſſiſtance and ſerve their country at this time, he would procure for them from the ſenate all the reaſonable condeſcenſions they could expect. "And, "in the mean time", ſaid he, "I command, that no "mention be made of confiſcations or impriſonments "during my adminiſtration". The people, depending on the promiſes of the dictator, took arms with pleaſure, and ten legions were ſoon raiſed; three of which were given to each conſul, and four reſerved for the dictator. Veturius was ordered to march againſt the Æqui, Virginius again the Volſci, and the dictator himſelf led his legions againſt the Sabines. The three generals were all attended with good ſucceſs, and it proved a glorious campaign for the republic. Valerius on his return was honoured with a triumph, and, as a further mark of diſtinction, both the ſenate and people agreed in allotting him an honourable place in the circus, at the celebration of the public games, and appointed, that a curule chair ſhould be always placed there for him; an honour which they made hereditary in his family [q].

Manius Valerius, a brother of Poplicola, created dictator.

The Æqui, Volſci, and Sabines, defeated.

But now Valerius, remembering his promiſes to the people, demanded of the ſenate the performance of them. But the patrician uſurers had made ſuch a party in the ſenate during his abſence, that the ſenators not only refuſed to comply with his demands, but reproached him with the affection affection of his family for the plebeians, and taxed him with betraying the intereſts of the ſenate. The prudent dictator, to prevent in ſome degree, the misfortunes which threatened the republic, ſent a colony of poor debtors to Velitræ, which had been juſt taken from the Volſci. But, as there ſtill remained a great number of theſe unhappy wretches, he ſolicited anew the ſenate in their favour. But his motion being rejected, he told the ſenators in great anger, that perhaps in a ſhort time they would wiſh for ſuch an interceſſor with the people, and, leaving the ſenate abruptly, ſummoned the people. When the aſſembly was formed he appeared in it with all the enſigns of his dignity; and in the firſt place acknowledged his obligations to them; then he made great complaints of the unſincere conduct of the ſenate, with regard both to them and him; and laſtly declared his reſolution to retire, or to ſurrender himſelf up to their reſentments, if they ſuſpected that he had betrayed their intereſt. Having ended this ſpeech, he laid down his employment, and ſtripped himſelf of the badges of the dictatorſhip. The people, who had heard him with ſentiments of reſpect and veneration, conducted him quite home to his houſe with loud acclamations, as if he had procured the abolition of their debts. The ſenate to prevent the diſorders which they foreſaw muſt attend the abdication of an injured dictator, ordered the two conſuls, who ſtill held the ſoldiers engaged by their oath (K), to lead

He reſigns his dignity.

(K) The giving the military oath, called ſacramentum, was, properly ſpeaking, the legal method of forming the Roman armies. After the ſoldiers had been choſen out of each tribe, this oath was adminiſtered to them in the following manner: The tribunes of each legion aſſembled the bodies they commanded. Then one ſoldier in a legion ſwore, in the name of all the reſt, to obey the commander of the Roman army. After this, every ſoldier came and ſingly engaged to perform what had been ſworn. In proceſs of time another oath, called by Livy (4) jusjurandum, was added to this, by virtue of which rebels and deſerters were puniſhed with death, and no appeal admitted. There was likewiſe another way of inliſting men, called conjuratio, which took place in unforeſeen commotions and ſudden irruptions of an enemy. Then, that no time might be loſt in raiſing the neceſſary forces, the ſoldiers were excuſed the formalities uſually obſerved in inrolling them. The general only went lead the army into the field, under pretence, that the Æqui and Sabines were making freſh preparations for war. The ſoldiery, who were well appriſed of the artifice, went out of Rome with the utmoſt rage; and therefore, as ſoon as they were in the field, ſome of the moſt ſeditious propoſed the aſſaſſinating of the conſuls, not out of any perſonal hatred, but merely to free themſelves from the oath which bound them to their command. Others thought, it would be monſtrous to put an end to the religious engagements they had entered into with the conſuls by criminal means, and on that account rejected the motion. After the leaders of the mutiny had conſidered of various projects, they concluded at laſt to carry away the military enſigns and ſtandards, and engage all the troops to follow them without the privity of their officers (L). This deſign went up to the capitol, and there erected two ſtandards, one red for the foot, and the other blue for the horſe. After this, he pronounced theſe words: "Let thoſe who love the ſafety of "the republic, make haſte and follow me." A third way of inrolling men was this: the conſuls committed into the care of perſons appointed for that purpoſe the raiſing of troops in different places, as the republic had occaſion for them; and this was called evocatio. The military oath was ſo eſſential in liſting men, that no Roman could ſerve in the army, even as a voluntier, or kill an enemy, till he had bound himſelf by a ſolemn promiſe to obey his general. In conſequence of this cuſtom, which was authorized by law, Tully tells us (5), that Cato wrote to Pompilius to inform him, that his ſon could not continue in the army without taking the military oath again, the time of his former engagement being expired.

(L) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus gives us the reaſon why the legions ſo readily followed their enſigns. The Romans, ſays he, when they are in the field, reſpect nothing more than their enſigns and ſtandards. They ſwear by their military enſigns, and pay them a ſort of religious worſhip. On certain feſtivals they crown them with flowers and perfume them. Animated by this ſuperſtitious prejudice, they expoſed themſelves to the greateſt dangers, and deſpiſed death itſelf to ſecure thoſe precious pledges, and prevent their being taken by the enemy. Thoſe, to whoſe care they were committed, were either put to death, or whipped, if they ſuffered the enemy to take them. The Romans, in the times of their firſt ſimplicity, had no other enſigns or colours, but a bundle of hay or graſs faſtened to the top deſign was executed under the conduct of a plebeian, named Sicinnius Bellutus. The troops marched away, and encamped beyond the Anio, three miles from Rome, on a hill called afterwards the ſacred mount, as their retreat was ſtiled the ſeceſſion [r].

THE firſt thing the rebellious army did was, to chuſe themſelves a general, and Sicinnius was the man they pitched upon. Then they ſecured themſelves within ſtrong intrenchments, where they lay quiet without committing any hoſtilities. The conſuls and officers, ſeeing themſelves thus deſerted by their troops, diſpatched a meſſenger to Sicinnius, exhorting him to return to the camp and bring back the troops to their duty. But he returned ſuch an anſwer, as ſhewed that he was determined to keep no meaſures with the patricians. A deſertion ſo general, and which looked like the beginning of a civil war, gave great uneaſineſs to the ſenate, and occaſioned a general conſternation in the city. The patricians were forced to guard the gates themſelves, in order to prevent the citizens from going out to join the malecontents. But notwithſtanding this precaution, thoſe who were burdened with debts, and ſuch as loved novelty, eſcaped and flocked to the camp of Sicinnius. In this general confuſion the ſenate met daily, and, after warm debates, in which they mutually accuſed each other of indulgence and ſeverity, they at length agreed to ſend a deputation to the malecontents, offering them a general pardon, and exhorting them to return to the city. But this ſtep only ſerved to encreaſe the inſolence of the ſoldiers. The deputies were therefore ſent back contemptuouſly, with no other anſwer, but that the patricians ſhould quickly find what enemies they had to deal with. This anſwer occaſioned new alarms in the city. In the mean time, the two conſuls, whoſe magiſtracy was expiring, aſſembled the centuries, which were left in Rome, for the election of their ſuctop of a long pole, as we have obſerved above. In ſucceeding ages they made uſe of the figures of monſters and animals, viz. of eagles, dragons, boars, wolfs, &c. Each manipulus had its own enſign. The horſe made uſe of a ſtandard, called vexillum, which was made of a piece of rich ſtuff, about a foot ſquare. It was faſtened to a croſs piece of wood, which was fixed to the top of a pike. But the form of the enſigns and ſtandards varied according to the times and the temper of the Romans, as we ſhall have occaſion to obſerve in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

ſucceſſors, and as no body at ſo dangerous a conjuncture ſtood candidate for that dignity, they obliged Poſthumius Cominius and Spurius Caſſius Viſcellinus, both conſular men and equally agreeable to the plebeians and patricians, to accept the conſulſhip. Their firſt care was, to convene the ſenate to deliberate upon the moſt ſpeedy and eaſy methods of reſtoring peace and union. Menenius Agrippa, a man of great integrity, and who ſtood neuter in the diviſions of the people and ſenate, being the firſt called upon to give his opinion, declared warmly for a reconciliation with the people, and propoſed the ſending of ſuch deputies, as were agreeable to them, with full power to make up matters, upon whatever conditions they ſhould think neceſſary for the good of the republic. M. Valerius, the late dictator, being deſired next to give his opinion, upbraided the ſenate with neglecting his former counſels; accuſed their indiſcretion in not offering the people an abolition of their debts by the firſt deputation, foretold, that the mutineers would, beſides their firſt demands, inſiſt upon laſting ſecurities for their future preſervation from oppreſſion; laſtly, he declared for the opinion of Menenius, adviſing the ſenate not to delay one moment giving the people ſatisfaction, let their demands be what they would. Appius, when it was his turn to ſpeak, oppoſed, in a very plauſible harangue, the opinion of Menenius and Valerius, and declared entirely againſt treating with the rebels, till they had laid down their arms; but on that condition was for ſhewing them mercy and indulgence. Hereupon the ſenate was divided; the old men were for Menenius Agrippa and Valerius; the young ſenators, jealous of the prerogatives of their rank, declared all for Appius, and the uproar was ſo great, that they almoſt came to blows. The two conſuls, who were diſpoſed to favour the people, having conferred together in private, determined to give time to thoſe hot ſpirits to cool, and with that view put off the deciſion of this great affair to another day. But before the aſſembly broke up, in order to intimidate the young ſenators, who had behaved in a very audacious manner, they threatened to exclude them from the ſenate, by fixing the age (M) neceſſary for a ſenator, unleſs they brought a more peaceable diſpoſition of mind along along with them. Some days after, the ſenate met anew, when every thing was tranſacted with great tranquillity, Menenius, being deſired again to declare his ſentiments, ſtill continued to think it neceſſary, that plenipotentiaries ſhould be ſent to the malecontents, with full power to grant them whatever they ſhould think conſiſtent with the good of the republic. All the ſenators, who had been conſuls, agreed with Menenius, except Appius, who, when it came to his turn to ſpeak, continued to proteſt againſt treating with rebels, till they had laid down their arms, and prayed Jupiter and the tutelar gods of Rome, that he might be deceived in his apprehenſions of the evil conſequences of ſuch a ſtep.

HOWEVER, the ſenate, determined by all means to divert the preſent evil, continued in their former reſolution of ſending commiſſioners to treat with the malecontents, and accordingly ten were named, and among them T. Lartius, Menenius Agrippa, and M. Valerius, all three in great eſteem, and of whom two had governed the republic, and commanded her armies in quality of dictators. Theſe with their colleagues ſet out for the camp, where they were received with all the reſpect due to their character. The preſence of the deputies had been ſufficient to bring back the mutineers to their duty, had not ſome turbulent ſpirits taken care to keep up the fire of diſcord. Theſe were Sicinnius Bellutus and another plebeian much of the ſame character, named Lucius Junius, like the founder of the republic; nay, he affected the certain; for Tully, in ſpeaking of Pompey (6), ſays, that he commanded armies before he had attained to the age that was required in a ſenator; the ſame is affirmed by Plutarch; and no expreſſion is more frequently made uſe of by the antient hiſtorians in the lives of great men, than that of ætas ſenatoria. But what age the laws fixed is uncertain. Dio Caſſius limits it to five and twenty, which was the age required for the quæſtorſhip, the firſt office of any conſiderable note. However, we read of many perſons promoted to this dignity without any regard had to their years. Pompey eſtabliſhed among the Bithynians a law, by which no one could become a member of their ſenate till he was thirty complete. It is probable, he followed the cuſtom of the Roman republic in this regulation; and the more ſo, becauſe Pliny the younger, in one of his letters to the emperor Trajan, ſays, that the Bithynians made the Romans their patterns, eſpecially in what related to their magiſtracy and ſenate.

the ſurname of Brutus, thinking himſelf deſtined to deliver the people from the tyranny of the ſenate, as the famous Brutus had freed Rome from the oppreſſion of the kings. Theſe two, being appointed by the malecontents to treat with the deputies from the ſenate, effaced with their crafty and artful ſpeeches the impreſſion, which the preſence of the deputies and their harangues had made on the minds of the multitude. But Menenius Agrippa, after having aſſured them, that the ſenate had, with unanimous conſent, determined to annul all bonds and obligations at preſent ſubſiſting, ſo ſoftened the populace by this promiſe and the famous apology of a conſpiracy of all the members of the human body againſt the ſtomach, which he applied to the people and the ſenate, that they all cried out, that they were ſatisfied, and that he might lead them back to Rome. This ſudden motion alarmed the pretended Brutus, who repreſented to the people, that they ought, indeed, to be very thankful for the favour ſhewed them at preſent in the abolition of their debts; but that he could not forbear letting them know, that he was very apprehenſive about the future, and therefore was of opinion, that means ſhould be found to ſecure the liberties of the people againſt the attempts of the ambitious patricians. What other ſecurity can you aſk, replied Menenius, beſides what our laws and the conſtitution of the republic already afford? Give us leave, anſwered Brutus, to chuſe annually out of the body of the plebeians a certain number of magiſtrates, who, without having any other authority in Rome but that of protecting them, may oppoſe or diſannul any edicts or judgments which ſhall be burdenſome to the people. If you come hither with a ſincere intention of peace, you cannot reject ſo equitable a propoſal. The deputies, greatly ſurpriſed at ſuch a demand, told them, that they aſked a very extraordinary thing, which abſolutely exceeded the bounds of their inſtructions and powers; but that M. Valerius and ſome others of the deputies would go and make their report of it to the ſenate, and return with an anſwer. Accordingly, they repaired with all ſpeed to Rome, where M. Valerius gave his opinion in favour of the people, while Appius, burning with indignation, exclaimed againſt the dreadful conſequences which would attend Valerius's condeſcenſion. But his remonſtrances were neglected, and the other ſide prevailed, moſt of the ſenators being weary of theſe diviſions, and deſirous to have peace at any rate; ſo that, with almoſt an univerſal conſent, a ſenatus-conſultum or decree of the ſenate was paſſed, permitting the creation of theſe new magiſtrates, who were called Tribunes of the people. This decree which included alſo the abolition of debts, was carried by the deputies of the ſenate to the camp as a ſeal of peace. The people were now for returning to Rome, but the leaders of the ſedition would not allow them to ſeparate, before they had elected the new magiſtrates. The aſſembly was held in the very camp, and, the auſpices being taken, the ſuffrages were gathered by curiæ, when L. Junius Brutus and C. Sicinnius Bellutus were, according to Dionyſius, choſen for the firſt tribunes. Theſe immediately named the two Licinii, Publius and Caius, with Sp. Icilius Ruga to be their collegues. Livy ſays, that C. Licinius and Lucius Albinus were the firſt tribunes, and that they afterwards choſe themſelves three collegues, among whom was Sicinnius Bellutus. Before they left the camp a law was paſſed, whereby the perſons of the tribunes were made ſacred. The words of the law were, "Let the tribune of the people be exempt from all the ſervile offices impoſed on the citizens. Let none of theſe offices be laid upon him, but by his own conſent. Let no one ſtrike him or cauſe another to ſtrike him. If any offend in this, let him be execrable, and his goods appropriated to the worſhip of Ceres. If any one kills him, any perſon may kill the murderer with impunity." To make this law perpetual, all the Romans were obliged to ſwear, for themſelves and their poſterity, that they would inviolably obſerve it. After theſe regulations the people erected an altar to Jupiter the terrible on the top of the hill where they had encamped, and, having conſecrated the place of their retreat, which from this time was called the ſacred mount, they followed the deputies of the ſenate and returned to the city [s].

Tribunes of the people created. Year of the flood, 2511. Before Chriſt 488. Of Rome, 260.

The people return to Rome.

THE tribunes were at firſt five in number, but a few years after five more were added. They were always choſen by the plebeians, and out of their body. Their ſole function was, to defend the liberties of the plebeians, and to interpoſe in all grievances offered them by their ſuperiors. This interpoſing, in matters determined by the ſenate or other magiſtrates, was called interceſſio, and was performed by ſtanding up, and pronouncing only one word, Veto, I forbid it. They had their ſeats placed at the door of the ſenate, and were never admitted into it, but when the conſuls called them to aſk their opinion upon ſome affair that concerned the intereſts of the people. As for the enſigns of their office, they had no toga prætexta, lictors, or curule chair; but were habited like private men, and attended only by one ſervant, called Viator. Their power was confined within the walls of Rome, or extended at moſt to a mile round the city. They were not allowed to be abſent from the city a day, Dion ſays an hour, except in the feriæ Latinæ. To ſhew their readineſs to protect the people, they were obliged to keep their doors open night and day. Their authority was very great; for, though at firſt they pretended only to prevent oppreſſion, yet afterwards they uſurped the power of doing almoſt whatever they pleaſed, having the populace to back them. They aſſembled the people, enacted laws, made decrees, and executed them upon the magiſtrates themſelves, commanding ſometimes the very conſuls to be carried to priſon. In ſhort, they occaſioned far greater diſturbances in the ſtate, than thoſe which they were firſt created to appeaſe, whence they are ſtyled by ſome of the antients, The bane of the public tranquillity.

The tribunes enlarge their authority.

ONE of the firſt ſteps of the tribunes towards an encreaſe of power was, to aſk permiſſion of the ſenate to chuſe two aſſiſtants in the execution of their office. This new demand was alſo complied with, and two men were choſen out of the plebeians to be the tribunes aſſiſtants, or agents. Theſe afterwards had the cognizance of a great many affairs, which before belonged to the conſuls, and the inſpection of all buildings both public and private; from which laſt branch of their office they took the name of Ædiles, with the epithet of Plebeian, to diſtinguiſh them from the Ædiles curules, of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

The Volſci and Antiates defeated.

ROME being now in a profound peace at home, troops were eaſily raiſed to march againſt the Volſci, whom the conſul Cominius defeated in a pitched battle, and took from them Longula and Poluſca. He marched next to beſige Corioli, the metropolis of the Volſci and ſtrongly fortified, which he likewiſe made himſelf maſter of, and gained a victory over the Antiates the ſame day. But Caius Marcius, a young patrician, had all the glory of both actions; for the beſieged having made a victorious ſally, and driven the Romans back quite to their intrenchments, Marcius, by his words and example, rallied the fugitives, brought them back to the charge, charge, and having obliged the enemy to retire into the city, followed them ſo cloſe, that he went in with them, and made himſelf maſter of the place. He then haſtened, without ſuffering his ſoldiers to ſtay for plunder, to join the conſul's army, which was upon the point of engaging with the Antiates, who were come to aſſiſt their allies. In the engagement which enſued, he behaved with equal bravery, and was attended with equal ſucceſs, the victory, which was gained, being entirely owing to his courage and prudent conduct. The next day, the conſul, having cauſed his tribunal to be erected before his tent, and called his ſoldiers together, made an harangue to them, which was little more than a panegyric on the brave Marcius. He put a crown of gold upon his head, aſſigned him a tenth part of all the ſpoil, gave him a fine horſe with ſtately furniture in the name of the republic, allotted him as much money as he could carry away, and, laſtly, allowed him to chuſe out any ten of the priſoners. But of all theſe preſents the young hero accepted only the horſe, and demanded but one captive of the ten, an old friend of his family, with a deſign to give him his liberty. This generous and diſintereſted conduct ſilenced even jealouſy itſelf. All reſpected an hero, whoſe ſentiments were as noble as his valour deſigned. But the conſul, to add to the glory of the brave warrior, beſtowed on him the ſurname of Coriolanus, transferring thereby from himſelf to Marius all the honour of the conqueſt of Corioli [t].

THE enemies of Rome, being terrified by the reduction of the Volſci, kept quiet at home; ſo that the conſul diſbanded his army, and war was ſucceeded by works of religion, public games, and treaties of peace. The antient alliance was renewed with the Latins, and a third day added to the feriæ Latinæ. In the mean time, Menenius Agrippa died in as great poverty at Poplicola. His relations reſolved to bury him without ceremony; but the people, at the motion of their new tribunes, agreed to pay a ſextans, or two ounces of braſs, a head, towards the expences of a magnificent funeral. Upon this, the ſenate, thinking it would reflect no ſmall diſhonour upon them to ſuffer an illuſtrious patrician to be buried at the expence of the people, allotted a ſum out of the public treaſury for his funeral, and committed the care of it to the quæſtors. Nevertheleſs the people refuſed to receive back their money, ordering it to be

be given to the children of the deceaſed Menenius [u]. This memorable conſulſhip ended with a cenſus and luſtrum, and there appeared to be but an hundred thouſand men in Rome fit to bear arms.

Rome ſuffers greatly by a famine.

UNDER the new adminiſtration of T. Geganius and P. Minucius, Rome ſuffered greatly by a famine, and this calamity revived the civil diſſenſions. The ſenate, to diſburden the city ſent away great numbers of the people to plant colonies at Velitræ and Norba, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the tribunes. In the mean time, the Antiates, taking advantage of the famine, with which Rome was afflicted, and of the diſcord between the people and the ſenate, made incurſions to the very gates of the city. Coriolanus could not bear this inſult, and therefore, as the tribunes ſtill oppoſed any regular levies being made, he put himſelf at the head of a band of voluntiers, advanced into the enemy's country, defeated them in ſeveral engagements, and returned loaded with a rich booty, conſiſting of corn, cattle, and ſlaves. At this the patricians triumphed, and the plebeians, who had remained behind, complained of their tribunes for having diverted them from following ſo ſucceſsful a leader. On the other hand, the tribunes, whoſe credit ſubſiſted only by the miſunderſtanding they fomented between the two orders in the commonwealth, endeavoured to ſtir up the populace to a general revolt, openly accuſing the patricians of being the cauſe of the ſcarcity, while their own families, they ſaid, were plentifully ſupplied with proviſions. The ſenate, alarmed at the ſtorm that threatened them, met daily to deliberate on the means to avert it. Some of the ſenators were for employing ſoft words and fair promiſes to gain over the moſt mutinous. But the opinion of Appius prevailed, which was, that the tribunes ſhould be threatened with the ſevereſt puniſhments, as diſturbers of the public peace, if they did not amend their behaviour. But when the conſuls came to declare to the curiæ the reſolution of the ſenate, the tribunes interrupted them, and even diſputed with them the right of ſpeaking in the comitia, contending, that their province was confined to the ſenate. The conteſt growing very warm and the hotteſt in each party being ready to come to blows, Brutus, who was now but ædile, deſired leave of the conſuls to ſpeak to the people, promiſing to quiet the diſpute. pleaſed with the deference paid them, readily conſented to let him ſay what he thought fit. But he, inſtead of addreſſing himſelf either to the tribunes, or the people, turned to the conſul Geganius, who had been one of the commiſſioners ſent to the malecontents on the ſacred mount, and aſked him, whether he remembered, that one of the articles of the late reconciliation was, that no patrician ſhould interrupt thoſe who were appointed to take care of the intereſts of the people? "I remember it very well," replied the conſul. "Why then, added Brutus, do you now come hither "to diſturb the conference between the people and their tri-"bunes?" "Becauſe ſaid Geganius," "this aſſembly was "ſummoned by us, and not by you." The conſul added too raſhly, "that if the tribunes had convened the aſſembly, "he would not even have come to hear what they ſaid." At theſe words Brutus cried aloud, "that's enough; you "grant us all we aſk; ſpeak to day as much as you pleaſe; "to morrow I will tell you, how far our power extends, "and how far yours." The next morning, before it was light, the tribunes and ædiles went to the temple of Vulcan, which ſtood near the comitium, and there aſſembled the people, complaining to them of the attempt that had been made the day before, to impoſe ſilence upon them in the aſſembly of the people, whom it was their duty to defend. They then propoſed to the curiæ the following law, empowering the tribunes to harangue the people. "Let no "man preſume to interrupt a tribune who is ſpeaking in "the aſſembly of the Roman people. If any one break "this law, he ſhall preſently give bail to pay the fine, to "which he ſhall be condemned: if he refuſes to give this "ſecurity, he ſhall be put to death and his goods confiſ-"cated: the difficulties, which may ariſe about theſe ſecu-"rities, ſhall be referred to the people, and determined by "them." This law was confirmed by the ſuffrages of the people, before the conſuls could make any oppoſition to it. The ſenate indeed refuſed to confirm it; but then the people in their turn would not accept the decrees of the ſenate. Thus theſe two tribunals were ever oppoſing one another; but the people always gained their point by their numbers and the unanimity of their leaders [w].

A law is paſſed, making it penal to interrupt the tribunes, when they are ſpeaking to the people.

Freſh diſputes about the diviſion of corn.

THE people, ſatisfied with having inlarged the power of their tribunes, bore the famine patiently, and continued quiet, et, till plenty of corn arriving from Sicily furniſhed the tribunes with a new occaſion of rekindling ſedition. The ſenators, who favoured the people, were for diſtributing gratis among the poor the corn, which had been bought with the public money. But the oppoſite faction was for holding up the price of bread, in order to keep the populace in dependence and ſubjection. The famous Coriolanus, at the head of the ſevere party, ſpoke loudly againſt ſhewing any indulgence to the people, propoſed the aboliſhing of the tribuneſhip, and taking vengeance of the mad rabble for their paſt inſolence. The ſenators were divided in their opinions, but the major part were for re-eſtabliſhing the government upon its antient foundations, and annulling the treaty concluded on the ſacred mount. Theſe proccedings enraged the tribunes, who left the aſſembly in the greateſt fury, calling out aloud on the gods, the avengers of perjury, to witneſs the ſolemn oaths by which the ſenate had authoriſed the eſtabliſhment of their dignity. The people fired by their factious tribunes, were ready to break into the ſenate, and there ſacrifice Coriolanus to their hatred and revenge. But the tribunes, that their proceedings might be regular, ſtopt them, and, having aſſembled the curiæ, ſummoned Coriolanus to appear before them. But he deſpiſed a ſummons brought him from a tribunal, which he did not acknowledge. Hereupon the tribunes, with a gang of the moſt mutinous among the plebeians, waited for him at the door of the ſenate, with a deſign to ſeize him when he came out. But, as he had a ſtronger guard with him than they, compoſed of young ſenators, who had a great reſpect for his perſon, the tribunes and their officers were beat back. Upon this the uproar was encreaſed, on the one hand, by the crouds of people, who flocked together from all parts of the city, and, on the other, by the patricians, who haſtened to the aſſiſtance of Coriolanus. But, in the mean time, the conſuls coming up diſperſed the croud, and, partly by entreaties, partly by their authority, prevailed upon the people to retire. The next day the tribunes, having aſſembled the people early in the morning, inveighed, as uſual, againſt the whole order of the patricians, but in particular againſt Coriolanus, repeating the very words he had uttered in the ſenate relating to the diſtribution of corn. Then they exaggerated the violence he had uſed againſt them the day before, the ill uſage their officers had met with from him and his company, the great number of men he had always about him, whom they called the tyrant's guards, &c. After they had with long and bitter invectives made Coriolanus odious to the people, they added, that if there was any patrician, who would undertake his defence, he might mount the tribunal and ſpeak to the people. Then Minucius, the eldeſt conſul, preſenting himſelf, in a long ſpeech cleared the ſenate from being the cauſe of the famine, excuſed the imprudent warmth of Coriolanus, deſired them to remember his virtues as well as his faults, and entreated them, in the name of the ſenate, to forgive him. The gentle words of Minucius, joined with promiſes of ſudden plenty, ſoftened and calmed the people. But the artful Sicinnius, now tribune of the people a ſecond time, effaced all impreſſions made on their minds in favour of Coriolanus. After having thanked the conſuls and patricians for their favourable diſpoſition, he exhorted Coriolanus to have recourſe to the clemency of the people, and to make an apology for his conduct. The tribune well knew, that Coriolanus was a man of too lofty a ſpirit to ſtoop to ſupplications, and therefore did not doubt, but he would provoke the people afreſh with the haughtineſs of his anſwers. Accordingly, the young patrician, inſtead of appearing as a criminal, aſſumed the air of a judge, and by an ill-timed reſoluteneſs deſtroyed the effect of the conſul's ſpeech. For he not only owned what he had ſaid in the ſenate, but gloried in it, and refuſed to ſubmit to any tribunal but that of the conſuls, proteſting, with a loud voice and a threatening look, that he would not have vouchſafed to appear in a tumultuous aſſembly of ſeditious men, had it not been to reproach them with their crimes, and put ſome check to their boundleſs deſires. Laſtly, he declared his hatred to the tribunes, whom he called the bane of the public happineſs.

Coriolanus provokes the people with the haughtineſs of his anſwers.

It is eaſy to imagine, that ſuch a ſpeech muſt greatly offend the plebeians. Some of them were for maſſacring him on the ſpot. But Sicinnius, thinking it neceſſary to obſerve, at leaſt, ſome appearance of juſtice, put a ſtop to the fury of the enraged multitude, and, having conſulted apart with his collegue, without ſo much as giving himſelf the trouble to collect the voices of the aſſembly, pronounced ſentence of death upon him, and ordered him to be thrown down headlong from the top of the Tarpeian rock, a puniſhment inflicted upon ſuch as were enemies to their country. The ædiles inſtantly advanced with their officers to put the ſentence into execution. But the ſenate and all the patricians in the aſſembly, haſtening to his aſſiſtance, placed him in the midſt of them, determined to oppoſe force with force. And now the people, either thinking their tribunes had carried their animoſity too far, or awed by the preſence of the conſuls, refuſed to give aſſiſtance to their ædiles; Sicinnius therefore, by the advice of Brutus, reſolve to proſecute Coriolanus in a legal way, and to convene the people by tribes for his trial. Of this reſolution he gave Coriolanus notice with the following words: "We cite thee, Coriolanus, "to appear before the people in ſeven and twenty-days". He then added, "as for the diſtribution of corn, if the ſe-"nate does not take due care of that matter, the tribunes "will give directions about it themſelves". Having thus ſpoke, he adjourned the aſſembly. In the mean time, the ſenate, in order to ſooth the people, fixed the price of corn at the loweſt rate it ever had been at even before the ſedition. The conſuls likewiſe, fearing leſt the proſecution of Coriolanus ſhould deter others from ſpeaking their mind freely in the ſenate, did all that lay in their power to appeaſe the tribunes. Minucius repreſented to them, that, by an immemorial cuſtom, all proceedings in capital caſes were to begin in the ſenate, and that it belonged to the ſenators to declare, whether it was proper to refer them to the people; he added, that the kings themſelves had paid this deference to ſo auguſt a body, and that he hoped the tribunes would not violate the antient rules of the government, but apply to the ſenate, if they had any grievances to lay to the charge of Coriolanus; he concluded by aſſuring them, that, according to the nature of the crime and the ſolidity of the proofs, the ſenate would refer the whole matter to the judgment of the people. Sicinnius exclaimed againſt this propoſal, pretending, that the affair naturally devolved upon the people, as the ſupreme court of judicature. But the other tribunes, plainly perceiving that they ſhould make themſelves odious even to the plebeians, if they ſo manifeſtly deviated from the uſual forms of juſtice, agreed to let the ſenate decide, as uſual, whether the people ſhould take cognizance of the matter depending. However, they inſiſted upon two conditions, which were; 1ſt, that the tribunes might be heard in the ſenate, with relation to the grievances which they pretended they had to lay to the charge of the perſon accuſed; 2dly, that the ſenators, after having been ſworn, ſhould deliver their opinions regularly, and the conſuls pronounce ſentence according to the plurality of voices. Theſe preliminaries being agreed on, the tribunes were introduced into the ſenate. Decius, the youngeſt of them, but a man of great eloquence, undertook to ſhew, that it belonged to the people to hear and determine the preſent cauſe. He cited a law of Poplicola, by which the plebeians, when ill treated by the patricians, were allowed to bring their complaints before the aſſembly of the people; he urged, that Coriolanus, having been guilty of a notorious inſult on the authority of the people and the dignity of their tribunes, the people were therefore his legal judges; he exaggerated the heinouſneſs of Coriolanus's offence, and adviſed the ſenate to withdraw their protection from ſo proud and inſolent a patrician [x].

When the tribune had ended his ſpeech, the conſuls aſked the opinion of the aſſembly, beginning with the oldeſt and moſt venerable ſenators; for in thoſe days, ſays Dionyſius, the young ſenators were not ſo preſumptuous as to make ſpeeches, or to think themſelves capable of inſtructing their elders. They only gave their opinion by ſome ſign, or by walking over to that ſide which they thought to be moſt in the right; whence they were called Senatores Pedarii, from the Latin word "pes, a foot". Appius Claudius, when it came to his turn to ſpeak, appeared to be ſtill the ſame man, an irreconcileable enemy to the people; he enumerated with great warmth all the encroachments of the plebeians. At firſt, ſaid he, they pleaded poverty, and only demanded an abolition of debts. In the beginning of their ſeditious ſeparation, they ſeemed to be content with impunity and leave to return home. After this they thought fit to demand a college of tribunes to protect them againſt our decrees. The authority of theſe officers they would have to be ſacred, and their perſons inviolable. Then, by the help of theſe new magiſtrates, they made laws without our privity, deſpiſed the authority of the ſenate and conſuls, and diſannulled our decrees. And now, by an unheard-of uſurpation, they ſummon a moſt illuſtrious patrician to appear at their tribunal, where he is to be tried as a criminal, only for delivering his opinion freely. After this he exclaimed againſt ſubmitting Coriolanus to be tried by the people, or making any conceſſions to them, and exhorted the ſenators not to fear a civil war, telling them, that both gods and men would join in their defence. But the popular Valerius was of a contrary opinion. He exaggerated the horrible conſequences of a civil war, and endeavoured to ſhew, that their paying ſome ſome deference to the people and their tribunes was the only means to quiet their fury, both againſt their threatened country and the offender. His opinion prevailed, and it was carried by a majority, that Coriolanus ſhould be tried by the people. When the decree was ready to be drawn up, Coriolanus, finding the ſenate was deſerting him, deſired to know what crime in particular he was to be accuſed of; the tribunes anſwered, that they would confine their whole accuſation to the ſingle crime of uſurping tyrannical power. 'Upon that foot,' replied Coriolanus, 'I have 'nothing to object to the decree of the ſenate; let it be put 'in writing; I will appear before the people, and anſwer 'that frivolous charge.' Thus, with the conſent of all parties, the decree was drawn up, and put in the hands of the tribunes, who immediately aſſembled the people, read it to them, and exhorted all the citizens of the republic, as well thoſe who dwelt in the country, as the inhabitants of Rome, to be in the forum on the day appointed for the deciſion of this affair. The decree of the ſenate allowed the accuſed ſeven and twenty days to prepare his defence; during which time, the tribunes frequently conferred among themſelves and with the leading men among the plebeians, as if the preſervation of the republic had depended on the deſtruction of Coriolanus.

The ſenate conſent that Coriolanus ſhall be tried by the people.

When the appointed day came, new diſputes aroſe about the form of the comitia, by which the accuſed was to be tried. The tribunes had ſeparated the people by tribes before the ſenators came; whereas from the reign of Servius Tullius the voices had always been gathered by centuries. The conſuls were for keeping up the antient cuſtom, being well appriſed, that they could ſave Coriolanus, if the voices were reckoned by centuries, of which the patricians themſelves and the richeſt citizens made the majority. But the artful tribunes, alledging that, in an affair relating to the rights of the people, every citizen's vote ſhould have its due weight, would not by any means conſent to let the voices be collected otherwiſe than by tribes. The people being aſſembled, Minucius the conſul ſpoke firſt, and endeavoured to perſuade the people to be ſatisfied with Coriolanus's ſubmiſſion in being brought to a trial before them, and not ſuffer it to be ſaid, that ſo illuſtrious a citizen underwent the forms of juſtice like a criminal. But, if you perſiſt, ſaid he, and are determined to vote, remember, that the whole ſenate is come hither to ſue for his pardon. Will you refuſe it to three hundred of the moſt venerable men in the republic? No; the moſt bitter enemy can never hold out againſt ſuch powerful interceſſors. Sicinnius anſwered with a haughty air, that he was not ſo cowardly as to betray the intereſts of the people, and that the aſſembly ſhould not be diſmiſſed till the affair was determined by a majority of voices. Well then, replied Minucius, ſince you obſtinately inſiſt, that Coriolanus ſhall be tried by this aſſembly, notwithſtanding our entreaties, I demand, that, purſuant to your agreement with the ſenate, you confine your accuſation to the ſingle article of tyranny, and bring proofs and witneſſes of this crime. Sicinnius then began the accuſation, and running over the whole life of Coriolanus, repreſented him as aiming, in every part of it, at regal power.

Coriolanus is tried in an aſſembly of the people by tribes.

As ſoon as the tribune had done ſpeaking, Coriolanus preſented himſelf in the aſſembly, and anſwered the calumnies thrown upon his conduct by a bare recital of his ſervices. He firſt enumerated the many campaigns he had made in the ſervice of the republic. Then he expoſed to the view of the people many crowns, with which he had been rewarded by the Roman generals; and every time he ſhewed the people any of thoſe proofs of his valour, he called upon the commanders, who had honoured him with them, to teſtify the truth of what he ſaid. He likewiſe named the many citizens he had ſaved in battle, and deſired them to ſtand up and witneſs what he advanced. Theſe men immediately appeared in the midſt of the aſſembly, and, ſtretching out their hands as ſuppliants, conjured the aſſembly not to deſtroy a man, to whom they were indebted for their lives: they offered to take the place of the accuſed, and to ſecure his life at the expence of their own. As theſe were moſtly plebeians, their ſighs and preſſing ſolicitations made ſuch an impreſſion on the multitude, that they could not refrain from tears. Then Coriolanus, tearing away his robe, ſhewed his breaſt all covered with the ſcars of many wounds he had received, and at the ſame time, with an air of confidence mixed with modeſty, "It was to ſave theſe worthy men, ſaid he, that "I have received the wounds you ſee; let the tribunes ſhew, "if they can, how ſuch actions are conſiſtent with the treacherous deſigns they lay to my charge. Is it eaſy to believe, that a man, who has done nothing to gain the favour of the people, but hazard his life for them, could have a deſign of uſurping the throne?" He had ſcarce done ſpeaking, when the moſt worthy men among the plebeians beians cried out, that ſo good a citizen ought to be acquitted, and that a man of his birth and merit ought not to have been brought to a trial upon ſuch ſlight preſumptions. Even the moſt mutinous thought, that the accuſers had not given ſufficient proofs of the crime laid to his charge. So that the aſſembly was juſt ready to break up much to the reputation of Coriolanus, when the tribune Decius, alarmed at this change, brought in a new charge againſt him, viz. that, contrary to the Roman laws, he had diſpoſed of the ſpoils taken from the Antiates in his late expedition, during the famine, among the ſoldiers, inſtead of delivering them to the quæſtor. This, ſaid Decius, is a plain proof of his evil deſigns: with the publick money he ſecured to himſelf creatures, and guards, and ſupporters of his intended uſurpation. Let him make it appear, that he had power to diſpoſe of the booty without violating the laws: let him anſwer directly to this one article, without dazzling us with the ſplendid ſhew of his crowns and ſcars, or uſing any other arts to blind the aſſembly. Neither Coriolanus nor his friends were prepared for this chicane; ſo that the tribunes, taking advantage of their ſurprize, exaggerated this breach of the law: Sicinnius inſolently aſked him, whether he was king of Rome, and by what authority he had diſpoſed of what belonged to the republic and the Roman people? All Coriolanus could ſay was, that thoſe of the people, who had attended him in that expedition, had received the whole benefit of that pillage. But the tribunes, urging he had by that diſtribution violated a law which was as antient as Rome itſelf, rekindled the former animoſity of the people againſt him, eſpecially of thoſe who had not been ſharers in the booty. Of this animoſity they laid hold, as the moſt favourable opportunity to collect the ſuffrages, and get Coriolanus condemned to perpetual baniſhment. Of the twenty-one tribes, but nine voted for him, and the reſt againſt him. The joy of the people upon this great event is not to be imagined: they never expreſſed more, even after the greateſt victories. And indeed not without reaſon; for, by the advantage they had gained over the ſenate and the nobility, the form of government was abſolutely changed, and the plebeians, who had been hitherto dependent on the patricians, were become their judges, and poſſeſſed of a right to call before their tribunal the greateſt men in the commonwealth, and to decide their fate. As the aſſembly was diſperſing, it was eaſy to diſtinguiſh the patricians from the plebeians, by the ſorrow or joy which appeared in their countenances. Coriolanus was the only perſon among the former, who ſeemed unconcerned. He neither ſaid nor did any thing unworthy of his uſual magnanimity. He repaired immediately to his own houſe, where he found his mother Veturia and Volumnia his wife, drowned in tears and in the firſt tranſports of their grief. He exhorted them, in a few words, to behave with conſtancy and fortitude under the various events of life; and having recommended to them the care of his children, who were yet but infants, he took his leave, not ſuffering any body to attend him in his exile, except three or four of his clients. A great number of the ſenators and other patricians attended him to the gate of the city; but he, juſtly offended at the weakneſs of their conduct, ſaid not one word to them by the way, and parted from them with the ſame reproachful ſilence [y].

THE illuſtrious exile ſpent the firſt days of his baniſhment at a country ſeat of his own in the neighbourhood of Rome. There being left wholly to himſelf, he could not reſiſt the ſtrong motions of his reſentment, but reſolved to revenge the affront which the ſenate had ſuffered the people to put upon him. Having taken this reſolution, he caſt his eyes upon the ſeveral nations that were neighbours and enemies to Rome, and finding none more exaſperated againſt the Romans, or in a better condition to undertake a war, than the Volſci, he determined to ſeek a retreat among them, not doubting, but he ſhould prevail upon them to eſpouſe his quarrel, and join with him in purſuing their common revenge. The Volſci were at that time a republic, conſiſting of ſeveral ſmall cantons, united by a league and governed by an aſſembly of deputies from each of them. One Attius Tullus, or, as Plutarch calls him, Tullus Amphidius, a man of great experience in war, and who had a conſiderable intereſt throughout the whole nation, was then their general. In the late wars between the Romans and the Volſci, he had been often encountered, and always conquered in battle, by Coriolanus. However, the Roman thought he could diſcloſe his reſentments and entruſt his life with no-body more ſafely than with a brave man, who perhaps might entertain as great an eſteem for him as he had for Attius. He therefore came to a reſolution to apply himſelf directly to him. Accordingly, he left his retreat in diſguiſe, and in the evening enter-entering Antium, one of the chief cities of the Volſci, where Tullus reſided, he went ſtrait to his houſe with his face covered, and ſat down by the hearth of the domeſtic gods, a place ſacred in all the houſes of the antient Pagans. He retires to Antium, the chief city of the Volſci.

Attius was at ſupper in an inner apartment, when news was brought him, that a ſtranger, of a very majeſtic air, was, without ſpeaking to any body, come into his houſe, and had placed himſelf by the hearth of his lares. Attius immediately came out, and aſked him who he was, and what he required? Coriolanus then diſcovered his face; but the other not recollecting him, he told him his name, acquainted him with his caſe, and offered to aſſiſt the Volſci againſt Rome, with his counſels and all his experience in war. Attius immediately gave him his hand, received him with great kindneſs, and aſſured him of the friendſhip of the Volſci. He then led him into his apartment, where they ſpent the following days in private conferences, about the means of puniſhing Rome, for the miſchiefs ſhe had done to the Volſci and the hard uſage Coriolanus had received from her. But the great point was, how to bring the whole nation to a declaration of war with Rome. The Volſci had ſuffered greatly in the laſt war, and had, by yielding ſome of their towns and part of their territory, obtained of the republic a truce for two years. As this truce was not yet expired, Tullus, though he had a great intereſt in the diets of the cantons of his country, could not promiſe, that he ſhould be able to perſuade the whole nation to take up arms. However, the two generals found means at laſt to compaſs what they deſired. The Romans were making great preparations for public ſports, which drew crouds of ſtrangers from all parts. The Volſci eſpecially went thither in great numbers, which gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the conſuls, whoſe apprehenſions were encreaſed by an artifice which the two generals had concerted together. This was to ſuborn one of the Volſci to go to the conſuls, and pretend to make a diſcovery of a deſign his countrymen had to ſet fire to Rome, while the Romans were taken up with the games and public ſports in the circus. Livy ſeems to inſinuate, that this ſcheme was laid without the knowledge of Coriolanus; but Plutarch and Dionyſius tell us, that the whole was an artifice of his. The conſuls immediately made the report of the pretended plot to the ſenate, and the ſenate cauſed the ſame day a decree to be publiſhed throughout the city ordering all the Volſci to leave it before ſun-ſet on pain of death. The conſuls, ſuls, being ordered to ſee this decree put in execution, cauſed all the gates of the city to be ſhut, except the gate Capena, through which all the Volſci were drove out with ſhame and ignominy. Tullus met them as by chance, and, hearing how they had been treated, exaggerated the affront they had received. "We alone", ſaid he, "of all the "different nations now in Rome are not thought worthy to "ſee the games. We alone, like the profaneſt wretches "and outlaws, are driven from a public feſtival. Go and "tell in all your cities and villages the diſtinguiſhing mark "the Romans have put upon us". He found no difficulty in exaſperating minds already prejudiced; a general diet was tumultuouſly aſſembled, when all the deputies were of opinion, that they were at liberty to begin the war, without waiting till the truce was expired. When Tullus, who conducted the affair, ſaw his countrymen ready to carry fire and ſword into the territory of Rome, he adviſed them, before he broke up, to ſend for Coriolanus into their aſſembly; telling them, that he now bore more enmity to the Romans than they themſelves, and was capable of doing them more hurt than they had received from them. The Romans was accordingly ſent for, and, being introduced into the aſſembly, he related his misfortunes, made a merit of chuſing a retreat among the Volſci, rather than among the Latins, Hetrurians, Sabines, &c. perſuaded them to demand back all the cities the Romans had taken from them; and laſtly, offered to aſſiſt their generals with his counſels and ſword, without aſpiring to any command in their armies. His ſpeech was received with great applauſe, and the embaſſadors were diſpatched to Rome, to demand the reſtoration of the lands and cities which had been taken in the late war. But the only anſwer they brought back was this, that the Romans would not give up what they had conquered, and that if the Volſci were the firſt to take arms, the Romans would be the laſt to lay them down. Upon this the Volſci unanimouſly appointed Tullus and Coriolanus to command their troops, and, to bind the latter more ſtrictly to them, conferred on him the dignity of ſenator. The two generals immediately raiſed a numerous army, which they divided into two bodies; Tullus with one ſtaid in the country to cover it on the ſide of Latium, while Coriolanus with the other, conſiſting of the flower of the Volſcian troops, entered the territory of Rome, before the conſuls had taken any meaſures to oppoſe him, and there made himſelf maſter of Circæum, Corbio,

The Volſci reſolve upon a war with Rome.

Coriolanus appointed to command their troops.

Corbio, Vitellium, and Trebia: Toleria, Bola, Labicum, and Pedum, all in Latium or on the confines of that country, were taken ſword in hand, and the inhabitants given up to the fury of an enemy victorious and enraged: As this irruption was not expected, Coriolanus found many Roman citizens diſperſed about the country, and theſe he made ſlaves. He burnt their farms, carried away their cattle, broke in pieces all their inſtruments of huſbandry, and, in ſhort, carried fire and ſword into all parts. However, in that general devaſtation, either out of regard to his old friends, or to keep up a reciprocal animoſity between the two parties, he ſpared the houſes and lands of the patricians. This conduct had the deſired effect. The plebeians complained of the patricians, as if they had brought ſo formidable an enemy upon them. The patricians, on the other hand, upbraided the people, with having forced ſo great a captain to throw himſelf in deſpair into the party of the enemy. As mutual diſtruſt, ſuſpicion, and hatred reigned in both parties, they were not ſo eager to repulſe the Volſci, as to decry and ruin each other: ſo that Coriolanus, finding no army in the field to oppoſe his deſigns, carried on his conqueſts, took Lavinium, and at length came and encamped at the Foſſa Cluilia within five miles of Rome. The conſternation in the city was then general. The people terrified at the approach of ſo formidable an enemy, haſtened into the forum, and there with loud cries demanded peace and the abolition of the decree of Coriolanus's baniſhment. But the ſenate, who had formerly protected the exile, now refuſed to comply with the demands of the people, either to clear themſelves from the ſuſpicion of maintaining a correſpondence with Coriolanus, or perhaps out of that ſpirit of magnanimity, which made the Romans averſe from peace, when they were attended with bad ſucceſs in war. However that be, the Roman general no ſooner underſtood the oppoſition the ſenate made to his return, but he advanced to Rome, and inveſted the place, as if he deſigned to beſiege it. As he continued there that evening and a good part of the next day, without making any motion, the Romans imagined he only waited for an opportunity of reconciling himſelf with his country. The ſenate therefore reſolved to ſend a deputation to him, conſiſting of five ſenators, who had been his moſt zealous friends. Theſe were M. Minucius, Poſthumus Cominius, Sp. Lartius, P. Pinarius,

Takes many cities from the Romans.

The people are for recalling him from baniſhment.

The ſenate ſend a deputation to him.

Pinarius, and Q. Sulpicius, who had all been conſuls. When Coriolanus underſtood, that the deputies were coming, he pleaſed himſelf with the thought of humbling thoſe proud republicans. He made them paſs through two ranks of ſoldiers ſtanding to their arms, and gave them audience, ſitting, and ſurrounded by the moſt conſiderable men among the Volſci. Minucius, who had been his chief advocate, put him in mind of the regard the patricians had always ſhewn him, and endeavoured to excuſe, in ſome meaſure, the people, of whom nine tribes had voted for him. He expoſtulated with him for carrying his reſentment to ſuch an exceſs, reminded him of the inſtability of fortune, and, laſtly, invited him to throw himſelf into the arms of his native city, which ſtretched them out, like a tender mother, to receive him into her boſom.

Coriolanus anſwered with a haughty air, that as general of the Volſci he muſt adviſe them to apply to the nation he ſerved, and in a ſuppliant manner ſue to them for peace, which he engaged to procure for them, upon condition that Rome reſtored to the Volſci the country ſhe had taken from them, granted them the ſame rights of citizenſhip which ſhe had granted to the Latins, and recalled the Roman colonies from thoſe towns of which ſhe had got poſſeſſion unjuſtly. As to the liberty offered him of going back to Rome, he ſaid it was not worth his acceptance. ‘ Is a bare re-eſtabliſhment in Rome ’, ſaid he, “ a “ ſufficient ſatisfaction for the affronts I have received? Can “ there be any ſafety for me, while a Sicinnius or a Decius “ is able to arm the populace againſt my life? No; Rome is “ an unnatural mother, who has caſt off a ſon that was uſeful “ to her and zealous for her glory. She ſhall ſoon know “ by the effects of my reſentment, whoſe cauſe it is that “ the gods eſpouſe”. Having thus ſpoke in a haughty ſtrain what concerned the intereſts of the Volſci and his own injuries, he aſſumed a more gentle air towards the deputies, aſſured them, that he remembered with pleaſure his obligations to them, returned them thanks for the generous protection they granted to his wife and children, and told them, that, to ſhew his gratitude, he would even allow the Romans a truce for thirty days with reſpect to the proper territory of Rome; but that, after the expiration of that time, he ſhould expect from them a deciſive anſwer. CORIOLANUS employed the thirty days in making new conquests in Latium, and then returned and encamped before Rome with all his forces. The senate had spent the thirty days in deliberations, and the result of their debates may give us a true notion of the temper of those haughty republicans. They resolved never to receive law from their enemy, nor treat of peace with him, till he had laid down his arms, and retired from the territory of Rome and from those of her allies. Their pride did not abate, notwithstanding the present calamity. They chose ten new deputies to carry this message to Coriolanus, who returned them this short answer, that the Romans had no choice but compliance with the articles, or war; and that he allowed them three days more to come to a final determination. He even refused to hear their reply, threatening to treat them as spies, if they did not quit his camp immediately. The report of the deputies threw the city into the utmost consternation. All that could be done in this universal dejection was, to appoint every one his post, either on the ramparts, the capitol, or in the towers. The tribunes were not now so much as heard of; the consuls being at a loss what to do, assembled the senate; expedient upon expedient was proposed, and at last they all agreed to send a deputation to the enemy's camp, consisting of all the ministers of the gods, with which they thought Coriolanus could not but be affected. Accordingly, all the priests, augurs, sacrificers, and guardians of the sacred things, were ordered to march out of the city in their pompous habits, and to conjure Coriolanus, by the respect he owed to the gods, to grant peace to his country. But this deputation was as fruitless as the former. Coriolanus sent them back to the city with orders to acquaint the senate, that the attack would immediately begin if they did not submit to the conditions which he had proposed in the name of the Volscian nation.

Another deputies sent to him consisting of the priests, augurs, &c.

UPON the return of the priests, they all looked upon the republic as lost; the men ran in disorder to the walls, and the women in despair to the temples, especially to that of Jupiter in the capitol, where, with tears in their eyes, they implored of the tutelar gods of Rome the preservation of their country, then on the brink of ruin. Such was the face of affairs in the city, when a Roman matron, named Valeria, sister of the famous Valerius Poplicola, as if she had been moved by a kind of divine inspiration, turned to the other matrons, who were come in crouds to the temple of

Jupiter, and ſuggeſted to them a reſolution which ſaved Rome. "Let us not ſuffer ourſelves" ſaid ſhe to them, "to ſink under our preſent afflictions. What men could "not do, women may perhaps accompliſh. We may perhaps ſoften the heart of a conqueror hitherto inflexible. "Let us go in this mournful dreſs to the houſe of Veturia, "the mother of Coriolanus, and agree with her to repair "to the camp of her ſon. Coriolanus will never be able to "hold out againſt the tears of his mother, his wife, and his "children, when attended with all the women of diſtinc-"tion in Rome." The motion being approved of by all who were preſent, they went ſtrait to the houſe of Veturia, whom they found with Volumnia, her daughter-in-law, deploring her misfortunes and thoſe of Rome. Volumnia, ſurprized to ſee ſo many women of diſtinction croud to her, aſked what had brought them to a houſe overwhelmed with ſorrow? "You," replied Valeria, "are the only re-"fuge we have left in our misfortunes. We come to en-"treat you to preſerve our eſtates, our honour, and our "liberty from the Volſci. Repair then with us to the "camp of Coriolanus, and bring with you Volumnia and "theſe tender children, who may ſoften the heart of their "beloved father. Your preſence will perſuade him to pre-"fer the preſervation of his deſtitute family to the purſuit "of his reſentment, and the honours he may expect from "the Volſci. Nothing can be more glorious for you, Ve-"turia, than to recover your ſon, deliver your country, "and ſave the lives of your fellow-citizens. Make no de-"lay, ſince the danger is great and requires a ſpeedy re-"medy." At theſe words Veturia burſt out into tears, recollected herſelf a moment, and then replied; "Alas! my "intereſt in Coriolanus is but a poor refuge. What im-"preſſions can women make on a warrior ſpirited by re-"venge? I am not wanting in affection to my country; "but what am I now in my ſon's eyes more than other "Roman women, who ſhare the averſion he has for Rome? "This he ſufficiently ſhewed at his departure into baniſh-"ment." Coriolanus, ſaid he to us, is now loſt to you "for ever. I have no longer either mother, wife, or "children. I renounce all, even my domeſtic gods. Can "we then hope to ſoften ſo hard a heart? What ſhall we "perſuade him to do? To love a country, which has trea-"ted him ſo injuriouſly? To betray a nation, which has "received

" received him in its boſom? ſhall we deſire him to ſhew " compaſſion for a people, who had none for him? Let me " ſpend my days, Valeria, in grief and ſorrow, and don't " force me to ſuffer the mortification of a refuſal, which " will be equally diſhonourable to Coriolanus and his mother." But Valeria renewing her entreaties, and with her all the Roman matrons embracing her knees and conjuring her not to refuſe her country this laſt aſſiſtance, Veturia, at length overcome, promiſed to comply with their requeſt, if the ſenate agreed to it. Valeria immediately gave advice of this deſign to the conſuls, who propoſed it in the ſenate, where, after long debates, it was approved of by the fathers. Then Veturia and the moſt illuſtrious of the Roman matrons, in a great many chariots, which the conſuls had ordered to be got ready for them, took their way to the enemy's camp. Coriolanus, being informed by his ſcouts, that his mother, his wife, and a great number of other women were coming to his camp, determined to receive them with the ſame reſpect that he had paid to the miniſters of religion, but in the main to grant them nothing; for he was well appriſed of the views the Romans had in ſo unheard-of a deputation. But notwithſtanding his reſolution, he no ſooner ſaw his mother and wife at the head of this troop of women, than he began to relent. He walked out of his tent, and ordering his lictors to lower their faſces before perſons ſo dear to him, he ran haſtily to embrace them. They expreſſed their joy upon ſeeing each other again chiefly by tears; and when they had given ſome time to the firſt emotions of nature, Veturia began to enter upon the ſubject for which ſhe came. Coriolanus, that he might not give any umbrage to the Volſci, called the chief officers of the army to be witneſſes of what paſſed in this interview. They were no ſooner come, than Vetruria told him, that the Roman matrons, who attended her, had omitted nothing, during his abſence, that could comfort her and his wife Volumnia in their affliction; that they were come to beg peace of him once more, and to conjure him, by all that was dear to him, to turn his arms againſt other enemies, &c. Coriolanus replied, that he could not think of betraying the intereſts of a nation, that had truſted him with the command of their army, and honoured him with a place in their ſenate; that he had found more honours at Antium, than he had loſt at Rome, and that nothing would be wanting to his happineſs, if ſhe and Volumnia would leave the ungrateful city, and come and enjoy among the Volſci the honours which they would pay to the mother and wife of their general. The Volſcian officers ſeemed very much pleaſed with this anſwer; but Veturia, without entering into a compariſon between Rome and Antium, which would have offended them, told her ſon, that ſhe would never require any thing of him that might be a blemiſh upon his honour; but that, without being any ways wanting in what he owed to the Volſci, he might mediate a peace equally advantageous to both nations. Then, raiſing her voice, ſhe added; "And can you, my ſon, reject a propoſal ſo equitable? can "you prefer a cruel and obſtinate revenge to the tears and "entreaties of your mother? conſider, that your anſwer "is to decide the fate of my glory and of my life too. A "Roman woman knows how to die, when her honour "calls upon her ſo to do. If I cannot move you, know "I have reſolved to give myſelf death in your preſence. "You ſhall not march to Rome, without treading under "your feet the body of her to whom you owe your being." Veturia, perceiving her ſpeech made a deep impreſſion on his mind, continued her diſcourſe, conjuring him by the great Jupiter, who preſided in the capitol, and by the manes of his father and anceſtors, to withdraw his troops from before Rome, and allow the Romans for her ſake a truce for a year, that in this interval meaſures might be taken to procure a ſolid and laſting peace. "Grant, this, my ſon," ſaid ſhe, "and, if my tears and prayers are not able "to move you, behold your mother at your feet, implo-"ring of you the preſervation of her country." With theſe words, melting in tears, ſhe embraced his knees; his wife and children did the ſame, and all the Roman matrons, who were with them, begged for mercy by their cries and tears. Coriolanus, ſeeing his mother at his feet, could hold out no longer, but amidſt a ſtruggle with different paſſions cried out, "ah, my mother, you diſarm me," and, tenderly preſſing her hand in lifting her up, he added in a low voice, "Rome is ſaved; but your ſon is loſt;" well foreſeeing, that the Volſci would never forgive him the regard he was going to pay to her entreaties. He then retired into his tent with his mother, wife, and children, and there conferred with the two perſons that were moſt dear to him about the meaſures he ſhould take with reſpect to the Volſci and to the Romans. The articles agreed on were theſe; 1ſt, that Coriolanus ſhould decamp the next day, without com-

committing any hoſtilities in the Roman territory; 2dly, that after he had aſſembled the chiefs of the Volſci, he ſhould uſe his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade them to conclude a peace with Rome upon reaſonable terms; 3dly, that if the Volſci would not hearken to an accommodation, he ſhould then lay down the command of their army, which would probably be a means to bring them to a better temper. Veturia, after a conference ſo beneficial to her country, taking leave of her ſon, returned in the evening with the other Roman ladies to Rome, where they were received with the acclamations of the whole city. The ſenate, deſired them to aſk what reward they pleaſed for ſo important a ſervice. But Veturia, after having conſulted with the others, replied, that they aſked nothing but leave to build a temple at their own expence to The Fortune of women. The ſenate, applauding their diſintereſtedneſs, ordered both the temple and the ſtatue to be erected at the expence of the public, in the very place where Veturia had overcome the obſtinacy of her ſon. Valeria, who had propoſed ſo ſucceſsful a deputation, was the firſt prieſteſs of this ſanctuary, which was much frequented by the Roman women[a].

EARLY next morning, Coriolanus led back his troops into the country of the Volſci, and there divided all the ſpoil among his ſoldiers, without reſerving any thing for himſelf. This liberality encreaſed their affection to him, ſo that they made his apology where-ever they went. However, ſome murmured at the reſpect he had ſhewn for his mother and country. Among theſe was Attius Tullus, who, growing jealous of the eſteem and credit which his rival had gained with the ſoldiers, publicly gave out, that he had betrayed the intereſt of the Volſci. Hereupon Coriolanus deſired, he might be allowed to clear his conduct before the general council of the nation. An aſſembly was accordingly held; but while Coriolanus was beginning to anſwer the charge brought againſt him by his adverſaries, Tullus, who no leſs feared his eloquence than his valour, raiſed a tumult, by the advantage of which ſome of the oppoſite faction, ſuborned by Tullus, threw themſelves upon him and ſtabbed him. The ſoldiers, who had ſerved under him, greatly lamented his death, and the people of Antium performed his obſequies with great pomp, and erected a ſtately tomb to his memory. The Romans had their reaſons ſons of ſtate for not decreeing him the ſame funeral honours. For he had born arms againſt his country, and was not yet reconciled to Rome by a regular treaty. However, the Roman ladies, upon their preſenting a petition to the ſenate, obtained leave to wear mourning for him ten months. Such was the end of the famous Marcius, ſirnamed Coriolanus, who, for his eminent virtues and great ſervices, deſerved a much better treatment both from the Romans and the Volſci. He was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious patrician families in Rome. He had an excellent underſtanding, was frugal, diſintereſted, of ſtrict probity, and inviolably attached to the obſervation of the laws. Theſe pacific virtues were never known to be accompanied with a more heroic courage, or ſo great a capacity for the art of war. Rome never bred a more able general: he was always ſucceſsful, becauſe always equally brave, and prudent. But he was imperious, inexorably ſevere, and ſo far from affecting popularity, that he ran into the other extreme, which paſſed for pride. Tho' he was too haughty for a republican, his country has ever honoured him as one of her heroes, and hiſtory has done him the juſtice to ſay, that he could, at the head of a Roman army, have more enlarged the dominions of the republic, than all the generals who went before him. But unhappy factions hindered Rome from reaping any benefit from his virtues. But ſhe was at laſt ſenſible of the loſs ſhe had ſuffered by baniſhing him; and her own misfortunes taught her, how many calamities ſhe might have avoided, and how many conqueſts gained, if ſhe had not provoked a man of ſuch eminent parts.

Upon the news of Coriolanus's death, the conſuls ventured to take the field. Theſe were Sp. Nautius and Sextus Furius, men of no experience in war or courage. They encamped ſeparately on eminences at a ſmall diſtance from the enemy. But though the Æqui and Volſci, who had entered into a confederacy againſt Rome, quarrelled about the choice of a general, and even fought a bloody battle, the timorous conſuls did not venture to attack them in their retreat, but led their troops back to Rome, where they were received with the hiſſes of the people [b].

ces of being governed by men of little merit, they resolved for the future to change their conduct; and therefore chose two consuls, who had given distinguishing proofs of their courage, and skill in war, Aquilius Tuscus and Sicinnius Sabinus. The former gained a complete victory over the Hernici, and latter over the Volsci, who had been so formidable under the command of Coriolanus: their army was entirely defeated, their camp taken, and the general Attius Tullus killed in the battle. This victory being of greater consequence than that of Aquilius, Sicinnius was decreed a triumph, and the other only an ovation. These consuls were succeeded by Sp. Cassius, who had been twice consul before and had obtained a triumph, and Proculus Virginius, a patrician of known courage. The latter marched against the Æqui, who, upon the approach of the Roman army, retired with all their effects into their cities. The consul therefore, who was not in a condition to undertake sieges, returned to Rome. It had fallen to Cassius's lot to make war with the Hernici; and accordingly he took the field, and entering their country, by the mere terror of his arms reduced them to submit, and sue for peace and an alliance with the republic. The consul, however, would not settle the conditions of the alliance, till they had first obtained a decree of the senate for it; which deference so obliged the fathers, that they impowered Cassius to draw up the articles of the treaty himself, promising to ratify whatever he should determine. This mark of distinction emboldened the consul to demand the honours of a triumph, which, though not due to him, for he had gained no victory, yet were granted. He was no sooner honoured with a second triumph, than he drew up the conditions of the treaty with the Hernici, which was only a copy of the treaty he had made with the Latins in his second consulship. This condescension gave no small umbrage to the senate; they could not bear, that a foreign nation, but just reconciled to Rome, should be raised at once to equal honours and privileges with the Latins, who were allied to them by blood, and had done them many important services. As Cassius was a man naturally vain and ostentatious, some penetrating republicans began to suspect, that, in thus favouring the Hernici, he had private views prejudicial to the state. And indeed he soon convinced them, that his views and interests were very different from those of the commonwealth. For the very next day after his triumph, having, according to cuſtom, convened an aſſembly of the people, to give them an account of what he had done for the ſervice of the republic during the campaign, among other things he told them, that he propoſed, before the end of his magiſtracy, to render the condition of the plebeians ſo happy, that they ſhould no longer envy that of the patricians. The next day he aſſembled the ſenate, and there made a long ſpeech in praiſe of the plebeians, which he concluded by propoſing a new diviſion of the lands belonging to the public, ſaying, it was but reaſonable, that the lands, taken from the enemy, ſhould be divided among thoſe who had expoſed their lives to enlarge the bounds of the republic. He added, that he likewiſe thought it reaſonable that the poor citizens ſhould be reimburſed what money they had paid in the late famine for the corn, which Gelo, one of the princes of Sicily, had made a preſent of to the republic, and which ought to have been diſtributed gratis among the people. Both theſe propoſals were rejected by the ſenate with great indignation. Moſt of the ſenators, without any reſpect to the dignity of Caſſius, publicly reproached him with his pride, his ambition, and the deſire he betrayed of raiſing new troubles in the commonwealth. But Caſſius, flattering himſelf that the people would declare in his favour, convened a new aſſembly, and having there bitterly inveighed againſt the patricians, he exhorted the multitude to free themſelves at once from the indigence to which the avarice of the nobility had reduced them, by making a ſolemn law for the partition of the conquered lands in their own favour. He did not ſtop here; but adviſed them, by the ſame law, to admit the Latins and Hernici to ſhare with them in the diſtribution. To make the people reliſh this part of his propoſal, he inſinuated to them, that by this means thoſe two nations would be united with them in one common intereſt, and conſequently would not fail to ſupport them in caſe of any attempt made by the patricians to drive them from their poſſeſſions. This law, as it related to the diviſion of lands, was called the Agrarian law from the Latin word ager, ſignifying land. The people at firſt received the propoſal with great applauſe. But the tribunes, diſpleaſed to ſee a conſul author of a law, which favoured the people, oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power, and brought over to them great numbers of the people, who at firſt had been fond of Caſſius, and had blamed blamed both tribunes and patricians as betraying their intereſt. "It is a ſhame, ſaid the tribunes, to ſuffer lands, "which you have acquired by your blood, to be profuſely "diſtributed among allies, who had no ſhare in your con-"queſts. Why are the Hernici to have one third of their "lands left to them? Ought they not, as a conquered peo-"ple, to be entirely deprived of them? There is, without "all doubt, O Romans, a deſign upon your liberty. Your "ſlavery will be the conſequence of this fatal diviſion of "lands, which the artful conſul would make between you "and foreigners. By that extraordinary diſtribution of "lands between the conquerors and the conquered, he "deſigns to make the old enemies of Rome his creatures, "to the prejudice of the republic, and to plane himſelf a "way to ſovereign power." One day, when Caſſius and his collegue Virginius, who oppoſed this law, were diſputing before the people, Rabuleius, a cunning tribune, addreſſed them both thus. "Is not your diſpute, whether "the people of Rome ſhall themſelves take poſſeſſion of "all the conquered lands, or ſhare them with the Hernici "and Latins?" The conſuls agreed it was. Upon which the tribune, turning to the people, "Our conſuls agree," ſaid he, "as to the main point; neither of them is for "excluding you from the lands in diſpute. Loſe no time "therefore, Romans, in taking poſſeſſion of what is una-"nimouſly granted you. As for the other article, leave "it to be conſidered of hereafter." This advice pleaſed the people, who were for having the clauſe in favour of foreigners dropt. But Caſſius, who was fond of his own ſcheme, diſmiſſed the aſſembly before they came to any reſolution. As the people were then all inclined to favour Virginius, Caſſius did not appear for ſome days in public, pretending to be indiſpoſed, but in reality contriving new expedients to get his law paſſed. To this end he brought as many Latins to Rome as he could, for they had the privileges of Roman citizens. But Virginius, aware of his collegue's deſign, publiſhed a decree, commanding all thoſe, who were not inhabitants of Rome, to leave it immediately. Caſſius, on the other hand, made a contrary edict, declaring it lawful for any one, who was enrolled among the citizens of Rome, to remain there; ſo that a ſedition was like to enſue. The ſenate aſſembled to prevent the calamities which ſeemed to threaten the ſtate. Several opinions were offered: Appius Claudius, that intrepid defender of the laws, ſpoke firſt, and oppoſed the Caſſian law in both its parts. He was againſt diſtributing the lands either to Romans or foreigners; inveighed againſt Virginius for ſhewing too much indulgence to the people and their tribunes; propoſed ſelling part both of the newly conquered lands, and of thoſe which ſome of the nobility had uſurped; and depoſiting the money ariſing from the ſale in the treaſury, for defraying the charges of the war; and laſtly, moved, that a college of ten ſenators, under the name of Decemviri, might be created to meaſure theſe lands, and determine the differences which might ariſe about their limits. A. Sempronius Atratinus, a man much reſpected by the ſenate, ſpoke next, and, after having highly approved of Appius's advice, obſerved, that there were two ſorts of lands to be diſpoſed of; ſome, which were formerly conquered by the Romans, without the aſſiſtance of their allies; and theſe he thought ought to be divided between the public and the indigent Romans only; others, that had been lately conquered from the Hernici, by the aſſiſtance of the Latins; and theſe he was for dividing between the public, the Romans, the Latins, and the Hernici, who were now become allies. As to the creation of the Decemvirs, he ſeconded that motion. Purſuant to the advice of theſe two ſenators, a ſenatus conſultum, or decree of the ſenate, was drawn up, by which it was enacted, that ten of the fathers, who had been conſuls, ſhould be appointed to divide the conquered lands between the treaſury, the Romans, and their allies; that for the future all the lands the Romans ſhould conquer, with the aſſiſtance of their allies, ſhould be divided between the public treaſury, the citizens of Rome, and thoſe allies; and laſtly, that the choice of the firſt decemvirs ſhould be left to the conſuls of the enſuing year. As the eſtates of the principal men in Rome lay wholly in thoſe conquered lands, they got this laſt article added to the decree, in order to put off the execution of it. Nay, the chief men in the ſenate reſolved among themſelves to impeach Caſſius, and proſecute him to the utmoſt, in order to deter others from ſtirring in this affair. Accordingly, the two new conſuls, Q. Fabius and Servius Cornelius, were no ſooner entered upon their office, but the quæſtors Cœſo Fabius, brother to the firſt conſul, and Valerius, nephew to the great Poplicola, having convened an aſſembly of the people, according to the power annexed to their office, accuſed Caſſius of having introduced foreign troops into the city with a deſign to uſurp the ſovereignty. The charge being plainly proved by the depoſitions of the Latins and Hernici themſelves, Caſſius was condemned by the unanimous voice of all his fellow-citizens, and thrown down headlong from the top of the Tarpeian rock [c]. Some writers tell us, that as ſoon as the two new conſuls had taken poſſeſſion of their dignity, Caſſius's own father accuſed him to the ſenate of having aſpired to the ſovereignty, and that, like another Brutus, having laid the proofs of his crime before the aſſembly of the people, he took him home to his own houſe, and there cauſed him to be put to death in the preſence of his whole family [d].

Sp. Caſſius is condemned and executed.

THE pride of the patricians and their contemptuous treatment of the people made the poorer citizens regret the loſs of Caſſius, who had been their zealous defender. The conſuls put off from day to day the nominating of the decemvirs for the diſtribution of the lands, notwithſtanding the ſolicitation of the tribunes to have the agrarian law put in execution. This provoked the people, who, being ſtirred up by the ſeditious harangues of their tribunes, began to hold private aſſemblies, and threatened both the conſuls and the ſenate. Every thing ſeemed to tend to a revolt, when the conſuls had recourſe to the old expedient of amuſing the people with a war. But, as they were well appriſed that the tribunes would oppoſe the neceſſary levies, they cauſed a rumour to be ſpread, that they were going to create a dictator, and that Appius Claudius would be choſen. The very name of a man ſo ſevere, and ſo much dreaded by the multitude, made ſuch an impreſſion on the people, that they liſted themſelves without delay. Cornelius entered the country of the Veientes, and Q. Fabius that of the Volſci: both conſuls were attended with good ſucceſs. Fabius returned with a great booty in ſpoils, cattle, and ſlaves, but ſold the whole, and put the money into the hands of the quæſtors, without giving the leaſt part of it to his ſoldiers. And now this year being expired, Cæſo Fabius, the quæſtor, and Æmilius Mamercinus were choſen conſuls in the comitia by centuries. Æmilius marched againſt the Volſci, by whom he was defeated in the field; but

but the enemy having attacked his camp, after he had received a ſtrong reinforcement from his collegue, he ſallied out upon them, put them to flight, and laid waſte their country. During the abſence of the conſuls, the ſenate, to divert the people's minds from the Agrarian law, ordered the conſecration of the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, which had been vowed by Poſthumius at the battle of Regillus. In the mean while, the time for electing new conſuls being come, M. Fabius, brother to Quintus and Cæſo, and L. Valerius, who in his queſtorſhip had been inſtrumental in the deſtruction of Caſſius, were choſen. During their conſulſhip, the war with the Volſci breaking out anew, the tribune Mœnius proteſted againſt any levies for the ſervice, till the decemvirs were named for executing the Agrarian laws. The conſuls, to extricate themſelves from this perplexity, carried their tribunal out of Rome, beyond the juriſdiction of the tribunes, which was confined within the walls of the city. They then ſent a ſummons to the people; and if any one refuſed to appear, or give in his name, they ordered his houſe in the country to be demoliſhed, and his lands laid waſte. Thus, without having any conteſts with the tribunes, they brought the people to their duty, and ſoon formed two armies, one to march againſt the Veientes, the other againſt the Volſci. The conſuls diſtruſting their troops, which conſiſted of men ill affected to them and for the moſt part inliſted againſt their will, agreed to act only upon the defenſive. This agreement was obſerved by Fabius, who marched againſt the Veientes; but Valerius came to an engagement with the Volſci, which proved very bloody without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide; for both armies, after having fought many hours with incredible fury, retired, as it were by common conſent, to their reſpective camps. The friends of Valerius at Rome gave out, that it was through want of affection in the ſoldiers to their general, that he had not gained a complete victory; but the ſoldiers in all their letters accuſed their general with incapacity in military affairs. The conſuls detained their ſoldiers in the field, as long as poſſible, to avoid new diſturbances; but the time for the election of new magiſtrates drawing near, they were obliged to return to Rome, and then diſcord raged again with more fury than ever. The patricians were for promoting moting Appius Claudius, ſon of the famous Appius, who had ſo ſignally ſhewed his averſion to the people. But as often as the conſuls ordered the centuries to aſſemble, the tribunes at the head of the people made ſo much noiſe, and raiſed ſuch violent and bitter conteſts, that it was impoſſible to proceed to the election. The conſuls and the ſenate endeavoured to appeaſe the tumult but to no effect, the tribunes telling them, that unleſs they choſe men of unqueſtionable characters, they ſhould find means to prevent any election, and that they would not ſuffer tyrants to be impoſed upon them for magiſtrates. As theſe diſputes threatened a ſedition, the ſenate agreed to reduce the republic for ſome time to an inter-regnum, and commit the adminiſtration of affairs to ſome venerable old men, who ſhould govern by turns and take care to provide new conſuls. S. Atratinus was the firſt who took upon him the care of public affairs, according to this ſcheme; and from that time all other authority ceaſed in Rome. To him, a few days after, ſucceeded Sp. Lartius, a man of a pacific diſpoſition, who managed both parties ſo artfully, that he prevailed on each to abate ſomewhat of their demands. It was concluded, that the election ſhould be made as uſual, and by the votes of the centuries, and that the two parties ſhould agree beforehand upon the perſons who ſhould be raiſed to the conſulate. Union being re-eſtabliſhed upon theſe conditions, they proceeded only for form ſake to the election. The tribunes got the conſular dignity beſtowed upon C. Julius Julus, who was of the people's party. The patricians named for his collegue Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who, without having ever offended the people, had on all occaſions ſtood up for the rights of the ſenate. As for the promotion of Appius, the patricians, fearing the oppoſition of the tribunes might raiſe a fatal ſedition, thought it adviſeable to defer it to more peaceable times. The tribunes made ſome oppoſition to the new levies, in hopes of getting the decemvirs named and obtaining the partition of the lands. But Fabius, notwithſtanding their oppoſition, raiſed ſuch a number of troops, as enabled him to take the field, and ravage the country of the Veientes [e].

The republic falls into an inter-regnum.

The civil feuds break out afresh.

THE civil feuds broke out afresh upon the next election of the consuls. The people insisted on chusing patricians of their party, and the senate were for electing such only as were in the interest of the nobility. Each party stood to its pretensions with equal warmth; but at length the affair was accommodated, and they agreed to go by the same rule as in the last election. The senate, named Cæso Fabius, who in his quæstorship had destroyed Cassius, and the people Sp. Furius. The Æqui and the Veientes having renewed their incursions, the consuls ordered the people to take arms. But Sp. Icilius, one of the tribunes, revived the old quarrel about the division of lands, and declared, he would vigorously oppose all the decrees that should be issued by the senate, let the matter be what it would, till the decemvirs were named. In the mean time, the Æqui and Veientes with fire and sword laid waste the territory of Rome, without the consuls being able to take the field, through the obstinacy of the tribunes, who, prevented their making great levies. In this perplexity Appius thought of an expedient, which proved very successful. This was, to gain over some of the tribunes; for if the opposition of a single tribune could suspend the execution of a decree of the senate, he concluded, that it had the same force as to the resolutions of his collegues. The senators therefore applied themselves to gain the friendship of the tribunes, wherein they succeeded, four of that college declaring in a public assembly, that they could not bear, that the enemy should thus lay waste the country with impunity. The opposition of Icilius being therefore over-ruled, the people took arms. Furius, being beloved by his soldiers, had a successful campaign, and gained very considerable advantages over the Æqui. But the troops of Fabius, who were to act against the Veientes, chose rather to lose their own glory, than gain any honour for their general. They refused to pursue the enemy, after they had put their troops to flight, lest, by making the victory complete, they should procure Fabius a triumph at his return to Rome. Neither did they stop here; but following, they struck their tents without orders, and began their march towards the city. The consul, finding it impossible to govern them, put the best face he could on the matter, sounded a retreat and returned

As it was now become cuſtomary in the republic to have one of the conſuls choſen according to the inclinations of the people, and the other according to thoſe of the ſenate, the patricians caſt their eyes again upon the Fabian family, and raiſed to the conſulate M. Fabius a ſecond time, notwithſtanding his brother Cæſo had been ſo diſagreeable to the army the year before; and the people promoted Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus. In their conſulſhip, the Hetrurians, encouraged by the diviſions in Rome, invaded the Roman territory with a numerous army. Pontificius, one of the tribunes, renewed the old diſpute; but the ſenate having gained ſome of their college, an army of twenty thouſand men was raiſed, and equally divided between the two conſuls, who taking the field, encamped near each other; but had ſo little dependence on the affection of their troops, that they kept within their intrenchments. In the mean time, lightning falling upon the tent of the conſul Manlius, the augurs declared, that his camp would be taken by the enemy; upon which prediction he quitted it the ſame night, and joined his army to that of Fabius. The Hetrurians, interpreting the omen to their advantage, ſeized the deſerted camp, and then inſulted the united armies in their entrenchments. Upon this, thoſe very ſoldiers, who a little before had agreed not to come to a battle, began to complain of their commanders for not leading them out againſt the enemy. The generals ſeemed to conſult together whether it were proper to engage the enemy; but their true deſign was to encreaſe the eagerneſs of the ſoldiers by further delays. Accordingly, they grew ſo impatient to fall upon the inſulting Hetrurians, that the conſuls were obliged to take away their arms, leſt they ſhould come to an engagement without orders. Then they crouded about the generals tents, making great clamours; and Fabius laid hold of that opportunity to reproach them with their former behaviour, and to encreaſe their ardor by expreſſing a diffidence of their courage and honour. He had no ſooner ended his ſpeech, but they all cried out with one voice, 'Lead us on, and lay aſide your ſuſpici-'ons.' One Flavoleius, a centurion in great eſteem among the troops, hearing theſe words, got upon an eminence, and thus addreſſed himſelf to the conſuls: 'I 'plainly ſee you have not quite laid aſide your diſtruſt

'of us; and indeed you have reaſon to fear that we 'ſhall not act anſwerably to our promiſes. But for my 'part, at leaſt, I declare, I will behave in the battle 'like a true Roman. Fellow ſoldiers,' continued he, 'do you take the ſame oath that I am now going to take.' At which words he drew his ſword, and, lifting it up towards heaven, cried out, 'O great Jupiter, Mars, and 'thou god, whoſoever thou art, who puniſheſt breach 'of faith, I call you to witneſs, that I will never return 'to Rome till I have conquered.' The conſuls, inferior officers, and all the ſoldiers, took the ſame oath, and confirmed it by ſacrifices. Then the conſuls reſtored to the ſoldiers their arms, and marched them out of the camp in ſilence and good order to take poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt, where they drew them up in battalia. On the other hand, the Hetrurians were ſurpriſed to ſee the cowardly Romans come out of their entrenchments and offer them battle. As this was a thing they did not expect, they had not brought the ſoldiers of the two camps together. However, either of their armies was conſiderably more numerous than that of the Romans; and beſides, it was confidently reported, that the Romans would betray their generals, and deſert them in the heat of the engagement. Full of theſe hopes, they ſounded the charge. The conſul Manlius commanded the right wing of the Roman army, Q. Fabius the left, and M. Fabius, the other conſul the main body. Both armies advanced with great ſhouts, and came to a cloſe engagement. The front of the right wing of the Hetrurians being more extended than that of the left wing of the Romans and more numerous, Fabius, with great difficulty, withſtood the multitude that faced him. However, he had broke into a great body of Veientes, and put them in diſorder, when an Hetrurian, of a gigantic ſtature, attacking him, plunged his lance into his breaſt. Fabius drew it out, but ſoon after fell from his horſe and died. Upon his death the left wing was ſurrounded, which the conſul Fabius hearing, he immediately quitted his poſt and flew to their aſſiſtance, with his brother Cœſo, and ſuch troops as he could confide in, and finding the Romans, diſheartened at the loſs of their leader, giving way, and ready to betake themſelves to a diſorderly flight, he cried out; 'Fellow ſoldiers, have you forgot your oaths? Will 'you ſhamefully fly back to the camp? Are you more a'fraid of the Hetrurians than of Jupiter and Mars!' Having uttered theſe words, he threw himſelf with his brother Cœſo into the midſt of the enemy, and being ſeconded by the troops he brought with him, obliged the Hetrurians to retire with great ſlaughter. In the right wing, commanded by Manlius, the Romans fought with great courage and reſolution, till the brave conſul being wounded was carried out of the field. Then his abſence and the report of his death made a great alteration on that ſide. The Romans began to loſe ground, but the conſul Fabius and his brother appearing unexpectedly in the firſt ranks, and aſſuring the frighted Romans that the enemy's right wing and main body were put to flight, and that the conſul Manlius was ſtill alive, they returned to the charge, and would have gained a complete victory, if a new battle had not begun in another place. A body of Veientes in the heat of the action fell upon the Roman camp, which was guarded by a ſmall number of troops, and were ready to enter it, when Manlius, wounded as he was, hearing of their danger, cauſed himſelf to be carried thither. But while, forgetful of his wound, he was defending, at the head of a ſmall body of choſen horſe, one of the avenues to the camp, his ſtrength being quite exhauſted, he fell from his horſe, and being ſurrounded by the enemy, was killed on the ſpot. His death was followed by the taking of the camp, the Romans, who defended it, being overpowered with numbers. Hereupon the conſul Fabius, who was ſtill engaged in the plain, leaving his men, came unexpectedly upon the Hetrurians, retook the camp, and, then haſtening back to the field of battle, gave the finiſhing ſtroke to the defeat of the enemy, who retired into their entrenchments in diſorder. Thus the Romans gained the victory; but it coſt them dear, one of the conſuls, the ſurviving conſul's brother, and a greater number of perſons of diſtinction being killed than in any former action. The conſul was ſo affected with the death of his brother, that at his return to Rome he declined the honours of a triumph, which had been decreed him, while he was yet in the camp. He entered the city in mourning, bringing with him the bodies of his collegue and brother, and, mounting the roſtra, made a panegyric on thoſe two heroes, without ſaying any thing of his own exploits. As he was now the ſole governor of the republic, he was afraid of countenancing the leaſt appearance of monarchy, and therefore he abdicated the conſulſhip, two months before it expired, and, leaving the government in an inter-regnum, retired to cure the wounds he had received in the action. This modeſt and generous behaviour in a perſon of ſo great merit gained him the hearts of the people; ſo that from this time the Fabii became popular [f].

The conſul Cæſo Fabius adviſes the ſenate to put the Agrarian law in execution.

THE Roman people aſſembling in the campus Martius choſe Cæſo Fabius the third time: ſo that now the three brothers had enjoyed that office for ſeven years ſucceſſively. The collegue, whom the centuries gave him, was T. Virginius. The new magiſtrates had no ſooner entered upon their office, but Fabius, actuated by his new affection for the people, laboured to reconcile them to the ſenate. The demands of the people, about the diſtribution of the conquered lands, and the refuſal of the patricians had been too long the ſource of diviſions in the republic. The conſul therefore, before the tribunes had preſented any petition on that head, which they did every year, exhorted the ſenators to prevent the complaints of the people, and put an end to the daily diſturbances, by making the diſtribution of thoſe lands themſelves. But Fabius was not heard; ſome rallied him on his new zeal for the intereſts of the people, others murmured, and ſome even accuſed him of ambition. He was attended with better ſucceſs in his military expeditions; for he diſperſed the Æqui, who had committed great ravages in the Latin territories, without the loſs of a ſingle man, and afterwards haſtened to the relief of his collegue, who being ſurrounded by the Veientes, without timely aſſiſtance, would have been obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. Nor was this the only remarkable ſervice that Cæſo Fabius did the republic in his third conſulate. The two conſuls were ſcarce returned to Rome and their armies diſbanded, when the Hetrurians entered again the Roman territory, and made incurſions even to the foot of the hill Janiculum, carrying off the cattle, and laying the whole country waſte. The ſenate aſſembled to deliberate upon the means of putting a ſtop to theſe devaſtations, but, the people refuſing to take arms till the Agrarian Law was put in execution, the fathers were greatly at a loſs what to do. In this perplexity Fabius formed a project worthy of his affection for his country. He aſſembled all the men of his own name and family, and having communicated to them

them his deſign, which was, that the family of Fabii ſhould, alone, and at their own expence, take upon them to ſecure the frontiers againſt the Veientes; the Fabii readily conſented to the motion, and communicated their deſign to the fathers, by whom it was received with applauſe and unanimouſly approved. Early the next morning, thoſe illuſtrious patricians, being in all three hundred and ſix, appeared under arms at Cæſo Fabius's door, and from thence marched through the city in good order with about four thouſand men, partly their vaſſals and partly their clients, all under the command of M. Fabius, who had laſt year gained the battle of Veii, and was now cured of the wounds he had received on that occaſion. The whole city ran in crouds to ſee them, and made vows to heaven for their preſervation. They went out of the city at the gate Carmentalis; and marching to the banks of the Cremera, now the Baccano, a ſmall river which diſcharges itſelf into the Tiber, there built a fort in a ſteep place, ſurrounded it with a double ditch, and erected towers at certain diſtances. When the works were finiſhed, they divided their men into four ſmall parties, one of which was left to guard the fort, while the other three marched into three ſeveral parts of the enemy's country, and pillaged it. Their firſt expeditions were attended with great ſucceſs; no huſbandmen durſt appear in the plains or bring out their cattle. In the mean time, new conſuls being choſen at Rome, viz. Lucius Æmilius, a ſecond time, and C. Servilius, Cæſo Fabius, the laſt year's conſul, obtained leave of the ſenate to join his family on the banks of the Cremera. But the conſcript fathers, to gain him the more reſpect, created for him a new office, declaring him a proconſul, a title which gave him the ſame power over the troops he commanded, as if he had been conſul; but no other authority (N).

The Fabian family undertake alone to guard the frontiers againſt the Veientes.

(N) Livy does not mention the creation of a proconſul till the year of Rome 289, when he ſpeaks of T. Quinctius Barbatus, as commanding the army of the republic againſt the Æqui in that quality. This dignity, when it was, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, in its infancy, was confined to the command of the troops, when the preſence of the conſul was neceſſary at Rome, or when the republic, being attacked by ſeveral different nations at once, was obliged to ſend ſeveral armies into the field, and conſequently to encreaſe the number of her generals. When the expedition was ended, the proconſulate expired. But afterwards,

War with the Hetrurians, the Volſci, and the Æqui.

The new conſuls had ſcarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome, that the Hetrurians were raiſing a formidable army in order to fall upon the Fabii, and that the Æqui and Volſci had already invaded the country of the Latins. Hereupon the conſuls divided their army into three bodies; Æmilius led one againſt the Veientes, Servilius another againſt the Volſci, and Sp. Furius the third, with the title of proconſul, againſt the Æqui. The Volſci being attacked by Servilius, repulſed him and obliged him to keep in his camp, without attempting any thing elſe that ſummer. The Æqui fled at the approach of Furius, who laid waſte their country. The Veientes, having received ſtrong reinforcements from the other Hetrurian leucumonies, came to an engagement with Æmilius, but were entirely defeated and forced to ſue for peace. The conſul out of reſpect to the ſenate referred their deputies to the conſcript fathers, and they in return gave him full power to conclude a treaty upon what conditions he ſhould think proper. Hereupon the conſul granted them a peace, without demanding hoſtages, or requiring any thing more than two months proviſions for his army, and money to defray the expences of the war for ſix months. This indulgence highly offended the ſenate, inſomuch, that they refuſed him a triumph. However, as he was an excellent commander, they promiſed to reward him, according to his merit, on condition he relieved his collegue, who was kept blocked up in his camp by the Volſci. But Æmilius, piqued at the refuſal he had met with, returned to Rome, and complained to the people of the proceedings of the ſenate, as if they were diſpleaſed with him for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had put too ſpeedy an end to the war with the Veientes. "The patricians", ſaid wards, when Rome became miſtreſs of Italy, and gave law to diſtant nations, ſhe then appointed governors over the conquered provinces in quality of proconſuls and proprætors. Theſe offices had then great privileges annexed to them, as we ſhall obſerve in a more proper place. It is not plain from the Latin hiſtorians, whether the proconſulate was at firſt diſpoſed of by the ſenate or people, or whether they both joined in the election of a proconſul; but when the proconſulate became a common office in the republic, it is certain, that, the people aſſembled by tribes, ſometimes by curiæ, and more rarely by centuries, had their ſhare in the election; of which we ſhall find inſtances in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

ſaid he, "prolong the wars abroad, with no other view, "but to put off the execution of the Caſſian law, and "the diſtribution of the conquered lands". He did not ſtop here, but, to ſhew his reſentment, inſtead of marching to the aſſiſtance of Servilius, he diſbanded his army, and recalled Furius, who, as proconſul, was obliged to obey him [g].

NOTWITHSTANDING the peace concluded with the Veientes, the Fabii did not abandon their poſt, but continued on the frontiers to keep a people in awe, whoſe inconſtancy and inclination to break treaties were well known. In the following conſulſhip of C. Horatius and T. Menenius, the other Hetrurian leucumonies being offended at the ſeparate peace the Vejentes had made with Rome, ſummoned them to appear in the general diet of the nation, and there gave them to underſtand, that they muſt either break the treaty they had made with Rome, or ſuſtain a war with the other eleven leucumonies. The Veientes being reduced to this dilemma, choſe the former, and accordingly ſent to the Fabii, requiring them to demoliſh their fort and quit the frontiers. The Fabii rejected the propoſal with indignation; whereupon hoſtilities were immediately renewed, and all Hetruria eſpouſed the quarrel of their countrymen. The Fabii continued to ravage the country, and often engaged the Veientes in the open field with their uſual ſucceſs, till they were at laſt unfortunately ſurprized in an ambuſh. The Veientes lodged a whole army of Hetrurians in a neighbouring wood, and poſted centinels on all the eminences, to give them notice when they ſhould ſally out. Then they brought out all their cattle and horſes into a valley under a ſmall guard, as if they had no deſign but to feed them. The Fabii no ſooner ſaw them than they marched out in a great body, leaving no more men in the fort than were neceſſary to ſecure it from a ſurpriſe. They advanced in good order, and the herdſmen with their guard flying on their approach, ſome of the Fabii purſued the fugitives, while others ſeized the cattle, and a ſmall number of them continued drawn up in order of battle. Immediately the Hetrurians ſallied out of the wood, ſurrounded the Romans on all ſides, and cut in pieces thoſe who were in purſuit of the booty. Hereupon the Fabii, who had kept their ranks, drawing themſelves into a cloſe compact body, which faced every way, quitted the plain, and gained an eminence, opening themſelves a way with their ſwords through the enemy's forces. When they had got half way up the aſcent, they fell into another ambuſh, and were quite encompaſſed anew by a freſh body of Hetrurian troops, which had been poſted in a wood near the hill. The Fabii, though quite ſpent and out of breath, renewed the fight with great vigour, made a dreadful ſlaughter of the Hetrurians, and at length, in ſpight of all oppoſition, gained the top of the hill. There they ſpent the night without any proviſions, being on all ſides beſet by an army of Hetrurians. The next day the Fabii, who were left to guard the fort, being informed of the danger of their relations, haſtened to their relief; but, being attacked in the plain by a numerous body of the enemy, they were all to a man cut off. Not long after, thoſe, who were on the top of the hill, being preſſed by hunger and thirſt, broke their way through the enemy, of whom they killed great numbers. The Hetrurians, ſurpriſed at their courage and intrepidity in the heat of action, offered to let them retire unmoleſted, upon condition they would throw down their arms, and give their word that they would abandon the fort. But this the brave men looked upon as a diſhonourable propoſal, and therefore choſe rather to die with glory, than ſave their lives by an action, which they thought would reflect diſgrace on their family. They renewed the attack; upon which the Hetrurians, changing their way of fighting, avoided coming to a cloſe engagement; and keeping at a diſtance, ſhowered from all parts darts and ſtones on thoſe illuſtrious warriors. They held out ſome time againſt the unexpected ſtorm, and puſhed forwards againſt the enemy, who had not the courage to come near them. At length the Hetrurians, perceiving that the ſwords of the Romans were for the moſt part broke and their bucklers ſplit in pieces, ventured to attack them man to man. Then the Fabii, like men in deſpair, threw themſelves with incredible fury into the midſt of the Hetrurian battalions, and, ſnatching the arms of their enemies, fought them with their own weapons. Hereupon the Hetrurians were again obliged to have recourſe to javelins and ſtones, with which thoſe brave men were overwhelmed, and all killed on the ſpot. The Hetrurians cut off their heads, and, carrying them in triumph on the tops of their lances, ſhewed them to the Fabii, who had ſtaid in the fort. At this this fight they gave themſelves up to deſpair, and inſtead of defending the ramparts, ſallied out upon the the enemy without obſerving any order, aiming at nothing but to ſell their lives dear. Theſe were likewiſe cut to pieces; ſo that of the three hundred and ſix Fabii, not one eſcaped. Livy and thoſe who have copied after him tell us, that only one of the name was left in Rome, a youth not fourteen years of age, from whom the Fabii we find afterwards mentioned, were all deſcended. But Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus looks upon this as a mere fable, invented to give ſomething of a miraculous air to ſo tragical an event. And indeed we can hardly believe, that of all the Fabii, who periſhed at the Cremera, one only left a child behind him. However that be, Rome ſuffered a great loſs, and ſhewed all the concern gratitude could expreſs. The gate Carmentalis, through which they marched out of the city, was thenceforth called "Porta Scelerata", or "The accurſed gate", and the day of their defeat was reckoned among the unlucky days on which it was not lawful to begin any thing of conſequence h. The conſul

(O) We have followed Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus in our account of the unfortunate defeat of the Fabii. But other hiſtorians are ſaid by that writer to relate it in the following manner. The family of the Fabii, ſay they, being obliged to offer up a ſacrifice, and celebrate a family-feaſt together, they marched out of the fort on the Cremera, in order to diſcharge this religious duty, guarded by a ſmall number of their clients. They paſſed through the enemy's country without uſing the precaution of ſending out ſcouts to reconnoitre, or marching in order of battle, as if they had been at peace with the Hetrurian nation. But the Veientes, being informed of their departure, poſted part of their troops in an ambuſcade on the road the Romans were to take, while a ſmall body marched to meet the guard and attack it. The Fabii, who ſuſpected nothing of this nature, fell into the ſnares which had been laid for them. The troops, which lay concealed, ſallied out unexpectedly and attacked them with vigor, ſome in front, others in flank, while a troop of Veientes, who followed them cloſe, fell upon their rear. Being thus ſurrounded on all ſides and overpowered with numbers, they were all cut off. This account has not, according to Dionyſius, the leaſt appearance of truth. Is it credible, ſays he, that all the Fabii ſhould abandon ſo important a poſt without an expreſs order from the ſenate? As for the care of the ſacrifice, it might have been committed to ſuch of their family and name as were diſpenſed with by their age from bearing arms.

conſul Menenius, who had received orders to march againſt the Hetrurians, was but thirty furlongs from the field of battle, when the Fabii were cut in pieces. But it was believed, that he out of jealouſy gave them up to deſtruction, when he might have eaſily relieved them. He afterwards encamped diſadvantageouſly on the ſide of an hill, without ſecuring the top of it; ſo that the Hetrurians encamping above him, attacked him from the higher ground, gave him an entire defeat, and made themſelves maſters of his camp. Puffed up with this victory, they advanced to the hill Janiculum, and poſted themſelves on the top of it, whence they could ſee all that paſſed in the city, and obſerve what preparations were made againſt a ſiege. This obliged the ſenate to recall the conſul Horatius, and the army which was appointed to act againſt the Volſci. The brave Horatius immediately came to a battle with the Hetrurians, near the

The conſul Menenius defeated by the Hetrurians.

If we ſuppoſe, that all the Fabii, not one excepted, were ſhut up in the fort, it would have been ſufficient for them to have diſpatched three or four of the family to diſcharge their obligations in the name of all the reſt. Beſides, it would have been highly imprudent in them to leave ſuch an important place defenceleſs and at the enemy's mercy, and to march through their country with as much confidence as in the moſt peaceable times.

Livy obſerves, that the Fabii marched out of the city at the gate Carmentalis, leaving the temple of Janus on their right hand. Ovid ſpeaks of the departure of the Fabii, of the curſe annexed to the gate Carmentalis, and of the temple of Janus in the following verſes:

Carmentis portæ dextra eſt via proxima Jano;
Ire per hanc noli, quiſquis es; omen habet.
Illa fama refert Fabios exîſſe trecentos.
Porta vacat culpa, ſed tamen omen habet (7).

The ſame poet tells us, that only one youth of the Fabian family, not yet fourteen years of age, was ſaved.

Una dies Fabios ad bellum miſerat omnes;
Ad bellum miſſos perdidit una dies.
Ut tamen Herculeæ ſupereſſent ſemina gentis

the gate Collina, the ſucceſs of which was pretty equal: but in a ſecond, near the temple of Hope, about a mile from Rome, he gained a victory, which revived the Roman courage, and ſecured the city. However, the enemy did not decamp from the Janiculum, nor quite lay aſide the deſign of beſieging Rome. At the ſame time a famine began to be felt in the city, occaſioned by the incurſions of the Hetrurians. The lands having been left unſown the laſt year for fear of their ravages, and moſt of the barns in the country burnt or plundered, there was a great ſcarcity of corn. The meaner ſort of the people got together in companies, threatening to plunder the granaries of the rich; and their clamours and mutinies were fomented by the tribunes, who did not fail to throw all the blame on the conſcript fathers. On the other hand, the ſenators, to clear themſelves, did all that lay in their power to relieve the people. They ſent out merchants to buy corn, fixed the price of it at a low rate, and ordered, that none of the patricians ſhould keep more in their granaries than was neceſſary for the maintenance of their families. But theſe wiſe precautions were only ſerviceable for a time. The Romans found themſelves at laſt under a neceſſity either of ſtarving, or driving the enemy farther off. They marched out therefore under the conduct of their new conſuls, A. Virginius and P. Servilius, and engaging the Hetrurians, gained a complete victory over them. But when by the dead bodies, that were brought to Rome to be burnt, the ſenate ſaw how many Romans had periſhed in the engagement, they refuſed the conſuls the honour of a triumph [m].

The Hetrurians entirely defeated.

THE departure of the Hetrurians reſtored plenty to the city, proviſions being brought thither from all the neighbouring countries. But the people were no ſooner delivered from the fear of a foreign enemy, than they renewed their complaints about the diſtribution of the conquered lands. As they could not bring about the execution of the Caſſian law, they laid the whole blame upon the conſuls, citing them, as ſoon as they were out of their office, before the aſſembly of the tribes. Thus Menenius, the ſon of the famous Menenius Agrippa, was accuſed by the tribunes of having connived at the deſtruction of the Fabii; and ſummoned to give an account of his conduct before a tribunal, where his moſt inveterate enemies were his judges. The patricians uſed the ſame arts, they had formerly practiſed in the affair of Coriolanus, to prevent his being tried by the people; but to no purpoſe; for the tribunes continued obſtinate, and their obſtinacy prevailed. Menenius was tried, not by the curiæ, but by the tribes, and almoſt unanimouſly condemned to death. But the ſenate and all his friends ſoliciting earneſtly in his behalf, the tribunes changed the ſentence of death into a fine of two thouſand aſſes, that is, about five pounds of our money, a conſiderable ſum, when men of the firſt rank lived upon the product of their ſmall farms, which they often cultivated with their own hands. Nay, this fine was exceſſive, with reſpect to Menenius, whoſe father had left him no other patrimony, but his glory. His friends offered to pay it for him, but he rejected their generous offers, and, being ſenſibly affected with the injuſtice and ingratitude of his fellow-citizens, ſhut himſelf up in his houſe, where he ſoon died of grief and hunger. This melancholy accident greatly incenſed the animoſity between the patricians and plebeians; the former, determining to keep no meaſures with the latter, openly declared, that they would never ſuffer the Caſſian law to be put in execution. On the other hand, the tribunes, more enraged than ever, omitted no opportunity of proſecuting the nobility. They took great pleaſure in humbling the patricians, and ſummoning the conſuls, as ſoon as they had laid down their office, to appear before the tribunal of the people. Servilius, as we have obſerved above, had loſt a great number of men in the engagement with the Hetrurians, when he drove them from the Janiculum. He had therefore ſcarce laid down the faſces, when a criminal proceſs was commenced againſt him for purſuing the enemy too far, and by that indiſcretion expoſing the lives of many citizens to unneceſſary dangers. But this was only a pretence for the proſecution. The real crime both of Servilius and Menenius was, their omitting to name the decemvirs for the partition of the lands. Servilius had too much confidence in the goodneſs of his cauſe to beg the ſenate to intercede for him. He faced the danger boldly, and, without changing either his habit or countenance, appeared before the aſſembly of the people, and made ſo judicious a defence, that he was unanimouſly acquitted. He ſoon after not only cleared his character from all blemiſh, but added a new luſtre to it. A remarkable victory, which the conſul ful Valerius gained the ſame year over the Hetrurians, was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Servilius, who ſerved in quality of the conſul's lieutenant. The following year, A. Manlius and L. Furius being choſen conſuls, the former marched againſt the Veientes, who, at his approach, ſhut themſelves up in Veii, where they were ſo diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, that they ſued for peace, and obtained of the ſenate a forty year's truce. The conful Manlius, for this ſucceſsful and unbloody expedition, was honoured with an ovation.

Servilius accuſed, but acquitted.

The Veientes obtain a forty years truce. New diſpatches about the diſtribution of lands.

PEACE abroad was always followed by inteſtine broils at home. The old diſputes about the diſtribution of the lands were revived by the tribunes; but the conſuls, without being in the leaſt ſhaken by their clamours and menaces, finiſhed their year, and left affairs in the ſame ſituation they had found them. They had no ſooner reſigned the faſces to L. Æmilius, now the third time conſul, and Vopiſcus Junius, than Cn. Genucius, a daring enterpriſing tribune, cited them to appear before the people, accuſing them of having neglected to name the commiſſioners, with a deſign to debar the poor citizens and brave ſoldiers of the ſhare, they had ſo well deſerved, in the conquered lands. He exhorted the people to do themſelves juſtice, repreſenting to them, that if they inflicted an exemplary puniſhment on thoſe criminals, they might, by that means, oblige their ſucceſſors to put in execution the Caſſian law. Accordingly a day was appointed for their trial. Theſe violent proceedings greatly alarmed the ſenate, who now ſaw, with no leſs indignation than ſorrow, that the tribunes aimed equally at their lives and fortunes, and that they had formed a deſign of deſtroying all the ſenators one after another. They therefore had private meetings among themſelves, and reſolved to reſcue Furius and Manlius, if they were condemned, there not being wanting deſperate men, who offered to make the attempt. On the other hand, the people triumphed before-hand, inſolently boaſting, that, in ſpite of all the artifice of the ſenate, the Caſſian law ſhould paſs, and be ſealed with the blood of thoſe who had oppoſed it; but the very day before the trial of Manlius and Furius, the furious tribune Genucius was found dead in his bed, without any marks on his body either of violence or poiſon. He was carried into the forum, and being there expoſed to public view, the common people concluded, that the gods did not approve of his enterprize; but the wiſer ſort entertained violent ſuſpicions of the patricians. However, the religious notion having prevailed, the partition of lands was not ſo much as mentioned for ſome time after [n].

THE conſuls and ſenate, finding the tribunes greatly confounded at the unexpected death of their collegue, and more at the effect it had upon the ſuperſtitious minds of the people, began to act in a very arbitrary manner, imagining they ſhould now meet with no oppoſition, either from the people or their tribunes. As there was occaſion to raiſe an army, the conſuls held their tribunal, as uſual, in the forum, and there either fined or cauſed to be whipped thoſe citizens, who did not appear as ſoon as they were called to give in their names. Amongſt others they called one P. Volero to liſt himſelf as a common ſoldier. Volero, tho' by birth a plebeian, had been formerly an officer in the army; and therefore, as he had behaved on all occaſions with great valour, he expected to be promoted at leaſt to the poſt of a centurion. Not able therefore to ſtifle his reſentment, he complained of the injuſtice of the conſuls, and demanded to be reſtored to his former poſt, or to know for what fault he was degraded. The conſuls, in great anger, ſent a lictor to ſeize him, and, upon his making reſiſtance, ordered him to be beaten with rods. The lictor endeavoured to execute their ſentence; but Volero, ſtriking him a blow on the face, declared, that he had done nothing which deſerved that puniſhment, and at the ſame time implored the protection of the tribunes; but they, terrified at the death of Genucius, not daring to appear, he appealed from the conſuls to the people, crying out to the multitude, "Aſſiſt me, O Romans, "it is your protection I implore; ſince our tribunes had "rather ſee a citizen of Rome beaten with rods, than run "the hazard of dying in their beds by the treachery of "the conſuls, we have no remedy left us againſt the tyranny of the conſuls but force." At theſe words the mutinous populace fell upon the lictors broke their faſces, and drove them out of the forum. The conſuls themſelves, being ſurrounded on all ſides by the multitude who preſſed hard upon them, thought it adviſeable to withdraw, and retire to the ſenate-houſe as a place of refuge. Hereupon the

the tribunes, recovering their ſpirits, inſpired the people with new fury, which was no longer levelled at the patricians in general, but only at the conſuls. Thoſe magiſtrates, in this ſudden commotion, which put all the city in an uproar, aſſembled the ſenate, and complained of the outrages committed by the people, contrary to the reſpect due to their dignity. Some ſenators were for putting Volero to death, and ordering him immediately to be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian rock; but the more moderate among them did not think proper to put it to a trial, whether the anger of the ſenate, or the fury of the people, ſhould prevail. The tribunes, on the other hand, demanded juſtice upon the conſuls, for commanding a Roman citizen to be whipped like a ſlave, after he had appealed to the people; which was a manifeſt and criminal tranſgreſſion of the Valerian law. While the people were thus complaining of the conſuls, and the conſuls of the people, Volero, in order to ſecure himſelf againſt the fury of the patricians, engaged the people to confer upon him the office of tribune, vacant by the death of Genucius. He publicly boaſted, that, if he were inveſted with that dignity, he would take ſuch meaſures, as ſhould deliver the people from being ever more oppreſſed by the ſenate. The multitude, charmed with this hope, readily granted him their votes, and he entered on his office after the election of the new conſuls, L. Pinarius, and P. Furius. Every one expected, that he would immediately begin a proſecution againſt the laſt year's conſuls; but Volero ſoon diſcovered, that he had views far more extenſive and important to the intereſt of his party, than a mere perſonal revenge. Without dropping one diſreſpectful word againſt the late magiſtrates, he endeavoured to leſſen the authority of the patricians in general, by depriving them of the influence they had in the election of the tribunes. In a general aſſembly of the people he propoſed, that their magiſtrates and protectors might be choſen for the future in the comitia by tribes, and not by curiæ. In this the ſubtle tribune had two views, very prejudicial to the patricians. In the firſt place, the curiæ were never aſſembled for elections, till the ſenate had conſented to it by a decree. In the ſecond place, the patricians, who commanded the ſuffrages of their clients, often got ſuch tribunes elected, as were agreeable to themſelves; but neither of theſe inconveniencies attended the comitia aſſembled by tribes; for the tribunes had the power of aſſembling them, without the conſent of the ſenate; and the country-tribes, who were not ſo devoted to the patricians as thoſe in the city, had a right to vote in them, as well as the inhabitants of Rome. The plebeian faction was highly pleaſed with this propoſal, and warmly declared for paſſing it into a law: but the conſuls, the ſenate, and the whole order of the patricians oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power; ſo that Volero's law became the common and only ſubject of diſpute between the two parties, the Agrarian law being for ſome time entirely dropped. A dreadful plague ſuſpended, for a few months, this furious conteſt; but it no ſooner ceaſed, than the tribunes reſumed the proſecution of Volero's law. In the mean time, Volero's tribuneſhip expiring, the people continued him in the ſame office for the following year, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the ſenate, and the whole patrician party °.

Appius Claudius ſet up by the patricians againſt Volero.

THE particians finding the people bent upon carrying their point, had but one expedient left; which was, to ſet up againſt Volero a man, who was not to be terrified by the clamours and menaces of the multitude. With this view, they pitched upon Appius Claudius, and raiſed him to the conſulate. He was the ſon of the famous Appius Claudius, who had ſo often ſignalized his hatred to the plebeians, and no leſs zealous than his father for the intereſt of the ſenate, but more obſtinate and inflexible. As he thought himſelf but ill qualified to govern in a time of general commotions, he had abſented himſelf from the comitia; but the patricians, acquainted with his ſteadineſs and intrepidity, got him elected, tho' abſent, in the comitia by centuries, in which they had great intereſt. They joined with him T. Quinctius, a venerable ſenator, of a ſweet temper, who was beloved by the people, tho' looked upon as one of the chief leaders of the other party. The new conſuls having convened the ſenate to deliberate on the moſt proper methods to hinder the publication of Volero's law, Appius, following the dictates of his natural ſeverity, was for raiſing an army, and ſending the people to vent that martial courage abroad, which made them untractable at home.

home. But Quinctius was of a contrary opinion; he thought it unjuſt to make war upon nations, that had given Rome no occaſion of complaint; and beſides, repreſenting to the ſenate, that the people themſelves would ſoon be appriſed of their deſign, and refuſe to take arms, which would turn to the diſhonour of the conſular authority, and produce a general flame. The opinion of Quinctius prevailed; but Appius, who could not bear the leaſt contradiction, lived upon ill terms with his collegue all the reſt of the year; which greatly encreaſed the affection the people had already for Quinctius [p].

THE diviſion of the conſuls and union of the tribunes made Volero believe, that he ſhould now get his law paſſed. He had even the confidence to add the two following articles to it, viz. that all affairs relating to the people ſhould no longer be brought before the curiæ, but before the tribes; and that the ædiles, as well as the tribunes, ſhould be choſen by them. There were but four tribes in the city, and ſeventeen in the country, which were not any-ways influenced by the nobility; ſo that in the comitia by tribes the patricians had but little intereſt. They therefore exerted their utmoſt endeavours to ward off a blow, which tended directly to deſtroy the authority of the ſenate, and to eſtabliſh that of the people upon its ruins. When the ſenate met to deliberate upon theſe extraordinary propoſals, Appius was for making a decree to invite all thoſe who loved their country to take arms, and declaring thoſe who refuſed to obey the ſummons enemies to their country; but Quinctius, who was afraid of ſeeing Rome become a field of battle, thought it adviſeable to try, whether the people could be brought to their duty by ways of gentleneſs and inſinuation. The advice of Claudius was rejected as too violent, and even dangerous, and the more moderate counſels of Quinctius prevailing, the tribunes were deſired to convene an aſſembly of the people, and to ſuffer the conſuls, peaceably and without interruption, to repreſent to the people the true intereſts of the common-wealth; after which they might, in concert, agree upon ſuch meaſures, as ſhould be moſt for the common good of the people and ſenate. The tribunes acquieſced to ſo reaſonable a propoſal; and Quinctius, when the time came, mounting the roſtra, made ſuch

ſuch an impreſſion on the minds of the people, by his ſoft and inſinuating eloquence, that Volero's propoſal would have been rejected, if Appius, when it was his turn to ſpeak, had not, by his imperious behaviour, his threatenings, and his invectives againſt the people and their tribunes, effaced the impreſſions made by his collegue. Caius Lectorius, who was accounted one of the braveſt ſoldiers in the republic, and had, for that reaſon, been raiſed to the tribuneſhip, when the domeſtic broils were like to end in a civil war, roſe up to anſwer the conſuls; but, without taking any notice of Quinctius's arguments, inſiſted only on the invectives of Appius, which he retorted, and concluded thus: "But to what purpoſe do we "fight with words againſt a wild beaſt? The ſword is the "proper weapon to be uſed in ſuch engagements; the ſword "perhaps may make you ſenſible, that the Roman people "are not ſo deſpicable as you think them. In the mean time, "you ſhall experience the authority of thoſe tribunes, who "are the objects of your contempt, but whom the law has "made your judges." Upon this there was a profound ſilence; and Lectorius, lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, ſwore by all that was moſt ſacred, that he would either get Volero's law paſſed, or periſh in the attempt. Then, after having kept the people ſome time in ſuſpenſe, turning to Appius, "I command you," ſaid he, "to leave the "aſſembly." Appius deſpiſed his order, and told him, that, tho' a tribune, he was but a private man, and that his whole power conſiſted in forming an oppoſition to ſuch decrees of the ſenate as were prejudicial to the plebeians. Then calling about him his friends, clients, and relations, who were very numerous, he prepared to oppoſe force with force. The tribune, having conferred haſtily with his collegues, commanded one of his officers to ſeize Appius and carry him to priſon. Hereupon a ſcuffle began between the conſuls lictors and the officers of the tribune. The ſenators, and patricians, and the clients who attended Appius, placed him in the midſt of them, and repulſed Lectorius, who advanced in perſon to aſſiſt his officers. Nothing was heard but confuſed cries, proceeding from mutual animoſity. From reproaches they quickly came to blows; but, as arms were forbidden in the city, little blood was ſpilt in the fray. Quinctius, attended by ſome venerable ſenators, threw himſelf into the midſt of the contending parties, and having found means to convey Appius out of the tumult, appeaſed the tribunes, and put an end to the ſcuffle.

The tribune Lectorius orders Appius to leave the aſſembly, and to be led to priſon.

THE next morning, the people, ſpirited up by their tribunes, and eſpecially by Lectorius who had been wounded the day before, ſeized on the capitol, fortified themſelves there, and ſeemed reſolved to begin an open war. The ſenate being aſſembled to deliberate on ways to quiet the ſedition, Quinctius was for yielding ſomething in favour of the people; whereas Appius could by no means be brought to make them the leaſt conceſſion. During this diſagreement, which laſted ſeveral days, Quinctius, having often conferred with the tribunes, gained at length their conſent to refer both their private and public complaints to the ſenate, and to ſtand to the determination of the conſcript fathers. He convened the ſenators, and after having acquainted them with the good diſpoſition of the tribunes, got the following decree paſſed, viz. That as the ſcuffle, which had happened a few days before, was not premeditated, but the effect of a ſudden commotion, ariſing in both ſides from a pretended zeal for the republic, all injuries, committed and received on that occaſion, ſhould be buried in an eternal oblivion. As to the law in queſtion, ſince Appius would by no means ſuffer it to be propoſed to the aſſembly of the people, without a previous decree of the ſenate, it was agreed, that it ſhould be referred to the ſenate, and that a decree ſhould be made for that purpoſe. The affair was therefore diſputed with great warmth, Appius calling both gods and men to witneſs, that the republic was betrayed, and that the ſenate were ſubmitting to a law more detrimental to their authority, than thoſe which had been formed on the ſacred mount; but Quinctius brought the ſenate to yield to the people, and allow them to propoſe the law in their aſſembly, where it paſſed, and was unanimouſly received with great applauſe. From this time therefore the tribunes were made, and almoſt every thing relating to the people determined, not in the comitia by curiæ, but by tribes [q]. Volero's law paſſes.

NOT long after this law was paſſed, the conſuls were obliged to take the field. Quinctius marched againſt the Æqui, and Appius againſt the Volſci. The former was ſo much eſteemed and loved by his army, that the enemy, not caring to appear againſt troops ſo well affected to their general, ſhut themſelves up in their cities, or lay concealed in the foreſts. The conſul therefore, having laid waſte their country, returned with a great booty to Rome, where he was received with loud acclamations, and called The father of the ſoldiers, while War with the Æqui and Volſci.

Appius was ſtyled by his men, The tyrant of the army; and indeed never was any army governed with more ſeverity, or diſcipline exacted with more rigour. As his rage againſt the people was no longer under any reſtraint from the tribunes, he entirely gave way to it; the conſequence of which was, that the centurions and ſoldiers all murmured at their general's orders, and even entered into a conſpiracy, not againſt his life, but his glory; for they reſolved by agreement, not to oppoſe the enemy, leſt their general ſhould receive the honours of triumph. The Volſci, being informed of all that paſſed in the Roman camp, drew up their men in order of battle, and challenged the Romans to an engagement. Appius marched out againſt them; but he was no ſooner within reach of the enemy, than his men threw away their arms, and, with one conſent, returned to the camp. The Volſci took advantage of this confuſion, and, having cut to pieces thoſe who were in the rear, attacked the entrenchments; but the Romans, fearing the enemy might break into the camp, faced about, made a brave reſiſtance, and drove back the Volſci. The raſh conſul would have led them again to face the enemy the next day; but they loudly demanded of their officers to be led out of the enemy's country, and forced Appius to comply with their demand and break up his camp. As ſoon as the incenſed conſul entered the Roman territory, where he was out of the reach of the enemy, he ſummoned his ſoldiers to aſſemble; and, being ſeated in his tribunal, he firſt upbraided them with their diſobedience and treachery, and then, giving a looſe to his reſentment, he commanded the heads of the centurions and other officers, who had abandoned their poſts, to be ſtruck off in his preſence. Thoſe, who had borne the enſigns and delivered them to the enemy, he cauſed to be beaten to death with rods. As for the common ſoldiers, he decimated them, that is, put every tenth man to death. As the time of the comitia for the election of new conſuls drew near, he led back to Rome the remains of his army, where he was received with the hiſſes of the multitude [r].

Appius's troops refuſe to fight.

He puniſhes them with the utmoſt ſeverity.

The old diſpute of the Agrarian law revived.

THE conſuls choſen to ſucceed Quinctius and Appius, were L. Valerius, a ſecond time, and Tib. Æmilius. They had ſcarce entered upon their office, when the tribunes revived the old diſpute concerning the partition of lands. Both the conſuls were diſpoſed to favour the people; Æmilius lius out of revenge againſt the ſenate, for having refuſed his father the honours of a triumph, when he returned from a ſucceſsful war againſt the Æqui; and Valerius, to gain the good-will of the people, whoſe hatred he had drawn upon himſelf by proſecuting Caſſius during his quæſtorſhip. As the conſuls, by a decree of the ſenate paſſed in the conſulate of Virginius and Caſſius, were impowered to nominate the decemvirs, in order to make a new diſtribution of the conquered lands, the tribunes, being ſecure of the preſent conſuls, brought the affair before the ſenate, where it occaſioned long debates. Æmilius, the conſul's father, who ſpoke firſt, was for having the decemvirs named by the conſuls, in order to proceed to the diviſion of the conquered lands; which ſaid he, being public and common, ought to be for the equal benefit of all. But Appius, that ſworn enemy of the people, oppoſed the opinion of Æmilius with ſo much warmth and ſtrength of reaſon, that the ſenate rejected the propoſal of the tribunes, tho' ſupported by both the conſuls. Hereupon the tribunes, enraged at their diſappointment, reſolved to deſtroy ſo violent an adverſary, and with that view cited him before the people, as a declared enemy to the public liberty. Appius, without changing his habit, as was uſual on ſuch occaſions, or even ſuffering his friends to ſolicit the multitude in his behalf, on the day of the aſſembly, appeared in the midſt of his accuſers with the ſame dignity as if he had been their judge. His accuſation was reduced to theſe four heads. 1. That he had ſpirited up the ſenate againſt the people. 2. That he had raiſed ſeditions in the republic. 3. That he had cauſed a tribune to be ſtruck, tho' the laws declared his perſon ſacred and inviolable. 4. That he had ſunk the courage of his ſoldiers by his ſeverity, and ſuffered himſelf to be overcome by the Volſci. But he anſwered theſe ſeveral articles with ſo much ſtrength, that the people durſt not condemn him. The tribunes, who were bent upon his deſtruction, fearing he would be acquitted, put off giving ſentence to another day, under pretence, that they ſhould not have time before night to collect the ſuffrages. But Appius, plainly foreſeeing that he ſhould fall a victim to the implacable hatred of thoſe magiſtrates, prevented the diſgrace of a condemnation, by laying violent hands on himſelf. The tribunes endeavoured in vain to deprive him of ſuch funeral honours as his merit and rank in the republic deſerved.

deſerved. His ſon obtained leave of the conſuls to aſſemble the people, and make, according to cuſtom, his funeral oration; which the people heard with pleaſure, ſhewing him more regard after his death, than they had done in his life-time.

UPON the death of Appius, the tribunes reſumed the buſineſs of the Agrarian law, which his proſecution had only ſuſpended; but not being able to prevail upon the preſent conſuls to name the decemvirs, the people at their inſtigation, refuſed to appear at the election of the conſuls for the next year, as if they intended to ſeparate themſelves once more from the body of the republic. However, the patricians, with their clients, raiſed to the conſulate T. Quinctius, a ſecond time, and Q. Servilius, who, to prevent the breach from growing wider, buſied the people all that year with foreign wars. Servilius had great ſucceſs againſt the Sabines; and Quinctius gained a complete victory over the united forces of the Æqui and Volſci, which was followed by the ſiege and ſurrender of the city of Antium. Quinctius, on his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph, and attended both by the ſenate and people in his proceſſion to the capitol. The domeſtic diſſenſions began afreſh in the following conſulate of T. Æmilius, a ſecond time, and Q. Fabius, ſon of one of the three famous brothers, who periſhed in the battle of Cremera. Æmilius, who had favoured the people in his firſt conſulate, renewed his endeavours to get the Caſſian law put in execution; whereupon great diſturbances enſuing, Fabius found out an expedient to appeaſe both the people and patricians. He propoſed to ſend a colony to people that pleaſant and fruitful canton of the Volſci, which Quinctus had juſt conquered. His motion was received with great applauſe by the meaner ſort of people, and three ſenators, viz. T. Quinctius the conſul, A. Virginius, and P. Furius, were immediately appointed to make the diſtribution of the lands; but when the plebeians were to give in their names to thoſe triumvirs, few of them appeared; nay, they began to change their ſtyle and complain of the ſenate, who, they ſaid, were ſending brave men out of their country, becauſe they oppoſed their oppreſſions; the greater part therefore choſe rather to ſtay at Rome, than leave it to take poſſeſſion of the lands, for which they had raiſed ſo many diſturbances. buſineſs, and the ſhare they had in the government, contributed to tie them to their old abode, and, notwithſtanding their poverty, made them look upon a colony as an honourable baniſhment. The triumvirs finding the people unwilling to quit Rome, were forced to admit of ſtrangers to make up the number appointed for the colony. However, one advantage accrued from the refuſal of the people, which was, that thoſe, who would not give in their names, were ever after aſhamed to meddle in the affair of the partition of the lands [s].

The Æqui ſubdued.

ROME enjoying now a profound tranquillity, Fabius took the field againſt the Æqui, and obliged them to ſue for a peace; which was granted them, on condition of their being ſubject to the republic. However, in the following conſulate of Sp. Poſthumius and Q. Servilius, now a ſecond time conſul, they began to ſtir again; and the next year, when T. Quinctius, a third time, and Q. Fabius, a ſecond time, were conſuls, they renewed the war, and continued it under the conſuls A. Poſthumius and Sp. Furius. The latter, who was but a very indifferent commander, having engaged raſhly with the enemy, was defeated, and ſo cloſely beſieged in his camp, that not a man could go out to give notice at Rome of his danger. However, the ſenate had advice of it, and, in ſo great a diſtreſs, reſolved upon an expedient never uſed but in great extremity; which was to give up the government abſolutely into the conſuls hands, by theſe words, Videat conſul, ne quid reſpublica detrimenti capiat, Let the conſul take care that the republic ſuffer no detriment. Poſthumius, who received this commiſſion, made all take arms who were able, and gave T. Quinctius the command of the army, with the title of proconſul. As ſoon as Quinctius came within ſight of the inveſted camp, the Æqui retired; but Furius had before made a ſally, in which his brother L. Furius and two cohorts had been ſurrounded by the enemy and cut in pieces. The conſul now acted upon the offenſive, and obliged the enemy to withdraw into their own country. Poſthumius attacked a great body of their freebooters, loaded with ſpoil, and made a great ſlaughter of them. By theſe ſucceſſes Rome was reſtored to its former tranquillity. In the following conſulate of P. Servilius Priſcus and Æbutius Elva, a dreadful plague broke out in Rome, and ſwept away almoſt all the flower of the youth who were able to bear arms, the fourth part of the ſenators, the greateſt part of the tribunes, and both the conſuls. Upon the news of ſo general a mortality among the Romans, the Æqui and Volſci renewed their old deſign of deſtroying the haughty republic. They began the campaign with committing hoſtilities in the territories of the Latins and Hernici, who immediately applied to the Roman ſenate for ſuccours; but all the Romans could do was, to give leave to their allies to arm and defend themſelves, and to promiſe them aſſiſtance in better times. Hereupon the Latins ſhut themſelves up in their cities, leaving their country open to the ravages of the enemy. The Hernici took the field, and even ventured an engagement, in which they loſt a great many men, and were, on that account, tho' the ſucceſs of the battle was pretty equal, forced to confine themſelves to their cities; ſo that the Æqui and Volſci, having now no enemy to oppoſe them in the field, entered the Roman territory, and appeared unexpectedly before Rome. The two conſuls being dead, and the few tribunes who were ſtill alive unable on account of their bad ſtate of health, to aſſiſt the republic either with their hands or their advice, the ædiles took upon them to repreſent the dignity, and perform the functions, of the conſuls. Notwithſtanding ſo many calamities, the Romans ſeemed to have loſt nothing of their antient ſteadineſs. They crept to the ramparts, and put the beſt face they could on their affairs. The ſenators themſelves mounted the guard and ſtood centinels; and, the city being well fortified on all ſides, the Æqui and Volſci, more expert at plundering than carrying on a ſiege, laid aſide all thoughts of making themſelves maſters of Rome, and marched their forces towards Tuſculum. In the mean time, the plague continued to rage in the city. The two augurs, Virginius and Valerius, died of it, as well as Sulpicius the chief of the curiones, that is, the prieſts of each curia. The dead wers ſo numerous, that they were thrown into the tiber without burial; ſo that the calamity becoming now greater than ever, the people turned their thoughts entirely to divine aſſiſtance; all made their vows upon the altars, and the matrons ſwept the temples with their hair, and continued proſtrate in the preſence of the gods, till at length a more wholeſome ſeaſon put an end to the diſtemper, and delivered Rome from a calamity which threatened her with utter deſtruction. Several patricians had governed one after another during the inter-regnum, which had lasted from the death of the consuls; and now Valerius Poplicola, being inter-rex, assembled the centuries for the election of new ones, when Lucretius Tricipitinus and T. Veturius Geminus were chosen. In the beginning of their consulate, the tribunes, forgetting the miseries the city had suffered, undertook to renew the old quarrel about the division of the lands; but the people, without hearkening to them, turned all their thoughts upon revenging the insults Rome had received from the Æqui and Volsci the year before. Even those citizens, whom the laws exempted from going to war, inlisted themselves for the service; so that two consular armies were immediately raised. It fell to Lucretius's lot to march against the Æqui and Volsci, who had united their forces; but were overthrown in a pitched battle, with the loss of both their generals and of thirteen thousand four hundred and sixty men, the most dreadful defeat they had ever received. So memorable an action made Rome forget the misfortunes she had suffered the last year [t].

the Æqui and Volsci entirely defeated.

WHILE the two consuls were thus employed in the field, a tribune of the people, named C. Terentius Arsa, took the opportunity of their absence to weaken the consular authority, exclaiming in a full assembly of the people against the exorbitant power of the consuls, and demanding, that bounds might be set to it with regard to public affairs, and that invariable laws might be established, for the consuls to be governed by in deciding the contests that arose between man and man. We must observe here, that the people referred all their differences to the judgment of the consuls, who regulated their sentences, either by the principles of natural equity, or by antient usages, or by the laws of Romulus and his successors, some remains of which were still to be found in the sacred books that were lodged with the pontifices, who, together with the patricians, made a mystery to the people of those first elements of their science of law. Terentius therefore, or, as Livy calls him, Terentillus, represented to the people, that the patrician magistrates were absolute masters of each man's fortune, and that the consuls, having no rule to go by in deciding causes, but their caprice, or laws unknown to the plebeians, might strip them, when they pleased, of all their effects, and at the

the ſame time make them believe, that they acted therein agreeable to the laws. To prevent this inconvenience, inſupportable in a free city, he moved for an immediate eſtabliſhment of laws, known by every body, to ſerve for a rule to the magiſtrates in their ſentences, and to the litigants for proofs of the juſtice or injuſtice of their cauſe. He urged at the ſame time with great vehemence, that the conſuls had all the deſpotic power of kings, and only wanted the name; and therefore demanded, that a choice ſhould be made of five of the beſt men in the republic, who ſhould be authoriſed to reſtrain within due bounds a power ſo exceſſive; ſo that the conſuls for the future might have no other authority over their fellow-citizens, but what thoſe very citizens ſhould think fit to intruſt them with. The ſenators were all ſurprized at ſuch bold propoſals. Q. Fabius, who then governed the city in the abſence of the conſuls, immediately diſpatched meſſengers to them, acquainting them with what had happened, and conjuring them to haſten back to Rome. He then convened the ſenate, and, after having enumerated the fatal conſequences of ſuch an innovation, prevailed upon the tribunes to deſiſt from ſeconding Terentius in his firſt demand, concerning the limitation of the conſular power; but as for the ſecond, they ſtill perſiſted in demanding a choice to be made from among the ſenators and plebeians, of proper perſons, to form a body of laws for determining ſuits among the citizens; however, overcome by the entreaties of Fabius, they conſented to ſuſpend the proſecution of this affair till the arrival of the conſuls. Thus the city continued ſome time quiet; for the tribunes did not ſo much as mention the Terentian law, till the new conſuls, P. Volumnius and S. Sulpicius, were choſen; and then the whole college renewed their efforts to get the law paſſed. The people were often aſſembled to hear the harangues of the tribunes on this ſubject; and the ſenate as often to concert meaſures to oppoſe their deſigns. The factions and blind zeal on both ſides encreaſed to ſuch a degree, that there was juſt reaſon to apprehend a civil war. The alarms, which theſe diſſenſions gave, were encreaſed by the dread which ſome pretended prodigies occaſioned in the city. At the ſame time, the Hernici, who were in alliance with Rome, gave notice to the ſenate, that the Æqui and Volſci were ſecretly arming, and that the new colony of Antium was entered into that confederacy. This news authorized the the conſuls to raiſe an army of citizens as uſual, whoſe abſence would leſſen the ſtrength of the tribunes; but theſe magiſtrates of the people, pretending that this war was nothing but a trick of the ſenate to get the citizens out of Rome, oppoſed the levies, and revived the demand of Terentius for the compiling a body of laws. The conteſt ran high, and occaſioned great diſturbances. Every thing was carried by mere violence. The conſuls having cauſed a plebeian to be arreſted, becauſe he refuſed to give in his name, the tribunes reſcued him out of the lictor's hands and ſet him at liberty. On the other hand, the young patricians made great diſturbances in the comitia, diſperſed the people by violence, and, with their clamours, hindered the reading of the law, which was drawn up in theſe words: "Let the people, in lawful comitia, elect ten men of a "mature age, conſummate wiſdom, and unſpotted reputati-"on, to draw up a body of laws, as well for the public "adminiſtration, as for the determination of public affairs; "let theſe laws be fixed up in the forum; and let the an-"nual magiſtrate, as well as other judges, be obliged to "conform to them in their deciſions of the controverſies, "which may ariſe in Rome." At length the tribunes gained their point of having this law propoſed to the people; but when the day came for the comitia by tribes to determine the affair, the young ſenators and patricians, having Quinctius Cæſo, the ſon of Quinctius Cincinnatus, at their head, ruſhed into the crowd, knocked down all who ſtood in their way, and diſperſed the aſſembly, in ſpite of all that the tribunes could do to keep them together. Cæſo was a young man, tall, well-ſhaped, of an extraordinary ſtrength of body, and had ſignalized himſelf by actions of uncommon bravery in ſeveral battles. His eloquence was not inferior to his ſtrength and valour; for no patrician was heard with greater applauſe, or ſpoke with more dignity. He was always the firſt to anſwer the ſeditious harangues of the tribunes with great freedom. Theſe magiſtrates therefore, enraged to meet with ſo much oppoſition from one ſingle man, conſpired his ruin; and, having agreed among themſelves upon articles of impeachment, Virginius, the moſt zealous of the tribunes, cauſed him to be ſummoned before the aſſembly of the people. This made Cæſo more violent in his oppoſition to the Terentian law; he reviled the plebeians, and inveighed with great bitterneſs againſt the tribunes.

tribunes. In the mean times, Virginius ſtill went on propoſing the law, not ſo much out of any hopes that it would meet with a ready acceptance, as purely to encreaſe the fury of Cæſo, and render him, by his violent and raſh behaviour, more odious to the multitude. Accordingly the inconſiderate youth, being ſupported by the ſenate, who flattered his vanity with their applauſes, gave the tribunes new matter of complaint, and made, we may ſay, open war with them and their party. At length the day came, which was appointed for his trial; and then his courage all on a ſudden failed him. He did not imitate the conſtancy of Coriolanus, but condeſcended to mean entreaties, and endeavoured to ſave his life by low and unworthy ſolicitations. He put on mourning, and, with a countenance full of ſorrow and humiliation, went about, begging the favour of the meaneſt plebeians. The tribune Virginius opened his accuſation, and, in his diſcourſe, enumerated the ſeveral violences of the young patrician, and produced thoſe to be witneſſes againſt him, who had been themſelves ill-uſed by him; but the chief crime laid to his charge was, his having hindered by violence the meeting of ſome judicial aſſemblies legally called. When the accuſation was ended, the accuſed was called upon to plead; but Cæſo refuſed to own the juriſdiction of the aſſembly, offering at the ſame time to ſubmit himſelf to the judgment of the conſuls, his only lawful judges. This ſet the people yet more againſt him; ſo that his father, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, a man highly eſteemed and reſpected of the republic, was obliged to undertake his defence. He denied the capital points of the charge; and, as to haſty words or blows, he excuſed them as the indiſcretions of youth, which rather deſerved pity, than reſentment. Then T. Quinctius Capitolinus, who had been thrice conſul, Sp. Furius, and Lucretius, all appeared to witneſs his bravery in ſeveral engagements, and his other good qualities. "Neither the Quinctian fa"mily, ſaid Quinctius Capitolinus, nor the city of Rome, "ever produced a young patrician of greater expectation.
"He made his firſt campaign under me, and I was wit-
"neſs of his glorious exploits." Nor did Sp. Furius give a leſs advantageous teſtimony to young Cæſo; The conſul Quinctius, ſaid he, often ſent him to my relief, when I was in great danger; and no-body contributed more than he to the advantages we gained over the enemy. Lucretius likewiſe, who had been honoured with a triumph the year before, did juſtice to the valour of the accuſed: "On

" this gallant youth will not be an ornament, if we drive him
" from ours? As to the natural impetuoſity he is reproached " with, age and prudence will by degrees correct it; and " when his virtue is arrived at its maturity, his defects
" will be worn away. How great a man will Cæſo be,
" when years ſhall have tempered the ardour, which now
" tranſports him?" The ſuffrages of ſo many illuſtrious men, and the entreaties of the father, made a ſenſible impreſſion on the multitude; but Virginius, who was bent upon Cæſo's deſtruction, fruſtrated the hopes of the patricians. He roſe up, and addreſſing himſelf to Quinctius Cincinnatus, " The public, ſaid he, does juſtice to your vir" tues and the affection you have for the people; but alas!
" how different is your ſon from you! his proud temper
" and tyrannical conduct make him unworthy of pardon.
" The education he has received, under the eye of a modeſt
" and popular father, has not been able to abate his pride.
" Romans, what have you to expect from him for the fu" ture? What a pernicious example has he given to the " youth, who follow and admire him? If you, Quinctius, " were ignorant of it before, yet being to day informed of
" it, you ought to join your indignation to ours. If you
" was acquainted with his conduct and did not correct him, " you are not worthy of the favour you aſk. But what " am I ſaying? your ſon's tranſports were certainly concea" led from you; nor have you had any ſhare in his at" tempts upon the authority of the Roman people: No, " Quinctius, you are not to be blamed for any thing, but " being a better father, than a commonwealth's man; but " in order to efface in your heart thoſe remains of tender-
" neſs which the people ſhare with you, I beg, that my

" offer, by way of private complaint againſt your ſon. I " hope the people will not leave unrevenged one of their " own magiſtrates, who has been ſo great a ſufferer by him."
Then Volſcius aſcending the roſtra, to act the part that had been concerted between them, directed his ſpeech to the people thus: " As I was returning one night with my bro" ther, from a friend's houſe where we had ſupped, we met,
" hard-

" ing to his cuſtom, by ſeveral young patricians of the " ſame character with himſelf, who, I ſuppoſe, had been " making a debauch together in thoſe infamous houſes.
" They at firſt attacked us with abuſive language, which " I indeed was for taking no notice of; but my brother,
" leſs patient than myſelf, returned injuries for injuries.
" Then Cæſo, full of anger and reſentment, fell upon " him, and, notwithſtanding my prayers and entreaties,
" ſo beat and bruiſed him, that he expired upon the ſpot.
" This happened the year the plague made ſuch havock a" mong us. I deſigned to carry my complaints to the con-
" ſuls; but death took them from us ſoon after. L. Lu" cretius and T. Veturius, their ſucceſſors, took the field " in a hurry, and Cæſo followed them. At their return
" I prepared to bring my action; but Cæſo, hearing of " my deſign, waited for me one night in a by-place, and " falling upon me, repeated his blows ſo thick, that, to " avoid my brother's fate, I was forced to promiſe never
" to mention what had befallen either of us.

THE people were ſo exaſperated at this ſtory, that, without examining into the truth of the facts, they were ready to tear young Cæſo in pieces; but Virginius, to give ſome appearance of juſtice to his villainous proſecution, interpoſed, and moved, that Cæſo ſhould be ſecured and impriſoned, till his crime could be fully proved, ſince Volſcius had not his witneſſes at hand. This occaſioned great debates; T. Quinctius repreſenting to the aſſembly, that it was a thing unheard-of in the republic, that, upon a bare accuſation, a citizen ſhould be arreſted and carried to jail. On the other hand, Virginius maintained, that ſuch a precaution was neceſſary to prevent ſuch an offender from eſcaping the juſtice of the people. After the queſtion had been long debated, with great warmth and liberty of ſpeech on both ſides, the tribunes took a middle way between Virginius's pretenſions and thoſe of the contrary party, which was, that Cæſo ſhould be ſet at liberty, provided he gave ſecurity for his appearance before the people on the day appointed. This raiſed a new debate about the ſum, in which the ſecurities were to be bound; but the ſenate at laſt fixed the ſum to three thouſand aſſes of braſs, that is, about nine pounds thirteen ſhillings and nine pence of our money; and left it to the tribunes to declare how many citizens ſhould be ſecurity for it, in caſe of his eſcape. They were content with ten ſecurities, who bound themſelves to produce Cæſo on the day he was to be tried, or to pay the fine. And this is the firſt time we read of bail given for appearance in public and capital caſes. Cæſo was no ſooner at liberty than he left Rome, and retired into Hetruria; but the tribunes knew nothing of his eſcape, till he was again cited to appear, when his friends endeavoured to prove to the people, that he had executed juſtice on himſelf, and anticipated their ſentence of baniſhment, by baniſhing himſelf; but the tribunes, ſeeing plainly that this was only an evaſion to avoid the payment of the fine, exacted it with more rigor; ſo that Quinctius, the father of Cæſo, having ſold the beſt part of his eſtate on that account, was forced to retire to a poor cottage on the other ſide the Tiber, where he cultivated with his own hands, five or ſix acres of land, which were all he had to live upon [u].

Cæſo retires into baniſhment.

THE tribunes, believing that the baniſhment of Cæſo would keep the young patricians in awe, called an aſſembly of the people, in order to propoſe the Terentian law, and get it approved by the tribes; but it was no ſooner mentioned, than there ſprung up as it were a thouſand Cæſos, all oppoſing it with the ſame intrepidity. Hereupon the tribunes ordered all the patricians to be driven away from the aſſembly; but the nobility, uniting themſelves more cloſely together after the proſecution of Cæſo, oppoſed force by force; and being attended by a great number of their clients, made the tribunes feel the evil conſequences of the ſedition they had begun. The people were diſperſed anew, and the tribunes obliged to ſave themſelves, by taking refuge in their own houſes. Thus the law was hindered from paſſing this year. The following year, the ſenate and patricians in conjunction raiſed to the conſulate Caius Claudius, brother to Appius Claudius, who killed himſelf, and P. Valerius, a ſecond time. The tribunes, ſeeing the whole body of the nobility united againſt them, and deſpairing to carry their point by a fair open conteſt, combined together to deſtroy at one ſtroke the better part of the ſenate, and ſuch of the patricians as were obnoxious to them. In order to put in execution ſo deteſtable a project, in the firſt place, by many falſe reports ſpread abroad broad among the people, they filled the whole city with inquietude and diſtruſt, as if ſome great deſign was ſecretly hatching againſt the public liberty. Then, to give the people ſtrong ſuſpicions of the whole body of the nobility, they cauſed a letter to be delivered to themſelves in public. While they were ſitting in their tribunal, a ſtranger came, and having, in the ſight of all the people, put into their hands a letter, diſappeared in an inſtant, and was never afterwards ſeen. The tribunes read the letter to themſelves, and, in reading it, put on an air of terror and ſurprize, in order to excite the curioſity of the people and make them more uneaſy. Then, riſing from their ſeats and cauſing ſilence to be proclaimed by the crier, Virginius, with looks full of conſternation, addreſſing himſelf to the aſſembly, ſpoke thus: 'Romans, you are threatened with the greateſt dangers. If the gods, who are the protectors of innocence, had not diſcovered the wicked deſigns of your enemies, you had been all loſt. But you muſt give us leave to acquaint the ſenate with the affair before it be divulged.' Virginius having thus ſpoke, the tribunes went all in a body to the conſuls houſes, and the ſenate being immediately aſſembled, the tribunes were admitted into it. In the mean time, the emiſſaries of the tribunes ſpread a thouſand falſe reports among the people about the contents of the letter. Some ſaid, that Cæſo was advancing towards Rome, where he had correſpondents, at the head of an army of Volſci; others, that the patricians had conſpired to call him back, and with his aſſiſtance, to deſtroy the tribunate; others confined the enterprize to the young patricians, and maintained that Cæſo was ſtill in Rome, and would ſoon appear at the head of a numerous body, compoſed of patricians and their clients, &c. Thus the people's prejudices were kept up, and their hatred to the patricians encreaſed.

THE tribunes being admitted into the ſenate, Virginius addreſſed himſelf to the conſuls and ſenators in the following words: "Our diſcretion, conſcript fathers, made us keep "ſilence, while the misfortunes, with which we are now "threatened, were yet uncertain. To act upon bare con"jectures againſt ſeditious men not yet diſcovered, is often only giving an handle to factious ſpirits to raiſe inſur"rections; however, we have not been unactive upon "our firſt ſuſpicions, and our private enquiries have been

"effectual-

" effectual. We have been faithfully ſerved by thoſe fo" reigners, with whom we live in hoſpitality and friend-
" ſhip. Their letters will convince you, that the gods
" watch over the republic for its preſervation. The ſymp-
" toms we find at home, agree with the accounts, we re" ceive from abroad. Rome is betrayed. Some of the " moſt illuſtrious families in this city, and ſome even of " the ſenate itſelf, are turned conſpirators, and have ſworn " her deſtruction. Among the Roman knights there are " aſſaſſins, who are ready to murder us. They wait on" ly for the opportunity of a dark night to break into our " houſes, and maſſacre us, and all thoſe among the people, " who ſhew any zeal for the public liberty. They take " it for granted, that, after this barbarous execution, they
" ſhall eaſily obtain of you the abolition of the tribunate.
" Cæſo, that Cæſo, whom they reſcued from his juſt
" puniſhment, is the inſtrument of their fury. He is to " appear within the walls, attended by numerous troops of " Æqui and Volſci, who are to be brought hither, pri" vately and in ſmall parties. The tribunes are to fall the
" firſt victims to his reſentment; and ſuch of the people
" as ſhall dare to make any reſiſtance, are to be ſacrificed " without mercy. Theſe are our dangers; this is the " crime of your patricians. What then is now to be " done? O! ye immortal gods, who unite us in the
" ſame religious worſhip, inſpire the ſenate with ſenti-
" ments of equity; efface out of their minds all regard " to rank, birth, and party-intereſt. We conjure you,
" conſcript fathers, not to give us up to the rage of theſe
" aſſaſſins. In order to prevent their evil deſigns, we hope " you will not refuſe us a decree, impowering us to make " further enquiries into this conſpiracy, and to ſecure the " chief authors of it. Thoſe who are moſt in danger,
" are moſt nearly concerned to avoid it, and will be moſt
" active in making diſcoveries. Time preſſes us, and our " aſſaſſins are at the gates. The leaſt delay were danger" ous; who knows, but this very night may be pitched
" upon for the execution of the bloody deſign? They muſt
" be conſpirators themſelves, who are againſt enquiring
" into the conſpiracy."

THE demand of the tribunes much embaraſſed the ſe-nate. The more timorous were apprehenſive, that a refu-ſal would irritate the people and raiſe a ſedition; but thoſe who who had more firmneſs of mind repreſented, how dangerous it was to give the tribunes an unbounded power in an affair of a capital nature. But the conſul Claudius, addreſſing himſelf to the tribunes, replied thus: "I take "upon me to anſwer you, tribunes, becauſe none of you "can have the confidence to ſay, that I am concerned in "the conſpiracy, with which you charge the patricians. "My conduct puts me out of your reach. However, my "deſign in ſpeaking is not to diſſuade the ſenators from "ſuffering informations to be taken of ſuch a cruel attempt, "or to hinder them from giving you this commiſſion. "Were the accuſation true, too much precaution could "not be uſed to ſecure your lives and the public liberty; "but let us ſearch the matter to the bottom. The tribunes "laſt year could not get their law paſſed: hence their air of "conſternation; hence their continual deliberations, their "aſſemblies, and their conferences. And what reſolutions "have they taken in them? No doubt, to invent the chime-"rical conſpiracy they now bring to light. Let us accuſe "the patricians, ſaid they, of having conſpired againſt our "lives; and then demand of the ſenate a power to take "cognizance of the conſpiracy. If they refuſe it, we "ſhall then inſpire the populace with new rage againſt "them. If they grant it, we will give then full ſcope to "our reſentment, and intimidate the oppoſers of the Te-"rentian law. This is the tribunes ſcheme; theſe are "the ſnares they have laid for us. Speak, Virginius, tell "us, whence came theſe letters, which have ſo much a-"larmed you? Who are theſe gueſts, and theſe faithful "allies? How came they acquainted with the misfortunes "which threaten you? Where is the bearer of this foul "accuſation? Why has he diſappeared? Let us know "who are the ſenators and knights named in the letter "you produce? Surely we have time enough to hear the "names of thoſe great criminals. Shall we wait till you "are made maſters of our lives by a decree of the ſenate, "and have it in your power to convict us of treaſon by "falſe evidence? You ſay, the ſymptoms at home agree "with the informations from abroad; why don't you then "ſhew us theſe ſymptoms? Why don't you produce the "accuſers? Could you poſſibly imagine, that the ſenate "would deliver up our moſt illuſtrious citizens to your "fury, upon a bare accuſation by letter, without any kind

" of proof? To you, conſcript fathers, to your indul" gence the bold attempts of the tribunes are to be aſcribed.
" You were too eaſy in delivering up the brave Cæſo to " the rage of his perſecutors. The tribunes ſucceſs a-" gainſt him encourages them to attempt every thing a-" gainſt us. To conclude my opinion is, that, if the
" ſtate be in any danger, it is only from theſe ſeducers
" of the people, who, while they ſet up for the defenders
" of the public liberty, are indeed its greateſt enemies."
This ſpeech quite ſtunned the tribunes. They withdrew with no leſs ſhame than fury; and repairing to the aſſembly of the people, who waited for them, began there to inveigh moſt bitterly againſt both ſenate and conſuls; but Appius following them, aſcended the roſtra, and ſpoke to the people with ſo much ſtrength and eloquence, that the better ſort were fully convinced, that the pretended conſpiracy was only an artifice of the tribunes to have it in their power to deſtroy their enemies; but the undiſtinguiſhing rabble continued in their firſt perſuaſion; and the tribunes took great care to maintain the belief of an error, which gave them an opportunity of raiſing new diſturbances in the ſtate [w].

Herdonius, a Sabine, attempts the reduction of Rome.

THE inteſtine broils of the republic encouraged a private man in Sabinia, named Appius Herdonius, to attempt the reduction of Rome. He was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and, having a great number of ſlaves and clients, he flattered himſelf that he ſhould be able, with their aſſiſtance, to reduce the Roman republic under his obedience; and make himſelf king of Rome. This bold deſign he imparted to his friends, repreſenting to them, that it was not impracticable to ſurprize the city during the diviſion between the people and the ſenate. Some of his friends, no leſs enterpriſing than himſelf, approving his undertaking, ſoon got together about four thouſand men, conſiſting partly of their own clients, but chiefly of ſlaves, outlaws, and men of deſperate fortunes. This was indeed a ſmall number for ſo great an enterprize; but Herdonius took it for granted, that a great number of Roman exiles, the Roman populace, who were greedy of plunder, ſuch citizens as were enemies to the patricians, the ſlaves, and alſo the Æqui and Volſci, would not fail to come to his aſſiſtance, upon the firſt news of his attempt. With theſe hopes he embarqued his troops on the Tiber by night, brought them down the river, and landed them before break of day by the ſide of the capitol. He got up the hill without being perceived, and, under cover of the darkneſs poſſeſſed himſelf of the temple of Jupiter and the fortreſs adjoining to it. Thence he threw himſelf into the neighbouring houſes, and put all thoſe to the ſword, who refuſed to join him. Some, who had the good luck to ſave themſelves before the Sabines entered their houſes, raiſed with their noiſe an alarm in all the quarters of the city. Nothing was heard but confuſed voices of people, crying out, "To arms, the enemy is in the heart of the city." The conſuls, awakened by the noiſe, knew not whether this tumult aroſe from a domeſtic faction, or foreign enemy, and were therefore equally afraid to arm the people, or leave them diſarmed. They therefore contented themſelves with giving arms to ſome, on whom they could depend, and placing them in the forum and at the gates of the city. The night was ſpent in doubts and uneaſineſs, neither the conſuls nor the people knowing how many, or what, enemies they were to contend with. At length the return of light diſcovered who was at the head of ſo daring an enterprize. The conſuls immediately repaired to the forum, and ſummoned all the citizens to take arms and follow them; but the tribunes, mounting their tribunal, with their unſeaſonable harangues, cooled the ardor of the people. We don't pretend, ſaid they, to obſtruct the public good; but after all, Romans, this is the time for turning the ſervice you are going to do your country to your own advantage. Before you take arms, inſiſt upon the conſuls not oppoſing the Terentian law; and don't expoſe your lives to evident dangers, till they have promiſed upon oath, that as ſoon as you have re-taken the capitol, they will ſuffer the Terentian law to paſs. Why ſhould you venture your lives, when you can draw no advantage from your bravery? Theſe words made ſuch an impreſſion upon the minds of the multitude, that neither the commands of the conſuls, nor the danger with which they were threatened, could prevail upon them to take arms. The conſul Claudius, full of indignation, was for having the patricians attack the citadel themſelves. The people, ſaid he, would ſell you their ſervices too dear. The patricians, attended by their clients, and a few voluntiers, are ſufficient to drive away the raſh Herdonius; beſides, we may

borrow ſuccours of the Latins and Hernici: our ſlaves, if we ſet them at liberty, will lend us their aſſiſtance. In ſhort, any ſoldiers are better than refractory citizens, who refuſe to relieve their country in its utmoſt danger. But Valerius, who was more moderate and popular than his collegue, was of opinion, that, in the preſent circumſtances, the ſenate ought not to refuſe the multitude any thing, that could induce them to take up arms immediately. The beſt part of the ſenators being of his mind, he advanced into the midſt of the people, and promiſed them, that, as ſoon as the capitol was re-taken, he would not hinder the tribunes from propoſing the law. The people, charmed with this promiſe, took arms, and ſolemnly ſwore never to lay them down without the conſuls leave. Then the conſuls drew lots for the conduct of the attack, which fell to Valerius. Claudius was appointed to cover the city, and prevent any ſuccours from joining Herdonius. Valerius, having drawn up his men in the forum, marched to the attack with them and a legion of Tuſculans, which L. Mamilius, the ſupreme magiſtrate of Tuſculum, had ſent of his own accord to the aſſiſtance of the Romans. Herdonius ſuſtained the aſſault with ſuch courage and reſolution, that the day was far ſpent before the Romans had gained any advantage over him. The conſul Valerius, encouraging his men by his example to advance boldly, notwithſtanding the ſhowers of darts which were inceſſantly diſcharged upon them, was ſlain at the head of the legionaries. P. Volumnius, who ſaw him fall, ordered his body to be covered, in order to conceal his death. He then took his place, and led on the Romans with ſo much bravery and reſolution, that they carried the place before they miſſed their commander. Herdonius fought like a man in deſpair, who was reſolved to ſell his life very dear. As he was a man of a tall ſtature and great ſtrength, he made a terrible ſlaughter of the Romans, diſputing the ground inch by inch, till he was at length ſlain, after having loſt the greateſt part of his followers. Thoſe, who outlived the loſs of their general, either ſtabbed themſelves, or threw themſelves headlong from the top of the capitol. And thus ended this raſh enterprize, in the deſtruction of Herdonius and all thoſe who were concerned in it [x].

Valerius prevails upon the people to take arms in defence of their country.

The conſul Valerius is killed, and the Sabines driven from the capitol.

THE city was no ſooner recovered from its fright, but the tribunes called upon Claudius, the ſurviving conſul, to perform his collegue's promiſe; but he put it off, under various pretences, and at length refuſed to do any thing in the affair, till a new conſul was elected in the room of Valerius. The day for the election being appointed, the ſenate and the whole body of patricians reſolved to chuſe ſome ſenator of great merit, who ſhould be capable of defeating the tribunes deſign, and keeping the people in awe with his authority. They caſt their eyes upon Quinctius Cincinnatus, the father of Cæſo, who was accordingly elected by the firſt claſs, conſiſting of eighteen centuries of cavalry and fourſcore of infantry; ſo that there was no occaſion for the inferior claſſes to give their ſuffrages. When the deputies, ſent by the ſenate to acquaint Quinctius with his promotion, preſented him with the decree of his election, the venerable old man, wholly free from ambition, was in ſome doubt what reſolution to take. He had retired, after his ſon's diſgrace, into the country, and was ſo taken with the ſweets of a rural life, that he preferred them to all the pomp of the conſular dignity. However, the love of his country getting the better of his private ſatisfaction, he left the plough, which he was driving when the deputies arrived, and conſented to go with them to the city; but he firſt took leave of his wife, and recommending to her the care of his domeſtic affairs, I fear, ſaid he, my dear Racilia, that our fields will be but ill manured this year. He no ſooner entered upon his office, but he turned his thoughts upon reforming the ſenate, and reſtraining the inſolence of the people and their tribunes. In the firſt ſpeech he made, he reprimanded both the ſenate and people with equal ſeverity, without declaring himſelf for either party. He reproached the ſenate for feeding, with their continual compliance, the rebellious ſpirit of the people; and the tribunes for raiſing continual diſturbances, and promoting an unbridled licentiouſneſs among the populace. Some ſeditious men, ſaid he, reign in Rome, with more inſolence and tyranny than ever did the Tarquins; but I ſhall take care to carry the people out of the way of thoſe ſeducers. Know then, ye Roman people, that my collegue and I have reſolved to make war upon the Æqui and Volſci. We declare too, that our intention is to paſs the winter in the field, without ever returning, during our conſulate, into a city ſo full of ſedition. We command all thoſe, who have taken the military oath, to appear tomorrow with their arms at the lake Regillus. The tribunes anſwered, that they would not ſuffer any levies to be made; and that if Quinctius was determined to take the field, he might chance to go to war only with his collegue. The brave conſul replied, That there was no occaſion for new levies, ſince the oaths the people had taken to Valerius, whoſe place he ſupplied, were ſtill binding. The tribunes, to elude that engagement, cried out, That by the oath the people had taken to Valerius, they had not laid themſelves under any obligation to Quinctius, who was then but a private man. But the anſwers of the tribunes ſeeming, even to thoſe who were moſt nearly concerned, more ſubtle than ſolid, every one began to take arms, tho' very unwillingly. What ſtill encreaſed their uneaſineſs was, a report ſpread abroad that the conſuls deſigned to hold a general aſſembly on the banks of the lake Regillus, and there to annul whatever had been done in former aſſemblies for the advantage of the people, the authority of the tribunes being confined to the city. Quinctius further gave out, that, on his return, he would name a dictator, whoſe authority could not be curbed by the oppoſition of the tribunes. Theſe reports, artfully ſpread abroad, ſtruck both the people and the tribunes with terror. The women and children, all in tears, conjured the principal men in the ſenate to intercede for them with Quinctius, and to prevail upon him to ſuffer their huſbands and fathers to return to their homes at the end of the campaign. Quinctius ſeemed inflexible; and the people, ſtruck with conſternation at the very mention of ſpending the winter in the camp, became very ſubmiſſive. At length a kind of treaty was made between Quinctius and the tribunes: the former promiſed not to force the troops to winter in the field, nor even to march out of the city; and the latter, on their parts, bound themſelves to make no propoſal to the people of new laws. To theſe two articles was added a third, viz. that, for the future, neither conſuls nor tribunes ſhould be continued in their offices beyond the year. Quinctius, having thus reſtored tranquillity to the city, applied himſelf to hear and determine private cauſes, and pronounced ſuch equitable judgments, that the people, charmed with his conduct, ſeemed to have forgot there were any ſuch officers as tribunes in the republic [y].

NOTWITHSTANDING the late agreement between Quinctius and the tribunes, the latter got themſelves continued in their employments. Hereupon the patricians were for continuing Quinctius in the conſulſhip; but he warmly oppoſed it, upbraiding the ſenators with their contemptible levity in being ſo ready to violate their own laws, and thereby countenancing the breach of them in the people. Before he retired to his farm, he preſided at the comitia, when Fabius Vibulanus, a third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginenſis were named conſuls for the enſuing year. They had ſcarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome, that Antium had revolted to the Volſci, who, together with the Æqui, had taken the field. It fell to Fabius's lot to march againſt the Volſci; and he gained conſiderable advantages over them, while his collegue was attended with equal ſucceſs againſt the Æqui, who, after having been defeated in the field with great ſlaughter, ſhut themſelves up in the city of Antium. Cornelius laid cloſe ſiege to the place, took it by ſtorm, and ordered the chief authors of the revolt to be firſt whipped in the market-place, and then beheaded. The Æqui, being diſheartened at their repeated loſſes, had recourſe to the clemency of the ſenate, who granted them peace, upon the ſame conditions on which it had been formerly granted to the Latins. They were to continue in poſſeſſion of their cities, lands, and laws, but under the dominion of Rome.

The Æqui and Volſci defeated.

Volſcius proſecuted.

WHILE the conſuls were thus employed in the field, A. Cornelius and Q. Servilius, both quæſtors this year, being men of great probity, began a proſecution againſt M. Volſcius, for having bore falſe witneſs againſt Cœſo. In virtue of the power annexed to their office, they convened an aſſembly of the people, and produced their evidences, of whom ſome depoſed, that they had ſeen Cœſo in the army, on the very day when Volſcius pretended he killed his brother at Rome. Others gave teſtimony, that Volſcius's brother died of a languiſhing diſtemper; and that he never ſtirred out of his houſe after he

he was ſeized with it. Theſe facts, and many others, were atteſted by ſo many perſons of unqueſtionable credit, that there was no room left to doubt of Volſcius's malice; but the tribunes, who had ſuborned Volſcius, put a ſtop to this proſecution, declaring, that they would not ſuffer the ſuffrages of the people to be gathered upon any affair whatſoever, before the Terentian law was determined. The ſenate, in their turn, made uſe of the like pretence, declaring, that they would not ſuffer the Terentian law to be propoſed, till the buſineſs of Volſcius was determined. Theſe conteſts were ſpun out till the return of the conſuls, who entered Rome in triumph, and ſoon after reſigned the faſces to C. Nautius and L. Minucius, who were obliged to take the field in the very beginning of their year againſt the Volſci, who had revolted from the Romans, and the Sabines, who, with a numerous army, committed great devaſtations in the Roman territory. The latter were routed by the conſul Nautius, and forced to ſhut themſelves up in their ſtrong-holds. But Minucius, by a ſtratagem of Cluilius commander of the Æqui, being led into a valley, was there hemmed in on all ſides, and in danger of being ſtarved into a ſurrender at diſcretion. Some horſe-men, having found means to make their eſcape in the dead of the night, carried the news to Rome. Whereupon Quintus Fabius, governor of the city, immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to the other conſul, to inform him of the danger his collegue was in. Nautius repaired to Rome in all haſte; and having aſſembled the ſenate, all the fathers were for having recourſe to the remedy made uſe of in their greateſt calamities, which was, to create a dictator. Accordingly the conſul named Quinctius Cincinnatus for that high ſtation, and immediately returned to put himſelf at the head of his army. The governor of Rome ſent the conſul's decree to Quinctius, who was found, as before, cultivating his ſmall inheritance with his own hands. When he ſaw the deputies with a numerous train of attendants, and twenty-four lictors with their faſces advancing to him, he put on his robe, and going to meet them, What tidings, ſaid he, do you bring from Rome? Your country, replied the deputies, being in great danger, ſtands in need of a dictator, and has pitched upon you; you are the only refuge Rome has in her diſtreſs. At theſe words he ſighed, and tho' ſorry to quit his beloved ſolitude, yet obeyed the orders of the ſenate, and, having put on the habit of his new dignity, ſet out for Rome. The ſenate, having notice that he drew near, ſent him a boat, in which he croſſed the Tiber, his three ſons, his friends, and the chief men of the ſenate, receiving him at his landing, and conducting him in triumph to his houſe, amidſt the loud acclamations of the people. The next day the dictator named for general of the horſe L. Tarquitius. He was a patrician of uncommon valour, but not having wherewithal to keep a horſe, had till then ſerved in the infantry; but the dictator, who had obſerved his gallantry and conduct in the campaign he had made under him, did juſtice to his merit; and, notwithſtanding his poverty, raiſed him to that high ſtation. The firſt order Quinctius made was, that all the ſhops and tribunals ſhould be ſhut up. Then he commanded all the youth in the city and country to be before ſun-ſet in the campus Martius, each with twelve ſtakes and proviſions for five days. He then put himſelf at the head of theſe troops, and, before break of day, arriving at the enemy's camp, viewed their intrenchments, as well as the obſcurity of the night would allow him. He made his ſoldiers, by ſeveral loud ſhouts, give the conſul notice of the arrival of ſuccours. Upon this, the conſular army expreſſing as much joy as the Æqui did terror, without waiting for day-light, ran to arms, and fell upon the enemy with another ſhout, which was heard by the dictator's army. The Æqui firſt turned their arms againſt Quinctius, in order to prevent him from ſurrounding them; but being called back to repulſe the conſul, Quinctius laid hold of that opportunity to fortify his entrenchments with a palliſado made of the ſtakes his men had brought from Rome. Theſe entrenchments ſerved at the ſame time to ſhut up the enemy's camp, ſo that the general of the Æqui, named Gracchus Duilius, found himſelf at day-light in the ſame ſituation to which he had reduced the conſul. Early in the morning the dictator and conſul attacked the enemy's camp at the ſame time with ſuch vigour, that Duilius, fearing his camp would be won ſword in hand, had recourſe to negotiation. He ſent deputies to the conſul, who, refuſing to hear them, referred them to the dictator. Quinctius having heard their propoſals, which were, to quit their camp and retire without baggage, arms, or cloaths, replied ſternly, That he did not think their death would be of any ſervice to his republic, and therefore was walling to grant them their lives, but

but upon condition that they delivered up to him their general and chief officers, and ſubmitted to paſs every man of them under the yoke, to imprint it deeply in their minds, that the Æqui were a nation conquered by the Romans. If they refuſed to comply with theſe conditions, he threatened to cut them all in pieces. The Æqui, being ſurrounded on all ſides and unable to ſuſtain two attacks at the ſame time, ſubmitted to what conditions the victorious enemy was pleaſed to impoſe upon them. Two javelins were therefore fixed in the ground, and a third laid over them; and under this ſort of gate all the ſoldiers paſſed, naked and unarmed. At the ſame time, they delivered up to the Romans their general and chief officers, who were reſerved to adorn the dictator's triumph. Quinctius would not allow the troops of the conſul Minucius to have any ſhare of the ſpoil. Cowardly troops, ſaid he to the conſular army, you were almoſt become a prey to the enemy; it is not therefore juſt you ſhould have any ſhare of their riches. As for you, Minucius, added he, you muſt learn the art of war in an inferior rank, before you pretend again to command in chief. He then obliged him to lay down his office; which the modeſt conſul was ſo far from reſenting, that he and his troops preſented the dictator with a crown of gold of a pound weight, for having ſaved the lives and honour of his fellow-citizens. Quinctius, after this victory, returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph, being attended both by his own and Minucius's army, with garlands of flowers on their heads. Before his chariot were led the enemy's general and a great number of officers in chains, who were the chief ornament of that proceſſion. The dictator, having finiſhed his expedition in leſs than a fortnight's time, was for laying down immediately his office, and retiring to his beloved ſolitude; but his friends prevailed upon him to continue in the dictatorſhip, till Volſcius, the accuſer of his ſon Cæſo, was brought to his trial. Accordingly he aſſembled the curiæ; and the informer, being convicted of calumny and falſe teſtimony, was according to the law of retaliation, condemned to perpetual baniſhment, and Cæſo recalled home. this done, Quinctius abdicated the dictatorſhip, the ſixteenth day after his advancement to it, though he might have held that dignity ſix months [z].

He degrades the conſul Minucius.

THE abdication of the dictator was followed by new diſturbances. Virginius was continued a fifth year in the tribuneſhip; Volſcius was recalled from baniſhment, and reinſtated in his office; the tribunes revived the diſpute about the Terentian law; and at the ſame time the Æqui, tho' lately ſubdued, together with the Sabines, began to make their uſual inroads and lay waſte the Roman territory. The two new conſuls, C. Horatius and Q. Minucius, were ordered by the ſenate to raiſe troops, and march without delay againſt the enemy; but the tribunes, after their old way, proteſted, that they would not ſuffer one plebeian to give in his name, till the commiſſioners for making a body of laws, according to Terentius's propoſal, were named. An extraordinary aſſembly of the ſenate was therefore ſummoned, to deliberate on the preſent troubles, and Quinctius Cincinnatus recalled to make head againſt the tribunes. He was of opinion, that the whole ſenate and body of the patricians, with their friends and clients, ſhould take up arms and haſten into the field. His advice was received with applauſe. Even the oldeſt ſenators repaired immediately to their houſes, took arms, and, attended by their clients and friends, appeared in the forum. The people who flocked thither from all parts, being moved at this new ſight, the conſul Horatius exhorted all good citizens to join thoſe illuſtrious ſenators, who choſe rather to expoſe their lives to the utmoſt dangers, than to ſee Rome inſulted by her enemies. Virginius, in the name of his collegues and people, anſwered, That the plebeians would not ſerve, till the Terentian law was accepted. Hereupon Horatius made a reproachful ſpeech to the curiæ, ſhewing them the diſmal effects, which the ſeditious practices of their tribunes muſt at laſt unavoidably produce. His harangue made a deep impreſſion on the minds of the multitude; which Virginius perceiving, thought it adviſeable to conform to the preſent conjuncture. Aſſuming therefore a milder behaviour he told the conſul, That he was ready to give over oppoſing the levies, nay, that he would exhort the people to take arms, provided the ſenate would grant them one favour, which would be of great ſervice to them, and no ways detrimental to the authority of the conſcript fathers. The conſul deſired him to ſpeak his mind freely, aſſuring him, that he would find the ſenate ready to comply with any reaſonable requeſt in behalf of the people. Then Virginius, having firſt conferred with his collegues, replied, All that the people requeſt of you is, that you will ſuffer the number of the tribunes to be encreaſed from five to ten. If you give us a refuſal in an affair of ſo ſmall importance, accuſe yourſelves only of the misfortunes the republic may ſuffer. This unexpected requeſt divided the ſenate. Caius Claudius oppoſed it with great warmth, being governed by his hereditary maxim, as we may call it, that all the requeſts of the tribunes ought to be ſuſpected. But Quinctius Cincinnatus, conſidering this affair in another light, was for granting the tribunes their requeſt. He thought, that the more numerous the tribunes were, the more eaſy it would be to ſow diviſions among them. The opinion of this great man prevailed, and the ſenate paſſed a decree, giving the people leave to chuſe ten tribunes annually, provided they did not continue the ſame man in office above a year. Purſuant to this decree, the tribes were immediately aſſembled, and two tribunes choſen out of each of the firſt five claſſes. The tribunes being ſatisfied, two armies were raiſed without oppoſition. Minucius marched againſt the Sabines, who fled before him and retired into their own country. Horatius led his troops againſt the Æqui, retook Corbio and Ortona, which they had ſeized; and then both conſuls returned to Rome, to preſide in the comitia at the election of their ſucceſſors [a].

The tribunes of the people encreaſed to ten. Year of the flood, 2547. Before Chriſt 452. Of Rome, 296.

In the following conſulate of M. Valerius Lactucinus and Sp. Virginius Tricoſtus, the tribunes, grown more audacious than ever by their number, propoſed, that mount Aventine, or at leaſt ſuch parts of it as lay uncultivated, or were not poſſeſſed by lawful owners, might be yielded to the people, who being now very numerous, began to want habitations. The conſuls looking upon this new demand as a prelude to the revival of the Agrarian law, and therefore deferring to convene the ſenate to debate it, Icilius, one of the tribunes, ventured upon an attempt never heard of before. He ſent an officer to them, commanding them to aſſemble the ſenate forthwith, and to repair to it themſelves. The meſſenger was, by the conſuls order, ſoundly beat, and ignominiouſly driven away by one of their lictors. Hereupon the tribunes cauſed the lictor to be ſeized, and ſome of them were for putting him immediately to death, for violating the ſacred privileges of the tribuneſhip in the perſon of their officer. The ſenate to ſave him, had recourſe to entreaties, but without ſucceſs. They were obliged to come to a compoſition with the tribunes. The lictor was ſet at liberty; but but mount Aventine was by a decree of the ſenate, yielded to the people. The ſenate ſoon found, that their compliance with the laſt demands of the people ſerved only to put them upon new pretenſions. Icilius, the moſt enterpriſing of the tribunes, formed a deſign to bring the conſuls themſelves under ſubjection. In the conſulate of T. Romilius and C. Veturius, the tribunes made more noiſe than ever about the Terentian law; and the conſuls, knowing the republic would never be quiet at home, till ſhe was engaged in a war abroad, reſolved to revenge the inroads, which the Sabines and Æqui had made the year before; but, in raiſing levies, they uſed ſo much ſeverity, that the people appealed to their tribunes, who, taking the part of the complainants, endeavoured to reſcue out of the hands of the lictors thoſe, whom the conſuls had ordered to be ſeized, for refuſing to anſwer when called upon. The conſuls advanced to ſupport the execution of their orders; but the tribunes, ſupported by the populace, not only repulſed them, but ordered their ædiles to ſeize thoſe ſovereign magiſtrates and carry them to priſon. So daring an attempt provoked the patricians to ſuch a degree, that they fell upon the tribunes, beat them ſoundly, and forced them to fly, with thoſe who ſtood up for them. The next day the tribunes aſſembled the people anew, and ſummoned the conſuls to appear before the tribunal, and there anſwer for what had happened the day before. The conſuls ſcornfully refuſing to obey the ſummons, the tribunes brought their complaints to the ſenate, and threatened to aſſemble the tribes, in order to judge the conſuls, in caſe they did not appear to juſtify their conduct. The conſul Romilius haughtily anſwered, That the tribunes had been the aggreſſors and the ſole authors of the tumult; and proteſted, that if they were ſo daring as to proceed a ſtep further in this affair, he would arm the whole body of patricians againſt them. The ſenate, thinking it equally dangerous to declare either for the conſuls or the tribunes, broke up, without coming to any reſolution. Icilius, finding that nothing was to be expected from the ſenate, convened an aſſembly of the people, in order to ſtir them up to ſome vigorous reſolution. Some of the plebeians were for taking arms, and retiring again to the ſacred mount; others for proceeding againſt the conſuls, and inſiſting upon their appearing before the people, or condemning them to death or baniſhment, in caſe they did not appear; but the moſt moderate adviſed the people to defer all proceedings againſt the conſuls, till their conſulate was expired pired, and, in the mean time, to proſecute, with the utmoſt rigor, thoſe patricians, who had aſſiſted them in the inſult they had committed on the perſons of the tribunes. Of theſe three different opinions the tribunes choſe to follow the ſecond; and accordingly ſummoned the conſuls to appear the third market-day. This project, however, came to nothing; for Icilius declared in the aſſembly of the people, that the college of tribunes, at the entreaties of the ſenate, forgave the conſuls the perſonal injuries they had received from them; but could not neglect the intereſts of the people, and would therefore propoſe both the Agrarian and Terentian laws to their conſideration. This ſaid, he fixed a day for a new aſſembly to deliberate upon thoſe matters.

The tribunes renew their purſuit of the Agrarian law.

THE time appointed being come, and the people aſſembled, Icilius made a long harangue on the reaſonableneſs of the Agrarian law, and then declared, that any plebeian might ſpeak his mind freely. Upon this, many plebeians pleaded the right their ſervices gave them to ſhare of the conquered lands, and made loud complaints of the patricians, who uſurped what the plebeians had gained with their blood. This was the common complaint of the plebeians; but none repreſented it in ſtronger terms than one Sicinius, or, as Livy calls him, Siccius Dentatus. He was a plebeian about threeſcore years of age; but yet in his full ſtrength and vigor, of a handſome ſhape and mein, and not uneloquent for a man of his profeſſion. He enumerated his exploits in war during forty years ſervice; told the multitude, that he had been in an hundred and twenty engagements, that he had received forty-five wounds, and all before, twelve of them in that ſingle action againſt Herdonius the Sabine; that for the thirty laſt years he had been always in ſome command or other; that fourteen civic crowns had been given him for ſaving the lives of ſo many citizens, three mural crowns for having been the firſt who mounted the breach in towns taken by ſtorm, eight other crowns for different exploits, eighty-three golden collars, ſixty golden bracelets, eighteen lances, twenty-five ſets of furniture for horſes, nine of which he had won from ſo many enemies conquered in ſingle combats. And theſe military toys, added he, are the only rewards I have hitherto received. No lands, no ſhare of the conquered countries. Uſurpers, without any title but that of a patrician extraction, poſſeſs them. Is this to be endured? Shall they alone enjoy the fruits of our conqueſts: the purchaſe of our blood? No plebeians, let us delay no longer to do ourſelves juſtice. Let us this very day paſs the law propoſed by Icilius. If the young patricians oppoſe it, let our tribunes make them feel what is the extent of their authority. Icilius beſtowed the higheſt elogiums on Dentatus, but affecting to appear a ſtrict obſerver of the laws, he told him, that he could not with juſtice propoſe the law, till he had heard what the patricians alledged againſt it. Accordingly, he adjourned the aſſembly to the next day. In the mean time, the conſuls, having ſpent great part of the night in conſulting with the chief men of the ſenate, about the proper means to fruſtrate the deſigns of the tribunes, came to the following reſolution, viz. to employ the whole art of eloquence to win over the people; but if they continued obſtinately bent upon the publication of the law, in that caſe to hinder by main force the collecting of the votes. This reſolution being imparted to the patricians, they all repaired early in the morning to the forum, and diſperſed themſelves among the multitude in ſmall parties. The conſuls being come, the tribunes cauſed proclamation to be made by a herald, that whoever had any ſolid reaſons to offer againſt the publication of the Agrarian law, might lay them before the people. Several ſenators preſented themſelves one after another; but they no ſooner began to ſpeak, than the populace ſet up ſuch a clamour, that it was impoſſible to hear what they ſaid. The conſuls proteſted againſt all that ſhould be done in ſo tumultuous an aſſembly; but the tribunes, without hearkening to their remonſtrances, commanded the urns to be opened, and the tablets to be delivered out to the people, in order to vote.

The patricians oppoſe by force the paſſing of the law.

Hereupon the young patricians ſtarting up, ſnatched away the urns, and ſcattered about the tablets, on which the votes were written, and throwing themſelves at the head of their clients and friends into the croud, by blows and main force hindered the people from dividing into their reſpective tribes. The tribunes having attempted in vain to oppoſe the patricians, and keep the people together, were at length obliged to retire, and defer the promulgation of the law to another day. Early next morning, the tribunes aſſembled the people, and having demanded and obtained permiſſion of the aſſembly to enquire after the authors of the late diſorder, they reſolved to turn the whole accuſation againſt the youth of the Poſthumian, Sempronian, and Clelian familes, who had been the moſt active active in the fray. It was then customary in Rome to determine what punishment the accused deserved, in case he was convicted, before his crime was reported to the people. The tribunes therefore having assembled a certain number of the most considerable citizens, to determine the punishment they should inflict upon the ring-leaders of the tumult, some voted for death, others for banishment; but Sicinius was for the least punishment the laws enjoined, viz. the confiscation of their effects; and his opinion prevailed. The chief men of the senate, having consulted together on this occasion, thought it advisable not to oppose the prosecution, hoping that the multitude, satisfied with this revenge, would drop the more important affair of the law. As for the loss of the sufferers, they resolved to repair it at their private charges. Accordingly, when the day came for the trial, the persons accused, not appearing, were condemned in a fine for default, and their goods publicly sold to pay it. But the senate caused them to be bought up by private hands, and restored to the former proprietors [b].

The Æqui invade the territory of Tusculum.

During these contentions, news was brought, that the Æqui had made an irruption into the territory of the Tusculans, who were in alliance with Rome. The senate immediately decreed, that the consuls should take the field and march to the assistance of those faithful allies. The tribunes did not fail to lay hold of this opportunity to raise new disturbances about the Agrarian law, protesting, that they would not suffer the plebeians to take arms, till the law was passed. But herein they were not seconded by the people, who, remembering the assistance they had received from Tusculum against Herdonius, readily gave in their names; so that two armies were immediately raised. Sicinius Dentatus was one of the first who joined the consuls, at the head of eight hundred veterans as brave as himself, who had all served the time prescribed by law, but yet were willing to make one campaign more under the command of so famous a leader. The consuls marched out of Rome in great state; but the Æqui, on the news of their approach, retired to their own frontiers, and encamped on a steep rock. The Romans pitched

ed their camp not far from the enemy, and kept cloſe within it to conceal their ſtrength, and by that means encourage the enemy to offer them battle. Accordingly, the Æqui, imagining the number of the Romans to be very ſmall, went down into the plain, and there challenged the Romans to an engagement. The conſul Romilius, who commanded that day in chief, ſeeing the enemy thus confirmed in their falſe confidence, reſolved to give them battle in the plain, and at the ſame time to attack their camp on the hill. With this view he ſent for Sicinius, and either out of eſteem for ſo valiant a commander, or, what is moſt likely, with a deſign to expoſe him and his veterans, who were all plebeians, to be cut in pieces, gave him the charge of attacking the enemy's camp. Sicinius, being well appriſed of the danger of ſo deſperate an attempt, gave the conſul this reſpectful anſwer; I never yet declined any dangerous enterpriſe out of fear: but give me leave to repreſent to you, that the execution of what you command, is not ſo eaſy as you ſeem to imagine it. The rock we muſt climb up is very ſteep on all ſides, and not acceſſible, but by a narrow way, which an handful of men may defend againſt a whole army. If you will have me therefore to make this attack, enlarge my troop, and put us in a condition to ſhew our bravery without diſhonouring ourſelves by a raſh attempt. At theſe words, the conſul told him in great anger, that his buſineſs was to obey, and not to act the general; and then added, with a ſcornful ſmile, This then is the brave man who has ſignalized himſelf in an hundred and twenty battles, who has been forty years in the ſervice, and whoſe whole body is covered over with wounds! He draws back at the ſight of danger, and has no courage, but in word. Go, Sicinius, go to the comitia, and fight the patricians with your tongue. What you refuſe to undertake, others ſhall put in execution for you. The brave plebeian, enraged at the general's reproaches, told him boldly, that he found he was reſolved either to deſtroy an old ſoldier, or to ſhame him; that he had been always ready to ſacrifice his life for his honour, and therefore would now march up to the enemy's camp, and either win it, or fall in the attempt, with all the veterans under his command. Then turning to them, my dear fellow-ſoldiers, ſaid he, let us go whitherſoever honour and the command of our general call us. You will bear me witneſs after my death, that I was deſtroyed only for having defended with zeal the public liberty. His veterans took their leave of the reſt of the ſoldiers, who looked upon them as men ſent to ſlaughter. But Sicinius, who underſtood the art of war better than the conſul, inſtead of following the narrow path, which he had pointed out to him, led his men round about, and at length entered a great wood, that ſeemed to ſtretch along the hills quite to the enemy's camp. There he met with a peaſant, who conducted him to an eminence, which overlooked the enemy's camp, and was not far from it. From thence he had a ſight of the two armies, which were already engaged, and at the ſame time obſerved, that the ſoldiers, who were left to guard the enemy's camp, were all gone to that ſide, which were next the plain, to ſee from thence the battle. In this juncture Sicinius, with his veterans, entering the intrenchments without oppoſition, ordered his men to give a loud ſhout, and at the ſame time falling upon the Æqui, whoſe eyes were turned another way, ſtruck them with ſuch terror, that they abandoned the camp, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion to the main body of their army. Sicinius purſued them cloſe, made a great ſlaughter of them by the way, and then falling upon the rear of the main body, which was engaged with the Romans, quickly put an end to the conflict. The Æqui betook themſelves to flight, and the conſuls, following them, killed above ſeven thouſand men in the purſuit. Sicinius, as ſoon as it was dark, retired with his veterans to the camp he had taken from the enemy, and having there put to the ſword all the priſoners, killed the horſes, and ſet fire to the tents, arms, and baggage, marched with all poſſible expedition to Rome, with his victorious cohort, and gave an account to the tribunes of what had paſſed, begging, that the honours of a triumph might not be allowed to generals who had abuſed their authority to deſtroy their fellow-citizens. The people, full of indignation, promiſed they would never conſent, that the conſuls ſhould have a triumph, and accordingly, when the generals returned from the campaign, the multitude refuſed to let them enter the city with the uſual pomp on ſuch occaſions. The ſenate, fearing ſome new commotions, did not think proper to eſpouſe the conſuls cauſe, ſo that they returned without honour, and loaded with freſh odium.

The Æqui are routed by the Romans

THE two conſuls had no ſooner reſigned the faſces to their ſucceſſors, Sp. Tarpeius and A. Æternius, but they were cited before the aſſembly of the people. Sicinius, whom the people had raiſed to the tribuneſhip, took upon him the management of the proſecution againſt his enemy Romilius, whilſt Allienus, one of the ædiles, accuſed Veturius. On the day appointed for their trial, they both appeared, depending on the promiſes the patricians had made them, which were not to ſuffer the ſuffrages of the people to be gathered. But Sicinius took ſuch meaſures to prevent the young patricians from raiſing any diſturbances, that they were both regularly tried for having offered violence to the tribunes, and diſturbed them in the execution of their office, and beſides, for abuſing their authority in the army, in order to deſtroy Sicinius and the eight hundred veterans of his cohort. The people fined them both, Romilius in ten thouſand aſſes, and Veturius in fifteen thouſand. Hiſtory has not told us, why the people made this difference in their fines; Veturius ſeems to have been leſs guilty than his collegue, and yet his fine was one third larger. Perhaps Sicinius, ſatisfied with humbling his adverſary, did not care to reduce him to poverty.

The laſt year's conſuls tried by the people, and fined.

UNDER this year's conſuls, a law was made, with the conſent of all orders in the ſtate, impowering any magiſtrate to lay a fine upon ſuch as ſhould be wanting in reſpect to his dignity; a prerogative reſerved before to the conſuls only. This new regulation raiſed the authority of the tribunes, and put them almoſt upon a level with the conſuls. However, to prevent any particular magiſtrate from abuſing his authority in this point, it was provided by the ſame law, that the higheſt fine for ſuch crimes ſhould never exceed the value of two oxen and thirty ſheep [c].

The tribunes reſume the purſuit of the Terentian law.

THE tribunes, finding they could not by any means bring the conſuls to hear of the Agrarian law, returned to the purſuit of the Terentian. The ſenate, to put an end to the continual conteſts between them and the people, which they foreſaw would at length make Rome become a prey to her enemies, began to hearken to the tribunes propoſal, and declared, that they would not oppoſe the drawing up a body of laws, which ſhould be a guide to the magiſtrates, provided vided all the legiſlators were choſen out of the nobility. On the other hand, the tribunes were for having them choſen partly out of the nobility, and partly out of the plebeians. On this occaſion, Romilius, to the great ſurpriſe of both parties, declared with great warmth for the eſtabliſhment of fixed laws, and at the ſame time propoſed the ſending of deputies to Athens, to tranſcribe the laws of Solon and of the other law-givers of Greece, in order to form thereby a body of Roman laws, which ſhould be the rule for magiſtrates in all the parts of their adminiſtration. The opinion of Romilius was followed by the two conſuls and a great majority of the ſenators. But before the decree paſſed, the tribune Sicinius roſe up and beſtowed great encomiums on Romilius, proteſting, that for the future he ſhould ever be his friend. Nay, he went further; and as Romilius had not yet paid the fine, the tribune declared, that he remitted it in the name of the people. But as fines, according to the cuſtom of thoſe days, were always applied to religious uſes, Romilius rejected this favour, proteſting, that he would not defraud the gods of the money which belonged to them. A decree, conformable to Romilius's propoſal, being paſſed by the ſenate and confirmed by the people, Sp. Poſthumius, S. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, were appointed to repair to Greece, and there collect the beſt laws and inſtitutions of the Greek cities, eſpecially of Athens. The quæſtors ordered ſome gallies to be fitted out and magnificently adorned, to give the Greeks an advantageous opinion of the Roman republic, with which they were yet entirely unacquainted. On board theſe gallies the deputies ſet out, leaving Rome in the enjoyment of a profound peace, which laſted all this year and the following, when P. Horatius and Sextus Quintilius were conſuls; but almoſt all Italy was afflicted with a plague, which ſwept away great numbers of citizens at Rome, amongſt others the conſul Quintilius, Sp. Furius, who had been named to ſucceed him, Servius Cornelius, the high-prieſt of Jupiter, the augur Horatius Pulvillus, four tribunes of the people, and the beſt part of the ſenators. The next year, P. Seſtius and T. Menenius being conſuls, the plague ceaſed, and the deputies, who had been ſent into Greece, returned home. Upon their return, the people preſſed the nomination of the ten commiſſioners or decemvirs for the great work of drawing up a body of laws. But the conſuls Seſtius and Menenius, being averſe to the whole deſign, put off the election under various pretences. At firſt they alledged in excuſe of their delay, that their ſucceſſors, in whoſe conſulate this great affair was to be ſettled, ought to be previouſly elected. This haſtened the election of the new conſuls, and Appius Claudius and T. Genucius, were choſen before the uſual time. Appius was the ſon of that Appius who killed himſelf, and grandſon of the firſt Appius. All the patricians gave him their ſuffrages, hoping he would be no leſs zealous for the power of the ſenate than his anceſtors. After this election of magiſtrates for the next year, the tribunes applied themſelves anew to the preſent conſuls for the nomination of the decemvirs. But Menenius, pretending to be out of order, kept at home, and Seſtius declared, that he would not act in ſo great an affair without his collegue. Hereupon the tribunes applied themſelves to the conſuls elect. It then evidently appeared, that the Roman conſtancy, and zeal of the moſt rigid patricians, for the intereſts of their body, was nothing elſe but a refined ambition.

The conſul Appius Claudius joins the tribunes.

For Appius Claudius, who had hitherto valued himſelf on his immoveable attachment to the party of the nobility, and ſeemed to have derived it with his blood from his anceſtors, changed all at once, and joined with the tribunes, in order to get the decemvirs appointed. His collegue Genucius followed his example, but with more moderation. Appius publicly undertook the defence of the popular faction, and, at the inſtigation of the tribunes, made an harangue in their favour in a general aſſembly of the people. He there publicly declared, that the nomination of the decemvirs ought to be deferred no longer, and added, that if the election of himſelf and his collegue to the conſulate was thought to be of any hindrance to it, they were both ready to relinquiſh their pretenſions to that dignity. Appius had in this his private views; he expected, that, by the favour of the tribunes, he ſhould be placed at the head of the decemvirs, and by that means have a more abſolute authority, than if he had continued conſul. The next ſtep was to bring the affair before the ſenate. Menenius ſtill pretended ſickneſs and ſtayed at home; but Seſtius was at length prevailed upon by Appius and Genucius to aſſemble the conſcript fathers, and propoſe the nomination of thoſe new magiſtrates, which did not paſs without ſome oppoſition. The patricians did not find their account in eſtabliſhing theſe laws, the authority of the conſuls being much greater, while they continued to determine cauſes in an arbitrary manner. Many therefore among the ſenators were for adhering to the antient cuſtoms, and rejecting all changes in the government of the ſtate. But Appius, who had a ſtrong party in the aſſembly, maintained on the contrary, that it was highly reaſonable that laws ſhould be eſtabliſhed, equally binding all citizens, and equally favourable to all; adding, that ſuch an eſtabliſhment would put an end to the domeſtic feuds, which had ſo long divided Rome, as it were, into two cities. The opinion of Appius prevailed, and it was reſolved, that ten men, venerable for their age and wiſdom, ſhould be choſen to compile a body of laws out of thoſe that had been brought from Greece. It was likewiſe decreed, that theſe commiſſioners ſhould for one whole year be inveſted with the ſovereign power; that the authority of conſuls, tribunes, ædiles, and quæſtors ſhould ceaſe; that there ſhould be no appeal from the decemvirs; and laſtly, that, during their adminiſtration, they ſhould be the ſole judges of peace and war, and of all matters of juſtice. This is the firſt inſtance of ſuſpending the tribuneſhip, which, as the tribunes were not properly magiſtrates, had hitherto been always preſerved even under the dictators. But when the ten commiſſioners came to be choſen, a new difficulty aroſe. The tribunes demanded, as they had done before, that ſome plebeians ſhould be let into the commiſſion; but the ſenate oppoſing with great unanimity this pretenſion, the tribunes yielded, for fear the nomination of the decemvirs ſhould be dropt entirely; but upon condition, that no alteration ſhould be made by the decemvirs in two laws favourable to the people, viz. the Icilian, which gave the people ground to build upon on the Aventine, and that of the Mons ſacer, by which the tribunes were appointed to defend and protect the people againſt the oppreſſions of the patricians. Theſe two articles being agreed upon, a ſolemn aſſembly was held of the whole Roman people convened by centuries, and the auſpices being taken, they proceeded to the election of the decemvirs. Appius Claudius and his collegue T. Genucius were the firſt named. To them were added Seſtius the conſul, who had laid this matter before the ſenate againſt his collegue's will; Sp. Poſthumius, S. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, who had brought the laws from Greece; T. Romilius, the firſt who propoſed that deputation; C. Julius, T. Veturius, and P. Horatius, all conſulars and men of great diſtinction. This was almoſt as remarkable a revolution in the government of Rome, as that from kings to conſuls. Nothing could be more moderate and gentle than the beginning of this joint reign, as we may ſtyle it, of the decemvirs. They agreed among themſelves, that only one of them at a time ſhould have the faſces and the other conſular ornaments, aſſemble the ſenate, confirm decrees, &c. To this honour they were to ſucceed by turns, each enjoying it one whole day, and then reſigning it to another. The reſt who were not actually exerciſing their authority, affected no diſtinction but that of guards, their habits differing very little from thoſe of the other ſenators. They repaired every morning, each in his turn to their tribunal in the forum, and there diſtributed juſtice with ſo muſt impartiality, that the people charmed with their conduct, ſeemed to have quite forgot their tribunes. Appius was the moſt popular of them all. He, who was formerly a ſevere and inflexible magiſtrate, was now all affability and complaiſance. He knew moſt of the citizens by their names, received them with reſpect, and ſaluted them with great marks of affection; inſomuch, that, from being the deteſtation, he became the idol of the people, and was looked upon as a ſecond Poplicola. Before the end of the year, each of the decemvirs preſented to the people that part of the laws which he had drawn up. They were aſſiſted by one Hermodorus, baniſhed from Epheſus, his native city, and then accidentally at Rome, in underſtanding the Greek tranſcripts brought from Athens. We are told, that Heraclitus, one of Hermodorus's friends wrote him a congratulatory letter on the pains he had taken in drawing up the Roman laws; adding, that in a dream he had ſeen all the nations of the earth bowing down before thoſe laws and worſhipping them after the Perſian manner [d]. When the whole work was completed, the decemvirs aſſembled the people, and harangued them with the following words; May the gods grant, that what we now preſent to you, Romans, may be equally agreeable to you, and advantageous to the republic, to you and your remoteſt poſterity! go, read the laws we have drawn up. We have uſed all the care and attention poſſible. But, after all, a whole nation muſt ſee further than any ten perſons. Examine our laws therefore in private, make them the ſubject of your public converſation; confer upon them among yourſelves, and conſult with one another what what ought to be taken from them, and what may be added to them. Nothing that we have drawn up ſhall have the force of a law, till it is received with univerſal conſent. Be you, Romans, rather the authors, than barely the approvers, of laws, which are to eſtabliſh order and regularity, and to be the main foundation of the happineſs both of the ſenate and people. A diſcourſe ſo modeſt and candid was heard with great applauſe. Immediately the laws were cut in ten tables of oak, fixed up in the forum, and all, who came to ſtart any difficulties about them, well received and readily heard. When all neceſſary corrections and amendments had been made, the ten tables were carried before the ſenate, where they met with no oppoſition; ſo that a decree was paſſed for convening the centuries for their ratification. This aſſembly was ſoon after held, and the auſpices being ſolemnly taken, the laws were firſt confirmed by the unaminous voices of the whole Roman people, and then tranſcribed on pillars of braſs, and ranged in order in the forum, as the foundation of all judicial determinations, with regard both to public and private affairs [e].

As many eminent men in the republic were of opinion, that ſeveral regulations, which would fill two other tables, were neceſſary to be added to the ten already eſtabliſhed, the continuation of the decemviral government for one year more was propoſed in a general aſſembly of the people, and approved of by the ſenate and people, with equal readineſs, but for different reaſons. The ſenators were glad at any rate to get rid of the tribunes; and the people extremely deſirous to keep back the reſtoration of the conſular dignity. Never was any office ſo much ſolicited by the graveſt and wiſeſt ſenators, as the decemvirate at this time. Thoſe patricians, who were formerly the moſt declared enemies of the people, and who ſcorned to canvaſs for public offices, were now wholly taken up in flattering and courting the meaneſt of the citizens. Appius, though a decemvir, forgetting his dignity, debaſed himſelf more than any of the candidates. He was perpetually ſeen in public places in company with thoſe who had been formerly tribunes, and whom he knew to be agreeable to the people. By their means he recommended himſelf to the multitude, for they were continually boaſting of him to the populace, as the author of the happineſs they enjoyed under the mild government of the decemvirs. But Appius himſelf, when aſked by the patricians, whether he deſired deſired to be continued in his office for the next year, affected to diſlike it, and was continually talking of the uneaſineſs that attends public employments. But his collegues ſaw into his deſigns, and wiſely formed their judgment of him by his actions, and not his words. They obſerved, that he abuſed the regard the people had for him to leſſen the moſt venerable ſenators in the eſteem of the people; that he excluded all men of known merit and ſteadineſs from ſtanding at the approaching election, by artfully defaming them among the multitude; that contrary to the pride of the Claudian family, he affected great affability and moderation, &c. All this gave great uneaſineſs to his competitors, and rendered him ſuſpicious to his collegues. Theſe latter therefore formed a deſign to diſappoint him. When the time of the comitia for the creation of the new decemvirs drew near, they appointed Appius to preſide in them; for the preſident in theſe aſſemblies propoſed to the people the perſons who ſtood for the office in queſtion, and it had never yet been known, that any one had nominated himſelf. But Appius, contrary to all the rules of decency, propoſed himſelf for the firſt decemvir; and the people who were now entirely devoted to him, readily gave him their ſuffrages. The other perſons he named were all men at his devotion, and ſuch as he favoured. The firſt of the number was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been three times conſul, a patrician indeed of a character hitherto unblameable. After him were choſen five other patricians, viz. M. Cornelius, M. Sergius, L. Minucius. T. Antonius, and M. Rabuleius, all men little eſteemed in their own body, but in great favour with Appius. But what moſt ſurprized the ſenate was, that Appius out of complaiſance to the people, propoſed three plebeians for the decemviral dignity, viz. Q. Petilius, Cœſo Duilius, and Sp. Oppius. Theſe, though excluded by their birth, and by a late agreement between the patricians and plebeians from this ſupreme magiſtracy, were by a plurality of voices added to the number of the decemvirs. Several men of known probity and moderation had offered themſelves for candidates, only to exclude thoſe, whoſe behaviour gave them cauſe to ſuſpect them of ſome ill deſigns, namely Quinctius Cincinnatus, Quinctius Capitolinus, and Caius Claudius, uncle to Appius. But theſe Appius, who preſided at the election, did not ſo much as name, leſt the people who were well acquainted with their merit, ſhould prefer them to his creatures [f].

AND now Claudius, ſeeing himſelf once more at the head of the decemvirs, threw off the maſk, and turned his thoughts wholly on making his denomination perpetual. As he governed his collegues with abſolute ſway before they began to exerciſe their office, he inſpired them with his own ſentiments. They had private meetings every day to deliberate about the moſt proper means of perpetuating themſelves in that dignity. Above all things they thought it neceſſary, and agreed to keep up a good underſtanding with one another. Appius, at their head, directed all their proceedings, and told them what they were to do. From that time they appeared reſerved and myſterious, ſuffered few perſons to come near them, and had no intercourſe but with thoſe of their own body. This cloſe union and confederacy of ambitious men made the ſenate apprehenſive, that the decemvirs for the enſuing year would behave themſelves very differently from their predeceſſors. When the ides of May came, and the new decemvirs made their firſt appearance, the Romans were greatly ſurprized to ſee each decemvir appear in the forum, early in the morning, with twelve lictors bearing axes among their faſces, like thoſe that were antiently carried before the kings, and afterwards before the dictator; ſo that the forum was filled with an hundred and twenty lictors. This was a dreadful ſight to Rome, the people prognoſticating from thence, that this would be a year of tyranny and injuſtice. And they were ſoon made ſenſible, that their fears were not groundleſs. The decemvirs began to reign imperiouſly, and with a deſpotic power. They were always ſurrounded, not only by the numerous train of their lictors, but alſo by a crowd of deſperate men, loaded with debts and guilty of the blackeſt crimes. Many of the young patricians, preferring licentiouſneſs to liberty, made their court to them in the moſt abject manner, in order to ſcreen themſelves from juſtice, and eſcape by their favour the puniſhment due to their crimes. No man's life or property was any longer ſafe. The young patricians, ſupporters of the ten tyrants were not aſhamed upon the moſt frivolous pretences to take poſſeſſion of their neighbours eſtates; and when application was made to the decemvirs for redreſs, the complainants were treated with contempt, and their complaints rejected. An inconſiderate word, or an expreſſion of concern at the remembrance of their antient liberty, was a capital crime. Some of the chief citizens were beaten with rods for complaining of the preſent adminiſtration; others were baniſhed, and ſome even put to death, and their goods confiſcated. The new tyrants vented their fury chiefly upon the people, treating them more like ſlaves than Roman citizens. As for the patricians, moſt of them, dreading the tyranny of the decemvirs, gave way to the ſtorm, and retired into the country for the remaining part of the year. They hoped, that the tempeſt would ceaſe with the annual power of the decemvirs. In the mean time; the ides of May, the time fixed for holding the comitia, in order to elect new magiſtrates, drew near; but the decemvirs inſtead of aſſembling the people, propoſed two new tables of laws, the firſt relating to religion and the worſhip of the gods, the ſecond to marriages and the right of huſbands. Theſe made up the number of the twelve tables ſo much ſpoke of, which the Romans preſerved ever after as a ſacred depoſitum. Notwithſtanding the hatred the public bore to the decemvirs, they found little to object to their laws. The laſt only forbidding patricians and plebeians to intermarry, ſeemed an artful invention of the tyrants to keep the two parties always divided, that they might reign with more ſecurity. In the mean time, the ides of May paſſed, and not a word of any comitia for an election of new magiſtrates. The tyrants then ſhewed themſelves bare-faced, and, in ſpite both of the ſenate and people, retained their power, without any other title but poſſeſſion and violence. All who gave them the leaſt umbrage were proſcribed; and many worthy citizens, retiring voluntarily from their country, took refuge among the Latins and Hernici. The people, groaning under ſo cruel a tyranny, caſt their eyes upon the ſenate, as their only refuge. But the ſenators, inſtead of comforting them, took an ill-natured pleaſure in ſeeing them oppreſſed, and bearing a great ſhare in the misfortunes they had occaſioned. When any plebeian complained to them, they maliciouſly referred him to Claudius, that idol, whom they had ſet up, and preferred to ſo many illuſtrious defenders of their country. C. Claudius, greatly concerned to ſee his nephew become the tyrant of his country, went ſeveral times to his houſe, with an intention to reprove him, and him in mind of the glorious examples left him by his anceſtors. But Appius, gueſſing at the errand he came upon, conſtantly eluded him, having ordered his attendants to admit none, but the ſupporters and partners of his tyranny.

In the mean time, the Sabines and Æqui, hearing of the weak condition of the republic, and diſdaining to live ſubject to a city which had loſt her own liberty, invaded the Roman territory, and advanced within a few miles of Rome. This unexpected invaſion alarmed the decemvirs. It was neceſſary to make head againſt the enemy; but the difficulty was how to raiſe an army, when the people were diſſatisfied with their governors. In this perplexity, the decemvirs reſolved to aſſemble the ſenate, and endeavour to prevail with the conſcript fathers to interpoſe their authority, and make a decree for legal levies. The people were ſurpriſed to hear a proclamation made in the forum for the ſenators to meet. We are indebted, ſaid they, to our enemies for the appearance of this ſingle ſpark of our antient liberty. But when the decemvirs repaired to the ſenate, they found no-body there but their own creatures. The others had retired to their country ſeats; and thither the decemvirs ſent meſſengers, ſummoning them to appear on a day appointed. Moſt of them obeyed the ſummons, and returned to Rome, but with views very different from thoſe of the uſurpers. Appius, in a ſtudied harangue, repreſented the danger which threatened the republic from the Sabines and the Æqui, and deſired a decree for levies without delay. He had ſcarce finiſhed, when L. Valerius Potitus roſe up to ſpeak, without waiting till it came to his turn. He was the grandſon of the famous Valerius Poplicola, and ſon of that Valerius, who was ſlain at the head of the Romans fighting againſt Herdonius the Sabine. Appius, apprehending he was going to propoſe ſomething contrary to the intereſt of the decemvirs, ſternly commanded him to ſit down and hold his peace, till ſenators, older than himſelf and more conſiderable in the republic, had declared their opinions. But the brave Valerius, deſpiſing his command, complained of his pride and inſolence, in preſuming to impoſe ſilence upon a ſenator ſtanding up for the liberty of the common-wealth, laid open the conſpiracy they had all formed againſt the republic; and laſtly, called upon Fabius, one of the decemvirs, as a man of juſtice and probity, to undertake the defence of his oppreſſed country, telling him, that on him chiefly the ſenate turned its eyes. Fabius, overwhelmed with ſhame and confuſion, did not anſwer. But Appius and the other decemvirs, ſtarting up from their ſeats in a great rage, ſurrounded Valerius, and obliged him to hold his peace. Such an extraordinary proceeding raiſed a tumult in the aſ-

ſembly, moſt of the ſenators being highly provoked at the haughty behaviour of the decemvirs, but no body more than M. Horatius Barbatus, the grandſon of that Horatius who had been conſul with Poplicola. As he was an intimate friend of Valerius, and animated with the ſame zeal for liberty, he could no longer bear the inſolence of Appius and his collegues; but, ſtanding up, called them the Tarquins and tyrants of their country. What hinders us, ſaid he from immediately executing the ſame vengeance on the new Tarquins, which our anceſtors did on the former tyrants? To reſtore liberty to Rome is an hereditary honour in the families of the Valerii and Horatii. It is not the name of king that makes a tyrant, &c. He was going on, when the decemvirs, ſurrounding him, drowned his voice with their clamours, threatening to have him thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, if he did not inſtantly hold his peace. But when they perceived, that the ſenate in general expreſſed an uncommon reſentment at their tyrannical proceedings, they repented of having impoſed ſilence upon thoſe who had a mind to ſpeak. Appius their chief, as ſoon as the tumult was appeaſed, declared to the aſſembly, that it was not the intention of the decemvirs to hinder by any violence the conſcript fathers from delivering their opinions; but that it was neceſſary to conform to the ordinary method, which was, that every one ſhould ſpeak in his turn, and confine himſelf to the matter in hand. He added, that whatever Horatius might imagine to the contrary, the commiſſion of the decemvirs was limited to no period but that of the eſtabliſhment of the laws; that they would not lay down their office till the twelve tables were ſettled in due form, and that then they would give an account of their adminiſtration. But, till that be done, continued he, we will ſteadily maintain and execute the offices of conſuls and tribunes, which are united in us. Then turning to his uncle C. Claudius, he deſired him to ſpeak his mind with freedom concerning the levies. But he, without confining himſelf to that ſubject, in a long harangue imputed all the misfortunes of the ſtate to the uſurpation ſurpation and tyranny of the decemvirs, exhorted the ſenators to inſiſt on their being depoſed, and in a very pathetic ſtrain urged his nephew to abdicate an authority, which was become intolerable to a free people. Appius diſdained to give his uncle an anſwer; But M. Cornelius, one of his collegues, ſpoke for him, and applying himſelf directly to C. Claudius, We don't want your advice, ſaid he, to direct our conduct; if you want to give particular conſels to your nephew, go to his houſe: the only affair in queſtion here is the war with the Sabines and Æqui: tell us in plain terms your opinion concerning the levies. Claudius roſe up a ſecond time, and, turning to the ſenate, ſince my nephew, ſaid he, will not condeſcend to ſpeak to me, either in his own houſe or in full ſenate, and I am ſo unhappy as to ſee the tyrant of my country ariſe out of my own family, I declare, conſcript fathers, that I am reſolved to retire to Regillus. I baniſh myſelf from Rome, and make an oath never to enter it again, but with our liberty. However, to fulfil the obligation I lie under of giving my opinion with relation to the preſent buſineſs, I am for coming to no determination concerning the levies, till conſuls are choſen to lead them. His opinion was followed by Quinctius Cincinnatus, Quinctius Capitolinus, and L. Lucretius, all conſular perſons, and by the chief men in the ſenate. When it came to L. Cornelius's turn to ſpeak, he, in a harangue, which he had concerted before-hand with his brother M. Cornelius, one of the decemvirs, imputed the enmity of the old ſenators againſt the decemvirate to envy and private reſentment, for having been themſelves diſappointed in the purſuit of that office; urged the unreaſonableneſs of loſing time in diſputes about new magiſtrates, when the enemy was almoſt at the gates of Rome, and repreſented, that it was impoſſible to come to a new election in leſs time than twenty-ſeven days, during which time the city might be beſieged and reduced to the utmoſt extremity. His ſpeech was highly applauded by the creatures of the decemvirs; and even ſome of the oldeſt ſenators were for granting levies, hoping, that when the war was finiſhed, the abdication of the decemvirs would quietly follow of courſe, and the government return naturally into the hands of the conſuls. Appius, ſeeing with great pleaſure that the majority were for granting him and his collegues a power to raiſe levies, aſked, for form ſake, the opinion of Valerius, on whom he had impoſed ſilence in in the beginning of the aſſembly. Valerius, riſing up, propoſed the creating a dictator, an expedient which had been ſo ſucceſsfully practiſed on many occaſions. All the ſenators who ſpoke after Valerius, declared for this motion, as did alſo many of thoſe who had before voted for the continuation of the decemvirate. A warm diſpute hereupon aroſe with much clamour and tumult. Appius, taking advantage of the diſorder, ſtept forth into the midſt of the aſſembly, and cried out aloud, that the ſuffrages had been gathered, and that the opinion of Cornelius had prevailed. He then ordered the decree of the ſenate, which he had brought with him ready drawn up, and which impowered the decemvirs to raiſe troops, to be read in the aſſembly, and immediately diſmiſſing the ſenators withdrew [g].

THE authority of the decemvirs being now become more formidable than ever, the moſt timorous among the citizens became as ſubmiſſive and complying as the tyrants could wiſh; others ſought an aſylum in the country, or among the neighbouring nations. Appius, enraged to ſee the beſt men in the republic abandon the city out of hatred to his government, placed guards at all the gates to prevent their eſcape. But, finding that this precaution only encreaſed the number of the malecontents, and fearing a general revolt, he removed the guard, and left every one free to retire. But to be revenged on thoſe who withdrew, he confiſcated their effects, or beſtowed them on his ruffians and partiſans. As for Valerius and Horatius, they ſtaid at Rome, and, having gathered together in their houſes a great number of their clients and friends, to ſecure them againſt the violence of the decemvirs, held private aſſemblies to concert meaſures for reſtoring liberty to the commonwealth. In the mean time, the decemvirs raiſed ten legions, the people, deſtitute of their tribunes, being forced to liſt themſelves. Q. Fabius, with two other decemvirs, Q. Petilius and M. Rabuleius, marched againſt the Sabines at the head of three legions. M. Cornelius, L. Minucius, M. Sergius, T. Antonius, and C. Duilius, all decemvirs, led five legions againſt the Æqui. Appius and Oppius remained with two legions in the city to keep in awe the domeſtic enemy, more formidable to him than the Sabines and Æqui. The people of whom the legions were compoſed, regretting ting the loſs of their liberty, would not conquer, but ſuffered the enemy to gain great advantages over them, and at laſt, feigning a ſudden fright, diſperſed in the night and returned into the Roman territory. Appius did not fail to ſend recruits and proviſions to his collegues, exhorting them to keep the ſoldiers in awe by the terror of puniſhments, or in caſe that was dangerous, to deſtroy by private ways the moſt mutinous, and he himſelf ſet them an example. The famous Sicinius Dentatus, of whom we have ſpoke above, being returned from the camp, filled the city with his complaints againſt the decemvirs, exaggerating the faults they had committed in the management of the war. Appius, to get him out of Rome, ſent for him, diſcourſed with him ſeveral times, and, deſiring him to ſpeak with freedom, examined him concerning the conduct of the decemvirs. Sicinius, without reſerve or circumſpection, blamed the proceedings of Fabius and the other generals. Appius, pretending to admire his wiſdom, prevailed upon him to go and aſſiſt Fabius with his advice; and, to deceive him the more effectually, he dignified him with the character of envoy or legate, which not only gave him the authority of a general, but made his perſon ſacred and inviolable. As true valour is a ſtranger to jealouſy and diſtruſt, the brave Sicinius willingly embraced the opportunity of ſerving his country, and repaired to the camp with all ſpeed, where the decemvirs, inſtructed by Appius, received him with outward marks of great joy, and conſulted him, ſoon after his arrival, about the operations of the campaign. Sicinius adviſed them to remove their camp into the enemy's country, for many reaſons which he laid before them. This was what Fabius wanted, and accordingly he commiſſioned him to go and view the ſituation of the country, and mark out the ground for a new encampment. He appointed him an hundred choſen men light-armed to be his guard; but this guard conſiſted only of the decemvirs ruffians, who had ſecret orders to diſpatch him. Sicinius, not ſuſpecting the leaſt treachery, led them into the narrow paſſes between the mountains, and there they took the opportunity of falling upon him when he could not make his eſcape. The brave veteran no ſooner perceived their baſe deſign, but, drawing his ſword, he ſet his back againſt a rock, that he might not be attacked behind, and, then then ſummoning all his valour, he laid fifteen of the aſſailants dead at his feet, and wounded above thirty more. The baſe aſſaſſins, not daring now to venture near him, ſtood at a diſtance and diſcharged their darts at him, which he avoiding with great dexterity, ſome of them climbing up to the top of the rock, from thence overwhelmed him with ſtones. They then went back to the camp, where they gave out, that they had been attacked by the enemy, and that Sicinius had been killed in the action. But when the ſoldiers, who marched out under arms to fetch the body of Sicinius, came to the place of the pretended battle, they obſerved, that the ſlain were all Romans, and that they lay unſtripped with their faces towards him. This made them ſuſpect that Sicinius had been murdered by his guard, and raiſed loud complaints and a general diſcontent throughout the camp. The whole army, in the greateſt fury and rage, demanded that the aſſaſſins might be brought to juſtice; but the decemvirs helped them to make their eſcape, and cauſed the body of Sicinius to be honourably interred, leſt the ſoldiers ſhould convey it to Rome, and there raiſe new diſturbances. The diſcontent, which ſo odious a treachery raiſed in the army, came to ſuch an height, that the greater part of the ſoldiers began to think in earneſt of throwing off the yoke, and reſtoring their country to its antient liberty, which they ſoon found an opportunity to effect.

Appius Claudius the decemvir, falls in love with Virginia.

APPIUS, as we have obſerved above, remained at home with a body of troops to keep the city in awe, while his collegues marched againſt the Sabines and Æqui. As he was one day going to his tribunal, he obſerved a young virgin of extraordinary beauty, and though he ſeemed dead to all ſoft paſſions, yet he was taken with her charms. It was then cuſtomary at Rome for young perſons of both ſexes to purſue ſuch ſtudies, as were proper for them, in public ſchools erected in the forum; and in one of theſe it was, that Appius firſt ſaw this beautiful young woman, and was charmed no leſs with her intent application to her book, than with her graceful mein and engaging behaviour. As his office obliged him to appear frequently in the forum, this ſevere magiſtrate and grave law-giver was obſerved to ſtop when he paſſed by the ſchool of the young virgins, and there to behold with great ſatisfaction ſome pleaſing object.

The

The perſon, who thus drew his attention, was the daughter of one L. Virginius, a man famous in the city for his probity, and in the army for his valour. Though he was a plebeian, he made a conſiderable figure in the troops, and had led ſeveral detachments in the preſent war with the Æqui, as commander in chief. His daughter's name was Virginia. Her mother Numitoria being dead, her father Virginius, upon his departure for the war, had committed her to the care of an uncle by her mother's ſide, who ſhewed for her all the affection and concern of a father. She was now marriageable; and Virginius had already promiſed her to Icilius, who had been tribune of the people, and was to marry her at the end of the campaign. But, in the mean time, the decemvir, conceiving a violent paſſion for her, reſolved at all adventures to ſatisfy it. He would willingly have married her; but he had a wife already, and though divorces were allowed by law, yet there had never been any inſtance of one. Poligamy was ſtrictly forbidden, and beſides, the decemvir himſelf had juſt paſt a law prohibiting all marriages between patricians and plebeians; ſo that he had no room to hope the accompliſhing of his wiſhes, but by the ſcandalous means of debauching the young maid; and theſe he began to purſue, by endeavouring to corrupt, with large preſents and great offers, Virginia's nurſe or governeſs. But ſhe, equally faithful and prudent, inſtead of making a private market of the beauty and charms of young Virginia, rejected his offers with the utmoſt indignation, and kept a more watchful eye over her charge than ever. The amorous tyrant, finding he could neither corrupt nor deceive the truſty and watchful nurſe, had recourſe to another ſtratagem, the execution of which he entruſted to M. Claudius, one of his clients, an infamous wretch and fit for any villainous enterprize. This miniſter of the decemvir's paſſion, taking with him a band of profligate fellows, entered the ſchool, where Virginia was, and ſeizing her by the arm, declared that ſhe was the daughter of one of his ſlaves, and therefore belonged to him. As he was carrying her to his houſe, with all the authority which the law gave to a maſter over his fugitive ſlave, the people flocked about him, and being touched with ſo moving a ſight, obliged him to ſet her at liberty. Claudius, finding he could not execute his firſt deſign, cited her to appear before the decemvir; and ſhe by the new laws was obliged to follow him to the tribunal. Appius, who was alone upon the bench, was juſt ready to adjudge her to the claimant, as his lawful ſlave, when the people, full of indignation, cried out with one voice, that Virginia's relations ought firſt to be heard. Appius, abſolute as he was, dared not refuſe to ſuſpend the ſentence, till ſome of the priſoner's relations appeared. The firſt who came was Numitorius, the uncle of the young woman, attended by a great number of his friends and relations. Upon his arrival, ſilence being made, Claudius renewed his claim, founded on a lie concerted between him and the judge; he pretended, that Virginia was born in his houſe of a ſlave belonging to him; that her mother had given her to Numitoria, the wife of Virginius, and that Numitoria had impoſed the child upon her huſband, and made Virginia paſs for his daughter. He added, that he would ſoon produce undeniable teſtimonies of what he advanced; that, in the mean time, it was but juſt, that a ſlave ſhould go with her maſter, and that he would give ſecurity to produce the young woman again in court, when Virginius, her pretended father, returned from the war. Numitorius repreſented, that it was highly unjuſt to diſpute a citizen's right to his very children, when he was not preſent to aſſert it, adding, that Virginius, who was ſerving his country in the camp, would not fail to be at Rome in two days, and that it was reaſonable her uncle, who had the care of her perſon, ſhould, in the mean time, be the guardian of her honour. This, he ſaid, was conformable to the laws, which ordained, that, during a law-ſuit and before a definitive ſentence, the plantiff ſhould not diſturb the defendant in his poſſeſſion. But this law Appius eluded, by artfully obſerving, that in the preſent diſpute there were two circumſtances, which altered the caſe. Here, ſaid he, there are two perſons claiming; one as a father, the other as a maſter; if the pretended father were preſent, he indeed ought to be allowed the poſſeſſion; but being abſent, the perſon, who claims her as his ſlave, ought to be preferred to any other, provided he gives good ſecurity to produce her again, at the return of the perſon, who is called her father. Having thus ſpoke, he ordered Virginia to be put into Claudius's hands. The iniquity of the judgment incenſed all who were preſent. The women who ſurrounded Virginia, made ſuch outcries, that they were heard at a great great diſtance. They kept her in the middle of them, and ſeemed reſolute to defend her. At that inſtant, Icilius, to whom ſhe had been promiſed in marriage, arrived, and, breaking through the croud, forced his way to the tribunal to defend his dear Virginia. A lictor endeavoured to oppoſe his paſſage, crying to him, that ſentence was already paſſed. But nothing could ſtop the enraged lover; he took Virginia in his arms, and addreſſing himſelf to Appius; No, Appius, he cried, nothing but death ſhall ſeparate me from Virginia. Add my murder to the many crimes with which thou art already polluted. Aſſemble all thy lictors, and thoſe of thy collegues too, I will defend her honour to my laſt breath. Have you deprived us of the protection of our tribunes, only to ſubject our wives and our daughters to your lewdneſs? Go on to exerciſe your rage upon our eſtates and lives; but ſpare the chaſtity of our virgins. If any attempt be made upon the honour of Virginia, I call the gods to witneſs that it ſhall not go unrevenged. What will not Virginius be able to do in the army, and Icilius among the people, when the one is to revenge the cauſe of an injured wife, and the other of a diſhonoured daughter? He was going on, when the lictors were ordered to drive him away and to ſeize Virginia. But the people, moved with his misfortune and his courage, fell upon the officers of the decemvir, diſperſed them, and obliged Claudius to take refuge under the tribunal. Appius, ſeeing the people incenſed againſt him beyond meaſure, called his client to him, whiſpered in his ear, and then, having cauſed ſilence to be made, "It is not," ſaid he, "the fury of the violent Icilius, which makes me com-"ply, but the entreaties of Claudius my client. He is "willing to give up the right he has to carry home his "ſlave, and to commit her to the ſame hands in which "ſhe was before. At his requeſt I will wait for Virginius's "return till to-morrow. Let his friends take care to give "him notice. If Virginius does not appear at the time "appointed, I would have Icilius know, that I ſhall not want any aſſiſtance from my collegues to put my decree in execution. When he had done ſpeaking, Claudius deſired, that Icilius might give ſecurity for producing Virginia the next day, which he did accordingly, all the people then preſent offering eagerly to be his ſecurity. Icilius and Numitorius immediately diſpatched, the firſt his brother, the ſecond his ſon, to bring Virginius from the camp. Appius at the ſame time ſent a courier with orders to the generals to put him under arreſt. But the other meſſengers were more expeditious; and Virginius, upon the firſt notice of his daughter's danger, had left the army, and was ſo fortunate as to eſcape two parties, which were ſent, one from the camp, and the other from the city to ſtop him. He appeared the next morning in the forum, leading his daughter in deep mourning, attended by a great number of matrons of diſtinction. He addreſſed himſelf to his fellow-citizens as he paſſed, and uttered his complaints with an air of dignity, which ſeemed rather to demand, than implore, aſſiſtance. Icilius broke into the throng, inveighed loudly againſt Appius, and endeavoured to transfuſe his own reſentment into every breaſt. But the ſilent tears of the women, who attended Virginia, affected the multitude more than any words. Appius was greatly ſurpriſed to hear that Virginius was in the forum. Full of rage, he repaired thither, and, though informed of the diſpoſition of the people, he aſcended his tribunal, being ſurrounded by a numerous croud of his dependents and creatures. Claudius ſpoke the firſt, renewed his claim, and produced the ſlave, whom he had ſuborned to declare that ſhe was the mother of Virginia, and that ſhe had ſold her to the wife of Virginius. Several other witneſſes appeared to atteſt the ſame thing, all gained with great promiſes by Appius and his client Claudius. The friends and relations of Virginia, to deſtroy this impoſture, urged the little probability of Numitoria's impoſing a child upon her huſband. He had married her, when ſhe was very young, and was almoſt of the ſame age with her. Virginia was born ſoon after their marriage. Where was the neceſſity then, ſaid they, for Numitoria's practiſing ſuch a fraud as is pretended. Beſides, if ſhe had proved barren, and had deſigned to introduce a ſtranger into her family, why ſhould ſhe have choſen the child of a ſlave, rather than of a free woman? Why a girl, when ſhe might as eaſily have had a boy? Beſides, was it probable, that a contrivance carried on by ſo many perſons ſhould continue ſo long a ſecret? Would not the ſlave have made her court to her maſter, as ſoon as Numitoria was dead, by diſcovering a ſecret to him, which would have put him in poſſeſſion of a young woman, well educated educated and of extraordinary beauty? Why was this myſtery kept undiſcovered till Appius was decemvir, ſince the ſlave for a long time paſt could have no intereſt in concealing it? To theſe preſumptions Virginius added undeniable proofs, and brought ſome of the moſt conſiderable women in Rome, who depoſed, ſome that they had ſeen Numitoria when ſhe was big with child, others, that they had aſſiſted at her labour, and ſome, that they had ſeen her ſuckle young Virginia, which ſhe could not have done, had ſhe been barren, as Claudius pretended. Appius, obſerving that theſe unanſwerable proofs made a great impreſſion upon the multitude, interrupted the evidence, and commanding ſilence, ſignified, that he himſelf had ſomething to ſay. All the people liſtened with attention, being anxious to know what he could object againſt ſo many witneſſes of unqueſtionable credit. He then ſpoke thus: "Virginius," ſaid he, "I muſt acquaint you and all who are preſent, "that this is not the firſt time I have heard of this affair. "Claudius's father revealed the ſecret to me at his death, "when he made me his ſon's guardian. Afterwards, I "examined into the matter, and found it to be true. "However, I did not think it became me to meddle in an "affair of this nature, and therefore left it to my pupil to "recover his right, or to agree with the parties concerned "when he ſhould come of age. But now that the cauſe "is brought before me in judgment, being obliged to give "ſentence, according to my own perſonal knowledge, I "declare both as judge and witneſs, that the young woman "belongs to Claudius, and my ſentence is, that ſhe be de- "livered up to him as his property." Virginius, provoked to the higheſt degree at ſo unjuſt and cruel a ſentence, was no longer maſter of himſelf. He trembled with rage, and, accompanying his words with a threatening geſture, "Infa- "mous wretch," ſaid he, "I never deſigned my daughter "for thee, I educated her for a lawful huſband, and not to "be a prey to a luſtful ravager. Muſt then brutal paſſions "among us take the place of honourable marriages! How "the citizens here will bear with theſe things I know not; "but I truſt that the army will revenge my wrongs." At theſe words the people ſet up a loud cry full of indignation, as if they were determined to oppoſe the execution of Appius's decree. But the decemvir, having firſt caſt his eyes on all ſides, to obſerve his ſtrength and how his friends were poſted, told the multitude with a threatening voice, that he was not unacquainted with the plots that had been laid to cauſe an inſurrection, but that he neither wanted power nor reſolution to inflict exemplary puniſhments on ſuch, as ſhould offer to diſturb the public peace. Let every one therefore, ſaid he, retire to his own houſe, and none preſume to give law to a ſupreme magiſtrate. As for you, Claudius, added he, ſeize your ſlave, and make uſe of my guard to diſperſe the croud. At theſe words uttered with an imperious tone, the multitude gave back, and left Virginia ſtanding by herſelf, an helpleſs prey to injuſtice. The unfortunate father, ſeeing there was no other remedy, drew near Appius, and in a ſuppliant manner addreſſed him thus: Pardon, Appius, the unguarded words, which have eſcaped me in my firſt tranſports of grief, and allow me to aſk in the young woman's preſence ſome queſtions of her nurſe, that I may carry home at leaſt the comfort of being ſet right in this matter. Appius readily granted him his requeſt, and Virginius taking his daughter in his arms, and wiping the tears in which ſhe was all bathed, drew near to ſome ſhops, which were in the forum. There he ſnatched up a butcher's knife, and turning to Virginia, "My dear daughter," ſaid he, "this is the only way to ſave thy liberty and thy honour; "go, Virginia, go to thy anceſtors, whilſt thou art yet a "free woman, pure and undefiled." With theſe words he plunged the knife into her heart, and then drawing it out again all ſmoaking with her blood, and turning to Appius; "By this blood," he cried, "I devote thy head "to the infernal gods." The decemvir immediately ordered him to be ſeized; but he with the knife in his hand made his way through the croud, got out of the city, and, mounting his horſe, took the road to the camp. In the mean time, Numitorius and Icilius, ſtaying by the dead body of Virginia, and ſhewing it to the people, raiſed a great commotion in the city. As for Appius, he ſeemed to have quite loſt his reaſon; inſtead of endeavouring to pacify the multitude, he retired to his own houſe, and from thence ſent his lictors to ſeize Icilius, and carry away the dead body. But the people oppoſed the execution of his orders, and falling upon the lictors, broke their faſces, and drove them out of the forum. Hereupon the decemvir had the boldneſs

neſs to come in perſon, attended by a choſen company of young patricians, to ſupport his authority. But Valerius and Horatius, thoſe ſworn enemies of the decemvirs, putting themſelves at the head of their friends and clients, obliged the decemvir to retire. In this perplexity, Appius haſtened to the temple of Vulcan, and there pretending to act the part of a tribune of the people, demanded that Valerius and Horatius ſhould be thrown head-long from the Tarpeian rock, as diſturbers of the public tranquillity. But his harangue was often interrupted with hiſſes; and, in the mean time, Valerius, having cauſed the body of Virginia to be carried to the top of a flight of ſteps, whence it might be ſeen by the people, was from the ſame eminence inveighing againſt Appius. So that there were two aſſemblies and two orators in different parts of the forum, declaiming againſt each other at the ſame time. But Appius's auditors ſoon left him to go to Valerius: and Appius, terrified at the deſertion of many of his creatures, privately withdrew, and, hiding his face with his robe, took refuge in a neighbouring houſe. At that juncture Oppius, the plebeian decemvir, ruſhed into the forum to defend his collegue; but finding that the party of Horatius and Valerius was by far the ſtrongeſt, he judged, that the wiſeſt method in the preſent exigence was to convene the ſenate; and this immediately quieted the multitude, for they hoped, that the decemvirate would by that means be aboliſhed. But the ſenators then in Rome being all friends to the decemvirs, only ordered the people to behave themſelves peaceably, and commiſſioned ſome young members of their body to go to the camp near mount Algidus, and prevent the ſedition which Virginius might raiſe there [h].

The decemvir obliged to retire.

He had entered the camp, attended by four hundred citizens, and holding the fatal knife in his hand. The ſoldiers at this ſtrange ſight, flocked to him from all quarters, when he, ſtanding on an eminence, with his face drowned in tears, related to them the plot laid by Appius againſt his daughter's honour and liberty, and the cruel method he had been forced to take for the preſervation of her chaſtity. The centurions and ſoldiers, full of indignation againſt Appius, aſſured him, that they were determined to ſtand by him in whatever he ſhould undertake againſt ſo wicked a tyrant. The decemvirs, who commanded the army, being informed of Virginius's ginius's return and the diſpoſition of the ſoldiers, attempted to ſeize the former, and appeaſe the latter. But the ſoldiers, refuſing to pay any obedience to the orders of men, whom they looked upon as uſurpers and tyrants, flew to their arms, ſnatched up their enſigns, and took the way to Rome which they reached about evening, and entered without making the leaſt diſturbance. They marched quietly through the city to mount Aventine, and there intrenched themſelves, declaring, that they would not lay down their arms, till the decemvirate was aboliſhed, and the tribuneſhip reſtored. Hereupon Oppius convened the ſenate, for Appius was afraid to appear in public, and the conſcript fathers agreed to ſend three of their body to the army, to aſk, why they had left the camp without their generals orders, and what their intent was in poſſeſſing themſelves of mount Aventine? As they had not yet choſen a head, they all cried out with one voice, let Valerius and Horatius be ſent to us, we will return no anſwer to the ſenate, but by them. As ſoon as the three commiſſioners were gone, Virginius adviſed the troops to chuſe chiefs to govern them, and manage for them. Agreeable to his advice, ten perſons were elected under the name of military tribunes. The army was deſirous to have Virginius at the head of them; but he declined the honour. My daughter, ſaid he, is dead, and I have not yet revenged her death. No kind of honour will become me, till her manes are appeaſed. Beſides, what prudent or moderate counſels can you expect from me, who am ſo incenſed againſt the tyrants? I ſhall be of more ſervice to the common cauſe by acting in it as a private man.

The ſoldiers revolt from their generals, and encamp on mount Aventine.

Ten military tribunes elected.

In the mean time, the three legions ſent againſt the Sabines, being ſtirred up by Numitorius and Icilius, abandoned their generals, and having, after the example of the other army, choſen themſelves ten military tribunes, marched through the city, and joined the legions on the Aventine. The two armies thus united, commiſſioned their twenty tribunes to elect two out of their number to be ſupreme over all, and the choice fell upon M. Oppius and Sextus Manilius. In the mean time, the ſenate aſſembled every day, but ſpent the whole time in debates, without coming to any reſolution. At length it was carried by a majority of voices, that Valerius and Horatius ſhould be ſent to the revolted army. But they proteſted, that they would not move a ſtep, ſo long as the decemvirs were maſters of the government. The two armies, tired out with theſe delays removed their camp to the ſacred mount, intrenched themſelves there, and obſerved obſerved the ſame good diſcipline as their anceſtors had formerly done. In this decampment they were followed by ſuch numbers of citizens, with their wives and children, that Rome was in a manner deſerted. The ſenators, ſurprized to ſee the ſtreets ſo thin of people, reſolved at length to aboliſh the decemvirate, to reſtore to the people their tribunes, and to the ſenate its conſuls. The decemvirs, finding they could not retain their authority any longer, only deſired, that they might not be ſacrificed to the hatred of their enemies, offering to reſign the power with which they were inveſted, whenever the ſenate ſhould think fit to create new conſuls. Upon this Valerius and Horatius repaired to the army, where they were received with inexpreſſible joy. Icilius, whom the army choſe for their ſpeaker, after having returned the deputies thanks for the zeal they had ſhewn all along in behalf of the people, demanded, in the name of all who had retired to the Mons ſacer, 1. The re-eſtabliſhment of the tribunes of the people, with a right of appeal to them from the deciſions of the conſuls. 2. An amneſty for all who had left the camp, without permiſſion from their generals. 3. That the decemvirs ſhould be delivered into their hands, that they might be burnt alive. But the prudent deputies made a great difference between the two firſt articles and the laſt. Your two firſt demands, ſaid they, are agreeable to reaſon; but the third is the effect of paſſion. You are offered a ſhield; do not pretend to take a ſword too. The ſenate has not yet declared you innocent, and will you already take upon you to give law to it? The people, being ſatisfied that no tribunes whatſoever could have their intereſts more at heart, than thoſe two ſenators, impowered them to make what terms for them they ſhould think fit. Horatius and Valerius returned immediately to the ſenate, and gave them an account of the demands of the people, but omitted their threats againſt the decemvirs, who hearing no mention made of their puniſhment, readily conſented to all that was aſked. Only Appius ſeemed unwilling to part with his power: "To re-eſtabliſh the tribuneſhip," ſaid he, "is only "to put arms into the hands of the enraged multitude. I "find my life muſt be ſacrificed to the public hatred. But "ſince it muſt be ſo, I will not any longer oppoſe the rage "of the populace. I am ready to reſign the decemvirate, "and care not how ſoon I do it." Accordingly, a decree was paſſed, aboliſhing the decemvirate and reſtoring the tribunes,

The ſenate reſolves to aboliſh the decemvirate,

A decree paſſes aboliſhing the decemvirate.

bunes. Then the decemvirs, repairing to the forum, there laid down their authority to the great joy of the city. When the news of their reſignation was carried to the camp, the army, leaving the ſacred mount, encamped a ſecond time on mount Aventine, and there choſe their tribunes, the pontifex maximus preſiding at the election. Virginius, Icilius, and Numitorius, were firſt named. C. Sicinius, M. Duilius, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, P. Villius, and C. Oppius, were appointed their collegues. An inter-rex was afterwards created, who held an aſſembly of the people by centuries, in which L. Valerius and M. Horatius were raiſed to the conſulate. Theſe conſuls, being both very popular, got ſeveral laws paſſed, which gave the people a ſuperiority over the ſenate. Formerly the decrees of the people, convened by tribes, obliged only the plebeians; but now it was enacted, that all decrees made in the comitia by tribes, ſhould have the force of laws with relation to all citizens. That the tribunes might be maintained in perpetual poſſeſſion of their right of judging cauſes brought before them by appeal, it was likewiſe enacted, that for the future no magiſtrates of any kind ſhould be inveſted with authority, without appeal to the aſſembly of the people, and that it ſhould be lawful for any one to kill the man, who ſhould attempt the creation of ſuch a magiſtrate. The ceremonies were likewiſe renewed, whereby the perſons of the tribunes were made ſacred. To theſe regulations another was added, viz. that the decrees of the ſenate ſhould for the future be carried to the ædiles, and kept in the temple of Ceres. This was done, leſt the ſucceeding conſuls ſhould ſuppreſs the decrees now made, and by that means render them uſeleſs.

L. Valerius and M. Horatius raiſed to the conſulate.

Appius impeached by Virginius,

THE power of the tribunes being now firmly eſtabliſhed, they reſolved to proſecute the decemvirs, and begin with Appius, who was accordingly cited to appear. Virginius, who was appointed to be his accuſer, without enumerating all his crimes, inſiſted only on his having, contrary to law, refuſed a young woman, who was in poſſeſſion of her liberty, the right of enjoying it, till the ſuit was determined. If you do not inſtantly clear yourſelf from this breach of the law, I will order you, ſaid Virginius, to be carried to priſon. Appius kept ſilence; but when the tribunes officers offered to ſeize him, he cried out, I appeal; and having enumerated the ſervices done to the republic by his family, and reminded the people of his own zeal for the common good, in promoting and compiling the body of laws contained in the twelve tables, he claimed the protection of the laws juſt made in favour of appeals. Virginius anſwered, that ſuch a monſter as Appius ought not to partake of the common benefits of ſociety, nor be allowed to eſcape impriſonment on giving ſecurity, ſince he had refuſed that privilege to Virginia. He added, that it was but reaſonable, that ſo profligate a wretch ſhould be carried to that priſon, which he himſelf had built, and inſolently named the habitation of the people of Rome. Accordingly, he was led, notwithſtanding his appeal, to priſon; but his trial was put off to the third market-day. In this interval Claudius, the uncle of Appius, who had ſo much diſapproved of his nephew's conduct, and had always been againſt the decemvirs, yet, upon hearing of the danger of Appius, haſtened to Rome, and appeared in the forum, with all his friends and relations in habits of mourning. He went from citizen to citizen, beſeeching them not to fix ſuch an ignominy on the Claudian family; but to no purpoſe; Virginius on the other hand begging them to ſhew compaſſion for him and his daughter, and not for the Claudian family, which had tyrannized over them. But, before the day appointed for the trial, Appius died in priſon. Dionyſius tells us, that the tribunes gave out he had ſtrangled himſelf; but that it was much ſuſpected he had been diſpatched by their orders. Livy barely relates, that Appius, to avoid the infamy of a public baniſhment, laid violent hands on himſelf in priſon [i].

And carried to priſon,

And dies there.

THE proſecution of Oppius, one of the plebeian decemvirs, followed next. He was accuſed by Numitorius, Virginia's uncle, as an accomplice with Appius, whoſe injuſtice in her affair he had not oppoſed, though at that time in Rome. Nor was this the only crime laid to his charge. A veteran, who had ſerved twenty-ſeven years in the army, and had been eight times honoured with military rewards, uncovering his ſhoulders, expoſed to the multitude the marks of the rods, with which he had been beaten by Oppius's orders, and offered to undergo the ſame treatment again, if the decemvir could aſſign any good good reaſon for his cruelty. The accuſed was by the unanimous ſuffrages of the people thrown into priſon, where he died the ſame day. The other eight decemvirs, terrified with theſe impriſonments, which were followed by ſudden deaths, retired into baniſhment of their own accord. Upon their flight their effects were confiſcated and ſold, and the money ariſing from them carried by the quæſtors into the public treaſury. As for M. Claudius, the client, who had been ſuborned to ſerve the pleaſures, and carry on the iniquity, of his patron, he was condemned to death. But Virginius, pitying a wretch, who had offended at the inſtigation of a powerful magiſtrate, and a ſovereign, from whom he had no appeal, changed the ſentence of death into that of perpetual baniſhment, upon his confeſſing that he had been ſuborned. After this, Duilius, one of the tribunes, adviſed his collegues to carry vengeance no farther; and accordingly a general amneſty was granted, and the ſtate enjoyed a profound tranquillity at home, the remaining part of the year.

The others retire of their own accord into baniſhment.

AFFAIRS being thus ſettled, the two conſuls took the field againſt the Æqui, Volſci, and Sabines, who, during the late inteſtine diviſions, had pillaged the Roman territory. Valerius defeated the two former, and Horatius the latter. But the ſenate, diſſatisfied with their too popular adminiſtration, and moved by a ſpeech of C. Claudius, who inveighed bitterly againſt them, refuſed them a triumph. But this oppoſition ſerved only to gain the people a new prerogative, the right of decreeing triumphs. For the conſuls applied to them, and, the tribunes eſpouſing their cauſe, Icilius declared, in the name of the people of Rome, that the conſuls ſhould, in ſpite of the ſenate, have the honour of a triumph, which was thought ſo legal a one, that it had a place in the Faſti Capitolini. The tribunes did not ſtop here, but formed a deſign of getting themſelves continued in the tribuneſhip after the expiration of their year. This was a conſpiracy not unlike that of the decemvirs; but to prevent any ſuſpicion, that their aim was to make themſelves ſole maſters of the government, they were for having the people continue Va'erius and Horatius in the conſulate. Duilius, one of their college, a man of great moderation and very zealous for the public liberty, oppoſed this project, and made it abortive, by prevailing upon the conſuls to declare publicly, that they would

would not hold the conſulate after their year was expired, though the people ſhould deſire it. After this Duilius held the aſſembly for electing tribunes and by his influence got five new ones choſen, in ſpite of the cabals of the old tribunes. However, the latter prevailed ſo far by their intrigues, as to hinder any other of the candidates from having the neceſſary number of voices. Hereupon the nomination of the five tribunes yet wanting was referred to the five actually choſen, according to the direction of a law, which expreſly provided, that 'if upon a day of election the full number of tribunes could not be choſen, thoſe 'who were elected ſhould have power to name their colleagues.' Agreeable to this law the new tribunes no ſooner entered upon their office, but they named their collegues, and among them, to the great ſurprize of all, S. Tarpeius and A. Æternius, both patricians, old ſenators, and even conſulars. Some writers are of opinion, that theſe patricians had got themſelves adopted into plebeian families; but this is a groundleſs conjecture; for Livy tells us, that the five firſt tribunes were directed by the ſenate in the choice of their collegues, whence it is more likely, that the ſenators privately joined with Duilius, who acted all along in concert with them, to get ſome of their body into the tribuneſhip, in order to counterbalance the power of the plebeian tribunes. The election of the conſuls followed that of the tribunes, when Lartius Herminius and T. Virginius were choſen without any diſturbance. In their conſulate, L. Trebonius, one of the tribunes, diſſatisfied to ſee two patricians in that college, gave himſelf entirely up to croſs the ſenate in every thing, whence he acquired the ſirname of Aſper, or 'The Crabbed.' In order to exclude patricians for the future, he got a law paſſed, which from his name was called 'Lex Trebonia,' by which it was ordained, that 'whoſoever ſhould for the future hold the comitia, 'for electing tribunes of the people, ſhould not diſmiſs the 'aſſembly, till the number of ten tribunes was completed 'by the votes of the people.' This law took from the tribunes, who were firſt choſen, the right of naming their collegues, which the Romans called Cooptatio [k].

The patricians choſen tribunes of the people.

THE following conſulate of M. Geganius and C. Julius produced nothing remarkable. But the ſucceeding conſuls, T. Quinctius, [k] Liv. l. iii. c. 65.

T. Quinctius Capitolinus, a fourth time, and Agrippa Furius, found the people highly exaſperated againſt the nobility, on account of ſome inſults they had offered the plebeians. The aggreſſors were cited to appear before the people, which occaſioned great contentions. Upon the news of theſe freſh domeſtic broils, the Æqui and Volſci entered the Roman territory, and ravaged the country to the very gates of Rome, the tribunes oppoſing the neceſſary levies to repulſe them. Hereupon the conſul Quinctius, a man illuſtrious for ſeveral victories, and greatly reſpected for the purity of his manners and the wiſdom of his counſels, having convened a general aſſembly of the people, made an harangue to them, with which they were ſo affected, that they concurred unanimouſly in taking arms. All the youth offered themſelves in crouds to be inliſted; inſomuch, that on the ſame day the levies were raiſed, and the army marched ten miles on its way. The next day, the conſuls came in ſight of the enemy, and the day following gave them battle, and gained a complete victory.

The Romans gain a complete victory over the Æqui and Volſci.

However, the conſuls, as Livy obſerves, did not demand a triumph, nor did the ſenate offer them one. He conjectures, that the conſuls were aſhamed to aſk an honour for one victory, which the fathers had refuſed to Valerius and Horatius for two. This would have been a glorious year for the republic, had not the Roman people diſhonoured themſelves by an iniquitous judgment, in a cauſe that was referred to their deciſion. The inhabitants of Ardea and Aricia choſe them arbitrators in a diſpute concerning a large tract of land, to which they both laid claim. The tribes being aſſembled and the cauſe heard, the votes were going to be taken, when one Scaptius, a Roman eighty-three years old, deſired to ſpeak. He pretended, that the diſtrict in queſtion belonged formerly to the city of Corioli, and conſequently now to the Romans, who ought therefore to make no ſcruple of ſeizing it. The conſuls uſed their utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade the people from taking a ſtep, which muſt caſt a blemiſh on the Roman probity. But all their efforts were to no purpoſe; the people, in ſpite of their remonſtrances, adjudged the territory to themſelves [1].

In the following conſulate of M. Genucius Augurinus and C. Curtius Philo, the tribunes carried their pretenſions ſions farther than ever. For they not only demanded, that the law, prohibiting patricians and plebeians to intermarry, might be repealed, but likewiſe, that plebeians might be admitted to the conſulate. Canuleius, the moſt active of the tribunes, declared to the ſenate, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that he would conſtantly oppoſe all levies of troops, let the want of them be never ſo preſſing, till theſe conceſſions were made to the people. The conſuls and patricians declared with great warmth againſt theſe new claims of the incroaching tribunes; but, the Ardeates, the Æqui, the Veientes, and the Volſci invading at the ſame time the Roman territory, the ſenate found it neceſſary to let the law concerning marriages paſs, hoping, that this conceſſion would induce the tribunes to give over entirely the purſuit of the law relating to the conſulſhip, or at leaſt to ſuſpend it till the concluſion of the war. But their hopes proved vain; for the tribunes, though the alarm from abroad daily encreaſed, ſtill oppoſed the levies, and puſhed their point with the ſame zeal as before. Nay, at the inſtigation of Canuleius, they all bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath, not to deſiſt from their enterprize, till the ſenate had granted them their demand. C. Claudius, in a private aſſembly of the oldeſt ſenators, moved to have recourſe to arms and violence; rather than yield to the people the dignity of the conſulſhip. But T. Quinctius and the majority of the aſſembly thought it better to comply, than to come to a rupture with the people. Hereupon Claudius, to prevent the debaſing of the conſular dignity, made a new propoſal, viz. that, inſtead of conſuls, a certain number of military tribunes ſhould be choſen, partly out of the ſenate and partly from among the plebeians, and that theſe new magiſtrates ſhould be inveſted with conſular power. This project being approved, the ſenate was aſſembled, and the tribunes called to it, to give their reaſons in behalf of the new laws in queſtion. After they had ſpoke, Claudius's ſcheme was propoſed, and received with great applauſe both by the patricians and plebeians. A decree was immediately paſſed for this fourth revolution in the Roman government, and the comitia were held without delay. But when the people came to vote, they refuſed to give their votes to any but patricians, ſo that only three military tribunes were choſen, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. At-

Military tribunes created with conſular power; who ſoon after abdicated.

L. Attilius, and S. Cecilius, or, as ſome ſtyle him, Clelius. But they did not long continue in office. Curtius, the late conſul, who had preſided at the election, declared three months after, that the auguries preceding it had been inauſpicious, which made their promotion void. This was probably an artful contrivance of the nobility to reſtore the antient form of government. However that be, the three new magiſtrates readily reſigned their office, and an inter-rex was named, that the commonwealth might not remain without a head. T. Quinctius the inter-rex aſſembled the people, to determine whether the conſular government ſhould be reſtored, or that of the military tribunes continued; The ſenate were for the former; the tribunes for the latter; but the people, being reſolved to confer the ſupreme dignity only on patricians, were indifferent whether it ſhould be called conſulſhip or tribuneſhip. At length all agreed to reſtore the old form of government, and L. Papirius Mugillanus and L. Sempronius Atratinus, brother to one of thoſe patricians, who had laid down the military tribuneſhip, were appointed conſuls for the remaining part of the year. Under the ſucceeding adminiſtration of T. Quinctius Capitolinus, a fifth time conſul, and M. Geganius, a ſecond time, the cenſorſhip was eſtabliſhed. There had been no cenſus for ſeventeen years, which occaſioned great diſorders. Theſe the new conſuls undertook to remedy; but, as they had many civil and military affairs on their hands, they deſired the ſenate to diſcharge them of the care of numbering the people, and to lay it upon two magiſtrates created for that purpoſe, who, with the title of cenſors, ſhould, every five years, take a general review of the whole Roman people, and an account of their effects. The ſenate approved the motion; and the tribunes, tho' always upon their guard againſt every thing offered by the ſenate, thought the employment of too little importance to oppoſe it. They did not even demand, that the plebeians ſhould be allowed a ſhare in it, not foreſeeing to what a pitch of power and grandeur the office of cenſor would in time arrive. As men generally ſtudy how to enlarge their authority, the cenſorſhip was no ſooner made a diſtinct magiſtracy, than the cenſors began to take upon them the reformation of manners, and by that means ſubject to their tribunal the ſenators and knights, as much as the meaneſt of the people. pirius and Sempronius, the conſuls of the preceding year, were the firſt cenſors, this dignity being unanimouſly conferred upon them, to make them amends for the ſhort duration of their conſulate [m].

WHILE the conſuls were thus eaſing themſelves of the burden annexed to their office, a neighbouring city found them employment enough abroad. The Ardeates, who had lately renewed their alliance with Rome, were unhappily involved in a civil war, which aroſe from a very ſlight cauſe. Two citizens of Ardea, one of a noble family, the other of a plebeian, had fallen in love with the ſame young woman. As ſhe was a plebeian, her guardians were for giving her a man of her own rank; but her mother, an ambitious woman, was fond of matching her with a man of quality. The diſpute about this marriage engaged all Ardea, the nobility declaring for one of the ſuitors, and the people for the other. At length the cauſe between the mother and the guardians was tried, and ſentence pronounced by the judges in favour of the former, who, they ſaid, had a right to diſpoſe of her child to whom ſhe pleaſed; but the latter, refuſing to ſtand to this determination, had recourſe to violence, gathered together ſome plebeians, and entering the widow's houſe, carried away her daughter. The nobility, on the other hand, taking the mother's part, ran to arms, fell upon the plebeians, and, having killed ſeveral of them, brought the young woman back to her mother's houſe. Hereupon the plebeians, leaving the city in great numbers, encamped on a neighbouring hill, and from thence ſent out parties to lay waſte the lands of the nobility. The mutineers, being joined by the Volſci, choſe themſelves a commander, named Cluilius, and laid ſiege to Ardea. In this diſtreſs the nobility applied to the Romans, and the ſenate ſent immediately an army to their relief, under the command of the conſul Geganius, who inveſted the beſiegers, obliged them to ſurrender their arms, and made them paſs under the yoke. After this, the conſul returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph, with uncommon pomp and ſolemnity [n].

A civil war among the Ardeates.

THE ſucceeding conſuls, M. Fabius and Poſthumius Ebutius, made the Ardeates ſome amends for the wrongs the

Romans had done them, on occaſion of their conteſt with the Aricians; for they ſent a colony to re-people their city, much depopulated by the civil war, and privately agreed, that no lands, except thoſe formerly in diſpute, ſhould be divided among the new colony, and even of thoſe only a ſmall part; and that the reſt ſhould be reſtored to their antient proprietors. As this was diſannulling the judgment of the people, Agrippa Menenius, F. Clælius, and M. Ebutius, who had put the decree in execution, were cited to appear before the people; but theſe three patricians, to avoid the proſecution, declared themſelves citizens of Ardea, and continued there. The following year, when the government was in the hands of C. Furius and M. Papirius, proved a year of peace. But, in the ſucceeding conſulate of Proculus Geganius and L. Menenius, great diſturbances aroſe, occaſioned by a Roman knight, named Sp. Mælius, who had the confidence to aſpire to the ſovereign power. A dreadful famine happening in Rome, the people, to prevent the evil conſequences of it, created, with the conſent of the ſenate, an extraordinary magiſtrate, with the title of Superintendant of proviſions. The perſon, they named for this office, was one L. Minucius, an active and prudent man, who immediately ſent his agents into the neighbouring countries to buy corn, but with little ſucceſs, Sp. Mælius, who was one of the richeſt men in Rome, having been before-hand with him at the markets. The corn Mælius bought was, by his order, diſtributed among the meaner people; ſo that his houſe quickly became the place of refuge for the poor, the idle, and thoſe who had undone themſelves by debauchery. Minucius, who was continued in his office under the new conſuls, T. Quinctius Capitolinus, the ſixth time, and Agrippa Menenius, found out, that Mælius, under cover of an extraordinary liberality, formed aſſemblies at his houſe, and that great quantities of arms had been conveyed thither by night. Upon this intelligence, he enquired further into the matter, and at length diſcovered, that a conſpiracy was formed to ſubvert the preſent government; that Mælius aſpired to the ſovereign power; that the people were to take arms in his favour and that even ſome of the tribunes had conſented to ſell the public liberty. Minucius, without loſs of time, gave an account of his diſcoveries to the ſenate; and the ſenate following the advice of Quinctius Capitolinus, impowered him to name his brother Quinctius Cincinnatus dictator. It was thought neceſſary to take this ſtep in ſo critical a juncture to prevent Mælius from escaping the punishment due to his wicked attempt. He might have appealed from the consuls to the people, who, as they were entirely devoted to him, would have saved him; but from the dictator there was no appeal. Cincinnatus, being then past fourscore, would have declined the office; but, the consuls and the whole senate insisting upon his charging himself with the care of the commonwealth, he at length acquiesced, and named Servilius Ahala to be his general of the horse, and the next day placed guards in all the quarters of the city. This precaution surprized those who knew nothing of the conspiracy; but Mælius and his associates being well apprised, that the power of the supreme magistrate was wholly bent against them, used their utmost endeavours to engage the multitude in their favour. Hereupon the dictator, having caused his tribunal to be carried into the forum, sent his master of the horse to cite Mælius to appear before him. Mælius, instead of obeying the summons, attempted to make his escape. Whereupon Servilius commanded a lictor to seize him; and his orders were put in execution: but the multitude having rescued him out of the lictor's hands, he was very near making his escape, when Servilius, throwing himself into the croud, overtook him, and killed him on the spot. This action pleased the dictator, who, on seeing his master of the horse all sprinkled with the blood of the criminal, told him, that to him Rome was indebted for her liberty. He then convened a general assembly of the people, and, having acquainted them with the conspiracy, declared, that Mælius had been justly slain. His house was, by the dictator's orders, razed to the ground, and the prodigious quantity of corn found in it, sold to the people at low rates. As for Minucius, a statue was erected to him without the gate Trigemina, as a reward of his vigilance; but three of the tribunes, provoked at the murder of Mælius, made loud complaints in the assembly of the people, and obstinately opposed the election of the consuls; insomuch, that the patricians, to avoid a tumult, was forced to consent, that military tribunes should be chosen for the next year. The tribunes hoped, that the people would now divide the government between the patricians and the plebeians; but they chose only three patricians, viz. Mamercus Æmilius, L. Quinctius, the son of the dictator, and Julius Julus [o]. During their administration, the city of Fidenæ not only revolted from Rome,

Rome, but, putting themſelves under the protection of Tolumnius king of the Veientes, murdered four embaſſadors ſent by the ſenate to aſk the reaſon of their conduct. As a war was unavoidable, it was thought more proper to chuſe conſuls than military tribunes for the next year; and accordingly M. Geganius, a third time, and L. Sergius were elected. It fell to the latter to make war upon the Veientes; but, though he gained ſome advantages over them, he loſt a great number of men; which determined the ſenate to remove him from the command of the army, and to create a dictator in his room. The conſuls named Mamercus Æmilius for that dignity, who choſe young Quinctius Cincinnatus for his general of the horſe, and appointed Quinctius Capitolinus and M. Fabius Vibulanus, two great commanders, his lieutenant generals. He ſoon after took the field, came to an engagement with the united forces of the Faliſci, Fidenates, and Veientes, and gave them a total overthrow. Tolumnius himſelf was ſlain in the battle by Cornelius Coſſus, a legionary tribune, who ſtripped him of his armour and royal robes, and carried theſe ſpoils, called ſpolia opima, on his ſhoulders in the dictator's triumph. When the triumph was over, he depoſited them in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, they being the ſecond of the ſort known in Rome. In the following conſulate of M. Cornelius and L. Papirius, one Sp. Mælius, a tribune of the people, and a near relation of the famous Mælius, cited Minucius and Servilius Ahala to anſwer for his death. Some hiſtorians tell us, that theſe proſecutions ſerved only to bring the tribune into contempt; but the greater part ſay, that Servilius was condemned to baniſhment, and afterwards recalled. As for Minucius, we do not find any puniſhment inflicted upon him.

Mamercus Æmilius dictator.

The ſecond ſpolia opima.

THE Veientes and Fidenates renewed the war, in the following conſulate of Julius Julus, the ſecond time, and L. Virginius, while the Romans were greatly diſtreſſed by a plague; but Q. Servilius Priſcus, being created dictator, gave them battle near Nomentum, routed them, and took the city of Fidenæ. This ſucceſs was followed by a cenſus of the Roman people, which, after the eſtabliſhment of the cenſors, never failed to be renewed every five years. The following year Mamercus Æmilius was named to the dictatorſhip a ſecond time, upon a report, that all Hetruria was preparing for war; but theſe fears proving vain, Æmilius, who had no hopes of gaining glory abroad, reſolved to do ſomething remarkable at home, and propoſed to the people the ſhortening the duration of the cenſorſhip, and reducing it from five years to eighteen months. This motion was received with applauſe, and paſſed into a law. Then Æmilius, to ſhew the diſlike he had to magiſtracies of long continuance, reſigned his own, and retired to his houſe, amidſt the loud acclamations of the multitude. However, this wiſe law coſt him dear; the cenſors, who were the inſpectors of the manners of the people, ſtruck him out of the roll of his tribe, took from him the privilege of voting, deprived him of all the rights of a Roman citizen, and loaded him with a tribute eight times greater than he uſed to pay; but this perſecution gave him a new luſtre, and ſtirred up the people againſt his perſecutors, Furius and Geganius, to ſuch a degree, that they would have tore them in pieces, if Æmilius had not been ſo generous, as to uſe his intereſt with the multitude to ſave them. The tribunes of the people, by renewing their ordinary harangues againſt the electing of conſuls, prevailed to have military tribunes choſen for the next year. However, the people raiſed to that dignity only three patricians, M. Fabius, M. Fauſtius, and L. Sergius. Nothing memorable happened during their adminiſtration, but a plague, which ceaſed in the following year, when the republic was again governed by three military tribunes, all patricians, viz. L. Pinarius, L. Furius, and Sp. Poſthumius. Hereupon the rich plebeians complained of the poorer ſort, for not chuſing any but patricians to that magiſtracy, notwithſtanding the law which allowed three plebeians to be elected. They met at the houſes of the tribunes of the people to conſult upon this matter, and there reſolved to propoſe a law, forbidding any pretenders to the ſuperior offices to go about, in garments of an extraordinary whiteneſs, to ſollicit the votes of the people. It was cuſtomary for thoſe, who aſpired to any office, to ſhew themſelves to the people on market-days, in a habit of an extraordinary whiteneſs, and, in that dreſs, to court the meaneſt of the citizens, to call them by their names, to ſhake hands with them, &c. From this habit they were called candidati, or candidates, a word derived from the Latin candidus, ſignifying white. As this way of canvaſſing for offices was uſed only by the nobility, the principal plebeians undertook the aboliſhing of ſuch a cuſtom, hoping thereby to put an end to the various arts uſed by the patricians to gain the favour of the people. The law prohibiting the uſe of white garments paſſed, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the patricians, who, ſeeing the people highly incenſed againſt the nobility, began to fear, that they would no longer refuſe their voices to the chief plebeians for the military tribuneſhip; wherefore, to avert this danger, they turned their thoughts on getting conſuls choſen for the next year, the formidable preparations which the Æqui and Volſci were making at this time for war favouring their deſign. As no plebeians had ever commanded armies, the people were quite indifferent, whether conſuls or military tribunes were choſen; for they were determined to give their ſuffrages to none but old captains, and conſequently to patricians. Thus the election being left to the ſenate, the conſulſhip was reſtored, and T. Quinctius, the ſon of Lucius, and C. Julius Mento were promoted to that dignity. They were both officers of great experience and courage; but a miſunderſtanding ariſing between them, they were defeated by the enemy near mount Algidus. Hereupon the ſenate thought it neceſſary to name a dictator; but the conſuls obſtinately refuſing to comply with their deſire in this particular, as being piqued at the diffidence they ſhewed of their abilities, the ſenators had recourſe to the tribunes of the people, exhorting them to interpoſe their authority, and oblige the conſuls to name a dictator. The tribunes, who were then in the ſenate, charmed with a motion which tended to encreaſe their authority, having withdrawn a while to conſult, returned with this declaration, that it was the pleaſure of the tribunes, that the conſuls ſhould obey the ſenate, or be led to priſon, if they perſiſted in their diſobedience. Hereupon the conſuls ſubmitted; but juſtly reproached the ſenators with betraying the inteſts of their own body, and ſubjecting the conſular authority to the tribunitian power. Another difficulty ſtill remained: the conſuls could not agree about the perſon who ſhould be dictator; ſo that they were obliged to draw lots for the privilege of nominating. It fell to Quinctius, and he named his father-in-law Poſthumius Tubertus, who appointed L. Julius Vopiſcus to be his general of the horſe. Poſthumius Tubertus dictator defeats the Æqui and Volſci.

THE next year, when C. Papirius and L. Julius Vopiſcus were conſuls, the Æqui deſired to enter into an alliance with the Romans, on the ſame foot with the Latins and Hernici; but all they could obtain was a truce for eight years. Nothing remarkable happened at Rome during the preſent conſulſhip, but the making a law to ſettle the value of oxen and ſheep paid by way of fines for diſobedience to magiſtrates. The fines were ordered to be paid in money for the future, each ox being valued at an hundred aſſes of braſs, and each ſheep at ten. The tribunes were the firſt projectors of this new law; but the conſuls, having notice of their deſign, propoſed the new regulation themſelves, and by that means gained the favour of the people. The next year the republic enjoyed a profound peace, under the adminiſtration of L. Sergius, a ſecond time conſul, and Hoſtus Lucretius, which was not diſturbed even by the tribunes. The next year, when T. Quinctius, a ſecond time, and Cornelius Coſſus were raiſed to the conſulate, was remarkable for nothing but an extraordinary drought, which occaſioned a famine, that was followed by a dreadful plague. On this occaſion the Romans had recourſe to deities unknown, and introduced new ſuperſtitions; but the ſenate, appriſed of the danger of innovations in religion, ordered the ædiles to take care, that no gods were worſhipped, but thoſe of the country; and by this means a ſtop was put to all foreign ſuperſtitions. The Veientes had obtained a truce for eight years, after their defeat near Nomentum, as we have related above; but, before the time was expired, had ravaged the lands of the republic. The ſenate, therefore, in the conſulate of L. Papirius, a ſecond time, and Servilius Ahala, reſolved to puniſh them; but, a diſpute ariſing between the people and the ſenate concerning the right of declaring war, thoſe enemies of the republic eſcaped vengeance this year. The next, the tribunes inſiſted upon having the government placed in the hands of military tribunes; and accordingly four patricians were choſen, T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, C. Furius, M. Poſthumius, and A. Cornelius Coſſus. The latter ſtaid at Rome, and the other three marched againſt the Veientes; but, as they did not act in concert, they were routed, and obliged obliged to keep within their camp. The people, upon the news of their defeat, inſiſted upon their being depoſed, and a dictator appointed in their room; but, as there were then no conſuls, whoſe prerogative it was to nominate a dictator, recourſe was had to the augurs, who declared, that Coſſus, who had had no ſhare in the late ſhameful diſaſter, might nominate a dictator. Accordingly he named Mamercus Æmilius, who had been in the ſame poſt twice before, and whom the cenſors had degraded. The new dictator appointed Coſſus his general of the horſe, and ſoon after took the field againſt the Veientes, whom the Fidenates had joined, after having maſſacred the Roman colony in their city. The dictator, coming up with them near the city of Fidenæ, gained a complete victory over their united forces, and made himſelf maſter both of the city of Fidenæ and of the camp of the Veientes. We are told, that the left wing of the Roman army was at firſt greatly terrified, and put into confuſion by the enemy's new manner of fighting; for the Fidenates, having all on a ſudden opened one of the gates of their city, ſent out ſome ſoldiers, with lighted torches in their hands and dreſſed like furies. Theſe, running through the Roman battalions, and threatening them with fire and ſword at the ſame time, occaſioned no ſmall diſorder; but the dictator upbraiding his men with cowardice, "What," ſaid he, "are you as "much afraid of ſmoke, as a ſwarm of bees? Make uſe "of your ſwords to wreſt the torches out of the enemies "hands, and then go and ſet fire to their city with them." Theſe words inſpired the Romans with new courage; and Coſſus falling upon the enemy at the ſame time with his cavalry, the latter were entirely defeated. This glorious expedition being finiſhed in ſixteen days, Æmilius led back his troops to Rome, had the honours of a triumph, and then laid down his employment [q].

The Veientes and Fidenates defeated by Mamercus Æmilius dictator.

NOTWITHSTANDING the ill conduct of the laſt military tribunes, the tribunes of the people prevailed ſo far, as to have the ſame government continued the two following years; but had ſtill the mortification to ſee patricians only elected. Theſe were, the firſt year, A. Sempronius, L. Furius, L. Quinctius, and L. Horatius; the ſecond, Ap. Claudius, Sp. Nautius, L. Sergius, and Sex. Julus. The tribunes of the people uſed their utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade them from this preference of the patricians to them in the elections. The richeſt and moſt eminent men among the

the plebeians gave out, that if they could once be choſen, they would not fail to get the public lands divided among the poor citizens. This made no ſmall impreſſion upon the multitude; but the patricians, who were then in poſſeſſion of the military tribuneſhip, to avoid the ſhame of having plebeians for their ſucceſſors, agreed among themſelves to lead out of Rome thoſe who aſpired to that dignity, under pretence of making an incurſion into the territory of the Volſci. In their abſence, Appius Claudius, ſon of the decemvir, and one of the military tribunes, held an aſſembly for electing conſuls, when C. Sempronius Atratinus and C. Fabius Vibulanus were choſen. They had ſcarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome, that the Volſci had taken the field with a very numerous army, and were advancing towards the frontiers, with a deſign to lay waſte the lands of the republic. The conſul Sempronius, a man of greater courage than conduct, was ſent againſt them; but he, deſpiſing an enemy whom the Romans had ſo often vanquiſhed, and attacking them with the infantry alone, was ſurrounded on all ſides, and would have been cut off with all his men, if one Tempanius, an old officer of the horſe, had not taken upon him the command of the cavalry. This brave officer, obſerving the danger the legions were in, leaped from his horſe, and addreſſing himſelf to his companions, "Follow my lance," ſaid he, "as if it were a ſtandard, "and let us ſhew the enemy, that we can fight on foot "as well as on horſe-back." At theſe words the whole body of horſe diſmounted, and, following their leader, fell upon the enemy with incredible fury. The general of the Volſci ordered his men to retire in good order to a neighbouring hill; but Tempanius, after having reſcued the legions from the danger they were in, continued to preſs the enemy with ſuch vigor, that they could no longer withſtand him. Then the Volſcian commander, who was a man of great experience in war, ſent orders to his troops to open their ranks, and give paſſage to the troops Tempanius led, and then to cloſe again, in order to ſeparate them from the reſt of the Roman army. His orders were obeyed, and Tempanius, ruſhing ſtill forwards, found himſelf at laſt cut off from the Roman main body. He did his utmoſt to force his way through the enemy's ranks; but not being able to break their order, he retired to an eminence, and there drawing up his men in a circle, defended himſelf with with incredible bravery, till night coming on put an end to the conflict. The brave Roman did not doubt but the enemy would renew the attack as ſoon as the darkneſs was diſpelled, and therefore encouraged his men to behave like Romans, and, ſince they muſt periſh, to ſell their lives dear; but he was much ſurprized, when at day-break he ſaw neither friends nor enemies. He could not imagine what was become of the two great armies, which, a few hours before, had covered the plain. He went down with a few of his men to take a view, firſt of the Volſcian, and afterwards of the Roman, camp. Not a man was to be ſeen in either, except ſuch of the wounded as had not been able to follow the main body of their reſpective armies. Both the Romans and Volſcians had fought till night, and being equally afraid to renew the fight the next morning, had quitted their camps, leaving many of their wounded, and a great part of their baggage, behind them, and retired to the neareſt mountains. Tempanius, not knowing to what place the conſul was retired with his troops, took up the wounded Romans and marched ſtrait to Rome, where he found the people actually aſſembled. Some runaways, having got to the city before him, had given out, that the conſul was defeated, and the whole body of cavalry cut in pieces. The tribunes of the people, thinking this to be a favourable opportunity of humbling a conſul, obliged Tempanius to appear in the aſſembly, before he ſet foot in his own houſe, and aſked him aloud ſeveral queſtions concerning the conduct of Sempronius. Tempanius anſwered, That it did not become a private officer to judge of the capacity and behaviour of his general; that he had ſeen him fight at the head of his legions with great bravery; and that, by what appeared to him upon a view of the field of battle, he could aſſure them, that the Volſci had loſt at leaſt as many men as the Romans. Notwithſtanding this favourable teſtimony of Tempanius, L. Hortenſius, one of the tribunes of the people, cited Sempronius, as ſoon as the year of his conſulate was expired, to anſwer for his conduct in the late battle; but when he appeared upon his trial, Tempanius, who had been choſen tribune of the people, with three other officers of the horſe, in reward of their ſervices, generouſly made themſelves his advocates, and aſked their collegue, why he proſecuted a brave general, whom he could reproach with nothing but bad fortune? "Sempronius," ſaid they, "was our general and our fa-accuſation[r]. Sempronius and his collegue Fabius had been ſucceeded by military tribunes, L. Manlius, Q. Antonius, L. Papirius, and L. Servilius; but this year Rome, having ſuch moderate tribunes of the people, returned to her antient form of government, and choſe, without any diſturbance, T. Quinctius Capitolinus, ſon of the famous Quinctius Capitolinus, and Numerius Fabius, conſuls.

The accuſation is dropped.

THE peace, which continued this year, gave the new tribunes an opportunity of raiſing diſturbances about the quæſtorſhip. Hitherto there had been only two quæſtors, and thoſe choſen annually from among the patricians. Their office was to collect the taxes, defray the expences of the war, and to keep exact accounts of the receipts and diſburſements of the public money, for which they were accountable. To this time they had never ſtirred out of Rome; the conſuls therefore propoſed, that two new quæſtors ſhould be added, to attend the generals in the field, take an account of the ſpoils, ſell the booty, and, above all, provide for the ſubſiſtence of the army. This motion was received with great applauſe both by the ſenate and people; but, when it came to be paſſed into a law, the tribunes demanded that two of thoſe magiſtrates ſhould always indiſpenſably be plebeians. The ſenate was willing, that, in the election of quæſtors, as in that of military tribunes, the people ſhould, if they thought fit, chuſe as many plebeians as patricians; but the tribunes obſtinately requiring, that the people ſhould not be left at liberty to chuſe plebeians or patricians, the ſenate thought it adviſeable, rather than ſubmit to this, to drop the motion. The tribunes, by way of revenge, proteſted againſt holding the comitia for electing conſuls, and inſiſted on having military tribunes for the next year. The obſtinacy of the two parties threw the republic into a kind of anarchy, the tribunes oppoſing even the ſenate's meeting to name an inter-rex. After warm diſputes, the tribunes agreed to the naming of an inter-rex; and the ſenate choſe for that office L. Papirius

Papirius Mugellanus, who, by expoſtulations and ſoft perſuaſions, brought the contending parties to this compromiſe, that the ſenate ſhould ſuffer the people to chuſe military tribunes inſtead of conſuls; and that the tribunes of the people ſhould allow the tribes to beſtow the quæſtorſhip on patricians or plebeians, as they thought fit. Notwithſtanding all the cabals and ſeditious harangues of the tribunes of the people, not only the military tribunes, but the quæſtors too, were choſen out of the patricians only, though one of the tribunes had propoſed his brother, and the other his ſon. The tribunes, enraged at this preference, were for accuſing A. Sempronius, who had preſided at the election, of ſome unfair dealing in taking the votes; but, as he was a man of known probity, and then one of the military tribunes, they turned all their fury againſt C. Sempronius his couſin-german, who had not been acquitted on his former trial, tho' the proſecution had been dropped at the requeſt of Tempanius. He was again cited to appear at the end of twenty-ſeven days, during which time he conſtantly attended the ſenate, and zealouſly oppoſed the requeſt of the tribunes concerning the diſtribution of lands. With the ſame ſteadineſs he behaved on his tryal, and pleaded his cauſe with great eloquence. But, notwithſtanding all the ſolicitations of the ſenate in his favour, and the favourable teſtimonies of many officers, who had ſerved under him, he was fined fifteen thouſand aſſes of braſs. Soon after a veſtal, who, by her levity and too free airs, had brought herſelf under a ſuſpicion of incontinency, was tried before the pontifices and acquitted; but the pontifex maximus admoniſhed her to be more reſerved for the future. In the following military tribuneſhip of Agrippa Menenius, Sp. Nautius, P. Lucretius, and C. Servilius, a plot was formed by the ſlaves to ſet fire to the city and ſeize the capitol; but the ſecret being diſcovered by ſome of the conſpirators, the evil conſequences of it were prevented. The next year, when the republic was governed by three military tribunes only, M. Papirius, C. Servilius, and L. Sergius, Labicum, a city of Latium about fifteen miles diſtance from Rome, revolted, and entered into an alliance with the Æqui, who, after having pillaged the territory of Tuſculum, encamped at the foot of mount Algidus. Hereupon two of the military tribunes were ordered to take the field, and the third to remain in Rome; but each of the three, thinking himſelf the moſt capable of commanding the

the army, deſpiſed the leſs glorious employment of governing the city. The ſenate was highly offended to ſee three magiſtrates, whoſe duty it was to take care of the intereſt of the public, ſacrifice it to their private ambition; but no one of that body had weight enough to put an end to the diſpute. At length Q. Servilius, who had been formerly dictator, interpoſing his paternal authority, commanded his ſon C. Servilius to ſtay at home; and Caius, tho' very deſirous of commanding the army, and raiſed above his father by the office he then bore in the republic, obeyed, without ſhewing the leaſt reluctance, and remained in Rome. But the two generals agreeing no better in the field than they had done in the city, the army under their command was drawn into an ambuſh, and entirely defeated. Hereupon the ſenate ordered a dictator to be created; and young Servilius nominated his father, who appointed him his general of the horſe. The father and ſon, leaving Rome at the head of a new army, encamped within two miles of the enemy, and, a few days after, attacked them, put their army to flight, took Labicum, their place of refuge, by ſtorm, and returning to Rome eight days after he had left it, laid down his office. The republic enjoyed a profound peace both at home and abroad under the ſucceeding military tribunes, P. Lucretius, L. Servilius, Agrippa Menenius, and Sp. Veturius. But the next year, when A. Sempronius, M. Papirius, Q. Fabius, and Sp. Nautius governed the republic, the tribunes of the people revived the old quarrel about the diſtribution of lands. Sp. Mæcilius, and Sp. Metilius, who were at the head of the factions, pretended, that the patricians had uſurped the lands they enjoyed, and therefore propoſed a new diviſion of them between the nobility and the plebeians. The ſenate met frequently to concert meaſures for defeating this propoſal; Appius Claudius propoſed gaining over ſome of the college of the tribunes, as the only remedy againſt their tyranny. His advice was received with great applauſe, and put in execution with ſucceſs; for the fathers applying themſelves to the tribunes, by entreaties and remonſtrances, won over ſix of the ten to oppoſe the promulgation of the law; ſo that Mæcilius and Metilius were obliged to drop their petition. The ſame good underſtanding was maintained the next year between the ſenate and ſome of the tribunes, when Cornelius Coſſus, Quinctius Cincinnatus, Valerius Voluſus, and Fabius Vibulanus were military tribunes. But in the military tri-buneſhip of Q. Fabius, Cn. Cornelius, P. Poſthumius, and L. Valerius, the affair of the Agrarian law was revived. The Æqui having retaken Bola, a little town which the Romans had lately ſeized, P. Poſthumius, one of the military tribunes, was ſent with an army to recover it. After ſome ſkirmiſhes with the enemy in the field, he ſat down before the place, and, to encourage his men, promiſed to diſtribute the plunder among them, if they took the town. The place was ſoon after carried by aſſault; but the general, who hated the plebeians, of whom the greateſt part of his army conſiſted, breaking his word, put all the ſpoil into the hands of the quæſtors, and thereby alienated the hearts of the army from him. In the mean time Sextius, one of the tribunes of the people, having brought on anew the affair of the Agrarian law, Poſthumius was ſent for to Rome, to aſſiſt his collegues in oppoſing the tribunes. As he was an obſtinate wrong-headed man, on his arrival, he let many inconſiderate expreſſions drop in the preſence of the curiæ. One day Sextius having propoſed a decree for dividing the city of Bola and its territory, among the ſoldiers then in the field, who had made that conqueſt, Poſthumius, in a violent paſſion, cried out, Wo be to my men, if any ſuch thing be done. Sextius, perceiving by this the haſty temper of the general, took pleaſure in exaſperating him, and making him ſay many things offenſive to the people and ſoldiers. Then the crafty tribune, turning to the people, upbraided them for thinking ſuch a brute more worthy of the military tribuneſhip than their own tribunes, whoſe whole buſineſs was to procure them lands, houſes, and a comfortable retreat in their old age. His artful diſcourſe much leſſened the partiality of the people for the nobility in the elections; but when the threats of Poſthumius were related in the camp, the ſoldiers began to mutiny; and becauſe P. Seſtius, one of the quæſtors, ordered a lictor to ſeize a ſoldier, who was more mutinous than the reſt, his companions not only reſcued him, but one of them wounded the quæſtor with a ſtone. Poſthumius, informed of this tumult, haſtened to the camp; but, inſtead of appeaſing the ſedition, encreaſed it by his unſeaſonable ſeverity. He commanded the moſt guilty of the mutineers to be thrown into a ſhallow water, to be there covered with hurdles, and then preſſed to death, by heaping ſtones upon them. As this was a ſlow kind of death, which made the criminals cry out in an affecting manner, the ſoldiers flocked about about them, and rescued them out of the hands of the executioners. Hereupon the general, in a transport of rage, came down from his tribunal, broke through the crowd, and being attended by his lictors endeavoured to disperse the multitude; but the soldiers forgetting their duty, opposed force with force, and, being worked up to fury, threw stones at their general, and killed him on the spot. This was the first instance of a commander killed by his troops from the foundation of Rome [s].

And killed their general

THE senate, fearing lest the people, in order to screen the murderers, should chuse military tribunes for the next year out of the plebeians, used their utmost endeavours to get consuls elected, and, after warm debates, prevailed. A. Cornelius Cossus and L. Furius Medullinus were raised to that dignity. As they were both men of great prudence and moderation, they were unanimously named, by the senate, people, and army, to prosecute the soldiers who had murdered their general; which they did with such circumspection, for fear of driving the army to an open revolt, that those few who died, fell by their own hands, and not by the axes of the lictors. Nothing remarkable, except a plague and famine, happened in the three following consulates of Q. Fabius and C. Furius, of M. Papirius and C. Nautius, and of M. Æmilius and C. Valerius. But in the consulate of Cn. Cornelius and L. Furius, a second time, the tribunes of the people, especially three of the Icilian family, who were more active than the rest, prevailed upon the people to make use of the liberty allowed them by the laws, and to chuse three plebeians into the quæstorship. The Icilii having carried this point, encouraged the plebeians to oppose the election of consuls, hoping, that some of their body might be raised to the military tribuneship, as they had been to the quæstorship. The disputes on this head grew warm, when news was brought, that the Æqui and Volsci were again in motion, and had retaken Carventum. It was therefore necessary to raise forces, in order to stop their further progress; but the tribunes obstinately opposed the levies, till the senate consented to the election of military tribunes; but, to disappoint the Icilii, they added this clause to their decree, that none of the tribunes of the people should either be chosen military military tribunes, or continued in their office the next year. As the tribunes could not object to this, without diſcovering their ambition, troops were raiſed without oppoſition; and tho' Carventum was not recovered, the city of Verrugo was taken from the Volſci, and ſome other advantages gained over them. In the mean time, the election of the military tribunes coming on, the patricians engaged ſome plebeians of no merit or weight to ſtand candidates. The plebeians, diſguſted with their meanneſs, and aſhamed to ſee them ſtand in competition with ſenators and conſulars of the firſt rank, gave all their ſuffrages to the nobles, and choſe three patricians, C. Julius Julus, P. Cornelius Coſſus, and C. Servilius Ahala. During their adminiſtration, the Volſci renewed the war, and having engaged ſome of the new allies of the republic to join them, encamped near Antium. The ſenate, apprehending the republic to be in great danger, ordered a dictator to be nominated; but as the three military tribunes had already drawn lots for the command of the army, which had fallen to Julius and Cornelius, thoſe two generals, offended at the diſtruſt the fathers had ſhewed of their conduct, refuſed to name a dictator. Hereupon the ſenate complained to the tribunes of the people. as they had done before upon the like occaſion, and deſired them to interpoſe their authority: but they gave them a ſcornful anſwer; Who are we, ſaid they, but contemptible plebeians, ſcarce to be reckoned in the number of men, much leſs of Roman citizens? When the honours and dignities of the republic ſhall be made common to us with the patricians, we ſhall take care that no proud magiſtrate diſobeys the decrees of the ſenate. Till then you muſt expect nothing from us, but do your own buſineſs the beſt you can. This refuſal greatly perplexed the ſenate; but at length C. Servilius, the third military tribune, extricated them out of the preſent difficulty, by taking upon him to act alone and to name a dictator. The perſon he raiſed to that high ſtation was P. Cornelius Rutilus, who appointed him to be general of the horſe. The dictator took the field, gained a complete victory over the Volſci, and returning to Rome laid down his office. Upon his reſignation, the military tribunes reſumed the functions of their employment, and to be revenged on the ſenate for the treatment they had met with, without conſulting the fathers, ordered the centuries to aſſemble for the election of military tribunes againſt the enſuing year. The patricians, alarmed at this ſtep, had recourſe to a new artifice, to prevent the government from falling into the hands of the plebeians. They obliged the moſt illuſtrious members of their own body to ſtand candidates; ſo that, notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of the tribunes, four patricians of diſtinguiſhed merit were choſen, viz. C. Valerius, C. Servilius, Lucius Furius, and Fabius Vibulanus [t].

THE truce with the Veientes being at this time ended, the Romans ſent feciales to demand ſatisfaction for the injuries they had formerly done the republic; but the feciales meeting on the road envoys from Veii, at their requeſt proceeded no farther. Theſe envoys, being admitted into the ſenate, repreſented, that their city, being at preſent diſturbed by domeſtic broils, was not in a condition to give the Romans ſatisfaction. Theſe diſſenſions gave the Romans a favourable opportunity of falling upon their old enemies; but they had too much generoſity, as Livy obſerves, to take advantage of the misfortunes of a rival ſtate, and therefore did not diſturb them this year. The Volſci retook Verrugo from the Romans the ſame year, and put the garriſon to the ſword; but the military tribunes having ſurprized the Volſci, while they were diſperſed about the country in queſt of booty, cut them all to pieces. In the following tribuneſhip of C. Cornelius, L. Valerius, Cn. Cornelius, and Fabius Ambuſtus, all patricians, the Veientes having inſulted the Roman embaſſadors and driven them out of their city with contempt, the ſenate ordered a declaration of war againſt them to be immediately propoſed to the people; but the tribunes oppoſed the levies, making the old affair of the Agrarian law their pretence. However, it was agreed, that three of the military tribunes ſhould lead an army againſt the Volſci, who, at the approach of the legions, betook themſelves to flight, and left the country open to be pillaged. Hereupon the Roman generals, having divided their army into three bodies, made incurſions into it on three different ſides. Fabius laid ſiege to Anxur, and having taken it by ſtorm, divided the ſpoil equally among the ſoldiers of all the three armies. This piece of generoſity paved the way for a reconciliation between the nobility and the people, which was entirely completed by a decree of the ſenate, that for the future the Roman infantry ſhould be maintained in the field at the public expence. Hitherto all the citizens had been obliged to ſerve in war at their own coſt and charges, which was an exorbitant burden on the poorer plebeians, and frequently ruined their families. The ſenate therefore, pitying their condition, and reflecting on the many diſorders which were occaſioned by their refuſing to liſt themſelves, even for the moſt neceſſary wars, of their own accord decreed, that the foot ſhould have pay out of the public money; and that, to furniſh this expence, a new tax ſhould be raiſed, from which no citizen whatſoever ſhould be exempt. What pay was given at this time to each ſoldier, we find no-where recorded; but in Polybius's time, that is, in the time of the ſecond Carthaginian war, each foot-ſoldier was allowed two oboli a day, a centurion double that pay, and an horſeman treble. Two oboli were about the third part of an Attic drachma, which was worth ſeven pence three farthings of our money [u]. Upon the firſt news of this decree, the people, tranſported with joy, ran in crowds from all parts to the ſenate-houſe, and kiſſing the ſenators hands, called them the true fathers of the people, proteſting at the ſame time, that they would ſpill the laſt drop of their blood for their country, which they now looked upon as a tender mother; but the tribunes of the people, not liking this union of the two orders, which hindered them from making a figure in the ſtate, endeavoured to leſſen the value of the favour. They inſinuated to the people, that this pay was to come out of their own pockets; that it was not juſt to make thoſe citizens, who had completed the time of their ſervice at their own charge, contribute to the ſupport of the new ſoldiers; that they would protect all thoſe who ſhould refuſe to pay the tax, &c. However, as the ſenators began by laying great ſums on themſelves, which they paid readily, according to the real value of their eſtates, the common people followed their example, without ſhewing the leaſt uneaſineſs [w].

The Roman infantry begin to receive pay.

And now the ſenate, finding themſelves in a condition to maintain an army abroad, as long as they pleaſed, began to form great deſigns. All oppoſition to the levies, being over, they reſolved to beſiege Veii itſelf, one of the ſtrongeſt places of Italy, in hopes of making themſelves maſters of a new city and territory larger than their own. Before they embarqued in this great undertaking, the people being aſſembled, bled, all voted for a war, and choſe for the firſt time ſix military tribunes, all patricians, viz. C. Julius Julus, C. Æmilius Mamertinus, T. Quinctius Capitolinus, L. Furius Medullinus, Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus, and A. Manlius Vulſo Capitolinus. Some of theſe remained at home, while others took the field againſt the Veientes, who, declining a battle, ſhut themſelves up in their city. The Romans inveſted it; but there was little action this year, and leſs the following, when P. Cornelius Maluginenſis, Sp. Nautius Rutilius, Cn. Cornelius Coſſus, C. Valerius Potitus, C. Fabius Ambuſtus, and M. Sergius Fidenas were military tribunes. Theſe were obliged to divide their army into two bodies; one of which continued before Veii, and the other marched againſt the Volſci, defeated them, took and razed the city of Artena, and then rejoined the forces left at the ſiege. The ſucceeding military tribunes, M. Æmilius, M. Furius, Ap. Claudius, grandſon of the decemvir, L. Julius, M. Quinctius and L. Valerius puſhed on the ſiege with great vigour. In the mean time the Veientes, changing their form of government, choſe themſelves a king; which ſo diſpleaſed the other ſtates of Hetruria, that they refuſed to ſend them any ſuccours. It was at this ſiege that the Romans are thought to have firſt invented lines of circumvallation and contravallation; at leaſt, this is the firſt time we find them mentioned in hiſtory. They fortified their camp both on the ſide of the city they inveſted, to prevent ſallies, and on the ſide of the country, to guard themſelves againſt any ſuccours, which the Hetrurians might ſend to the beſieged. The military tribunes, conſidering likewiſe that Veii could not be taken but after a long ſiege, and then not ſo much by force as by famine, reſolved, as the troops were now more at their command, to keep the army in the field all winter in wooden barracks covered with ſkins. To this deſign the ſoldiers made no oppoſition, chuſing rather to live in the camp at the expence of the public, than in Rome at their own; but the tribunes of the people, diſliking a project which kept great numbers of their adherents out of Rome and conſequently leſſened the ſtrength of their party in the comitia, aſſembled the tribes, and inveighed bitterly againſt the military tribunes, accuſing them of ambitious deſigns and cruelty, in keeping the troops all winter in the field. Appius whom the other military tribunes had left at Rome, in a long ſpeech, which he made to the people, expoſed the ſeditious and unreaſonable conduct of the tribunes. The people gave no great heed to Appius's remonſtrances; but a loſs, which the beſiegers ſuſtained before the place, animated the plebeians, more than his prudent diſcourſe, to purſue the ſiege with vigour. The Veientes in a ſally ſurprized the Romans, ſlew a great number of them, ſet fire to their machines, and ruined in a few hours the work of many days. This misfortune, inſtead of ſinking the ſpirits of the Romans, inſpired them with new courage. The citizens, who had wealth enough to be placed in the firſt claſs among the knights, but had not yet received horſes from the republic, which ceremony was neceſſary to make a man a knight, went in a body to the ſenate, and offered to mount themſelves at their own expence and ſerve at the ſiege of Veii. The fathers accepted the offer; and the people, following the example of the new knights, declared themſelves ready to ſerve and ſupply the places of the ſoldiers who had been killed. The ſenate ordered the ſame pay to be given to the voluntiers as to the reſt of the army, and decreed at the ſame time, that for the future the cavalry likewiſe ſhould receive pay out of the public treaſury [x].

The cavalry receive pay.

THE election of new military tribunes furniſhed the army with new generals. The ſix choſen were C. Servilius, Q. Sulpicius, Q. Servilius, A. Manlius, L. Virginius, and Manius Sergius. The Siege of Veii was carried on by the two latter; but as theſe two generals could not agree, each of them had a body of troops under his command, and, as it were, a ſeparate army. Sergius commanded the attack, and Virginius covered the ſiege. While the army was thus divided, the Faliſci and Capenates fell upon Sergius, and at the ſame time the beſieged ſallying out attacked him on the other ſide. The Romans under his command, thinking they had all the forces of Hetruria to deal with, began to loſe courage, and retire. Virginius could have ſaved his collegue's troops; for his forces were ranged in order of battle at a ſmall diſtance: but Sergius was too proud to ſend to him for ſuccour; and Virginius, tho' well appriſed of his danger, reſolved not to ſend him any, unleſs he aſked it. Thus the public good was ſacrificed to a private pique. The enemy made a dreadful ſlaughter of the Romans in their lines, but Sergius himſelf, having the good luck to eſcape, fled to Rome, not ſo much to juſtify his his own conduct, as to complain of that of his collegues. Hereupon Virginius was recalled, and both commanders ordered to give an account of their conduct to the senate, where they inveighed against each other with great acrimony. The conscript fathers, to quiet the matter, thought it advisable to make a decree, that all the military tribunes of that year should lay down their dignity, and the people immediately proceed to a new election. The four, who had been guilty of no fault, made no opposition to the decree; but the two, on whose account it had been made, protested against it, declaring, that they would not resign their authority before the ides of December, the due time for its expiration. The tribunes of the people, thinking this a favourable opportunity for them to appear again and make some figure, threatened, with an air of authority, to send the two refractory magistrates to prison, if they did not obey the senate. But Servilius Ahala, one of the military tribunes, after having severely reprimanded the tribunes of the people for treating his collegues in so haughty a manner, declared, that, if Sergius and Virginius continued obstinate, he would name a dictator. Hereupon the two magistrates, finding it fruitless to resist any longer, abdicated their magistracy, and the people chose six new tribunes, viz. L. Valerius, L. Julius, M. Æmilius, Cn. Cornelius, Cæso Fabius, and Furius Camillus. These new magistrates were ordered to begin anew the siege of Veii; but when the troops came to be raised, the tribunes of the people kindled fresh broils, by dissuading the old soldiers, left in Rome to guard it, from paying the taxes, as if they were exempted from that burden by being inlisted. The disturbances raised on this occasion were so great, that the tribes could not agree in the choice of more than eight new tribunes of the people; however, the majority of these eight named two more, in defiance of the Trebonian law, which gave C. Trebonius, one of the present tribunes, an opportunity of drawing the hatred of the people upon three of his collegues; but they diverted the hatred of the public from themselves, by turning it against Sergius and Virginius, the two generals of the last year, who were both cited to appear before the people, and condemned to pay a great fine for misconduct. This prosecution had the designed effect; for the people were so intent upon it, that they forgot the Trebonian law, and their quarrel with the three tribunes [y].

THE tribunes, encouraged by the ſucceſs that attended them in the proſecution of Sergius and Virginius, renewed the domeſtic broils, and propoſed two laws; the firſt requiring a partition of the lands as formerly; the ſecond excuſing the people from any more contributions towards the ſoldiers pay; and, in fact, they would not ſuffer them to pay the taxes: ſo that the legions, being deprived of their ſubſiſtence, began to mutiny. But at length all was quieted, by chuſing a plebeian into the military tribuneſhip. His name was P. Licinius Calvus. The other five were, P. Mœlius, P. Mœnius, Sp. Furius, L. Titinius, and L. Publilius. Licinius, tho' a plebeian, was an old ſenator; for ſome time ſince the conſiderable plebeians had begun to be admitted into the ſenate. The tribunes of the people were ſo much rejoiced to ſee a plebeian raiſed to the ſupreme magiſtracy, that they dropped their oppoſition to the tax; ſo that the ſoldiers, receiving their pay again, took new courage, made themſelves maſters of Anxur, which belonged to the Volſci, and carried on the ſiege of Veii with great reſolution and perſeverance, tho' they ſuffered much from the ſevere cold of the winter.

A plebeian choſen military tribune.

LICINIUS having diſcharged his truſt with univerſal approbation, the centuries choſe for the year following five military tribunes out of the plebeians, and only M. Veturius out of the patricians. The five were C. Duilius, L. Atinius, Cn. Genucius, M. Pomponius, and Volero Publilius. Their adminiſtration proved very glorious; for they carried on the ſiege of Veii with great vigor, and entirely defeated the confederate forces of the Faliſci and Capenates, who came to the relief of the beſieged city; but the extreme cold of the weather, changing of a ſudden to exceſſive heat, occaſioned a mortality both among men and cattle. Hereupon the Sibylline books being conſulted, the duumviri pretended to find there a new ſort of expiation. Three beds were placed in a temple round a plentiful table, and the ſtatues of Apollo, Latona, Diana, Hercules, Mercury, and Neptune taken down from their niches, laid on the beds, and ſerved with magnificent repaſts for eight days together. Theſe public ceremonies were imitated in private families; every one kept open houſe for friends, ſtrangers, ſtrangers, and even enemies; all law-ſuits, diſputes, and animoſities were ſuſpended, and the very priſoners releaſed to partake of the public rejoicings [z].

In the mean time the patricians, taking advantage of the preſent ſtate of affairs to recover the chief offices of the republic, and knowing the ſuperſtition of the people, attacked them on that ſide, and gave out, that the uncommon ſeverity of the winter the laſt year, and the preſent year's plague, were puniſhments from the gods, who were diſpleaſed to ſee all diſtinctions of families confounded, and plebeians placed in the higheſt offices. By this means and by propoſing only ſuch candidates to the centuries as were of ſuperior merit, they diſpoſed them to favour the nobility; and accordingly they reſtored the military tribuneſhip to the patrician order, raiſing to that office, L. Valerius, L. Furius, M. Valerius, Q. Servilius, Q. Sulpitius, and the famous Camillus, all patricians. During their adminiſtration, Rome was aſtoniſhed with a prodigy. It happened to be a very dry ſummer; but nevertheleſs the lake of Alba ſwelled on a ſudden to ſuch a height, as to cover the tops of the rocks which ſurrounded it; whereas it had never before reached to the foot of them. This ſtrange accident was much talked of in the camp before Veii; and, as in long ſieges the ſoldiers on both ſides frequently become acquainted, they talked of the prodigy from their different camps; but an old ſoldier of the Veientes one day, while the others were making merry with the prodigy, cried out in an enthuſiaſtic manner, Veii ſhall never be taken, till all the water is run out of the lake of Alba. A Roman centinel, who had great faith in divination, hearing him, aſked who the old man was? and being informed that he was a diviner, made him priſoner by a ſtratagem, and carried him before the Roman general, who ſent him to the ſenate. The old man declared, that what he had ſaid was agreeable to an antient tradition written in ſome prophetic books of his country; and that, if the Romans could draw the water out of the lake, Veii would be taken: but he adviſed them to take particular care, that the drains, which ſhould be made to carry it off, did not convey it to the ſea. Tho' the ſenate was unwilling to truſt the bare word of the diviner, yet they thought the matter of ſuch conſequence, as to ſend a deputation of three patricians to Delphos, to conſult the oracle. Theſe returned the next year, while L. Julius, L. Furius, L. Sergius, A. Poſthumius, A. Manlius, and P. Cornelius, all patricians, were military tribunes. The anſwer of the oracle was, to the great ſurprize of the ſenate and people, perfectly agreeable to the advice and prediction of the old man. The ſenate therefore immediately ſent out pioneers to make a canal, which might carry off the waters of the lake, and convey them all over the fields in trenches. This wonderful work ſubſiſts to this day, and the waters of the lake Albano run through it [a]. The election of the preſent military tribunes being defective with regard to the auguries, they all abdicated, and, after a ſhort inter-regnum, were ſucceeded by ſix new ones, all plebeians, viz. L. Atinius, P. Mœlius, L. Titinius, P. Mœnius, Cn. Genucius, and P. Licinius. Atinius and Genucius marched with ſome troops to oppoſe a great body of Hetrurians, who were coming to attack the Roman entrenchments before Veii; but the two tribunes falling into an ambuſh, Genucius was killed, and his collegue driven out of the field. The news of this defeat ſo terrified the ſenate, that they had recourſe, as uſual in ſuch caſes, to a dictator. M. Furius Camillus was accordingly raiſed to that ſupreme dignity. He named P. Cornelius Scipio for general of the horſe, and ordered new troops to be raiſed. The people ſtrove who ſhould firſt liſt themſelves under the banners of ſo renowned a commander. The Latins and Hernici of their own accord ſent him a ſtrong ſupply of their choiceſt youth. On his firſt taking the field he came to a battle with the united forces of the Faliſci, Capenates, and Hetrurians, and having entirely defeated them, ſat down before Veii, and puſhed on the ſiege with incredible vigor; but the beſieged defending themſelves with more courage than ever, Camillus, deſpairing to carry by aſſault a place, which had a whole army for its garriſon, had recourſe to mines and ſapping. His pioneers, whom he divided into ſix companies, relieving one another, and the work continually advancing without interruption, a paſſage under ground was opened to the very caſtle. The dictator then

then thinking himſelf ſure of conqueſt, ſent to the ſenate, to know how they would have the ſpoils of the city diſpoſed of. The queſtion was debated with great warmth; Appius Claudius was for having the rich plunder of Veii made a fund for the payment of the troops; but Licinius, thinking that this would give riſe to endleſs murmurs and ſeditions, propoſed, that the ſpoils ſhould be divided between the army and thoſe citizens who ſhould be in the camp when the town was taken. This advice prevailed, and a decree was made, giving leave to all the citizens to go to the camp, and take their ſhare of the booty. Accordingly vaſt numbers flocked thither well armed, and joined the dictator's troops in the attack. The ſignal being given for the aſſault, part of the army ſcaled the walls, while the ſoldiers in the mine ſallied out, and ſpread themſelves in ſeveral bodies through the town. One fell upon thoſe who were defending the walls; another broke down the gates, and the whole Roman army entering the city, put all thoſe to the ſword who did not ſurrender their arms. Thus was the rich city of Veii taken, like a ſecond Troy, after a ten years ſiege. The booty, which was exceeding rich, was divided among the ſoldiers; but the priſoners of free condition were ſold to the beſt bidder, and the money ariſing from thence put into the public treaſury; but, tho' this was the only part of the ſpoil from which the public reaped any benefit, the people murmured at it, and inveighed both againſt the ſenate and dictator. The diſpleaſure of the multitude was encreaſed with regard to Camillus, by ſome ſingularities in the pomp of his triumph; for he entered the city in a ſtately chariot, drawn by four horſes all milk-white, and coloured his face with vermilion. White horſes, ſince the expulſion of the kings, had been allowed only to Jupiter and the ſun; and the ſtatues of the gods were commonly painted with vermilion. The people therefore, in the midſt of the praiſes, which they gave the dictator, could not, without a ſecret indignation, behold him affecting a pomp, which in a manner, put him upon a level with the gods. What ſtill more incenſed the people againſt him was, his demanding back from them a tenth part of the ſpoil of Veii, to diſcharge a vow, which he had made to Apollo juſt before the aſſault, and afterwards forgot. This contribution at a wrong time irritated the people againſt him, and the tribunes gladly ſeized ſo favourable an occaſion of inveighing againſt againſt him. In the mean time, it was propoſed to buy ſuch a vaſe of gold,, with the produce of what the ſoldiers returned, as might ſhew Greece the magnificence of the Roman republic; but there being little gold to be found in the city, the ladies, of their own accord, contributed all their toys and ornaments, of which a vaſe with two handles was made, weighing eight talents; and three ſenators were ſent to Delphos with it. In return for the ladies generoſity, the republic granted them two favours, 1. That funeral orations ſhould be made for illuſtrious women, as for great men. 2. That they ſhould have leave to ride in chariots at the public games [b]

Sicinius Dentatus propoſes, that half of the ſenators, knights, &c. ſhould remove to Veii,

THE next year, the republic being under the government of ſix military tribunes, viz. P. Cornelius Coſſius, P. Cornelius Scipio, M. Valerius, Cæſo Fabius, L. Furius, and Q. Servilius, all patricians, Sicinius Dentatus, a tribune of the people, propoſed, that half of the ſenators, knights, and people of Rome ſhould remove to Veii and ſettle there. The affair, according to cuſtom, was carried before the ſenate; and the fathers, eſpecially Camillus, oppoſed it with great warmth. They feared, that two ſuch cities would, by degrees, become two different ſtates, which, after a deſtructive war with each other, would at length fall a prey to their common enemies. They therefore proteſted, that they would ſooner die than conſent to ſo unreaſonable a law. By this means, Camillus and the other ſenators, after much ſtruggle, brought this project to nothing. Notwithſtanding the oppoſition made by Camillus to this law, he was choſen one of the ſix military tribunes for the year following. His collegues were, L. Furius, P. Cornelius Scipio, C. Æmilius, Sp. Poſthumius, and L. Valerius. The conduct of the war againſt the Faliſci being committed to the care of Camillus, he beſieged Falerii, their capital city, and ſurrounded it with lines; but at ſo great diſtance from the walls, that there was ſufficient room for the beſieged to take the air without danger. The Faliſci had brought from Greece the cuſtom of committing all their children to the care of one man, who was to inſtruct them in all the branches of polite literature, to take them out a walking with him, and ſee them perform the exerciſes pro-

proper for their age. The children had uſed often to walk with their maſter without the walls of the city before the ſiege; and their fears of an enemy, who kept quiet and at ſuch a diſtance, were not great enough to make them diſcontinue that exerciſe afterwards. But the preſent ſchool-maſter proved a traitor; he at firſt led the youth only along the walls; then he carried them a little farther; and at length, when a favourable opportunity offered, he led them through the guards of the Roman camp, quite to the general's tent. As they were the children of the beſt families in the place, their treacherous leader, when he came into Camillus's preſence, addreſſed him thus: With theſe children I deliver the place you beſiege into your hands. They were committed to my care and tuition; but I prefer the friendſhip of Rome to my employment at Falerii. Camillus, ſtruck with horror at the treachery, ordered his lictors to ſtrip the traitor, to tie his hands behind him, and to furniſh the youth with rods to whip him back again into the city. The Faliſci, moved by this generous action, immediately ſent a deputation to Camillus to treat of a ſurrender, tho' they had a little before proteſted, that they would rather undergo the fate of the Veientes, than ſubmit to Rome. Camillus, out of modeſty, referred the deputies to the ſenate, which they addreſſed in the following manner: Rome, conſcript fathers, has juſt now gained a victory over us, which can never be ſhameful to us in the ſight either of gods or men. We ſubmit to you out of a perſuaſion, that we cannot live more happily, than under the laws of a republic, in which juſtice and probity reign. The Romans and Faliſci are this day giving two great examples to poſterity; you, in preferring juſtice to victory; we, in rather yielding to the charms of virtue, than to the force of arms. We ſurrender ourſelves into your hands. Command the Faliſci to lay down their arms, to give you hoſtages, and to receive a Roman garriſon, and we will obey and open our gates. We ſhall never repent of ſubjecting ourſelves to your government; nor ſhall you ever have reaſon to complain of our being unfaithful to you. The ſenate heard this diſcourſe with pleaſure; but left to Camillus the terms of the peace which was to be made with the Faliſci, not as conquered people, but as with a nation which voluntarily ſubmitted to the dominion of the republic. He therefore entered into an alliance with them, and demanded only the expences of the preſent campaign. He then led back his army to Rome, where his ſoldiers encreaſed creaſed the number of his enemies. They had promiſed themſelves great riches from the plunder of Falerii, and thinking Camillus had given the Faliſci better terms than they deſerved, they looked on their general as an enemy to the people, and as one, who was no-ways inclined to promote their intereſt; ſo that the hatred of the multitude to this hero encreaſed as faſt as his reputation [c].

The Æqui defeated.

WHILE Camillus was thus employed, two of his colleagues, Æmilius and Poſthumius, having united their forces, defeated the Æqui in a pitched battle; but while the arms of the republic proſpered abroad, new diſturbances were raiſed at home. When the time came for electing tribunes of the people, the multitude was for continuing thoſe who had propoſed the law for going to Veii; and the patricians were for re-electing thoſe who had oppoſed it; but the former prevailing in the comitia by tribes, the promoters of the law were re-choſen. Hereupon the patricians, in revenge, reſolved, if poſſible, to reſtore the conſular government; and accordingly, in the comitia by centuries, where they had moſt ſway, L. Lucretius Flavus and Severus Sulpitius Camerinus were choſen conſuls. During their adminiſtration, Sicinius the tribune uſed his utmoſt endeavours to get the law paſſed for removing half of the people and ſenate to Veii. A. Virginius and Q. Pomponius, two of the tribunes of the people for the laſt year, who had oppoſed it, were cited to appear before the tribes, and fined ten thouſand aſſes of braſs. The whole ſenate was offended at this ſentence, but eſpecially Camillus, who adviſed the conſcript fathers to appear in the comitium, when the tribes aſſembled to determine the affair, as men prepared to defend their temples, their houſhold gods, and their country. Accordingly the patricians, by tears, entreaties, and the more powerful arguments drawn from religion, prevailed to have the law rejected, tho' it was only by a majority of one tribe. And now the ſenate was ſo well pleaſed with the people, that the very next morning a decree was paſſed, aſſigning ſix acres of the lands of Veii, not only to every father of a family, but to every ſingle perſon of free condition. On the other hand, the people, delighted with this liberality, made no oppoſition to the election of conſuls. L. Valerius Potitus

[c] Plut. ibid. Liv. l. v. c. 27.

Potitus and M. Manlius Capitolinus were raiſed to the conſulate, and began their year by performing the vow, made by Camillus when dictator, to celebrate the great games. Of theſe there were two ſorts, the one celebrated every year in the month of September, in honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; the other, called votive or extraordinary, had no fixed day, and was celebrated in honour of Jupiter only. This year the Volſinii, one of the twelve Hetrurian nations, alarmed at the fate of Veii and Falerii, took arms againſt Rome, and, being joined by the Salpinates, made incurſions into the Roman territory; but a contagious diſtemper made the republic ſuſpend her revenge. The two conſuls being ſeized with it, the ſuperſtitious multitude imagined they had been inauſpiciouſly choſen. They were therefore ordered by the ſenate to reſign. Upon their reſignation an inter-regnum enſued, during which the republic was governed by three preſidents, Valerius Potitus, (not the conſul) Camillus, and Cornelius Scipio, who ſucceeded each other for a few days. Valerius held an aſſembly for the election of ſix military tribunes, which ſort of government was now re-eſtabliſhed, that, in caſe ſome of the ſupreme magiſtrates were infected with the contagion, there might ſtill be others to take care of the public welfare. By a cenſus taken this year it appeared, that the number of citizens, able to bear arms, amounted to one hundred fifty-two thouſand five hundred and eighty-three. No wonder therefore that numerous armies were often raiſed within the walls of Rome itſelf. The troops, ſince their receiving pay, were more obedient than formerly to their commanders, who kept them in the field ſummer and winter. They had never had a more gallant or experienced commander than Camillus. The frontiers of the republic were now extended above ſixty miles beyond the Tiber; and the people ſeemed to be in a ſettled tranquillity and perfectly reconciled to the ſenate; but this unuſual proſperity was interrupted by the Gauls, a memorable event, which almoſt ruined the Roman nation.

Conſuls created inſtead of military tribunes.

An inter-regnum.

Military tribunes elected anew.

GAUL was antiently divided into three parts, viz. Gallia Belgica, Gallia Celtica, and Gallia Aquitanica. The firſt reached from the Britiſh ſea to the Seine; the ſecond comprehended all the country between the Seine and the Garonne, quite to the Alps; the third contained all that tract of ground which lies between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the weſtern ocean. The Celtæ, or the inhabitants habitants of Gallia Celtica, were the only Gauls, who, at different times, croſſed the Alps and ſettled in Italy. The firſt invaſion of Italy by the Gauls happened about the year of Rome 160, during the reign of Tarquinius Priſcus; when Ambigatus, king of the Celtæ, finding his dominions overſtocked, ſent away vaſt numbers of his ſubjects to ſeek their fortune, under the command of his two nephews, Segoveſus and Belloveſus. The former took his way through the Hercinian foreſt, and ſettled in a canton of Germany, ever ſince called Bohemia or Boïemia, from the word Boii, the greateſt part of his followers being of the Celtic nation which was ſo named; but theſe, being afterwards driven from thence by the Marcomani or Sclavonians, retired into that country, which lies between the Inn and the Iſer, and which from them took the name of Boiaria, or Bavaria. As for Belloveſus, he croſſed the Rhone, and, paſſing the Alps, poſſeſſed himſelf of thoſe countries which are at preſent known by the names of Piedmont and Lombardy, after having driven out the Hetrurians, who then held them. A ſecond irruption into Italy was made by the Cænomani, or thoſe people of Gallia Celtica who dwelt between the mouths of the Seine and the Loire, under the conduct of one Elitouis. Theſe new adventurers ſettled in the preſent Breſciano, Cremoneſe, Mantuano, Carniola, and the territories now ſubject to the republic of Venice. The Læves, or Lævi, and the Ananes made the third irruption into Italy; the former ſeized the country of Novara, on the north ſide of the Po; and the latter that of Piacenza, on the ſouth ſide of the ſame river. The fourth tranſmigration of the Gauls into Italy was, when the Boii and Lingones paſſed the Alpes Penninæ, and ſettled on the ſouth ſide of the Po, between Bologna and Ravenna. Two hundred years after the invaſion by Belloveſus, the Senones, who poſſeſſed that part of Gaul which lies between Paris and Meaux, made a fifth irruption into Italy; which was occaſioned by the following accident: Arunx, one of the chief men of Cluſium in Hetruria, had been guardian to a young Leucumo, or lord of a leucumony, and had educated him in his houſe from his infancy. The Leucumo, as ſoon as he was of an age to feel the force of a paſſion, fell in love with his guardian's wife, and, havingupon the firſt diſcovery of their intrigue, conveyed her away, Arunx endeavoured to obtain reparation for the injury he had received; but the Leucumo, by his intereſt and money, gained over the magiſtrates; ſo that the injured guardian, finding no protectors in Hetruria, reſolved to make his application to the Gauls. The people, among all the Celtic nations, to whom he choſe to addreſs himſelf, were the Senones; and, in order to engage them in his quarrel, he acquainted them with the great plenty of Italy, and made them taſte of ſome Italian wines. Upon this the Senones reſolved to follow him; and a numerous army was immediately formed, which paſſing the Alps, under the conduct of their Hetrurian guide, and leaving the Celtæ in Italy unmoleſted, fell upon Umbria, and poſſeſſed themſelves of all the country from Ravenna to Picenum. They were about ſix years in ſettling themſelves in their new acquiſitions, while the Romans were carrying on the ſiege of Veii. At length Arunx brought the Senones before Cluſium, in order to beſiege that place, his wife and her lover having ſhut themſelves up there. The Romans, notwithſtanding the daily conqueſts made by the Gauls, ſeem to have been under no apprehenſion of any danger from them; for at this time the great Camillus, the only general they had capable of making head againſt ſuch formidable neighbours, was accuſed by Apuleius, one of the tribunes of the people, of having applied to his own uſe ſome ſpoils taken from the Hetrurians, particularly a braſs door brought from Veii. His friends, not finding themſelves ſtrong enough to protect him, promiſed to pay the fine which ſhould be laid upon him; but Camillus, having too great a ſoul to bear the affront of a public condemnation, retired from Rome and went of his own accord into baniſhment. He was no ſooner gone, than envoys arrived from the Cluſini, imploring the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt the Senones. The ſenate, being unwilling to engage in an open war with a nation which had never offended them, ſent an embaſſy of three young patricians, all brothers and of the Fabian family, to bring about an accommodation between the two nations. Theſe embaſſadors, being arrived at the camp of the Gauls and conducted into the council, offered the mediation of Rome, and demanded of Brennus, the leader of the Gauls, What injury the Cluſini had done him? or what pretenſions any people from a remote country could have upon Hetruria? Brennus anſwered proudly, that his right lay in his ſword, and that all things belonged to the brave; but that, without having

recourſe to this primitive law of nature, he had a juſt complaint againſt the Cluſini, who, having more lands than they could cultivate, had refuſed to yield to him thoſe they left untilled: "And what other motives had you your "ſelves, Romans," ſaid he, "to conquer ſo many "neighbouring nations? You have deprived the Sabines, "the Albans, the Fidenates, the Æqui, and the Volſci "of the beſt part of their territories. Not that we accuſe "you of injuſtice; but it is evident, that you thought "this to be the prime and moſt antient of all laws, To "make the weak give way to the ſtrong. Forbear there-"fore to intereſt yourſelves for the Cluſini, or allow us to "take the part of the people you have ſubdued." The Fabii were highly provoked at ſo haughty an anſwer; but, diſſembling their reſentment, deſired leave to go into the town, under pretence of conferring with the magiſtrates. But they were no ſooner there, than they began to ſtir up the inhabitants to a vigorous defence; nay, forgetting their character, they put themſelves at the head of the beſieged in a ſally, in which Q. Fabius, the chief of the embaſſadors, ſlew with his own hand one of the principal officers of the Gauls. Hereupon Brennus, calling the gods to witneſs the perfidiouſneſs of the Romans and their violating the law of nations, immediately broke up the ſiege of Cluſium, and marched leiſurely to Rome, having ſent an herald before him to demand, that thoſe embaſſadors, who had ſo manifeſtly violated the law of nations, ſhould be delivered up to him. The Roman ſenate was greatly perplexed, between their regard for the law of nations and their affection for the Fabii. The wiſeſt of the ſenate thought the demand of the Gauls to be but juſt and reaſonable; however, as it concerned perſons of great conſequence and credit, the conſcript fathers referred the affair to the people aſſembled by curiæ. As the Fabian family was very popular, the curiæ were ſo far from condemning the three brothers, that, at the next election of military tribunes, they were choſen the firſt. Brennus, looking upon the promotion of the Fabii as an high affront on his nation, haſtened his march to Rome. As his army was very numerous, the inhabitants of the towns and villages through which he paſſed, left their habitations at his approach; but he ſtopped no where, declaring that his deſign was only to be revenged on the Romans. The ſix military tribunes, viz. Q. Fabius, Cæſo Fabius, Caius Fabius, Q. Sulpicius,

The imprudent behaviour of the Roman embaſſadors.

Sulpicius, Q. Servilius, and Sextus Cornelius marched out of Rome, at the head of forty thouſand men, without either ſacrificing to the gods, or conſulting the auſpices, eſſential ceremonies among a people that drew their courage and confidence from the propitious ſigns which the augurs declared to them. As moſt of the military tribunes were young, and men of more valour than experience, they advanced boldly againſt the Gauls, whoſe army was ſeventy thouſand ſtrong. The two armies met near the river Allia, about ſixty furlongs from Rome. The Romans, that they might not be ſurrounded by the enemy, extended their wings ſo far as to make their center very thin. Their beſt troops, to the number of twenty-four thouſand men, they poſted between the river and the adjoining hills; the reſt they placed on the hills. The Gauls firſt attacked the latter, who being ſoon put into confuſion, the forces in the plain were ſtruck with ſuch terror, that they fled without drawing their ſwords. In this general diſorder moſt of the ſoldiers, inſtead of returning to Rome, fled to Veii; ſome were drowned as they endeavoured to ſwim croſs the Tiber; many fell in the purſuit by the ſword of the conquerors, and ſome got to Rome, which they filled with terror and conſternation, it being believed there that all the reſt were cut off. The day after the battle, Brennus marched his troops into the neighbourhood of Rome, and encamped ou the banks of the Anio. Thither his ſcouts brought him word, that the gates of the city lay open, and that not one Roman was to be ſeen on the ramparts. This made him apprehenſive of ſome ambuſcade, it being unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the Romans would abandon their city, to be plundered and ſacked, without making any reſiſtance. On this conſideration he advanced ſlowly, which gave the Romans an opportunity to throw into the capitol all the men who were fit to bear arms. They carried into it all the proviſions they could get; and, that they might laſt the longer, admitted none into the place, but ſuch as were capable of defending it. As for the city, they had not ſufficient forces to defend it, and therefore the old men, women, and children, ſeeing themſelves abandoned, fled to the neighbouring towns. The Veſtals, before they left Rome, took care to hide every thing appropriated to the gods, which they could not carry off. The two palladiums and the ſacred fire they took with them. When they came to the Janiculum, one Albinius, a plebeian, who was conveying his his wife and children in a carriage to a place of ſafety, ſeeing the ſacred virgins bending under their load and their feet bloody, made his family alight, put the prieſteſſes and their gods into the carriage, and conducted them to Cære, a city of Hetruria, where they met with a favourable reception. The Veſtals remained at Cære, and there continued to perform the uſual rites of religion; and hence thoſe rites were called ceremonies. But while the reſt of the citizens at Rome were providing for their ſafety, about fourſcore of the moſt illuſtrious and venerable old men, rather than fly from their native city, choſe to devote themſelves to death by a vow, which Fabius the high pontiff pronounced in their names. The Romans believed, that by theſe voluntary devotements to the infernal gods diſorder and confuſion was brought among the enemy. Of theſe brave old men ſome were pontifices, others had been conſuls, and others generals of armies who had been honoured with triumphs. To complete their ſacrifice with a ſolemnity and pomp becoming the magnanimity and conſtancy of the Romans, they dreſſed themſelves in their pontifical, conſular, and triumphal, robes, and repairing to the forum, ſeated themſelves there in their curule chairs, expecting the enemy and death with the greateſt conſtancy [d].

Brennus enters Rome.

At length Brennus, having ſpent three days in uſeleſs precautions, entered the city the fourth day after the battle. He found the gates open, the walls without defence, and the houſes without inhabitants. Rome appeared to him like a mere deſart; and this ſolitude encreaſed his anxiety. He could not believe, either that all the Romans were lodged in the capitol, or that ſo numerous a people ſhould abandon the place of their nativity. On the other hand, he could no where ſee any armed men but on the walls of the citadel. However, having firſt ſecured all the avenues to the capitol with ſtrong bodies of guards, he gave the reſt of his ſoldiers leave to diſperſe themſelves all over the city and plunder it. Brennus himſelf advanced into the forum with the troops under his command in good order; and there he was ſtruck with admiration at the unexpected ſight of the venerable old men, who had devoted themſelves to death. Their magnificent habits, the majeſty of their countenances, the ſilence they kept, their modeſty and conſtancy at the

the approach of his troops, made him take them for ſo many deities. For they continued as motionleſs as ſtatues, and ſaw the enemy advance without ſhewing the leaſt concern. The Gauls kept a great while at an awful diſtance from them, being afraid to come near them. But at length, one ſoldier, bolder than the reſt, having out of curioſity touched the beard of M. Papirius, the venerable old man, not being uſed to ſuch familiarity, gave him a blow on the head with his ivory ſtaff. The ſoldier in revenge immediately killed him, and the reſt of the Gauls, following his example, ſlaughtered all thoſe venerable old men without mercy. After this the enemy ſet no bounds to their rage and fury. They plundered all places, dragging ſuch of the Romans as had ſhut themſelves up in their houſes, into the ſtreets, and there putting them to the ſword, without diſtinction of age or ſex. Brennus then inveſted the capitol, but being repulſed with great loſs, in order to be revenged of the Romans for their reſiſtance, he reſolved to lay the city in aſhes. Accordingly, by his command, the ſoldiers ſet fire to the houſes, demoliſhed the temples and public edifices, and razed the walls to the ground. Thus was the famous city of Rome entirely deſtroyed; nothing was to be ſeen in the place where it ſtood, but a few little hills covered with ruins, and a wide waſte, in which the Gauls, who inveſted the capitol, were encamped. Brennus, finding he ſhould never be able to take a place, which nature had ſo well fortified, otherwiſe than by famine, turned the ſiege into a blockade. But, in the mean time, his army being diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, he ſent out parties to pillage the fields and raiſe contributions in the neighbouring cities. One of theſe parties appeared before Ardea, where the great Camillus had now ſpent two years in a private life. Notwithſtanding the affront he had received at Rome, the love he bore his country was not in the leaſt diminiſhed. The ſenate of Ardea being met to deliberate on the meaſures to be taken with relation to the Gauls, Camillus, more afflicted at the calamities of his country, than at his own baniſhment, deſired to be admitted into the council, where with his eloquence he prevailed upon the Ardeates to arm their youth in their own defence, and refuſe the Gauls admittance into their city. Hereupon the Gauls encamped before the city; and as they deſpiſed the Ardeates, after they had made themſelves maſters of Rome, they preſerved neither order nor diſcipline in their camp, but ſpent whole days in drinking. Hereupon Camillus, having eaſily perſuaded the youth of the city to follow him, marched out of Ardea in a very dark night, surprized the Gauls drowned in wine, and made a dreadful slaughter of them. Those who made their escape, under the shelter of the night, fell next day into the hands of the peasants, by whom they were massacred without mercy. This defeat of the enemy revived the courage of the Romans scattered about the country, especially those who had retired to Veii after the unfortunate battle of Allia. There was not one of them who did not condemn himself for the exile of Camillus, as if he had been the author of it; and, looking upon that great man as their last resource, they resolved to chuse him for their leader. Accordingly, they sent without delay embassadors to him, beseeching him to take into his protection the fugitive Romans and the wrecks of the defeat at Allia. But Camillus would not accept of the command of the troops, till the people assembled by curiæ had legally conferred it upon him. He thought the public authority was lodged in the hands of those who were shut up in the citadel, and therefore would undertake nothing at the head of the Roman troops, till a commission was brought him from thence. To do this was very difficult, the place being invested on all sides by the enemy. However, one Pontius Cominius, a man of mean birth, but bold and very ambitious of glory, undertook it. He put on a light habit, and, providing himself with cork to keep the longer above water, threw himself into the Tiber above Rome in the beginning of the night, and suffered himself to be carried down with the stream. At length he came to the foot of the capitol, and landed at a steep place, where the Gauls had not thought it necessary to post any centinels. There he mounted with great difficulty to the rampart of the citadel, and having made himself known to the guard, he was admitted into the place and conducted to the magistrates. The senate being immediately assembled, Pontius gave them an account of Camillus's victory, and in the name of all the Romans at Veii demanded that great captain for their general. There was not much time spent in debates: the curiæ being called together, the act of condemnation, which had been passed on Camillus, was abrogated, and he named dictator with one voice. Pontius was immediately dispatched with the decree, and the same good fortune which had attended him to the capitol, accompanied him in his return. Thus was

Camillus

Camillus, from the ſtate of baniſhment, raiſed at once to be ſovereign magiſtrate of his country. He was indeed proclaimed dictator in his abſence, contrary to cuſtom. But this was a ſmall defect in point of form only, which the neceſſities of the ſtate made very excuſable. His promotion to the command was no ſooner known, but ſoldiers flocked from all parts to his camp; inſomuch, that he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of above forty-thouſand men, partly Romans, and partly allies, who all thought themſelves invincible under ſo great a general [e].

WHILE he was taking proper meaſures to raiſe the blockade of the citadel, ſome Gauls, rambling round the place, perceived, on the ſide of the hill, the print of Pontus's hands and feet. They obſerved likewiſe, that the moſs on the rocks was in ſeveral places torn up. From theſe marks they concluded, that ſome-body had lately gone up to, and returned from, the capitol. The Gauls immediately made their report to Brennus of what they had obſerved; and that experienced commander laid a deſign, which he imparted to no-body, of ſurprizing the place by the ſame way that the Roman had aſcended. With this view he choſe out of his army ſuch ſoldiers as had dwelt in mountainous countries, and been accuſtomed from their youth to climb precipices. Theſe he ordered, after he had well examined the nature of the place, to aſcend in the night the ſame way that was marked out for them, climbing two abreaſt, that one might ſupport the other in getting up the ſteep parts of the precipice. By this means they advanced, with much difficulty and more danger, from rock to rock, till they arrived at the foot of the wall. They proceeded with ſuch ſilence, that they were not heard or diſcovered, either by the centinels who were upon guard in the citadel, or even by the dogs, that are uſually awaked and alarmed at the leaſt noiſe. But, though they eluded the ſagacity of the dogs, they could not eſcape the vigilance of the geeſe. A flock of theſe birds was kept in a court of the capitol, in honour of Juno, and near her temple. Notwithſtanding the want of proviſions in the garriſon, they had been ſpared out of religion; and as theſe creatures are naturally quick of hearing, they were alarmed at the firſt approach of the Gauls; ſo that running up and down, with their cackling and beating of their wings, they awaked Manlius, a gallant ſoldier, who ſome years before had been conſul. He ſounded an alarm, and was the firſt man who mounted the rampart, where he found two Gauls already upon the wall. One of them offered to diſcharge a blow at him with his battle-axe; but Manlius cut off his right hand at one blow, and gave the other ſuch a puſh with his buckler, that he threw him headlong from the top of the rock to the bottom. He in his fall drew many others with him; and in the mean time the Romans, crouding to the place, preſſed upon the Gauls and tumbled them one over another. As the nature of the ground would not ſuffer them to make a regular retreat, or even to fly, moſt of them, to avoid the ſwords of the enemy, threw themſelves down the precipice, ſo that very few got ſafe back to their camp [f].

As it was the cuſtom of the Romans at that time not to ſuffer any commendable action to go unrewarded, the tribune Sulpicius aſſembled his troops the next morning, in order to beſtow the military rewards on thoſe who the night before had deſerved them. Among theſe Manlius was firſt named, and, in acknowledgment of the important ſervice he had juſt rendered the ſtate, every ſoldier gave him part of the corn which he received ſparingly from the public ſtock, and a little meaſure of wine out of his ſcanty allowance. An inconſiderable preſent indeed in itſelf, but very acceptable, at that time, to the perſon on whom it was beſtowed. The tribune's next care was to puniſh the negligent; accordingly, the captain of the guard, who ought to have had an eye over the centinels, was condemned to die, and, purſuant to his ſentence, thrown down from the top of the capitol. The Romans extended their puniſhments and rewards even to the animals. Geeſe were ever after had in honour at Rome, and a flock of them always kept at the expence of the public. A golden image of a gooſe was erected in memory of them, and a gooſe every year carried in triumph upon a ſoft litter finely adorned; whilſt dogs were held in abhorrence by the Romans, who every year empaled one of them on a branch of elder [g].

THE blockade of the capitol had already laſted ſeven months; ſo that the famine began to be very ſenſibly felt, both both by the beſieged and the beſiegers. Camillus, ſince his nomination to the dictatorſhip, being maſter of the country, had poſted ſtrong guards on all the roads; ſo that the Gauls dared not ſtir out for fear of being cut to pieces. Thus Brenus, who beſieged the capitol, was beſieged himſelf, and ſuffered the ſame inconveniencies, which he made the Romans undergo. Beſides, a plague raged in his camp, which was placed in the midſt of the ruins of the demoliſhed city, his men lying confuſedly among the dead carcaſſes of the Romans, whom they had ſlain and not buried. So great a number of them died in one quarter of the city, that it was afterwards called Buſta Gallica, or the place where the dead bodies of the Gauls were burnt. But, in the mean time, the Romans in the capitol were more pinched with want than the Gauls. They were reduced to the laſt extremity, and at the ſame time ignorant, both of the lamentable condition to which the enemy's army was brought, and of the ſteps Camillus was taking to relieve them. That great general only waited for a favourable opportunity to fall upon the enemy; but, in the mean time, ſuffered them to pine away in their infected camp, not knowing the extreme want the Romans endured in the capitol, where they were ſo deſtitute of all ſorts of proviſion, that they could no longer ſubſiſt. Matters being brought to this ſad paſs on both ſides, the centinels of the capitol and thoſe of the enemy's army began to talk to one another of an accommodation. Their diſcourſes came at length to the ears of their leaders, who were not averſe to the deſign. The ſenate not knowing what was become of Camillus, and finding themſelves hard pinched by hunger, reſolved to enter upon a negotiation, and impowered Sulpicius, one of the military tribunes, to treat with the Gauls, who made no great difficulty in coming to terms, they being no leſs deſirous than the Romans to put an end to the war. In a conference therefore between Brennus and Sulpicius, an agreement was made and ſworn to. The Romans were to pay to the Gauls a thouſand pounds weight of gold, that is, forty-five thouſand pounds ſterling, and the latter were to raiſe the ſiege of the capitol and quit all the Roman territories. On the day appointed Sulpicius brought the ſum agreed on, and Brennus the ſcales and weights; for there were no gold or ſilver coins at that time, metals paſſing only by weight. We are told, that the weights of the Gauls were falſe, and their their ſcales untrue, which Sulpicius complaining of, Brennus, inſtead of redreſſing the injuſtice, threw his ſword and belt into the ſcale where the weights were; and when the tribune aſked him the meaning of ſo extraordinary a behaviour, the only anſwer he gave was, Væ victis, Wo to the conquered. Sulpicius was ſo ſtung with this haughty anſwer, that he was for carrying the gold back into the capitol and ſuſtaining the ſiege to the laſt extremity; but others thought it adviſeable to put up that affront, ſince they had ſubmited to a far greater one, which was to pay any thing at all. During theſe diſputes of the Roman deputies among themſelves and with the Gauls, Camillus advanced with his army to the very gates of the city, and being there informed of what was doing, he commanded the main body to follow him ſlowly and in good order, while he, with the choiceſt of his men, haſtened to the place of the parly. The Romans overjoyed at his unexpected arrival, opened to make room for him, as the ſupreme magiſtrate of the republic, gave him an account of the treaty they had made with the Gauls, and complained of the wrong Brennus did them in the execution of it. They had ſcarce done ſpeaking, when Camillus cried out, "Carry back this gold into the capitol, and "you, Gauls, retire with your ſcales and weights. Rome "muſt not be redeemed with gold, but with ſteel." Brennus replied, that he contravened a treaty, which was concluded and confirmed with mutual oaths. "Be it ſo," anſwered Camillus, "yet it is of no force, having been made "by an inferior magiſtrate without the privity or conſent of "the dictator. I, who am inveſted with the ſupreme autho-"rity over the Romans, declare the contract void." At theſe words Brennus flew into a rage, and both ſides drawing their ſwords, a confuſed ſcuffle enſued among the ruins of the houſes and in the narrow lanes. The Gauls, after an inconſiderable loſs, thought fit to retire within their camp, which they abandoned in the night, not caring to engage Camillus's whole army, and, having marched eight miles, encamped on the Gabinian way. Camillus purſued them as ſoon as it was day, and coming up with them, gave them a total overthrow. The Gauls, according to Livy, made but a faint reſiſtance, being diſheartened at the loſs they had ſuſtained the day before. "It was not," ſays that author, "ſo much a battle as a ſlaughter." Many of the Gauls were ſlain in the action, more in the purſuit; but the greater number were cut off, as they wandered up and down the

the fields, by the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages. In ſhort, there was not one ſingle Gaul left to carry his countrymen the news of this fatal cataſtrophe. The camp of the barbarians was plundered; and Camillus, loaded with ſpoils, returned in triumph to the city, the ſoldiers in their ſongs ſtiling him Romulus, father of his country, and ſecond founder of Rome [h].

The Gauls all to a man cut off.

As the houſes of Rome were all demoliſhed and the walls razed, the tribunes of the people renewed, with more warmth than ever, an old project, which had occaſioned great diſputes. They had formerly propoſed a law for dividing the ſenate and government between the cities of Veii and Rome. Now this law was revived, nay, moſt of the tribunes were for entirely abandoning their old ruined city, and making Veii the ſole ſeat of the empire. The people were inclined to favour this project, Veii offering them a place fortified by art and nature, good houſes ready built, a wholeſome air, and a fruitful territory. On the other hand, they had no materials for rebuilding a whole city, were quite exhauſted by misfortunes, and even their ſtrength was greatly diminiſhed. This gave them a reluctance to ſo great an undertaking, and emboldened the tribunes to utter ſeditious harangues againſt Camillus, as a man too ambitious of being reſtorer of Rome. They even inſinuated, that the name of Romulus, which had been given him, threatened the republic with a new king. But the ſenate took the part of Camillus, and, being deſirous to ſee Rome rebuilt, continued him, contrary to cuſtom, a whole year in the office of dictator; during which time, he made it his whole buſineſs to ſuppreſs the ſtrong inclination of the people to remove to Veii. Having aſſembled the curiæ, he expoſtulated with them upon the matter, and, by arguments drawn from prudence, religion, and glory, prevailed upon them to lay aſide all thoughts of leaving Rome. As it was neceſſary to have the reſolution of the people confirmed by the ſenate, the dictator reported it to the conſcript fathers, leaving every one at free liberty to vote as he pleaſed. While L. Lucretius, who was to give his opinion the firſt, was beginning to ſpeak, it happened, that a centurion, who with his company had been upon guard, and was then marching by the ſenate-houſe, cried out aloud, Plant your colours, Enſign. This is the beſt place to ſtay in. Theſe words were conſidered as dictated by the gods themſelves, and Lucretius taking occaſion from them to urge the neceſſity of ſtaying at Rome, A happy omen, cried he, I adore the gods who gave it.

it. The whole ſenate applauded his words, and a decree was paſſed, without oppoſition, for rebuilding the city [i].

THOUGH the tribunes of the people were defeated by Camillus in this point, they reſolved to exerciſe their authority againſt another patrician, who had indeed deſerved puniſhment. This was Q. Fabius, who had violated the law of nations, and thereby provoked the Gauls, and occaſioned the burning of Rome. His crime being notorious, he was ſummoned by C. Martius Rutilus before the aſſembly of the people, to anſwer for his conduct in his embaſſy. The criminal had reaſon to fear the ſevereſt puniſhment; but his relations gave out that he died ſuddenly, which generally happened, when the accuſed perſon had courage enough to prevent his condemnation and the ſhame of the public puniſhment. On the other hand, the republic gave a houſe ſituate on the capitol to M. Manlius, as a monument of his valour and of the gratitude of his fellow-citizens. Camillus cloſed this year by laying down his dictatorſhip; whereupon an interregnum enſued, during which he governed the ſtate alternately with P. Cornelius Scipio, and it fell to his lot to preſide at the election of new magiſtrates, when L. Valerius Poplicola, L. Virginius Tricoſtus, P. Cornelius Coſſus, A. Manlius Capitolinus, L. Æmilius Mamercinus, and L. Poſthumius Albinus were choſen. The firſt care of theſe new magiſtrates was, to collect all the antient monuments of the religious and civil laws of Rome, which could be found among the ruins of the demoliſhed city. The laws of the twelve tables, and ſome of the laws of the kings, had been written on braſs and fixed up in the forum; and the treaties made with ſeveral nations had been engraven on pillars erected in the temples. Pains was therefore taken to gather up the remains of theſe precious monuments; and what could not be found was ſupplied by memory. The pontifices on their part took care to re-eſtabliſh the religious ceremonies, and made alſo a liſt of lucky and unlucky days.

Q. Fabius is cited before the people but lays violent hands on himſelf.

AND now the governors of the republic applied themſelves wholly to rebuild the city. Plutarch tells us, that as the workmen were digging among the ruins of the temple of Mars, they found Romulus's augural ſtaff untouched by the flames; and that this was looked upon as a prodigy, from whence the Romans inferred, that their city would continue for for ever. The expence of rebuilding private houſes was partly defrayed out of the public treaſure. The ædiles had the direction of the works, but ſo little taſte for order or beauty, that the city, when rebuilt, was even leſs regular than in the time of Romulus. And though in Auguſtus's time, when Rome became the capital of the known world, the temples, palaces, and private houſes were built in a more magnificent manner than before, yet even then theſe new decorations did not rectify the faults of the plan, upon which the city had been built after its firſt demolition.

CHAP. IV.

From the rebuilding of Rome to the firſt Punic or Carthaginian war.

ROME was ſcarce reſtored, when her citizens were alarmed by the news that all her neighbours were combining to her deſtruction. The Æqui, the Volſci, the Hetrurians, and even her old allies the Latins and the Hernici, entered into an alliance againſt her, in hopes of oppreſſing her before ſhe had recovered her ſtrength. The republic under this terror nominated Camillus dictator a third time. This great commander, having appointed C. Servilius to be his general of horſe, ſummoned the citizens to take arms, without excepting even the old men. He divided the new levies into three bodies. The firſt, under the command of A. Manlius, he ordered to encamp under the walls of Rome; the ſecond he ſent into the neighbourhood of Veii, and marched himſelf at the head of the third to relieve the tribunes, who were cloſely beſieged in their camp by the united forces of the Volſci and Latins. He, finding the enemy encamped near Lanuvium on the declivity of the hill Marcius, poſted himſelf behind the hill, and, by lighting fires, gave the diſtreſſed Romans notice of his arrival. The Volſci and Latins, when they underſtood that Camillus was, at the head of an army, newly arrived, were ſo terrified, that they ſhut themſelves up in their camp, which they fortified with great trees cut down in haſte. The dictator obſerving, that this barrier was of green wood, and that every morning there aroſe a great wind, which blew full upon the enemy's camp, formed the deſign of taking it by fire. With this view he ordered one part of his army to go by break of day with fire, brands to the windward ſide of the camp, and the other to make a briſk attack on the oppoſite ſide. By this means the enemy was entirely defeated and their camp taken. Camillus then ordered his men to extinguiſh the flames, in order to ſave the booty, with which he rewarded his army, a bounty the more agreeable, becauſe unexpected from the rigid dictator. He then left his ſon in the camp to guard the priſoners, and entering the country of the Æqui, made himſelf maſter of their capital city Bola. From thence he marched againſt the Volſci, whom he entirely reduced after they had waged war with the Romans for the ſpace of an hundred and ſeven years. Having ſubdued this untractable people, he penetrated into Hetruria, in order to relieve Sutrium, a town in that country in alliance with Rome, and beſieged by a numerous army of Hetrurians. But, notwithſtanding all the expedition Camillus could uſe, he did not reach the place before it had capitulated. The Sutrini, being greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions and exhauſted with labour, had ſurrendered to the Hetrurians, who had granted them nothing but their lives and the cloaths on their backs. In this deſtitute condition they had left their own country, and were going in ſearch of new habitations, when they met Camillus leading an army to their relief. The unfortunate multitude no ſooner ſaw the Romans, but they threw themſelves at the dictator's feet, who, moved at this melancholy ſight, deſired them to take a little reſt and refreſh themſelvs, adding, that he would ſoon dry up their tears, and transfer their ſorrows from them to their enemies. He imagined, that the Hetrurians would be wholly taken in plundering the city, without being upon their guard or obſerving any diſcipline. And herein he was not miſtaken. The Hetrurians did not dream that the dictator could come ſo ſpeedily, from ſo great a diſtance, to ſurprize them; and therefore the Roman army paſſed through the territory of Sutrium, without finding any advanced guards, or meeting any ſcouts, and even entered the city, before the enemy had any notice of their approach.

In a word, he ſurpriſed the Hetrurians, who were wholly employed, either in plundering the houſes and carrying off the booty, or feaſting on the proviſions they had found in them, put many of them to the ſword, made an incredible number of priſoners, and reſtored the city to its antient inhabitants, who had not waited in vain for the performance of the dictator's promiſe. And now, after theſe glorious exploits, which were finiſhed in ſo ſhort a time, the great Camillus entered Rome in triumph a third time. This honour was decreed him for having conquered the Volſci, made himſelf maſter of the capital city of the Æqui, and retaken Sutrium from the Hetrurians. The greateſt part of the captives, who graced his triumph, were ſold, and by that means money enough raiſed to pay all the Roman ladies for the jewels they had formerly contributed to make a preſent to Apollo. With the remainder were bought three vaſes of gold, which, with Camillus's name inſcribed on them, were placed at the feet of Juno in the temple of Jupiter. Thus did the glory of Camillus eclipſe that of all his rivals. Envious men had hitherto aſcribed the greateſt part of his victories to chance. But, after theſe three laſt expeditions againſt three different nations, envy itſelf was ſilent [k].

CAMILLUS having reſigned his dictatorſhip, the republic choſe ſix new military tribunes, Q. Quinctius, Q. Servius, L. Julius, L. Aquilius, L. Lucretius, and Ser. Sulpitius. During their adminiſtration, the country of the Æqui was laid waſte, in order to put it out of their power to revolt anew, and the two cities of Cortuoſa and Contenebra, in the lucumony of the Tarquinienſes, taken from the Hetrurians and entirely demoliſhed. At this time it was thought proper to repair the capitol, and add new works to that part of the hill, where the Gauls had endeavoured to ſcale the citadel. Theſe works were eſteemed very beautiful, as Livy informs us, even in the time of Auguſtus, after the city was adorned with moſt beautiful decorations [l].

The cities of Cortuoſa and Contenebra taken by the Romans, and demoliſhed.

AND now, Rome being reinſtated in her former flouriſhing condition, the tribunes of the people, who had been for ſome time quiet, began to renew their ſeditious harangues harangues, and revive the old quarrel about the diviſion of the conquered lands. The patricians had appropriated to themſelves the Pomptin territory lately taken from the Volſci, and the tribunes laid hold of this opportunity to raiſe new diſturbances. But, the citizens being ſo drained of their money, that they had not enough left to cultivate new farms and ſtock them with cattle, the declamations of the tribunes made no impreſſion upon their minds, ſo that the tribunes project vaniſhed. As for the military tribunes, they owned, that their election had been defective, and left the irregularities of the former comitia ſhould be continued in the ſucceeding ones, they voluntarily laid down their office. So that after a ſhort inter-regnum, during which M. Manlius, Ser. Sulpicius, and L. Valerius Potitus governed the republic, ſix new military tribunes, L. Papirius, C. Sergius, L. Æmilius, L. Menenius, L. Valerius, and C. Cornelius were choſen for the enſuing year, which was ſpent in works of peace. A temple, which had been vowed to Mars during the war with the Gauls, was built, and conſecrated by T. Quinctius, who preſided over the affairs of religion. As there had hitherto been but few Roman tribes beyond the Tiber, which had a right of ſuffrage in the comitia, four new ones were added, under the name of the Stellatina, Tramontina, Sabatina, and Arnienſis, ſo that the tribes were now in all twenty-five, which enjoyed the ſame rights and privileges.

THE expectation of an approaching war induced the centuries to chuſe Camillus one of the military tribunes for the next year. His collegues were Ser. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, L. Quinctius, L. Horatius, and P. Valerius. As theſe were all men of moderation, they agreed to inveſt Camillus with the ſole management of affairs, in time of war, and accordingly in full ſenate transferred all their power into his hands; ſo that he became in effect dictator. It had been already determined in the ſenate to turn the arms of the republic againſt the Hetrurians; but upon advice that the Antiates had entered the Pomptin territory, and obliged the Romans, who had taken poſſeſſion of it, to retire, it was thought neceſſary to humble them before the republic engaged in any other enterpriſe. The new dictator, if we may ſo call him, allotted lotted to each of the five military tribunes an employment ſuitable to his rank. He joined P. Valerius with himſelf in the command of the army, which he was to lead againſt the Antiates. Q. Servilius was placed at the head of a body of troops, which was to continue in Rome, and be in a continual readineſs to march againſt the Hetrurians, or Latins and Hernici, in caſe they took the field. The third army wholly conſiſted of old men, and ſuch citizens as were excuſed on account of their infirmities from taking the field. The command of theſe was given to L. Quinctius, who was appointed to guard the walls of the city. L. Horatius's province was to ſupply the troops with arms, ammunition, and proviſions. Laſtly, the ſuperintendency of civil affairs, the comitia, the laws, and religion were committed to the care of Ser. Cornelius. So that none of the military tribunes, who had in ſome meaſure deveſted themſelves of their power in favour of Camillus, was left without an employment: they all readily accepted the provinces, which Camillus aſſigned them, only Valerius refuſed to be upon an equal foot with Camillus, 'You ſhall be my dictator,' ſaid he, 'and I 'will ſerve under you as your general of the horſe.' The Antiates had joined the Latins and Hernici near Satricum, ſo that the Romans being terrified at their prodigious numbers, ſhewed themſelves very backward to engage; which Camillus perceiving, he inſtantly mounted his horſe, and riding through all the ranks of the army, Fellow-ſoldiers, cried he, "Why don't I ſee "that joy and deſire of fighting in your looks, which "you uſed to have? Have you forgot, who I am, who "you yourſelves, and who your enemies are? Have "not the Volſci and the Latins been the occaſion of "your gaining immortal fame? Have you not con"quered Veii, defeated the Gauls, and delivered Rome "under my command? Am I not Camillus, becauſe I "have not the title of dictator? Do you but attack "the enemy, and we ſhall ſucceed as uſual. You will "conquer, and they will fly." Having uttered theſe words, he diſmounted, took the next ſtandard-bearer by the hand, led him towards the enemy, and cried out, 'Soldiers advance.' The ſoldiery was aſhamed not to follow a general, who expoſed himſelf to the firſt attack, and having therefore made a great ſhout, they fell upon upon the enemy with incredible fury. Camillus, in order to encreaſe their eagerneſs ſtill more, commanded a ſtandard to be thrown into the middle of the enemy's battalions, which made the ſoldiers, who were fighting in the firſt ranks, exert all their reſolution to recover it. The Antiates, not being able any longer to make head againſt the Romans, gave way and were entirely defeated. The Latins and Hernici ſeparated from the Volſci and returned home. The Volſci, ſeeing themſelves thus abandoned bv their allies, took refuge in the neighbouring city of Satricum, which Camillus immediately inveſted and took by aſſault. The Volſci threw down their arms and ſurrendered at diſcretion. He then left his army under the command of Valerius, and returned to Rome to ſolicit the conſent of the ſenate, and to make the neceſſary preparations for undertaking the ſiege of Antium. But while he was propoſing this affair to the ſenate, deputies arrived from Nepet and Sutrium, two cities in alliance with Rome in the neighbourhood of Hetruria, demanding ſuccours againſt the Hetrurians, who threatened to beſiege theſe two cities, which were the keys of Hetruria. Hereupon the expedition againſt Antium was laid aſide, and Camillus commanded to haſten to the relief of the allied cities, with the troops which Servilius had kept in readineſs at Rome, in caſe of an emergency. Camillus immediately ſet out for the new war, and upon his arrival before Sutrium found that important place not only beſieged, but almoſt taken, the Hetrurians having made themſelves maſters of ſome of the gates, and taken poſſeſſion of all the avenues leading to the city. However, the inhabitants no ſooner heard, that Camillus was come to their relief, but they recovered their courage, and, by barricadoes made in the ſtreets, prevented the enemy from making themſelves maſters of the whole city. Camillus in the mean time having divided his army into two bodies, ordered Valerius to march round the walls, as if he deſigned to ſcale them, while he with the other undertook to charge the Hetrurians in the rear, force his way into the city, and ſhut up the enemy between the beſieged and his troops. The Romans no ſooner appeared, but the Hetrurians betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight, through a gate which was not inveſted. Camillus's troops made a dread-

a dreadful ſlaughter of them within the city, while Valerius put great numbers of them to the ſword without the walls. From reconquering Sutrium, Camillus haſtened to the relief of Nepet. But that city, being better affected to the Hetrurians than to the Romans, had voluntarily ſubmitted to the former. Wherefore Camillus, having inveſted it with his whole army, took it by aſſault, put all the Hetrurian ſoldiers, without diſtinction, to the ſword, and condemned the authors of the revolt to die by the axes of the lictors. Thus ended Camillus's military tribuneſhip, in which he acquired no leſs reputation, than he had done in the moſt glorious of his dictatorſhips [m].

And takes Nepet by aſſault.

But as well eſtabliſhed as Camillus's reputation was in Rome, yet he was not without a rival; M. Manlius, who had ſaved the capitol, could not bear to ſee his glory eclipſed by that of Camillus. He was indeed one of the braveſt ſoldiers Rome had ever produced; but his ambition and vanity were yet greater than his valour. However, he did not attempt any thing till Camillus's fourth military tribuneſhip was expired. But no ſooner was the government put into the hands of ſix new military tribunes, A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, T. Quinctius, L. Quinctius, L. Papirius, and C. Sergius, than he began to vent his ſpleen, and endeavour to darken the glory of a man, whom he looked upon as his rival. After all, Camillus's chief glory, ſaid he, is his having recovered Rome out of the hands of the Gauls, which he could never have done, had I not firſt ſaved the capitol; ſo that his glory is founded upon mine. Nor did he conquer the Gauls, till they had been tired with a long ſiege. But I repulſed them from the capitol, when they were moſt flushed with ſucceſs. A whole army ſhared Camillus's glory with him; but Manlius had no companion in his. By theſe and ſuch-like ſpeeches, he gave vent to his envy; but finding himſelf unable by noble actions to outſhine Camillus in reputation, in order to ſatisfy his ambition, he began to court the multitude, and even entered into the faction of the tribunes of the people. Though a patrician by birth, he inveighed againſt the nobility, and eſpouſed the cauſe of the people in the affair of the diſtribution of lands. He even oppoſed the rich, whenever they ſeized their debtors, and ſet at liberty thoſe who were already in chains. So that he was always attended by a kind of guard made up of thoſe whom he had ſo aſſiſted. The ſenate, alarmed at Manlius's proceeding, thought it neceſſary to create a dictator, in order to prevent the evil conſequences of his two great popularity, and to cruſh the riſing faction. The army, which the Volſci had juſt then raiſed, furniſhed them with a ſpecious pretence for taking ſuch meaſures. The dictatorſhip was given to A. Cornelius Coſſus, who named T. Quinctius Capitolinus to be general of the horſe. The dictator came to an engagement with the Volſci in the Pomptin territory, and entirely defeated them, though much more numerous than the Romans. Among the priſoners, were found many Latins and Hernici of diſtinction, who being examined confeſſed, that they had acted by authority. Hereupon the dictator kept his army in the field, not doubting but he ſhould be ſoon employed againſt thoſe faithleſs allies. But the diſturbances raiſed by the factious Manlius called him back to the city without delay. It was neceſſary to examine into the deſigns of that ambitious man, whoſe popularity was become dangerous. A creditor had lately ſeized a centurion for debt, who was a man of great courage, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions. As the officer was leading him to priſon, according to his ſentence, Manlius and his ſeditious company met them. Upon which the factious patrician began to inveigh againſt the pride of the nobility and the cruelty of the rich, who lent money upon intereſt; but, above all, expatiated on the merit of the inſolvent centurion; what ſignifies my having ſaved the capitol, ſaid he, if more cruel enemies than the Gauls are ſuffered to rob me of a brave and faithful companion in battle, and reduce him to ſlavery? Having uttered theſe words, in the preſence of the officer and five witneſſes, he paid the debt, admitting the priſoner, as ſoon as he was delivered out of his creditor's hands, to be one of the guard that always attended him. This gave great umbrage in a republican ſtate, where the magiſtrates were always upon their guard againſt any thing that tended to monarchy. But ſoon after Manlius encreaſed their apprehenſions by a yet more extravagant act of popularity. He had ſome lands in the territory of Veii, which were his paternal eſtate. Theſe he ſold by auction, and declared to the people, that he deſigned to apply the whole to the paying of the debts of inſolvent debtors. Theſe bounties made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion on the multitude, that they ſeemed ready to back him in any enterprize he ſhould undertake. Beſides, all his diſcourſes in his own houſe tended only to decry the patricians and the ſenate. He gave out, that the nobility, not content to rob the people of their right to a ſhare in the conquered lands, had concealed, with an intent to appropriate it to their own uſe, the gold, which was to have been given to the Gauls, and had been raiſed by the voluntary contributions of all the citizens who were then in the capitol: a treaſure, which alone would be ſufficient to diſcharge all the debts of the poor plebeians. He even promiſed to ſhew them in due time the place where this treaſure was concealed; ſo that the whole care of the populace was to draw thoſe riches out of the hands of the patricians [n].

SUCH was the poſture of affairs at Rome, when the dictator Coſſus returned thither. He therefore poſtponed his triumph, till ſuch time as he had re-eſtabliſhed the public tranquillity. He made it his firſt buſineſs to aſſemble the ſenate, and finding the fathers inclined to ſuppreſs Manlius's inſolence, he ordered his tribunal to be placed in that part of the forum, where the comitia was held, and ſent a lictor to cite Manlius to appear before him. Manlius obyed the ſummons, but attended by his uſual guards, whom he exhorted to ſtand by him. The aſſembly looked like two armies drawn up in battalia againſt each other. Silence being made, the dictator challenged Manlius to declare, as he had promiſed, the perſons who had concealed the pretended treaſures, and the place where they were hid; otherwiſe he threatened to ſend him to priſon as an incendiary and ſlanderer. Manlius, inſtead of anſwering directly, extolled his own merit, and reproached the patricians with avarice and cruelty. He concluded his ſpeech with ſaying, that as to the ſecrete treaſure, the ſenators, who had concealed it, were better qualified than he to diſcover the place. But this being only an evaſion, the dictator preſſed him anew, either to perform his promiſe to the people, or to confeſs that he had caluminated the ſenate. Manlius replied, that his thus preſſing him to declare the place where the gold was hoarded, was a convincing proof, that the ſenate had removed it beyond rhe reach of the moſt curious enquiry. Hereupon the dictator immediately ordered him to priſon. We have on this occaſion a ſurpriſing inſtance of the ready ſubmiſſion of the Romans to the command of a lawful magiſtrate. The people, however ſeditiouſly devoted to Manlius, took no one ſtep to hinder the execution of the ſentence. There was not an angry expreſſion heard, or a threatening look ſeen, in the whole aſſembly. The tribunes themſelves did not ſhew diſreſpect to the dictator. Only Manlius, when the lictors laid hold of him, cried out, addreſſing his complaints to the Gods, "O Jupiter, beſt "and greateſt, O Juno, queen of heaven, Minerva, and "all ye other gods and goddeſſes, who reſide in the ca-"pitol, will you ſuffer your champion and defender to "be thus treated by his enemies? Shall this right hand, "with which I drove the Gauls from your ſanctuaries, "be locked in chains?" But theſe lamentations raiſed no diſturbances among the multitude. His moſt zealous adherents expreſſed their concern only by habits of mourning, neglecting to cut their hair and beards, crouding about the doors of the priſon, and there lamenting his misfortune. In this time of affliction the dictator Coſſus received the honours of a triumph. But the multitude expreſſed nothing but a deep concern on that day of joy; ſome were even heard to ſay, that Coſſus did not ſo much triumph over the Volſci, as over an oppreſſed citizen. Nothing, ſaid they, remains to complete the general's triumph, but to have the unfortunate Manlius led before his chariot in chains. In order therefore to appeaſe the people, the ſenate thought it neceſſary to ſhew them ſome indulgence. They aſſembled, and, of their own motion, ordered a colony of Roman citizens to be ſent to Sutrium, where they allotted to every man two acres and an half of arable land. But this unexpected bounty was ſo far from ſatisfying the malecontents, that it encreaſed their rage and jealouſy. For they looked upon this liberality of the ſenate as an artifice to induce the citizens to abandon Manlius. So that the ſedition gained ground, and the fury of the populace encreaſed ſtill more, as ſoon as Coſſus's dictatorſhip was expired. The multitude, being now freed from the dread of an uncontroulable magiſtrate, no longer kept within any bounds. The people, ſurrounding the priſon day and night, threatened to break it open. The ſenate, fearing leſt the incenſed populace in their fury ſhould execute what they threatened, and that Manlius, being ſet at liberty by ſuch violent means, ſhould carry his fury farther than ever, thought fit to put an end to the diſturbance by releaſing him themſelves. But this timorous proceeding only gave the ſeditious a leader, provoked by the ſhame of his impriſonment, and incapable of following ſober counſels.

But is ſet at liberty.

DURING theſe ſeditions, embaſſadors arrived from the Latins, the Hernici, and from the cities of Circæi and Velitræ, demanding, that the priſoners, taken by the dictator in the late action with the Volſci, might be delivered up to them. The different reception they met with ſhews the diſtinction, which the Romans always made between nations in alliance with them and Roman colonies. Circæi and Velitræ were upon the foot of colonies, but the Latins and Hernici only in alliance with Rome: the latter enjoyed their own laws; the former were ſubject to the laws of Rome. The embaſſadors therefore of the Latins and Hernici were received, though their demand was rejected, nor did the Romans diſpute their right of ſending an embaſſy. But the deputies of Circæi and Velitræ were ordered immediately to depart, and not appear before the people, ſince they had no right to ſend embaſſadors[o].

WHEN new magiſtrates came to be elected for the next year, the great Camillus was choſen military tribune a fifth time, the republic wanting a governor of his reputation to ſtem the tide of the preſent troubles. With him were joined Ser. Cornelius, P. Valerius, Ser. Sulpicius, C. Papirius, and T. Quinctius. The confidence of Manlius and the ſtrength of his faction were now much encreaſed by the timorouſneſs of the ſenate. The mutineers met at Manlius's houſe, which was crouded with them day and night. There he ſpoke his mind without reſerve, exhorting the multitude to ſhake off the yoke they groaned under, to aboliſh dictatorſhips and conſulates, to eſtabliſh an exact equality among all the members of one and the ſame republic, and to make themſelves an head, who would govern and keep in awe the patricians as well as the people. "If you "judge me worthy of that honour," ſaid he, "the more

" power you give me, the ſooner you will be in poſſeſſion " of what you have ſo long wiſhed for. I deſire authority " with no other view, but to make you all happy." It is ſaid, that a plot was formed to ſeize the citadel and declare him king; but it is not certain, that he embarqued in ſo difficult an undertaking, or how far he carried his ambitious views. The ſenate, alarmed at the danger which threatened the republic, aſſembled frequently to deliberate on the beſt method to avert the blow. A decree was made, enjoining the military tribunes " To be watchful, that the republic received no damage "; a form of words, which was never uſed but in the greateſt dangers of the ſtate, and which inveſted thoſe magiſtrates with an authority almoſt equal to that of a dictator. After this different means were propoſed for defeating the evil deſigns of Manlius. All, except the tribunes of the people, were for aſſaſſinating the author of the ſedition. But as ſuch an attempt would have occaſioned the ſhedding of much blood, two of thoſe tribunes, M. Mænius and Q. Publilius, thought it more adviſeable to take him off by the uſual forms of law. They offered to proſecute him before the comitia, not doubting but the people, when they ſaw their tribunes become his accuſers, would immediately deſert him. This advice was approved, and Manlius ſummoned to his trial before the comitia by centuries. The crime laid to his charge was, his aiming at the ſovereign power; and as this was a capital crime, the accuſed appeared before his judges in deep mourning. But neither his own brothers, nor any of his relations changed their dreſs, or ſolicited the judges in his behalf, as was uſually done by the friends of a perſon accuſed; ſo much did the love of liberty prevail in the hearts of the Romans over all the ties of blood and kindred. Livy tells us, that he could not find in any author what direct proofs the tribunes brought of Manlius's aſpiring to the regal power. However, he ſuppoſes, that they had ſufficient proofs, ſince nothing but the circumſtances of the place, where he was tried, prevented his immediate condemnation. They could ſee the capitol, which Manlius had preſerved, from the campus Martius, where his ſentence was to be pronounced; and this ſight alone abated the reſentment of the centuries againſt the criminal; ſo that the people, who could neither reſolve to condemn or acquit him, put off pronouncing ſentence more than once, and every time poſtponed this affair for three market-days. In the mean time, Manlius omitted nothing that could move his judges to compaſſion. He produced above four hundred plebeians, whoſe debts he had paid, and whom he had delivered out of the hands of their creditors. He ſhewed the people thirty ſuits of armour, the ſpoils of thirty enemies, whom he had ſlain in ſingle combat. He had been the firſt Roman who had deſerved a mural crown by fighting on horſeback. He had been honoured with eight civic crowns, for having ſaved in battle the lives of ſo many citizens, and had been ſeven and thirty times rewarded by his generals for his extraordinary valour. He had ſaved in battle the life of C. Servilius, when general of the horſe, and had received two wounds on that occaſion. But his greateſt glory was, his having defended the capitol againſt the attack of the Gauls. This important piece of ſervice ſupported the criminal, notwithſtanding the evident proofs of his crime. Looking often at the capitol, he called upon Jupiter and the other gods for ſuccour, conjuring the people to turn their faces to that ſanctuary, and think of the gods who reſided there, when they were going to pronounce judgment. The people, having before their eyes the very place, where, by fighting ſo valiantly againſt the Gauls, he had ſaved Rome, could not reſolve to find him guilty. The tribunes, perceiving this, deferred the deciſion of the affair to another day, and appointed the place of the aſſembly to be in the Peteline wood, without the gate Flumentana, whence the capitol could not be ſeen. Then the object, which had ſaved Manlius, no longer dazzling the eyes of his judges, they forgot his glory, and remembered only his crime. The public welfare gained the aſcendant over their gratitude, and the unhappy Manlius was condemned to be thrown headlong from the capitol itſelf. The ſentence was no ſooner pronounced than put in execution: the houſe, where he had held his private cabals, was razed to the ground, and it was decreed, that no patrician ſhould thenceforth dwell on the capitol, leſt the advantageous ſituation of a fortreſs, that commanded the whole city, ſhould ſuggeſt and facilitate the deſign of enſlaving it. The Manlian family alſo came to a reſolution among themſelves, that no member of it ſhould ever bear the prænomen of Marcus. But how inconſiſtent is the multitude! Manlius was ſcarce dead, when his loſs was generally lamented, and a plague,

a plague, which ſoon followed, aſcribed to the anger of Jupiter againſt the authors of his death [p].

Wars carried on with the Prænestini and Volſci.

THE puniſhment of the ſeditious Manlius neither brought any diſcredit upon his relations, or leſſened their intereſt. On the contrary, his brother A. Manlius was choſen one of the military tribunes at the very next election. His collegues were L. Valerius, Ser. Sulpicius, L. Lucretius, L. Æmilius, and M. Trebonius. During their adminiſtration, the Volſci threatened the republic with a new war; the cities of Circæi and Velitræ continued in their revolt; Lanuvium itſelf, ever before faithful to Rome, declared againſt her, and all the cities of Latium ſeemed ready to riſe in their turns. And, to add to the misfortunes of the republic, the plague ſtill raged in the city. However, the ſenate judged it neceſſary to engage the people to conſent to a war. In order to this, they promiſed to divide the Pomptin territory among them, and nominated five commiſſioners to regulate the diſtribution of the lands, and three others to lead a colony to Nepet. But this deſign was not put in execution till nine years after. However, the comitia by tribes being aſſembled, it was decreed, that a war ſhould be declared with the ſeveral enemies of Rome, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the tribunes of the people. Accordingly, an army was raiſed, but the plague continuing to rage, the military tribunes could not lead their troops into the field. In the mean time, the inhabitants of Prænesſte, following the example of the other colonies, revolted, and committed great devaſtations in the territories of the Gabini, Tuſculani, and Labicani, who continued ſteady in their alliance with Rome. Though theſe faithful allies brought complaints to the ſenate of the hoſtilities committed in their diſtricts, yet the fathers pretended not to believe them, chuſing rather to diſſemble with them, than to take up arms in their preſent unhappy ſituation. But the Romans, who ſcarce ever ſuffered any attempt againſt their republic to eſcape unpuniſhed, only ſuſpended their reſentment. For, in the following military tribuneſhip of Sp. Papirius, L. Papirius, Ser. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, Ser. Sulpicius, and L. Æmilius, the two Papirii being ſent againſt the Veliterni, defeated them, though joined by great numbers from Prænesſte, and obliged them to ſhelter themſelves within the walls of their city. However, the generals did not think it adviſeable, either to attempt a doubtful ſiege, or to carry hoſtilities ſo far as to exterminate a Roman colony. The

The ſenate alſo adjudged it more neceſſary to purſue the war with vigour againſt the Prænestini, who had farther provoked the Romans, by aſſiſting their irreconcileable enemies the Volſci.

THESE expeditions therefore, which were to be undertaken, made the aſſembled centuries caſt their eyes on Camillus, and raiſe him a ſixth time to the military tribuneſhip. He was indeed very unwilling to embarque again in public affairs, being now very infirm and apprehenſive of the viciſſitudes of fortune. He therefore endeavoured to decline the honour which the people had conferred upon him, pleading his age and infirmities. But the people would not hearken to his repreſentations. We don't expect, ſaid they, that Camillus ſhould perſonally engage either on foot, or on horſeback, or that he ſhould join the bravery of the private ſoldier to the wiſdom of the general. All we now deſire of him is, to aſſiſt our armies with his council and command them; this is enough to make them invincible. Camillus could not help complying with their requeſt; he accepted the military tribuneſhip, in which he had the following collegues, A. Poſthumius, L. Poſthumius, L. Furius, L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambuſtus. The command of the army, which was to be employed againſt the Volſci, was decreed to Camillus by the ſenate; but it fell by lot to L. Furius to be joined with him in the command. The two generals commanded an army of four legions, conſiſting of four thouſand men each, which marched to Sutrium, where the Volſci and Prænestini had formed a camp, and waited without fear for the Romans, being far more numerous than they, and flushed with their late ſucceſs againſt Satricum, which they had taken and put moſt of the inhabitants to the ſword. Camillus, whether he waited to recover his health, for he was greatly indiſpoſed, or to receive a reinforcement of troops, was not in haſte to come to a battle. But, in the mean time, the Volſci appearing drawn up in battle and provoking the Romans, the latter could hardly be reſtrained from ſallying out of their camp and falling upon them. Their ardor for fighting was encreaſed by the raſh diſcourſes of young Furius, who imputed the prudent delays of his collegue to his age, which he ſaid, had chilled his blood. At length the Volſci not only marched out their men on their own ground near the camp, but advanced into the open fields, and carried on their lines almoſt to the Roman camp. This was ſuch an

inſult, as neither Furius nor the legions could bear. The young general therefore addreſſing himſelf to Camillus, reproached him, that he was the only perſon in the army for delaying the engagement, and urged him to comply with the deſires of the ſoldiers. Camillus anſwered with an air of ſuperiority, but with great temper, that hitherto Rome had not been diſſatisfied either with his conduct or ſucceſs. But nevertheleſs, if the impetuoſity, which hurried the ſoldiers on to an engagement, could not be reſtrained, he wiſhed them ſucceſs, but deſired to be excuſed on account of his age from engaging in the foremoſt ranks. Furius drew up his troops in order of battle; but Camillus made it his buſineſs to prepare a corps de reſerve to aſſiſt his colleague in caſe of diſtreſs: Furius charged with great vigour, and the Volſci, feigning to give way, drew the Roman legions half way up the hill, on which their camp was ſituated; then ſallying out with freſh troops, by the advantage of the ground, obliged the Romans to retire in great diſorder. The Volſci purſued them cloſe to the very gates of their camp, which thoſe brave legions, a little before ſo deſirous of fighting, ſtrove by a ſhameful flight to regain. Camillus, though greatly indiſpoſed, no ſooner heard that the Romans were defeated, than he quitted his tent, and haſtening to the gate of the camp with his body of reſerve, cried out to the flying legions, is this then, Romans, the victory, you were ſo ſure of? What god or man can you blame, but your ſelves? You are come to ſeek for ſhelter in that camp, which you were ſo deſirous to abandon. But you ſhall not enter it till you have repulſed the enemy. Having uttered theſe words, he put himſelf at the head of the troops, which he had kept with him in the camp, and encouraging the legions that had fled to return with him to the engagment, he obliged the enemy to retire, which was all he could do that day. But the next day he drew up his troops in the plain, and challenged the enemy to a ſecond engagement. Furius, whom Camillus had placed at the head of the cavalry, behaved himſelf in the battle, which enſued, with uncommon valour. For the infantry being hard preſſed, he prevailed upon his cavalry to diſmount, and came ſo opportunely to the relief of the foot, that the numerous army of the Volſci was entirely routed, their camp taken, and their chief commanders either ſlain or made priſoners. Among the captives captives were found ſome Tuſculans, who, as their city was in alliance with Rome, were ſeparated from the reſt and brought before the generals. Upon examination, they declared, that they had taken arms with the conſent and by the orders of their magiſtrates. This alarmed Camillus, who thought it neceſſary to go in perſon to Rome with the priſoners, and lay the matter before the ſenate. During his abſence, he left the army under the command of Furius, who was now grown prudent by the ill ſucceſs of his late attempt. However, it was generally believed both in the camp and the city, that the general's chief buſineſs at Rome was to accuſe his collegue, whoſe raſh conduct had like to have deſtroyed the army. The ſenate therefore was ſurpriſed to hear him ſpeak of nothing but the revolt of the Tuſculans. He was charged to puniſh their defection in an exemplary manner, and allowed to chuſe which of his five collegues he pleaſed to command with him in this new expedition. Upon which they all made intereſt to attend him, in order to learn the art of war under ſo great a general. But the generous Camillus, to the great ſurprize both of the ſenate and army, preferred Furius to all the reſt, being more deſirous to conceal the ſhame of one who had perſonally affronted him, than to purſue the dictates of revenge. An inſtance of moderation, which gained him no leſs eſteem and veneration than all his victories. The two generals began their march; and either the artifice of thoſe faithful allies, or their true repentance, gave the wiſe Camillus a freſh opportunity of ſignalizing his moderation. For when he entered their territories, he found the huſbandmen at work in the fields, as in times of the profoundeſt peace, the magiſtrates of the city ſent him proviſions, and came out to meet him. When he entered the city, he found the citizens with their wives and children walking about the ſtreets, without betraying the leaſt fear or ſurprize. The ſchools and ſhops were open, the markets full, and not the leaſt ſign of war. The general, pleaſed to find the Tuſculans returned to their duty, aſſembled the chief men of their republic, and, having told them that they had found out the true ſecret of diſarming the reſentment of the Romans, adviſed them to ſend a deputation to Rome, and apply to the ſenate, who were the proper judges, whether their preſent conduct was a ſufficient atonement for their paſt defection. Deputies were accordingly diſpatched, who, habited in mourning and with their dictator at their head, addreſſed the conſcript fathers in a ſuppliant manner. The ſenate readily forgave them, and ſoon after even granted them the privileges of Roman citizens (Q). Thus ended the ſixth military tribuneſhip of the incomparable Camillus [q].

THE military tribunes choſen to ſucceed him and his colleagues were, L. Valerius, P. Valerius, L. Menenius, C. Sergius, Sp. Papirius, and Ser. Cornelius, whoſe adminiſtration was diſturbed by domeſtic ſeditions and a foreign war. Sp. Poſthumius, one of the cenſors, died; whereupon the other laid down his office, as the law directed, and the Romans proceeded to a new election. But as the patricians were afraid of the cenſus, which muſt of courſe diſcover their riches and exceſſive uſury, they pretended, that there was ſome defect in the election, and thence took occaſion to declare, that it was againſt the will of the gods that Rome ſhould have any cenſors that year. On the other hand, the tribunes of the people uſed their utmoſt endeavours to bring on a new election of the cenſors as ſoon as poſſible. This occaſioned great diſturbances, during which the Prænestines

(Q) He only was a Roman citizen, in the moſt extenſive ſignification of the expreſſion, who had a right of having an houſe in Rome, of giving his ſuffrage in the comitia, and of ſtanding candidate for any office; and conſequently, who was incorporated into one of the tribes. The freed-men did not enjoy all theſe privileges, for in the times of the republic they were excluded from dignities. The municipal towns and Roman colonies enjoyed the right of citizenſhip, which had ſometimes more, ſometimes fewer, privileges annexed to it. The municipal cities enjoyed this privilege by a particular grant from the ſenate and people, without being obliged to change their own form of government. But there was this difference between them, that ſome of them could, others could not, either give their votes, or ſtand candidates for offices. This account of the municipia, and the difference between them, is agreeable to Livy, who tells us, that the inhabitants of Cære were made municipes with the right of ſuffrage; and elſewhere ſpeaking of Fundi and Formiæ, ſays, that theſe two cities did not obtain the right of ſuffrage, without much application, though they had already the right of citizenſhip. As for the Roman colonies, they enjoyed more or fewer privileges and exemptions peculiar to Roman citizens, in proportion to their fidelity and the ſervices they rendered the republic.

neſtines entered the Roman territory, and advanced to the very gates of the city. However, the tribunes would ſuffer no levies to be made, till the ſenate had recourſe to the uſual expedient in great extremities. Titus Quinctius was in all haſte nominated dictator, and he appointed A. Sempronius to be his general of horſe. The Prænestines no ſooner underſtood that Rome had created a dictator, but they removed farther off, and troops were raiſed in the city without oppoſition. The enemy, hoping that the banks of the Allia would prove always unlucky for the Romans, encamped there. But their hopes proved vain, the dictator purſued them, and gave them a total overthrow. They fled to Prænestе, but the dictator coming up with them, before they reached that place, defeated them in a ſecond engagement, took all their ſtrong-holds in a few days, and then appeared before Prænestе itſelf, wich capitulated. Quinctius, having thus reduced the enemy, returned to Rome, and brought with him from Prænestе the ſtatue of Jupiter Imperator, which, as an eternal monument of his glory, was placed in the capitol between Jupiter Capitolinus and Minerva. The dictator entered Rome in triumph, and then laid down his office, which had laſted but twenty-five days [r].

THE complaints of the inſolvent debtors, which ſtill continued, occaſioned this year an alteration in the government. Whether the aſſembled centuries divided the military tribuneſhip between the patricians and plebeians of their own accord, or by conſtraint, is uncertain; but we are told by all the antients, that three military tribunes were choſen out of the nobility, and three out of the people. The patricians were, P. Manlius, C. Manlius, and L. Julius; the plebeians, C. Sextilius, M. Albinius, and L. Antiſtius. Diodorus Siculus reckons up eight military tribunes for this year, as he did for the preceding; but herein he is as much miſtaken, as he is in changing Caius Sextilius's name into that of Caius Sextius. The two Manlii, without drawing lots, were appointed to command the army againſt the Volſci; but Rome had ſoon occaſion to repent of the choice ſhe had made, for the two tribunes having divided their army and encamped near each other, they ſent out their cavalry to forage, without being well acquainted with the country. The enemy did not think proper to intercept, as they might, the the foragers, but by a ſtratagem found means to draw the whole army into an ambuſcade. They ſent to the Roman camps a Latin ſoldier, diguiſed like a Roman, to acquaint the generals, that their foragers were ſurrounded by the enemy, and muſt be inevitably cut off, if not relieved without delay. This was giving a general alarm; the two commanders, without ſo much as thinking of detaining the meſſenger who brought this falſe news, marched out of their camps with precipitation and in diſorder, hurrying their troops into narrow paſſes, where the Volſci lay in wait for them. The Romans though in diſorder, fought with incredible bravery, and were by their deſperate courage alone preſerved from total deſtruction. But while they were wholly intent on defending themſelves againſt one body of the enemy's forces, the other took and plundered the two Roman camps without reſiſtance. The ill conduct of the Manlii made the ſenate deliberate, whether a dictator ſhould be nominated; but the enemy attempting nothing farther, it was reſolved to recall the army and its commanders. During theſe misfortunes abroad, a profound peace reigned at home, which, no doubt, was owing to the ſhare the plebeians had in the government.

The Roman camp taken and plundered by the Volſci.

THE enſuing year, the centuries choſe only patricians, viz. Sp Furius, Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, P. Clælius, M. Horatius, and L. Geganius. The people therefore renewed their antient complaints, and, in order to free themſelves from the oppreſſions of the rich, got at length two cenſors choſen, Servilius Priſcus and Clælius Siculus, who took an exact account of the people and their effects, and concluded the cenſus with a luſtrum, which the Faſti Capitolini call the nineteenth from its inſtitution. So that nothing now remained for the cenſors to do, but to put an end to the diſputes between the patricians and plebeians, by relieving the poor debtors, who were oppreſſed by the exceſſive uſury of their avaricious creditors. But, in the mean time, news being brought to Rome, that the Volſci had entered the Roman territory and were committing ravages there, the cenſors ſuſpended this work, under pretence, that it was of more conſequence to the ſtate to guard againſt hoſtilities abroad, than diſſenſions at home. But the tribunes of the people purſued their point, and, playing their uſual game, oppoſed the levies; ſo that the ſenate was obliged to iſſue a decree, that no perſon ſhould be diſturbed for debt, or even

even the payment of the uſual taxes, during the campaign. The levies were then made without oppoſition and two armies raiſed, which marching by different ways into the country of the Volſci, laid it waſte, and returned to Rome with an immenſe booty, the enemy not daring to appear in the field. The patricians no ſooner found themſelves free from the terror of a foreign war, but they cited their debtors to appear before the judges as uſual, the tribunes of the people not being able to lend them any aſſiſtance ſo long as peace continued abroad.

The country of the Volſci laid waſte.

THE following year, the centuries choſe ſix patrician military tribunes, viz. L. Æmilius, S. Sulpicius, P. Valerius, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, C. Veturius, and C. Quinctius. During their adminiſtration, the Latins and Volſci, entering into a new confederacy againſt the republic, took the field and encamped near Satricum. It is ſurprizing, that the tribunes of the people ſhould not lay hold of the opportunity, which the diſcontents and complaints of the debtors gave them, to oppoſe the raiſing of troops. The patricians had in all likelihood at this time the aſcendant over the plebeians; for three armies were raiſed without the leaſt oppoſition; one to guard the walls; another to be ready to march on the firſt notice; and the third, which was the moſt numerous, to attack the enemy in the neighbourhood of Satricum, under the command of P. Valerius and L. Æmilius. Theſe two generals found the Latins and Volſci advantageouſly poſted; but nevertheleſs did not delay giving them battle, which laſted till it was interrupted by ſo violent a rain, that neither party could keep the field. It was renewed next day, and at firſt with pretty equal ſucceſs on both ſides, the Latins, who had been long in alliance with the Romans, having learnt of them the art of war. At length the Latin battalions were broke and put in diſorder by the Roman cavalry, which occaſioned the defeat of the whole confederate army. The fugitives retired in great diſorder, firſt to Satricum, about two miles from the field of battle, and from thence to Antium, with a deſign to ſecure themſelves in that city. But the Antiates, not thinking their city to be in a condition to hold out a long ſiege, were for ſurrendering to the Romans on honourable terms. The reſt of the Volſci, being alſo weary of the war, expreſſed an inclination to peace. Hereupon the Latins, obſtinately bent upon purſuing the war, ſeparated from them in a great rage, which they carried upon Satricum, though belonging to the Volſci, and the very place which had ſerved them for a retreat after their overthrow. They reduced the place to aſhes, ſparing only a temple of the goddeſs Matuta, whom the Greeks, as Plutarch informs us, worſhipped under the name of Leucothea, or Ino, the daughter of Cadmus. From Satricum they marched into the country of the Tuſculans, ſurprized their city, and put all the inhabitants they met with to the ſword, for having renounced the Latin confederacy and accepted the privileges of Roman citizens. Great numbers of the Tuſculans retired with their wives and children into the citadel, and from thence ſent to acquaint the Romans with their misfortune and ſurprize. Hereupon an army, which had been kept ready againſt any unforeſeen accident, was immediately ſent to their relief, under the command of L. Quinctius and Ser. Sulpicius, two of the military tribunes, who took the place by aſſault, and put all the Latins within the walls of Tuſculum to the ſword, not one of them eſcaping. The tribunes, having thus recovered the city, led back their army to Rome[s].

THE peace concluded with the Antiates and the defeat of the Latins gave the republic an interval of reſt from foreign wars. But at home the avarice of the patricians encreaſed the miſery of the poorer ſort of people. As all the debtors were preſſed to pay their debts at the ſame time, one friend could not aſſiſt the other; ſo that moſt of them, becoming inſolvent, were delivered up to their creditors and reduced to ſlavery; which melancholy ſcene ſo depreſſed the ſpirits, not only of the meaner plebeians, but even of the moſt conſiderable of that order, that, far from ſtanding in competition with the nobles for the military tribuneſhip, they even neglected to ſue for the plebeian magiſtracies. Inſomuch, that the patricians ſeemed to have engroſſed to themſelves for ever the whole adminiſtration of public affairs. But at this very criſis a trifling accident gave the plebeians an opportunity of ſhaking off the yoke they groaned under, of raiſing their drooping ſpirits, and carrying their pretenſions higher than ever. Fabius Ambuſtus, an illuſtrious patrician, but very popular, had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius a patrician, and at this time military tribune; the younger to Licinius Stolo, a rich plebeian.

The lower ſort of people oppreſſed by the rich.

It

[s] Liv. l. vi. c. 32.

It happened, that while the younger ſiſter was paying a viſit to the elder, Sulpicius came home from the forum, where he had been diſcharging the duties of his office, attended by a croud of clients and by the lictors, who, thundering at the door with the ſtaff of the faſces, as was uſual, gave notice that the magiſtrate was coming. This noiſe, to which the wife of Licinius was not accuſtomed, put her into a fright, which her ſiſter taking notice of, could not forbear laughing at her, ſeeming much to wonder at her ignorance. This laughing, how innocent ſoever, was conſtrued by the younger ſiſter as an inſult upon her, on account of the ignoble family into which ſhe was married. This imaginary affront greatly provoked her, and her uneaſineſs was encreaſed by the croud of people, that came to pay their court to her ſiſter and receive her commands. Her father happening to ſee her, and perceiving by her countenance that ſomething troubled her, kindly aſked what it was, and whether all was well at home. At firſt he could get no ſatisfactory anſwer from her, but at length prevailed upon her with ſoft words to diſcloſe the ſecret: You have married me, ſaid ſhe, into a family, which is excluded from enjoying the chief honours of the republic: What a vaſt difference is there between my ſiſter's condition and mine? Her father, who was very fond of her, did all that lay in his power to comfort her; "Don't be uneaſy," ſaid he; "you ſhall ſoon ſee as much ſtate at your own "houſe, as you was ſurpriſed to find at your ſiſter's." From this time he entered into an aſſociation with Licinius, his ſon-in-law, and L. Sextius, a young plebeian of extraordinary parts, who wanted nothing but a nobler birth to qualify him for the higheſt offices of the republic. Their deſign was to aboliſh the military tribuneſhip, reſtore the conſulſhip, procure for the plebeians a ſhare in that ſupreme dignity, and, in ſhort, to put the patricians and plebeians upon an equal foot. To compaſs this deſign, it was thought expedient, that Licinius and Sextius ſhould begin, by getting the plebeian tribuneſhip for the next year, which would enable them to pave themſelves a way to the higheſt dignities. The two candidates were accordingly admitted; and having carried that firſt point, they immediately bent all their thoughts and power to deſtroy the grandeur of the patricians, and promote the intereſt of the people. The firſt ſtep they took was, to propoſe a law, for ſuppreſſing the military tribuneſhip, reſtoring the conſulate, and requiring, that of the two conſuls to be annually choſen, one ſhould always be a plebeian. In order to engage the people to paſs this law, they added two others to it relating to the debts and the conquered lands. The firſt was this; let the intereſt already paid be reckoned as a diſcharge of ſo much of the principal; and let the remainder of it be paid at different equal payments. The ſecond reſtrained any Roman citizen from poſſeſſing more than five hundred acres of land. Whatever lands any one held beyond that reſtriction were to be taken from him, and divided among the poorer citizens. The patricians, alarmed and terrified, frequently met in order to deliberate on the moſt proper means to avert the impending evil; but could fix upon no other, except that of dividing the tribunes of the people, and engaging one part of the college to oppoſe the attempts of the other. Accordingly, they gained over the other eight: Licinius and Sextius aſſembled the tribes ſeveral times, in order to get their law paſſed; but were always oppoſed by their collegues, who, as ſoon as the law began to be read, never failed to cry out, "We proteſt againſt it." Theſe proteſts of one part of the tribunes againſt the other were often repeated at different comitia; inſomuch, that the two popular tribunes were not able to get their laws heard by the people. Being therefore at length tired with ſuch frequent diſturbances and interruptions, they reſolved to proteſt in their turns. Very well, ſaid Sextius to his collegues, ſince you are ſo delighted with hearing the word Veto, I forbid or proteſt, we ſhall ſoon find occaſion to repeat it too, and to the advantage of the people. Accordingly, when the centuries aſſembled to elect military tribunes for the next year, Sextius and Licinius cried out in their turns, We proteſt againſt it, which put a ſtop to all proceedings. As theſe two were continued in the plebeian tribuneſhip, they renewed the ſame oppoſition for five years ſucceſſively; ſo that the republic fell into a kind of anarchy, none but plebeian officers being elected, that is, tribunes and ædiles. Thus the patricians were entirely excluded from the government; and this interminſion of ſuperior magiſtrates placed Licinius and Sextius, who were at the head of the tribunes of the people, in ſome degree at (2) the head of the republic. So that Fabius's promiſe to his daughter may be ſaid to have been performed from this time.

In the ſixth year, Licinius and Sextius were juſt elected tribunes of the people a ſixth time, when the inhabitants of Velitræ

Velitræ declared war againſt Rome, over-ran the lands of the republic, and even laid ſiege to the city of Tuſculum. As the Tuſculans had long been allies, and lately admitted citizens, of Rome, Sextius and Licinius, aſhamed to refuſe them aſſiſtance, waved their oppoſition, and ſuffered an aſſembly to be held by an inter-rex for electing military tribunes. Six patricians were choſen, viz. L. Furius, P. Valerius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpicius, C. Valerius, and Ser. Cornelius. Theſe having made the neceſſary levies, marched againſt the enemy, defeated them, raiſed the ſiege of Tuſculum, and inveſted Velitræ. But as the generals, who began the ſiege, could not make themſelves maſters of the place before their year expired, ſix new military tribunes were created, without the leaſt oppoſition, to purſue the war with the Veliterni, till their city was reduced. It happened very unfortunately for the patricians, that Fabius Ambuſtus, the father-in-law of Licinius Stolo, was choſen military tribune. His five collegues were, Q. Servilius, M. Cornelius, C. Veturius, Q. Quinctius, and A. Cornelius. The promotion of Fabius encouraged the tribunes to purſue their point with more vigour than ever. They found means to gain over three of their collegues; ſo that of the ten tribunes five were now for the publication of the laws, and five againſt it. Licinius and Sextius were now the eighth year in office; and as they were by long habit thoroughly practiſed in the art of managing the people, they held frequent aſſemblies, and, in the preſence of the multitude, aſked the patricians the following queſtions; Whether they did not think it unreaſonable, that they ſhould poſſeſs above five hundred acres of land, whilſt a great number of the plebeians had ſcarce ground enough whereon to build themſelves a ſmall habitation to live in, or a ſepulchre for their family? How can you, patricians, ſaid they, even in point of intereſt, account for your making your miſerable debtors languiſh in chains, and abſolutely putting it out of their power to pay you, by keeping them in priſon? And yet what is more common than to ſee theſe wretched citizens delivered up into the hands of their creditors by your courts of juſtice? Are not the houſes of the patricians become ſo many priſons? When they perceived that theſe enquiries made a great impreſſion on the minds of the people, they immediately added, and what remedy can be provided againſt theſe misfortunes? Since our tribunes are not able to protect us, we muſt introduce ſome of the plebeians into the higheſt offices. Nor will it be ſufficient that plebeians be qualified by law to be conſuls. Was not the number of military tribunes encreaſed, on purpoſe that the plebeians might have a ſhare in that magiſtracy? and yet how few have been raiſed to it? And how much eaſier will it be for the patricians, when there are but two places to be filled, to ſecure them both to themſelves? It is therefore neceſſary, that a law be paſſed, laying Rome under a neceſſity of chuſing one of her ſupreme governors out of the people. From that very day, and not till then, may the Roman people be deemed to have baniſhed kings from Rome, and eſtabliſhed liberty on a laſting baſis. When the tribunes found that the people liſtened to theſe diſcourſes with great pleaſure, they added a fourth law to the three already mentioned, importing, that decemviri ſhould be elected inſtead of duumviri, to preſerve and interpret the Sibylline books, and that five of them ſhould be always plebeians. However, all proceedings on this, as well as on the other regulations, were ſuſpended, till the reduction of Velitræ, that the ſoldiers employed in that ſiege, who made ſo great a part of the people, might not be excluded from giving their votes, when ſuch important innovations were on foot.

THE year expiring before the return of the army, for the ſiege went on but ſlowly, the republic choſe ſix new military tribunes, L. Quinctius, Sp. Servilius, Serv. Cornelius, L. Papirius, Serv. Sulpicius, and L. Veturius. As for the tribunes of the people, Licinius and Sextius were ſtill continued in their employment, the people being eager to have theſe two oppoſers of the patrician party carry on their deſigns and complete them. The Roman army was no ſooner returned from the ſiege of Velitræ, than Licinius and Sextius ſummoned the people once more, declaring, that they would proceed to the publication of the law, without any regard to the oppoſition of their collegues. The patricians, ſeeing their caſe deſperate, had recourſe to the laſt refuge, which was to nominate a dictator. The man, who ſeemed moſt proper to ſit at the helm of affairs in ſo tempeſtuous a ſeaſon, was Camillus, and accordingly the fathers with unanimous conſent raiſed him to that dignity the fourth time. Camillus was not very forward to accept the charge, being unwilling to quarrel with thoſe very men, whoſe valour he had ſo often employed in war. As affairs then ſtood, he could expect nothing, but either to diſoblige the commons, if he ſucceeded, ceeded, or to contribute to the ruin of his party, if he did not. However, that zealous patriot did not refuſe to aſſiſt his country, when it ſo much ſtood in need of his authority. From the day he was nominated dictator, the power of the tribunes of the people ought to have been ſuſpended. But Licinius and Sextius, without paying any regard to the dictator, continued ſtill to aſſemble the people, who being met in the forum on the day appointed, the four laws* were read to them. The tribes had already begun to give their ſuffrages in order, and the firſt tribe had actually voted in favour of the laws, when the dictator, full of anger and indignation, and attended by a great body of patricians, repaired to the aſſembly, and there ſeated himſelf in his tribunal. As the tribunes were divided among themſelves, ſome declaring for the laws and others proteſting againſt them, the dictator riſing up declared, that he was come to ſupport the privileges of the people, and that he would never ſuffer one part of the tribunes to deprive the other of their right of oppoſition. The two heads of the tribunes laughed at this artful ſpeech, and purſuing their meaſures with great ſteadineſs, continued to take the ſuffrages of the people, which ſo provoked Camillus, that he ordered his lictors to drive away the tribes from their reſpective places, threatening at the ſame time, that if they did not diſperſe immediately, he would aſſemble them in the campus Martius, inliſt them, and make them march into the field without delay. On the other hand the tribunes, to encourage the people, had the boldneſs to threaten the dictator, that, as ſoon as his dictatorſhip was expired, they would get him condemned in a fine of fifty thouſand drachmæ, if he prevented the people from giving their ſuffrages. However, the tribes, terrified at the menaces of a magiſtrate, who had power of life and death, retired, and the comitia were poſtponed to another day. But Camillus, ſeeing the people too much enraged to be brought to any terms, either by authority or perſuaſion, withdrew to his own houſe, and ſoon after laid down his office. Some authors are of opinion, that remembering his exile, he was intimidated by the threatenings of the tribunes, and did not care to venture himſelf again in an affair of ſo much heat. But Livy tells us, that he was informed there had been ſome defect in the ceremony of taking the auſpices, when he was created dictator, and that on this account he would not, as he was very ſcrupulous in theſe matters, retain a dignity conferred upon him contrary to the laws of his religion. The ſenate, after a ſhort inter-regnum, named P. Manlius to ſucceed Camillus. Manlius preſently diſcovered himſelf to be a great favourer of the people; for the firſt thing he did was to name a plebeian, C. Licinius, not Licinius the ſon-in-law of Fabius, for his general of the horſe. Sextius and Licinius no longer doubted, but they ſhould be able to bring their deſigns to a happy concluſion, under the adminiſtration of a dictator who favoured them, and the protection of his general of horſe, provided they could get themſelves continued in the tribuneſhip. In order to this, they pretended, that they would no longer ſerve, repreſenting to the people, that they were grown old in the tribuneſhip to no purpoſe, and that, after ſtruggling nine years with the ſenate for the good of the people, the only recompence they had met with was neglect and ingratitude. Shall our laws, ſaid they, wholly tend to your benefit, and we receive no manner of advantage from them ourſelves? Is it conſiſtent with modeſty for you to aſk great advantages by our means, while you reſolve to leave us without honour, or even the hopes of honour? To be plain then, the laws we have propoſed are inſeparable. If you are reſolved to paſs them conjointly, then continue in us the tribuneſhip. We ſhall in that caſe make uſe of the authority you ſhall inveſt us with, to finiſh the work we have begun. But if you are determined to paſs thoſe laws, which concern uſury and the conquered lands, without any regard to our intereſt, we will accept of the tribuneſhip no longer; and be aſſured, that you ſhall not obtain your deſires. The people were very earneſt to paſs the laws concerning the debts and conquered lands; but as to the other two laws, relating to the re-eſtabliſhment of the conſulate, on condition that one of the conſuls ſhould always be a plebeian, and the changing of the duumviri into decemviri, the people did not give themſelves much concern about them, being well appriſed, that the endeavours of the tribunes, to open a way for the plebeians to arrive at the conſulate, were chiefly intended for their own private intereſt. The tribunes therefore would not by any means ſuffer the laws to be propoſed ſeparately. Appius Claudius, grandſon to the famous decemvir, made a long ſpeech, full of invectives againſt the two tribunes, expatiating on the inſolence of the declaration they had made, viz. that the people ſhould not be allowed to paſs ſuch laws as they approved, unleſs they would at the ſame time paſs others which they did not approve. But, notwithſtanding his harangue, the two tribunes were choſen the tenth tenth time, the multitude being afraid of loſing ſuch able and zealous defenders. Not long after their re-election, they obtained the paſſing of that law, which related to the care of the Sibylline books. This advantage contented the people for the preſent; and ſix military tribunes, all patricians, were created for the next year without the leaſt diſturbance, viz. A. Cornelius, L. Veturius, M. Cornelius, P. Valerius, M. Geganius, and P. Manlius. In the very beginning of their adminiſtration, the tribunes uſed their utmoſt efforts to get the other laws paſſed, and the debates were carried to ſuch an height on both ſides, that the citizens were upon the point of taking up arms againſt each other, when news was brought to Rome, that a numerous army of Gauls was in full march from the coaſts of the Adriatic, with a deſign to revenge the defeat of their countrymen. The approach of ſo dreadful an enemy ſuſpended the diviſions of the commonwealth. The common danger united both patricians and plebeians, and prompted them to name a dictator. The great Camillus was raiſed to this dignity the fifth time. He was indeed now fourſcore years old, and had very lately laid down the dictatorſhip before the uſual time. But nevertheleſs, his zeal for the welfare of his country induced him to ſacrifice the remaining part of his life to the public good. He did not now plead infirmity, as he formerly had done, to decline the charge, but readily undertook it; and, having made the neceſſary levies, marched out of Rome with all the vivacity of a young man, after he had named T. Quinctius to be his general of the horſe. As ſoon as he came near the camp of the Gauls, which was on the banks of the Anio, he poſted the ſmalleſt part of his army upon a hill of eaſy aſcent, and concealed the reſt in the vallies and behind the rocks. The poor appearance of the Roman troops made the Gauls ſo confident, that they pillaged the country quite up to his very trenches, which Camillus, in order to encreaſe their confidence, ſuffered them to do for ſeveral days together, keeping himſelf quiet within his camp, which was well fortified on all ſides. At length, perceiving, that a great part of the enemy were ſcattered in the country to pillage, and being informed, that thoſe who remained in the camp did nothing night and day but drink and revel, he ordered his light-armed men to march in the night-time into the plain, and to prevent the enemy from drawing up in order of battle, when they ſhould firſt ſally out of their camp. Early in the morning he marched ed down the hill with his main body, and drew them up in battalia. The Gauls haſtened out of their trenches, but the light-armed Romans, falling upon them before they could range themſelves in their uſual order, obliged them to begin the fight in confuſion. In the mean time, Camillus charged them with his heavy-armed legions, and made ſuch a ſlaughter in the foremoſt ranks, that the reſt fled and diſperſed themſelves over the champain country, the Romans being poſſeſſed of the hills. Thoſe who eſcaped the purſuit of the conquerors, fled into Apulia. Some writers are of opinion, that from this time the Gauls began to ſpread themſelves into Illyricum, Pannonia, Thrace, Greece, and Aſia Minor. After this victory the dictator led his victorious army againſt Velitræ, the ſiege of which city had been interrupted. But the Veliterni ſubmitted to him without making the leaſt reſiſtance; he returned therefore to Rome, where the honours of a triumph were decreed him both by the ſenate and people [t].

BUT the republic was in too great a ferment for the ſenate to conſent to his abdicating the dictatorſhip. The patricians thought, that, under the ſhelter of his great name and abſolute authority, they ſhould be better able to contend with their adverſaries. For the people proud of their late victory, were more obſtinately bent than ever on paſſing the laws ſo long diſputed. Sextius and Licinius, ſeeing themſelves backed and ſupported by the multitude, grew more audacious than ever, and took a moſt extraordinary ſtep to effect their purpoſe. As the dictator was one day ſitting on his tribunal in the forum, an officer, ſent by thoſe tribunes, commanded him to riſe and follow him, laying his hand upon him at the ſame time, as if he deſigned to ſeize him and carry him away by force. Hereupon ſuch a noiſe and tumult aroſe in the forum, as never had been heard before, the patricians, who attended Camillus, driving back the officer, and the multitude at the foot of the tribunal crying out, 'Pull him down; 'pull him down.' The tribunes deſign was by this violence to frighten Camillus into an abdication, but he, though at a loſs what to do in this exigence, would not lay down the authority, which had been legally conferred upon him. In the midſt of this uproar, he took refuge in the ſenate-houſe, whither the patricians followed him; and there the pretenſions of the people and their tribunes were taken into conſideration. On this occaſion Camillus made a vow to build a temple to Concord, in caſe he ſucceeded in quieting theſe commotions. As the populace could not be prevailed upon by any means to abate of their pretenſions, it was reſolved, after many long and warm debates to comply with their requeſt, and to accept the three laws in queſtion, as the only means to extinguiſh their obſtinate fury. Thus the government was changed, the conſulate revived, and the military tribuneſhip laid aſide for ever [u].

THE people having thus carried their point, the comitia were held for the election of conſuls, when L. Æmilius Mamercinus and L. Sextius, the plebeian tribune, were raiſed to that dignity. However, when the election of Sextius came to be confirmed by the ſenate, the conſcript fathers abſolutely refuſed to conſent to it. The new diſputes between the two parties on this occaſion were carried to ſo great a length, that the people were ready to leave Rome and ſeparate themſelves from the patricians, as they had formerly done. All the wiſdom of a dictator univerſally eſteemed was therefore neceſſary to bring about an accommodation; and Camillus found out an expedient, to which both parties agreed. The conſuls and military tribunes, who long ſupplied their places, were generals of the Roman armies, and at the ſame time judges of civil affairs; but as they could not always attend to the latter branch of their office, being commonly during the ſummer in the field, Camillus's expedient was to ſeparate this function from the conſulate, and to create a judge, with the title of Prætor, to whom it ſhould be appropriated. He adviſed the ſenate to ſuffer one conſul to be choſen annually out of the plebeians, on condition that the prætors ſhould be alway patricians. This motion was agreed to by both parties, the election of Sextius was confirmed, and all feuds and diſſenſions in the republic laid aſide (R).

(R) The prætorſhip was then looked upon as the ſecond dignity in the republic, the prætor being elected in the comitia by centuries, and under the ſame auſpices as the conſuls; ſo that they were in a manner collegues. The conſul had the management of political and military affairs. The prætor was the chief magiſtrate concerned in the adminiſtration of juſtice. Before the eſtabliſhment of the prætorſhip, the conſuls were called

The great games.

TRANQUILLITY being thus re-eſtabliſhed, the ſenate, in gratitude to the gods, ordered the great games to be celebrated. Theſe ſhews formerly laſted only three days; but now a fourth was added to them; and on that account their names was changed from ludi magni, or great games, into that of ludi maximi, or the greateſt games. The preſent ædiles refuſed, for what reaſon we know not, to make the neceſſary preparations for the great games, tho' that was a branch of their office. Hereupon the young patricians cried out; That, ſince the affair in queſtion was to take care of the worſhip of the gods, they ſhould think it no diſhonour to be choſen ædiles. The dictator accepted the offer, and propoſed to the people the eſtabliſhing of two patrician ædileſhips, which they agreed to. Theſe patrician ædiles, from the ivory chair, called ſella curulis, had the name of ædiles curules, and were of greater account, being curule magiſtrates, than the plebeian ædiles. Their buſineſs was to take care of the temples, theatres, games, markets, tribunals of juſtice, and the repairing of the city walls, and alſo to ſee that no novelty was introduced into religion. In after-ages they examined the fables or pieces written for the ſtage, and ſeem to have been the judges of other writings. To them the generals of armies, upon prætors; nay, the dictator himſelf aſſumed the title of prætor maximus, the word prætor being derived from the Latin verb præire, ſignifying to go before: Hence the old Latins called their commanders prætores. At firſt one prætor only was appointed. Afterwards, that is, about the year of Rome 501, another was added; and then one of them applied himſelf to the adminiſtration of juſtice among the citizens, with the name of prætor urbanus, while the other decided the differences which aroſe amongſt foreigners, with the title of prætor peregrinus. Upon the taking of Sicily and Sardinia, two more prætors were created to aſſiſt the conſuls in the government, and as many more upon the entire conqueſt of Spain. Sylla encreaſed their number to eight; Julius Cæſar, firſt to ten, and afterwards to ſixteen; and the ſecond triumvirate to ſixty-four. From this time we meet ſometimes with twelve prætors, and ſometimes with eighteen; but, in the declenſion of the empire, they were reduced to three. When the number of the prætors was thus encreaſed, the prætor urbanus undertook the cognizance of private cauſes, and the others that of crimes; whence they were alſo ſtyled Quæſitores. Beſides theſe, there were alſo provincial prætors, whoſe buſineſs it was to adminiſter juſtice in the Roman provinces, and command the troops there in time of war, till their office, which was annual, expired.

upon their return, delivered the corn and proviſions taken from the enemy, as they did the priſoners to the prætor, and the money to the quæſtor. Nothing now remained, but to mark out a place for the temple of Concord, which Camillus had vowed. It was built, at the expence of the public, upon an eminence at the foot of the capitol; ſo that it was ſeen from the forum, and the placed where the aſſemblies were held and juſtice was adminiſtered. Thus ended a year ſo glorious for Camillus. He had overcome the moſt formidable enemies of Rome, reſtored peace to the republic, and calmed the people, without exaſperating the nobility. Full therefore of glory and of years, he laid down the dictatorſhip, wholly bent on ſpending the ſmall remainder of his days in the repoſe and tranquillity of a private life.

The temple of Concord.

The enſuing year all continued quiet, both at home and abroad, except that the tribunes of the people complained, and could not bear, that for one plebeian conſul granted to the people, the patricians had got three curule magiſtrates, viz. a prætor and two ædiles. Their complaints, backed with the murmurs of the people, made an impreſſion on the ſenate; and the patricians conſented, that the curule ædiles ſhould be choſen out of the plebeians every ſecond year. Afterwards they left the people at full liberty to chuſe them every year out of either body. Theſe eſtabliſhments being once made, Rome enjoyed a profound peace, under the adminiſtration of the new conſuls, L. Genucius, a plebeian, and Servilius Ahala, a patrician. This year a dreadful plague broke out, which ſwept away great numbers; amongſt the reſt one cenſor, three tribunes of the people, and one curule ædile; but the moſt fatal ſtroke of all was the death of the great Camillus, who was much regretted by all ranks of people. He was deſervedly ſtyled a ſecond Romulus, the firſt having founded, and he reſtored, the city. He is ſaid never to have fought a battle without gaining a complete victory, never to have beſieged a city without taking it, and never to have led an army into the field, which he did not bring back loaded both with glory and booty. He was a zealous patriot, and, though perſecuted by his ungrateful country, would never hearken to his juſt reſentments. The neceſſities of the public no ſooner obliged the people to have recourſe to him, than, forgetting the affronts he had received, he took upon him the conduct of the moſt difficult and laborious undertakings.

takings. He was a patrician by deſcent; but not actuated by party-zeal, his love for the public being the only rule of his conduct. He favoured the plebeians, when the intereſt of the public required him to do ſo, but without flattery or ſelf-intereſt. He had nothing in view but to do every one juſtice, and put an end to the diſſenſions which weakened the republic; ſo that he left his country in the enjoyment of a perfect tranquillity at his death, by means of the equality he had wiſely introduced, and the juſt balance he had ſettled between all orders of men in the republic. In ſhort, Rome may be ſaid to have furniſhed the world with many noble patterns of probity; but, none perhaps more perfect than that of the incomparable Camillus.

THE Roman republic, at the time of Camillus's death, had ſcarce gained any encreaſe of territory, except on the other ſide of the Tiber, in the country of the Hetrurians; nor did her juriſdiction even there reach far beyond Veii and Cære; ſo that it was confined within ſix or ſeven leagues of the capital. Ever ſince the taking and ſacking of Rome by the Gauls, her allies had been continually wavering in their fidelity. The eternal jealouſies between the nobility and people retarded their conqueſts, and revived the hopes of the nations they had conquered. The tribunes of the people were ever oppoſing the enterprizes of the conſuls or military tribunes. The ſenate had often recourſe to a dictator, and then the experience and valour of the Roman troops made them victorious; but the return of domeſtic ſeditions gave the people, whom they had conquered, an opportunity of ſhaking off the yoke. Thus were the Romans, without interruption, running in the ſame round of wars againſt the ſame enemies, without reaping any advantage from their conqueſts. Such was the ſtate of Rome, when C. Sulpicius and C. Licinius Stolo were raiſed to the conſulate. The firſt was a patrician, and the latter the famous plebeian tribune, ſon-in-law to Fabius, who jointly with his collegue Sextius, had firſt contrived the four laws, then maintained them, and at length, in the ten years he had been tribune, obtained the publication of them. And now the promiſe which Fabius had made to his younger daughter, that ſhe ſhould ſee the ſame honours paid to her huſband, which ſhe had beheld with envy paid to the huſband of her elder ſiſter, was fulfilled. She had the pleaſure to ſee for a whole year the lictors with their faſces march before her huſband, and to have her houſe adorned with thoſe enſigns of the ſupreme power and

As

As the plague ſtill continued to rage, the Romans had recourſe to an old ſuperſtition called lectiſternium. This was a religious entertainment made for the gods in their own temples, where tables were ſpread, and beds placed round them, on which the gods, according to the Roman faſhion, were to lie, and eat. The beds were placed near the altars, and ſtrewed with leaves and odoriferous herbs, as well as the temples; whence this ceremony had the name of lectiſternium, that is, a ſtrewing of a bed. The ſtatues of Jupiter and the other gods were laid upon theſe beds, as if they had been to partake of the feaſt. The goddeſſes were placed on chairs, after the manner of the Roman women, this being thought the more decent poſture for their ſex; but, as the ceremony of the lectiſternium did not remove the plague, the ſuperſtitious Romans endeavoured to appeaſe the anger of the gods, by inſtituting new ſports, which were called ſcenici, from their being repreſented on a ſcene, that is, a ſtage built in the ſhade. The performers were brought out of Hetruria, in the language of which country hiſter ſignified a player; whence came the Latin word hiſtrio. Theſe hiſtriones or actors danced to the flute, and kept time with their motions and geſtures; but their dances, in theſe early times, were not accompanied by any verſes or diſcourſes. Afterwards the Roman youth imitated theſe foreign dances, and mixed ſuch jokes and raillery with them, as were ſuitable to the geſtures and poſtures they mimicked. This mixture of dances and merry verſes were very agreeable to the people, which prompted ſome to undertake the compoſing of verſes for the ſtage; but the firſt ſpeakers fell into the corrupt taſte of the Feſcennini, a people of Hetruria, who threw rude and unpremeditated jokes at one another, without any order or regularity. Theſe were ſoon ſucceeded by ſatires, written in verſe and ſet to the flute; which ſatires were repeated with ſuitable geſtures. Some years after, Livius Andronicus turned the ſatires into regular plays; and then the farces, which had made people laugh, were deſpiſed (S).

The lectiſternium.

(S) However, the Roman youth revived theſe farces, and acted them at the end of their ſerious pieces. When the profeſſed actors had finiſhed their parts, ſome young Romans came upon the ſtage maſqued, and began to repeat merry verſes as formerly, but ſuch as were free from obſcenity. Theſe pieces were

THE ſcenic plays, which were introduced at this time, were performed in a part of the circus, near the banks of the Tiber, which happening to overflow, the people concluded, were firſt brought from Atella, a city of Campania, and called exodia, that is, verſes not belonging to the play. The Roman youth never ſuffered the profeſſed actors to bear any part in their exodia, for fear of diſhonouring them; ſo that the perſons who acted theſe pieces, were not liable to the penalties inflicted on the hiſtriones. Their names were not blotted out of the tribes, in which they were incorporated; nor were they excluded as infamous perſons from ſerving in war. In ſhort, they were not upon the foot of actors hired to entertain the public. The profeſſion of an actor was indeed honourable among the Greeks. Æſchines acted on the ſtage of Athens in his youth, and yet became one of the greateſt orators of his time, and equalled Demoſthenes himſelf (9). Ariſtodemus, tho' an actor, was ſent on an embaſſy to Philip king of Macedon, in the name of the republic of Athens (10). But this was not the caſe with the Romans. Cornelius Nepos ſhews us the difference in his preface, where he ſays, that in Greece it was no diſhonour to a man to appear upon the ſtage in the habit of an actor; whereas among the Romans it was infamous and unworthy of an honeſt man. Hence Tully ſays of Roſcius the comedian, that he ſeemed to be the only man of his profeſſion who deſerved to be encouraged, and have a numerous audience, adding, that ſo mean an employment was unworthy of ſo honeſt a man, and that he deſerved a more honourable ſtation and more ſuitable to his probity (11). The profeſſed actors could not be incorporated in any tribe, and conſequently had no right of ſuffrage. None who acted on the ſtage were capable of ſerving in the legions, or bearing any civil or military employment. A ſenator, if he acted but once on the ſtage, was immediately degraded; and a knight forfeited all his privileges. An actreſs was infamous, and ſubject to the ſame laws as common proſtitutes. Theſe puniſhments were decreed and inflicted by an edict of the prætor; Ait prætor, ſays Ulpian, Qui in ſcenam prodierit, infamis eſt (12). But the actors of the Atellanæ were not compriſed under this law, the Roman nobility confining the acting of theſe performances to themſelves. If any actor in theſe pieces did not perform his part well, the people did not oblige him to unmaſk, which they had a right to do with reſpect to the profeſſed actors.

cluded, that the new remedy was not efficacious to appeaſe the wrath of heaven. They therefore revived an old religious ceremony, which was ſaid to have proved effectual in the like calamity. This was, the driving of a nail by a dictator into that part of the wall of Jupiter Capitolinus's temple, which divided it from the chapel of Minerva under the ſame roof. This odd ceremony was borrowed from the Volſinienſes in Hetruria, who reckoned their years by nails, which they drove into a temple of the goddeſs Nortia or Fortune. When Brutus and Horatius Pulvillus were conſuls, immediately after the expulſion of the Tarquins, the Romans built the famous temple of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and reſolved to mark down in it, and thereby tranſmit to poſterity, the number of years, which had paſſed ſince the foundation of Rome; but as they were then unacquainted with the numeral letters, they drove as many nails into the wall of the temple, as there had paſſed years ſince their city was founded. Every year afterwards, on the ides of September, the chief prætor, or conſul for the time being, drove a nail into this wall, which ſhewed the year of his conſulſhip. Livy tells us, that the law which enjoined this ceremony was written in antique characters and obſolete words, and fixed up in the chapel of Minerva, whom the Romans looked upon as the inventreſs of numbers. This ceremony of driving the nail was afterwards transferred from the conſuls to dictators, as magiſtrates of greater dignity and power; and, as it had been long diſcontinued, it was thought neceſſary to revive it at this time, ſome of the old people reporting, that it had formerly put a ſtop to a violent plague. A dictator was accordingly named for the performing of this ceremony, and the perſon raiſed to that dignity was T. Manlius, who, from his haughty ſpirit and imperious air, was ſurnamed Imperioſus. He choſe L. Pinarius Natta for his general of the horſe, and, with great pomp and ſolemnity, drove the nail into the wall of the temple; but the proud dictator, unwilling to have the whole buſineſs of his office confined to one religious ceremony, ordered troops to be raiſed, and even forced the citizens, tho' worn out with long ſickneſs, to inliſt themſelves, under pretence, that the Hernici were preparing to ſhake off the Roman yoke; but, as he had been nominated dictator to perform a religious ceremony, and

and not to command an army, the tribunes of the people repelled force with force, and at length obliged him to lay down his office; which he had no ſooner done, than he was cited by M. Pomponius, one of the tribunes, to anſwer before the people for the violence and cruelty which he had exerciſed over the citizens; for he had impriſoned ſome, and cauſed others to be barbarouſly whipped. He was alſo accuſed of treating inhumanly one of his own ſons, by name Titus, whom he had confined to the country, obliging him to work among his ſlaves, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he was of ſlow parts and had an impediment in his ſpeech. This ſhews, that the abſolute power which fathers, by the laws of Rome, had over their children, was kept within bounds by the ſuperior authority of the magiſtrates. Manlius had, according to cuſtom, a copy of the heads of his accuſation given him, and the uſual time of three market-days, or twenty-ſeven days, allowed him to prepare for his defence. All were highly exaſperated againſt ſo ſevere a dictator and ſo barbarous a father, except the ſon himſelf, who, moved with filial piety, and under the greateſt concern that he ſhould furniſh matter of accuſation againſt his father, reſolved upon a moſt extraordinary method to deliver him. Early in the morning he left the country-houſe, to which he had been baniſhed by his unnatural father, came to the city, and ſtopped no-where till he got to the houſe of Pomponius, who was yet in bed. However, Manlius was immediately admitted by the tribune, who did not doubt but he was come to diſcover to him ſome new inſtances of his father's ſeverity. After they had ſaluted each other, Manlius deſired a private conference; whereupon every body was ordered to withdraw. Then the young man, drawing out a poniard and holding it cloſe to the tribune's throat, threatened to ſtab him that moment, if he did not ſwear to deſiſt from the proſecution he was carrying on againſt his father. Pomponius was ſo terrified, that he readily ſwore whatever the other was pleaſed to dictate, and, thinking himſelf obliged even to comply with an involuntary obligation, dropped the proſecution. The people was not diſpleaſed at the bold enterprize of a ſon in favour of a father, by whom he had been uſed in the baſed manner. They all extolled his piety, and not only, for his ſake, pardoned the father, but the ſame year raiſed him to one of the moſt important important poſts in the Roman army, that of legionary tribune[w].

THIS year the Hernici revolted; but, while the Romans were preparing to bring them back to their duty, an unforeſeen accident threw the city into the utmoſt conſternation. The earth opened all on a ſudden in the midſt of the forum, probably by the violence of an earthquake. The citizens, having laboured in vain to fill up the chaſm by throwing abundance of earth into it, had at laſt recourſe to the augurs, who declared, that they would never be able to compaſs their deſign, till that thing, in which the ſtrength and power of the Roman people conſiſted, was thrown into the place; and that ſuch a victim would ſecure the eternal duration of the Roman ſtate. While they were all conſulting about the meaning of this oracle, M. Curtius, a brave young patrician, having firſt aſked them, Whether Rome had any thing more valuable than arms and valour? armed himſelf completely, and mounting a horſe richly capariſoned, came to the forum, and, in the ſight of the people who were aſſembled in crouds, devoted himſelf to death for his country, and rode full ſpeed into the gulph; an action, which ſome hiſtorians would willingly magnify with a miracle; for they tell us, that the ground immediately cloſed; but the moſt judicious writers own, that the opening was afterwards filled up with earth and rubbiſh[x]. After M. Curtius had thus devoted himſelf, the Romans did not doubt but they ſhould ſoon humble the Hernici: but they were diſappointed; for Genucius, the firſt plebeian conſul who had ever been entruſted with the command of an army, fell into an ambuſcade, and was killed, after the legions, ſeized with a ſudden fright, had abandoned him. Some hiſtorians ſeem to doubt, whether he did not fall by the hand of a Roman; at leaſt it is certain, the melancholy news of his defeat did not ſo much grieve the patricians, as raiſe their pride. They exclaimed in all places, that the misfortunes of Rome were owing to the violation of human and divine rights in the conſecration of a plebeian conſul. To wipe off the diſgrace which Rome had received, it was reſolved to create a dictator. Servilius, the surviving consul, named to that office Appius Claudius, the most inveterate enemy of the plebeian party, that he might repair the losses, which the republic had sustained by the mismanagement of a plebeian consul. While the dictator was raising a second army, the Hernici, elated with their late success, advanced with great boldness to besiege the vanquished in their camp; but C. Sulpicius, who had been lieutenant to Genucius, and had, after the defeat and death of his general, collected the scattered troops, sallying out upon them, obliged them to return to their own intrenchments. Appius soon after arrived with a new army, which he had just raised in the city, and having exhorted his men to imitate the bravery of Sulpicius and the soldiers under his command, prepared for a general engagement. The Hernici, hearing that a dictator was created to carry on the war against them, exhausted their country of men to reinforce their army, none who were able to bear arms being excused from taking the field. Out of this multitude they chose three thousand two hundred men, whom they divided into eight cohorts, of four hundred men each. This was the flower of the enemy's troops; and their generals, to distinguish them from the rest, and by that means engage them to exert themselves in battle, not only allowed them double pay, but exempted them from all the laborious offices of the army. The dictator no sooner began to draw up his men, but the Hernici did the same, in a plain, which lay between the two camps, and was about three miles over. This was the field of battle; and never were forces more equal, or the victory more doubtful. The Roman knights engaged the eight cohorts; but, notwithstanding their utmost efforts, the enemy kept both their ground and ranks. The bad success of this first onset made the Roman cavalry change their way of fighting. They all dismounted, and, with permission of their general, posted themselves in the first line, at the head of the infantry. The eight cohorts still made head against them with incredible bravery, the rest of the soldiers in both armies being idle spectators of a battle fought by the flower of the two nations. The victory was a long time doubtful, many falling on both sides; but at length the better fortune of the Romans, as Livy expresses it, prevailed; the cohorts first retreated in good order, and then, being warmly pressed, gave way and fled in confusion. The conquerors pursued the enemy to their camp; but but night coming on hindered them from attempting to force it. The next morning the Romans found it abandoned; the Hernici having retired under the walls of their cities. This victory coſt the Romans dear; for they are ſaid to have loſt a fourth part of their army and a great number of knights. The dictator returned to the city; but did not obtain a triumph, the people being in all likelihood unwilling to beſtow that honour on the moſt declared enemy of the plebeian party [y].

NOTWITHSTANDING the misfortune of Genucius, the centuries choſe another plebeian conſul, viz. C. Licinius Stolo, a ſecond time, and with him C. Sulpicius, ſirnamed Peticus. As the moſt violent enemy of the plebeians had been nominated dictator the laſt year by the patricians, ſo the moſt enterprizing adverſary of the nobility was now raiſed to the higheſt office by the ſuffrages of the people. The two conſuls entered the enemy's country together; but finding no enemy in the field, they beſieged and took Ferentinum, formerly a city of the Volſci, which had been given up to the Hernici by the Romans. After the ſurrender of this place, they took the road to Rome; but when they came to Tybur, they were ſurprized to find the gates of that city ſhut againſt them. Upon enquiry, they found, that the Tyburtes were in ſecret intelligence with the Gauls, who were again in motion. The apprehenſion of a war with ſo formidable an enemy made them determine to create a dictator. T. Quinctius Pennus was the perſon nominated to that dignity, and he appointed Serv. Cornelius to be his general of the horſe. While the Romans were preparing for the war, the Gauls advanced as far as the banks of the Anio, within three miles of Rome. The Roman army, under the command of the dictator, immediately advanced to meet them, and encamped on the oppoſite banks of the river. Both armies lay near one of the bridges of the Anio, which neither of them offered to break down, leſt it ſhould ſeem to argue fear; ſo that this bridge became the ſcene of ſeveral combats between the champions of both parties. One day a Gaul of gigantic ſtature, advancing upon the bridge, cried out with a loud voice, "Let the braveſt man "in the Roman army enter the liſts with me; the ſucceſs "of

" of our combat ſhall determine which is the more valiant " nation." His extraordinary ſize and fierce looks ſtruck the Romans with ſuch terror, that, for a long time, not one in the whole army offered to accept the challenge. At length young Manlius, who had ſo remarkably ſignalized his piety to his father, touched with a juſt ſenſe of the affront offered to the Roman name, quitted his poſt, and flying to the dictator, aſked leave to encounter the Gaul. Tho' I were ſure of victory, ſaid he, I would not fight this proud Gaul without your orders; but, if you will give me leave, I will make this huge beaſt know, that I am of the blood of that Manlius, whoſe valour proved ſo fatal to the Gauls on the capitol. The dictator, who had been very uneaſy that no Roman had accepted the challenge before, readily complied with the requeſt of the brave youth. "Go " Manlius, ſaid he, and humble the pride of this inſulting " enemy. Revenge the cauſe of the city where you firſt " drew your breath, as ſucceſsfully as you relieved him to " whom you owe it." Upon this the young Roman, having changed his round buckler, which he wore as a Roman knight, for a ſquare one, and armed himſelf with a ſhort ſword, fit both for cutting and ſtabbing, advanced againſt the Gaul, who was ſtrutting about in his armour and making an oſtentatious ſhew of his ſtrength. Both Romans and Gauls retired to their reſpective poſts, leaving the bridge free for the two champions. The Gaul, ſays Livy, began the combat, by diſcharging a great blow with his long ſword at Manlius, which made much noiſe, but did no execution. Hereupon the young Roman, dexterouſly ſlipping under his enemy's ſhield before he recovered his heavy ſword, ſtabbed him in two places; ſo that he ſoon fell, and covered, to uſe Livy's expreſſion, a vaſt piece of ground with his huge body. The conqueror cut off his head, and, without troubling himſelf about the reſt of his ſpoils, only ſeized a golden collar, which he tore from his neck, and, bloody as it was, put it about his own, in token of victory; and hence he got the ſirname of Torquatus, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity. The event of this combat ſo diſcouraged the Gauls, that they abandoned their camp in the night and retired into Campania [z].

Young Manlius kills in ſingle combat a mighty champion of the Gauls, who thereupon retire.

As ſoon as the conſuls for the new year entered upon their office, the one, viz. C. Pætelius Libo, was ſent with an an army to puniſh the Tyburtes; and the other, M. Fabius Ambuſtus, was ordered to march againſt the Hernici, who perſiſted in their revolt. The two conſuls had no ſooner left Rome, than the Gauls appeared again, and, venturing to advance into the neighbourhood of Rome, blocked up the gate Colina. However, the ſenate did not think proper to recal either of the conſuls. A dictator was created to make head againſt thoſe dangerous enemies, and the conſuls pitched upon Servilius Ahala, who, having named T. Quinctius to be his general of horſe, and armed all the youth that were left in Rome, came to an engagement with the Gauls under the very walls of Rome. As the Romans fought in ſight of their parents, wives, and children, who were on the ramparts, they behaved with extraordinary valour. The battle was very bloody, and the field all covered with dead bodies; but at length the Gauls gave way and fled towards Tybur, where the conſul Pætelius fell upon them, with a deſign to prevent them from taking refuge in that city: but the Tyburtes ſallying out covered their retreat; ſo that they eſcaped, but not without great loſs, the purſuit of the conquerors. On the other hand, Fabius fought the Hernici with ſucceſs, and overcame them in a general action. Thus was the republic this year victorious on all ſides. The honours of a triumph were chiefly due to the dictator; but he, either deſpiſing them out of pride, or declining them out of modeſty, on his return to Rome, highly commended the two conſuls both to the ſenate and people, and then, without mentioning his own exploits, abdicated the dictatorſhip. Pætelius ſolicited for a triumph and obtained it; but his colleague Fabius, who had conquered the Hernici, was content with an ovation [a].

The Gauls and Hernici defeated.

The next year Cn. Manlius Imperioſus and M. Popilius Lænas being conſuls, the Tyburtes came in the dead of the night to the very gates of Rome, and alarmed the city, the people believing that the Gauls were come again; but the return of light diſcovering only a ſmall number of Tyburtes, who were come rather out of a bravado, than with any concerted deſign to ſurprize the city, the conſuls marched out at two different gates, and eaſily repulſed the bold aggreſſors. The conſuls for the next year were C. Fabius Ambuſtus and C. Plautius Proculus. The latter marched againſt the Hernici, and totally ſubdued them; but the former, being ſent againſt the Tarquinienſes, who had entered the Roman territory in arms, was defeated by them. The Tarquinienſes took three hundred and ſeven Roman priſoners, and, to ſhew their contempt of the republic, firſt treated them in a barbarous manner, and then cut their throats. The diſadvantage Fabius had ſuffered was followed by a new alarm from the Boii, who appeared all on a ſudden in the plain of Prænefte, and from thence advanced as far as Pedum, a city of Latium between Tybur and Tuſculum, and not above ten miles from Rome; but the Latins, perhaps tired with ſeeing their country almoſt every year plunderd by the Gauls, renewed very ſeaſonably their alliance with Rome, and furniſhed her armies with the ſame quota of men they had formerly ſtipitulated to grant. With this reinforcement the republic was in a condition to make head againſt all her enemies. As the conſuls were both employed elſewhere, Sulpicius, ſirnamed Peticus, was created dictator, to conduct the war againſt the Gauls.

Sulpicius Peticus dictator marches againſt the Gauls,

The dictator named M. Valerius for his general of the horſe; and having choſen out the beſt legions in the two conſular armies, he took the field and marched againſt the enemy. Both armies were very impatient to come to a battle; but the dictator reſtrained the impetuoſity of his men, being well appriſed, that the Gauls muſt neceſſarily be ſoon diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, ſince they had brought none with them, nor prepared any magazines; but the ſoldiers began to complain of their general's conduct, and even threatened openly to attack the enemy without his leave, or to quit the camp and march back to Rome. They came in crowds to the dictator's quarters, and demanded acceſs to him, having named Sextius Tullius to be their ſpeaker. Sextius was an officer of diſtinguiſhed courage, and had been for ſeven years laſt paſt the firſt captain of the firſt corps of the army. The dictator was therefore ſurprized to ſee a company of ſeditious men headed by an officer of his rank and reputation. Sextius, in the name of the army, reproached the dictator with the diſadvantageous opinion he ſeemed to entertain of his troops, and preſſed him to lead them againſt the enemy. His diſcourſe was followed by the acclamations of the multitude, who all cried out for leave to arm and march to battle. The dictator could not help complying with their requeſt, and therefore promiſed to lead them out againſt the enemy the next day. Then taking Sextius aſide, he aſked him, What could have put him at the head of a faction? The brave centurion replied, that it was not want of reſpect to his general, or ignorance of the martial laws; but to divert the unruly multitude from chuſing a leader, who might have done ſomething injurious to the dignity of the dictator. He then exhorted Sulpicius to yield to the deſires of thoſe impetuous men, who were ſtrongly inclined to ſeize the firſt opportunity of fighting without his leave. The dictator followed his advice; and having acquainted his men that he deſigned to engage the enemy the next day, he ordered all the muleteers of the army to put upon their mules the furniture of war-horſes, to mount them, and, marching up the hills in the night-time, to conceal themſelves in the woods, till they received further orders. This, as Frontinus informs us, was then a new ſtratagem; but often practiſed afterwards both by the Romans and other nations. As ſoon as it was day, Sulpicius led his troops out of their entrenchments, and marched up againſt the Gauls, who did not expect to ſee the Romans appear ſo ſoon in the field. He drew up his army ſo, that all the legionaries, who uſed to attack the enemy at the head of their legions with a ſort of darts called pila, ſucceeded one another in files. As ſoon as one company of them was within reach of the enemy, they diſcharged their darts and inſtantly retired, leaving a ſpace of ground between them and the Gauls. Then a ſecond company took the place of the other, and did the ſame. Thus four companies ſucceeded one another, diſcharging their darts and falling back, without ſuffering the Gauls, who depended chiefly on their long ſwords to come near them. This repeated diſcharge of darts, which put the enemy into ſome confuſion, was no ſooner over, than the reſt of the legions cloſed in with them ſword in hand. The Gauls, tho' in ſome diſorder, ſuſtained the attack with great bravery, and even obliged the right wing of the Romans to give ground. Then the dictator, who was there in perſon, flying to the foremoſt ranks, Is this, ſaid he, the effect of your promiſes? Will all your boldneſs in the camp end in a ſhameful flight in the field? Follow your general, if you are true Romans. Having thus ſpoke, the brave dictator

advanced ſword in hand at the head of his legions, which, confounded with ſhame, threw themſelves upon the enemy's battalions, and fought like men in deſpair. There was indeed more of a ſavage fierceneſs than true courage in this attack; but it ſucceeded. The Gauls were put to flight, and the Romans purſued them; but the enemy rallied near their right wing, which kept its ground, tho' attacked with great vigor by the dictator, at the head of his victorious troops. Then Sulpicius ſent orders to his muleteers to leave their ambuſcade, appear in the plain, and march towards the camp of the Gauls, who no ſooner ſaw them, than they quitted their ranks, and haſtened in confuſion to the defence of their camp; but M. Valerius, general of the horſe, who had poſted himſelf near the enemy's camp, after the defeat of their left wing, intercepted their flight; ſo that they had no retreat left but to the mountains and woods. Valerius purſued them cloſe with his cavalry, and put moſt of them to the ſword, the whole plain being for ſome miles covered with dead bodies. This victory left the republic no enemies in Latium. The Hernici were ſubdued; the Gauls vanquiſhed and cut in pieces; and the Latins quieted. In ſhort Rome was now in as flouriſhing a condition as it had been before it was taken by the Senones. Sulpicius, when he had been honoured with a triumph, which he well deſerved, reſigned the dictatorſhip, and the government returned into the hands of the two conſuls for the year [b]. During their adminiſtration, a law was paſſed, at the motion of Pætelius the tribune, againſt openly canvaſſing for votes; for the novi homines, or upſtarts, more ambitious of offices than the patricians themſelves, not only ſolicited the ſuffrages of the people in the forum, but even went to the country fairs and other public meetings to buy voices.

And gains a complete victory.

UNDER the ſucceeding conſuls, C. Marcius Rutilus and Cn. Manlius Imperioſus, the intereſt of money, which before was arbitrary, was, at the motion of Duilius and Mænius, two tribunes of the people, ſettled at one per cent. The patricians, diſpleaſed with a law which ſet bounds to their avarice, in order to revenge themſelves on the plebeians, cited the famous Licinius Stolo to anſwer for a breach of one of the four laws, which he himſelf had ſo zealouſly promoted, forbidding any citizen to poſſeſs more than five hundred acres of land. Licinius actually poſſeſſed a thouſand; but, to cover his breach of the law, had emancipated his ſon, or given given up his authority over him, and made him the nominal poſſeſſor of one half of them; but, as this emancipation was made purely to evade the law, he was convicted of fraud before the prætor, and fined ten thouſand aſſes of braſs, that is, about thirty-two pounds ſterling [c]. This ſame year the conſul Marcius defeated the Privernates, who had declared againſt Rome the year before, and took their city. His colleague Manlius marched againſt the Faliſci, a people of Hetruria; but gained no conſiderable advantage over them. Nothing was talked of at Rome, but his attempt upon the conſtitution. He had ventured to aſſemble the tribes near Sutrium, and made a law in his camp, whereby it was enacted, that, for the future, the twentieth part of the price of every ſlave ſhould be paid into the public treaſury. The law paſſed by the favour of the conſcript fathers, notwithſtanding its irregularity; but the tribunes of the people thought this ſtep might be of dangerous conſequence to the public liberty: The tribes, ſaid they, when aſſembled in a camp and by an armed conſul, are not free to vote as they pleaſe; beſides, the ſoldiers, who are ſworn to obey their generals, will of courſe give their ſuffrages as their commanders direct them. To prevent therefore theſe inconveniencies, the tribunes got a law paſſed, forbidding any magiſtrate to aſſemble the comitia any-where but in Rome, under pain of death. However, the law for paying the twentieth part of the price of every ſlave was not repealed. The two conſuls for the following year, M. Fabius Ambuſtus and M. Popilius Lænas, were employed, the firſt againſt the Faliſci and Tarquinienſes, and the latter againſt the Tyburtes. Popilius, not finding the enemy in the field, ravaged their country and carried off a great booty; but Fabius, after having gained ſome advantage over the united forces of the Faliſci and Tarquinienſes, and the latter againſt the Tyburtes. Popilius, not finding the enemy in the field, ravaged their country and carried off a great booty; but Fabius, after having gained ſome advantage over the united forces of the Faliſci and Tarquinienſes, was obliged to retire, all Hetruria taking up arms againſt him. Upon his retreat, a numerous army of Hetrurians advanced as far as the ſalt-pits on the banks of the Tiber. Their approach obliged the Romans to have recourſe to a dictator tator. The conſul Popilius named him in the abſence of his collegue, and as he was a plebeian himſelf, he pitched upon C. Marcius Rutilus, the plebeian conſul for the laſt year. The dictator likewiſe choſe a plebeian, C. Plautius Proculus, for his general of horſe. The patricians, highly provoked at theſe promotions, did all that lay in their power to prevent the dictator from having ſuch things decreed him as were neceſſary for the war. But the people, on the other hand, haſtened the preparations for the campaign; ſo that, every thing being got ready ſooner than uſual, the dictator took the field without delay, marched ſtraight to the enemy's camp, ſurprized and forced it, nothing being able to withſtand the Roman ſoldiery under the conduct of a plebeian dictator, the firſt who had ever been raiſed to that high office. Hiſtorians do not tell us what number of Hetrurians periſhed in the battle; but leave us to gueſs at the multitude of the ſlain by the number of priſoners; for we are told, that eight thouſand were taken in this famous action. This victory well deſerved the honours of a triumph, which the patricians, jealous of the glory of a plebeian dictator, oppoſed to the utmoſt of their power: but the people, in ſpite of their oppoſition, did him juſtice; ſo that he entered Rome in triumph the day before the nones of May [d].

Triumphs over the Hetrurians.

The time drawing near for electing new conſuls, and there being none but plebeian magiſtrates in Rome to preſide in the comitia, the nobility raiſed difficulties againſt holding them. They pretended, that it was not lawful for any plebeian, tho' a dictator, to preſide in them. The pontifical laws, ſaid they, require, that the election of chief magiſtrates ſhould be conſecrated by auguries, which belong of right only to the patricians. And for this time they prevailed: the dictator and the conſul Popilius were excluded on account of their birth. As it was neceſſary to have ſome magiſtrate of the firſt rank to preſide at the election, the republic had recourſe to an inter-regnum, during which it was governed by ſix patricians, viz. Q. Servilius Ahala, M. Fobius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpicius, and L. Æmilius. Theſe governed by turns, and managed their affairs ſo well, that the plebeians, in the very year in which they triumphed moſt were excluded from a ſhare in the government; for C. Sulpicius picius Peticus and M. Valerius Poplicola, both patricians, were raiſed to the conſulate, tho' for the laſt eleven years one of the conſuls had been a plebeian. The tribunes exclaimed againſt the election, as contrary to the laws; but Fabius, who preſided in the comitia, ſilenced them, by quoting a law of the twelve tables, whereby it was enacted, that only the laſt edict of the people ſhould be of force, and render all preceding ones null. From thence he inferred, that the Roman people, by giving their votes to two patricians, had repealed the law, which divided the conſulate between the patricians and plebeians. The conſuls of this year took Empulum from the Tyburtes; but did nothing elſe worth mentioning. When the time came for new elections, they declared, that they would not reſign their dignity into any hands, but thoſe from which they had received it. We hold the conſulate, ſaid they, of the ſenate and patricians, and therefore think ourſelves bound, both in honour and gratitude, not to reſign it into any hands but theirs. This extraordinary proceeding occaſioned ſuch commotions in the campus Martius, that the greater number of the people cried out, that they ought not only to diſſolve the aſſembly, but leave Rome, as they had done formerly. Many actually retired, leaving only the leaſt paſſionate behind them, who gave their ſuffrages for two patricians, M. Fabius Ambuſtus and T. Quinctius Pennus, who took the field without delay againſt the Tyburtes and Tarquinienſes. The former were totally ſubdued by Fabius, and the latter defeated in a bloody battle by Quinctius, who, to revenge the cruelty they had formerly committed on three hundred and ſeven Roman ſoldiers, put all the priſoners to the ſword, except three hundred and fifty-eight, whom he ſent to Rome, where, by order of the ſenate, they were firſt beaten with rods, and then beheaded. Theſe victories gained the Romans ſuch reputation among the Italian nations, that the Samnites ſent an embaſſy to Rome, to propoſe an alliance with the republic. The embaſſadors were kindly received by the ſenate, and the alliance concluded, the Samnites engaging to furniſh the republic with troops, when required, and the Romans promiſing to protect them againſt their enemies both at home and abroad. Thus Rome advanced by degrees to that immenſe grandeur to which at laſt ſhe attained.

THE patricians had gained ſuch an aſcendant over the people, that they kept the conſulate in their own hands, and promoted to that dignity C. Sulpicius Peticus and M. Valerius Poplicola. The former marched againſt the Tarquinienſes, and the latter againſt the Volſci, who were anew in motion. The conſuls had ſcarce taken the field, when Valerius was recalled to nominate a dictator, the ſenate being informed by Sulpicius, that the Cærites were diſpoſed to take part with the Tarquinienſes, and that the Faliſci had already joined them.

Manlius Torquatus dictator.

Valerius named T. Manlius Torquatus to the dictatorſhip, tho' he had never been conſul, a neceſſary ſtep to that ſupreme dignity; but Valerius regarded nothing but the merit of Manlius in the choice; and his nomination was not oppoſed, tho' contrary to law. The new dictator, having named Cornelius Coſſus to be his general of horſe, was preparing to march againſt the Cærites; but they, being ſenſible they could not make head againſt the brave Torquatus, ſent deputies from all their towns to implore the clemency of the Romans. The ſenate referred the deputies to the people, who being reminded by them, that Cære had been the aſylum of the veſtals when Rome was taken by the Gauls, received them into favour, and granted them a truce for an hundred years. Then the dictator led his army againſt the Faliſci; and, finding no enemy in the field to contend with, laid waſte their country, and returned to Rome, where all things continued quiet, till the time came for the new elections. The dictator, who was to preſide in the comitia, had formed a deſign of excluding the plebeians; which the tribunes being aware of, oppoſed the aſſembling of the centuries, till the expiration of the dictatorſhip, which ended with the conſuls year. Whereupon the republic fell into an inter-regnum; and thoſe who then governed found both parties irreconcileable. The diſputes grew to ſuch a height, as threatened an open revolt; which ſo terrified the fathers, that they ſuffered at length the Licinian law to take place, and one of the conſuls to be choſen, agreeable to that law, out of the plebeians. The perſons elected were P. Valerius Poplicola, a patrician, and C. Marcius Rutilus, a plebeian, who was now raiſed to this office a ſecond time [e].

The payment of debts regulated.

THE firſt care of the new conſuls was to regulate the payment of debts, the only obſtruction to a thorough union of the patricians and plebeians. They no longer conſidered the relief of debtors as a private affair, but as a general concern of

of the public; and therefore choſe out five men, of known probity and great experience, to take an account of all the debts of the plebeians. Theſe five were called bankers, and had the command of the public treaſury to enable them to diſcharge their commiſſion; which they did to the ſatisfaction of both parties. Thoſe who, out of ſloth and idleneſs, had plunged themſelves in debt, either borrowed money of theſe bankers, giving the treaſury ſecurity for it, or depoſited the value of their debts in their creditors hands in effects, which were valued by the bankers. By this means the greateſt part of the debtors were relieved, without doing injury to any perſon and with little loſs to the public.

TRANQUILLITY being thus eſtabliſhed at home, the city was ſuddenly alarmed with a report, that the twelve leucumonies of Hetruria were entered into an alliance againſt the republic and ready to enter her territories. Hereupon Julius Julus was named dictator, and he appointed L. Æmilius, ſurnamed Mamercinus, to be his general of the horſe; but the report proved groundleſs, and was in all likelihood artfully ſpread by the patricians, that they might have an opportunity of placing a man at the head of the republic, who was able to prevent the execution of the Licinian law. And indeed Julius made uſe of all his credit and authority to get two patricians choſen conſuls; but he was ſo warmly oppoſed by the tribunes, that both he and the conſuls went out of their office, before the comitia could be aſſembled for a new election. In the inter-regnum which enſued, C. Sulpicius Peticus and M. Fabius governed ſucceſſively, and found means to bring the people to a compliance with the patricians. Two patricians were choſen, Sulpicius himſelf and T. Quinctius Cincinnatus. During their adminiſtration, the Tarquinienſes and Faliſci, being quite tired out with the calamities of war, ſubmitted to the republic, and obtained a truce for forty years. And now the peace the Romans enjoyed giving them a favourable opportunity to elect new cenſors, the day was fixed for the comitia to proceed to this new election. None but the moſt illuſtrious patricians had ever enjoyed this dignity; but nevertheleſs C. Marcius Rutilus, thinking himſelf, tho' a plebeian, qualified for any poſt in the republic, after he had been twice conſul and once dictator, ſtood candidate for this office, and, in ſpight of all oppoſition of the nobles;

bles, was elected, with Cn. Manlius a patrician. The commons being unwilling to give a new luſtre to an office, to which a plebeian had been juſt promoted, Ovinus, one of the tribunes propoſed a law, depriving the conſuls of the prerogative of filling up the ſenate, and lodging this power in the cenſors. The law paſſed; and what is very extraordinary, this important change was made in the republic without the leaſt diſturbance. And now the cenſorſhip being open to the plebeians, the patricians, in order to ſecure the conſulate to themſelves, and prevent the Licinian law from being put in execution, prevailed upon the conſuls to name a dictator to preſide at the next election, imagining, that he would be more reſpected in the comitia, and have a far greater influence over the centuries than the conſuls. The perſon raiſed to this dignity was Fabius Ambuſtus, a man diſtinguiſhed by his birth, his employments, and his perſonal merit. He had been thrice conſul, and honoured with a triumph but three years before. He choſe for his general of the horſe the famous Servilius Ahala, a man no-ways inferior to himſelf; but, notwithſtanding theſe precautions, M. Popilius Lænas, a plebeian, who had been conſul twice already, was promoted to this dignity. His collegue, L. Cornelius Scipio, falling ſick ſoon after his election, the plebeian conſul, to the great mortification of the nobility, became the ſole general of the Roman troops. The Gauls, at this time having entered Latium anew and laid waſte the country, were advancing towards Rome. Popilius therefore ordered levies to be made; and ſo great a number of ſoldiers inliſted themſelves on this occaſion, that two armies were immediately raiſed, one to guard the city, under the command of M. Valerius Poplicola who was then prætor, and the firſt in that employment who was ſeen at the head of an army. Popilius marched with the reſt of the troops to ſtop the progreſs of the Gauls, who, upon his firſt appearance, offered him battle; but Popilius, who was well acquainted with their temper, and therefore willing to let their firſt heat abate, kept within his camp. The Gauls, thinking the Romans afraid, attacked them while they were raiſing their works; but were repulſed with great loſs. The Gauls, however, returned the ſame day to the charge; and, in the beginning of this ſecond attack, Popilius, expoſing himſelf too much, was wounded with a javelin, and carried out of the field to have his wound dreſſed. This accident ſuſpended the ardor of the Romans; but as ſoon as their general appeared again, they renewed their courage, drove the Gauls into the plain, and there, drawing up into the form of a wedge, penetrated into the main body of the enemy, and obliged them to retire with precipitation. The general did not think proper to purſue the fugitives; but having taken and plundered their camp, led back to Rome his victorious army enriched with the ſpoils of the conquered enemy. He was decreed a triumph at his return, which was put off till he was recovered of his wound. As his collegue Scipio continued likewiſe indiſpoſed, the ſenate deſired the two conſuls to name a dictator to preſide at the approaching election. In compliance with the requeſt of the conſcript fathers, they named L. Furius Camillus, ſon of the great Camillus, to that dignity, who appointed P. Cornelius Scipio to be his general of the horſe. Theſe two patricians uſed all their intereſt to make the election fall only on men of their order, and carried their point; for Camillus himſelf was choſen one of the conſuls, and Appius Claudius, ſurnamed Craſſus, another patrician, was appointed his collegue[f].

The Gauls defeated by Popilius.

In the beginning of their conſulate, the Gauls, who had fled for refuge to the hills of Alba, appeared again in great numbers on the ſea-coaſt of Latium; and at the ſame time ſome Greeks, from what part Livy does not determine, made a deſcent on the coaſt which the Gauls were plundering. The latter, jealous of their booty, oppoſed the Greeks at their landing, and obliged them to retire to their ſhips; however, they continued hovering about the coaſt, while the Gauls laid waſte and plundered it, from the mouth of the Tiber to Antium. The republic made the neceſſary preparations to drive ſuch dangerous enemies farther off; but in the mean time, Appius, one of the conſuls, dying, the whole management of the war was committed to Camillus, whoſe very name was looked upon as a good omen in a war with the Gauls. His firſt care was to raiſe a numerous army, conſiſting of ten legions, and amounting to forty-five thouſand men. Of theſe legions he gave four to L. Pinarius the the prætor, ordering him to guard the ſea-coaſt againſt th[e] Greeks; two he left to defend the city, and with the other four marched himſelf againſt the Gauls; but as he had no deſign to come to a pitched battle with them, he encamped in the Pomptin territory, a country full of marſhes and rivers. While both armies continued inactive, a fierce Gaul, remarkable both for his ſtature and the richneſs of his armour, challenged the braveſt man in the Roman legions to a ſingle combat. M. Valerius, a legionary tribune, great-grandſon to the famous Valerius Voluſus, accepted the challenge, and is ſaid to have obtained the victory by means of a raven, which, perching upon his helmet, and flying in the face of the giant during the fight, ſo blinded him with his wings, that it was eaſy for his rival to ſtab him. But the Gauls, deſpiſing the advantage Valerius had gained by the help of a bird, crouded round the body of their dead champion, to hinder the Roman from ſtripping him of his armour. Upon this the Romans haſtened to the aſſiſtance of Valerius, which naturally led both armies to a battle, in which the Gauls were entirely defeated. Thoſe who eſcaped took their way through the country of the Volſci, and, entering Campania, croſſed the plains of Falernum, penetrated as far as Apulia, and retired to the coaſts of the Adriatic ſea. As for the brave Valerius, the general rewarded him with a crown of gold and two oxen, a conſiderable preſent at that time. He ever after bore the name of Corvus, which ſignifies a raven, and his poſterity that of Corvinus; which diſtinguiſhed this branch of the Valerian family from all the reſt [g].

M. Valerius furnamed Corvus.

The Gauls defeated anew.

The conſul, having thus freed Latium from the Gauls, joined his army to that of the prætor Pinarius, in order to drive away the Greek pirates, who infeſted the coaſt; but the obſtinacy of thoſe adventurers, who, though they durſt not land, continued ſtill at ſea, obliged him to keep the field longer than he expected; ſo that, in the mean while the time for electing new conſuls drawing near, he was obliged to nominate a dictator to preſide in the comitia. The perſon he promoted to that dignity was the famous Manlius Torquatus, who choſe Cornelius Coſſus to be his general of the horſe. As the dictator was charmed with the exploit of Valerius, ſo much reſembling his own, and had a great influence in the elections, he prevailed with the people to chuſe him one

one of the conſuls, though he was but twenty-three years of age, and too young even to have a place in the ſenate. His collegue was Popilius Lænas, who now entered upon this office the fourth time. As for Camillus, he continued with his army on the coaſt, till the Greeks, wanting freſh water and other neceſſary proviſions, and not daring to come aſhore, put out to ſea.

WHILE the Romans enjoyed a profound peace both at home and abroad, under the adminiſtration of the two conſuls mentioned above, embaſſadors came from Carthage to Rome. The Carthaginians were the firſt nation the Romans were acquainted with out of Italy, and with whom they entered into an alliance. As early as the firſt year after the expulſion of the Tarquins, when Brutus and Valerius were conſuls, theſe two nations entered into a treaty, chiefly in relation to navigation and commerce. This treaty was yet to be ſeen in Polybius's time, on the baſe of a column in the antient Roman language, which, as that writer tells us, was ſo different from what was ſpoke in his time, that thoſe who were moſt converſant with the Latin tongue could not, without much ſtudy and labour, underſtand it. The Greek hiſtorian has tranſlated the words of this treaty with all poſſible fidelity, and tranſmitted it to us. It was conceived in theſe terms:

A treaty of navigation and commerce made with Carthage.

" THERE ſhall be peace and friendſhip between the Ro" mans, and the allies of the Romans, and between the " Carthaginians, and the allies of the Carthaginians, on the " following terms: The Romans, and the allies of the Ro" mans, ſhall not ſail beyond the Fair Promontory, unleſs
" conſtrained by tempeſt, or by any enemy. If, at any " time, they ſhall chance to be forced aſhore, they ſhall not " be permitted to buy any thing, nor take any thing, but
" what they want for repairing theirve ſſels, or for their ſa" crifices. None ſhall make longer ſtay aſhore than five " days. Thoſe who ſhall come as merchants, ſhall pay no " other duty than what is allowed to the common crier and " regiſter. Theſe two officers ſhall make oath of what ſhall
" be bought and ſold in their preſence, as well in Africa as " Sardinia. If the Romans ſhall chance at any time to viſit
" ſuch places in Sicily, as are ſubject to the Carthaginians,
" they ſhall not ſuffer any moleſtation whatſoever; but ſhall
" have juſtice done them in all things. The Carthaginians
" ſhall attempt nothing againſt the Ardeates, the Antiates,
" the Aretini, thoſe of Laurentum, Circeii, and Terracina,

" or, in a word, any of the Latins whomſoever, who ſhall " be in ſubjection to the Romans; nor ſhall they attempt " any of their towns that are under the Roman protection. " And in caſe they ſhould at any time make ſeizure of ſuch " towns, they ſhall reſtore the ſame to the Romans without " any damage. They ſhall not build either fort or citadel " in the country of the Latins; and in caſe they ſhould at " any time invade their lands in an hoſtile manner, they " ſhall not remain there one night."

THE promonotory here called the Fair Promontory, lay, according to Polybius, north of Carthage and near it. The Carthaginians, as the ſame author obſerves, did not allow the Romans to ſail beyond it, that is, to the ſouthward of it, not caring that their coaſts ſhould lie open to all comers, leſt the fruitfulneſs of the land and the happy ſituation of the cities ſhould tempt them to ſettle there. Such was the firſt treaty Rome made with Carthage at the birth of the republic; and now, when Valerius Corvus and Popilius Lænas were conſuls, the Carthaginians croſſed the ſea, came to Rome, and concluded a ſecond treaty, differing from the former in ſome particulars. It was couched in the following terms: " The Romans and their allies ſhall have friendſhip and con- " federacy with the people of Carthage, the Tyrians, the " inhabitants of Utica, and their allies, on condition that " they exerciſe no hoſtilities, carry on no traffic, build no " towns beyond the Fair Promontory, Maſtia, and Tar- " ſeium. If the Carthaginians ſhall take any town in the " territory of the Latins, which is not under the protection " of the Romans, they ſhall enjoy the pillage thereof; but " the town ſhall be reſtored, and put into the hands of the " Romans. If the Carthaginians ſhall make any captives " among thoſe Latins, who, tho' not ſubject to the Romans, " are in league or amity with them, and ſhall bring ſuch " captives into any Roman port, and theſe captives ſhall be " diſcovered and challenged by any Roman, they ſhall be ſet " at liberty. The Romans ſhall be treated in the ſame " manner in the ports belonging to the Carthaginians. If " the Romans ſhall put in at any port belonging to the Car- " thaginians, to take in water or other neceſſaries, not any " of thoſe, who are compromiſed in this treaty of friend- " ſhip, ſhall offer them any injury or moleſtation; if other- " wiſe, it ſhall be deemed a public breach of the treaty. " As to Sardinia and Africa, the Romans ſhall have no " commerce there; they ſhall neither traffic, build towns, " nor ſo much as attempt to land on thoſe coaſts, unleſs to " buy

" buy neceſſaries and refit their ſhips. If they ſhall be com" pelled by tempeſt, or otherwiſe, to take refuge in ſuch
" ports, they ſhall depart in five days. The Romans ſhall
" be allowed to traffic in any of the towns of Sicily, un" der the dominion of the Carthaginians, and in the city
" of Carthage itſelf, where they ſhall enjoy the ſame rights " and privileges as the Carthaginians themſelves; and the " Carthaginians ſhall have the like treatment in Rome [h]."

THE whole employment of the preſent conſuls was to negociate this treaty with the Carthaginians. They were ſucceeded by C. Plautius Hypſæus and T. Manlius Torquatus, who had been twice dictator, but now for the firſt time conſul. During their conſulate the republic enjoyed a profound peace, which left them no room to gain themſelves any glory by feats of arms. They therefore endeavoured to promote the public welfare by wiſe regulations: they reduced the intereſt of money from one per cent. to half per cent. and allowed the debtors, by paying down one fourth of their debts, three years to diſcharge the remainder, by annual and equal payments. A new war with the Volſci broke out during the adminiſtration of the ſucceeding conſuls, Valerius Corvus, now a ſecond time conſul, and C. Pætelius Libo. Valerius defeated the enemy, took from them Satricum and burnt it, ſparing only the temple of the goddeſs Matuta. He was honoured with a triumph, in which four thouſand captives marched before his chariot. In this conſulate the ſecular games, which had been inſtituted in the year of Rome 297, were celebrated for the ſecond time. The next year's conſuls, M. Fabius Dorſo and S. Sulpicius Camerinus, named L. Furius Camillus to be dictator a ſecond time, on occaſion of a war with a new enemy, the Aurunci, a petty nation near the confines of Latium, on the coaſt of the Tyrrhenian ſea. Furius overthrew them in battle, and at his return built a temple, which he had vowed during the action, to Juno Moneta. This name had been given to the queen of the Gods a little before the taking of Rome by the Gauls. It was pretended, that from the temple of Juno had come a voice, accompanied with an eathquake, and that the voice had warned the Romans to avert the evils that threatened them, by ſacrificing a ſow with pig. Hence ſhe was called Moneta, from the verb " monere " to warn. This temple was built on the capitol, in the place where the houſe of the rebellious Manlius formerly ſtood, and afterwards became a public mint. Hence the medals, which were ſtamped for current coin in trade, were called moneta, or money. The year following, the Romans imagining, that the goddeſs, agreeable to her name, admoniſhed them by prodigies of the impending wrath of the gods, C. Marcius Rutilus, now conſul a third time, and T. Manlius Imperioſus, a ſecond time, appointed P. Valerius to be dictator for the ſolemnization of the feſtival called feriæ Latinæ.

THE dictator having brought the republic to an interregnum, for ſome reaſon not mentioned by the hiſtorians, the centuries choſe two patricians, as they had done the year before, viz. M. Valerius Corvus, a third time, and Cornelius Coſſus, ſirnamed Arvina. During their adminiſtration, the enmity betwen the Romans and Samnites broke out. A city at that time ſcarce known to the Romans ſowed the ſeeds of diſcord, and changed the alliance between the two nations into laſting hatred. The Sidicini, a people of Auſonia, on the other ſide of the Liris, being attacked by the Samnites, and not able to defend themſelves with their own ſtrength, had recourſe to the people of Campania, who took up arms in favour of their oppreſſed neighbours, it being their intereſt to ſtop the progreſs of ſo powerful an enemy. Hereupon the Samnites, having a proſpect of greater advantages in the conqueſt of the Campanians than of the Sidicini, turned their arms againſt the former; and as they were an effeminate people, defeated them in two pitched battles, and threatened to beſiege the city of Capua, their metropolis. In this diſtreſs the magiſtrates had recourſe to Rome, whither they ſent an embaſſy to implore the aſſiſtance of the republic; but the ſenate returned to their humble addreſs the following anſwer: The ſenate of Rome think you worthy of their protection; but we muſt have regard to our antient friendſhip with the Samnites. We cannot therefore take arms in your favour; but we will entreat the Samnites, our friends, to put an end to their hoſtilities. The Capuan deputies had hitherto ſpoken only of an alliance and confederacy with the Romans; but now, not being ſatisfied with the anſwer they had received, purſuant to the powers with which they had been inveſted, they made this further declaration: Since the Romans ſcruple to attack openly the Samnites, contrary to the faith of their treaties, let them at leaſt not be afraid to defend their own property againſt the unjuſt uſurpations of their enemies; the people of Campania, the city of Capua, our lands, our temples, every thing we have divine and human, we abſolutely give and ſurrender to you. From this time therefore all our loſſes will be yours. This donation in due form, by embaſſadors authoriſed to make it, was of great weight with the conſcript fathers. They did not think their alliance with the Samnites obliged them to refuſe it; and therefore without delay diſpatched embaſſadors to entreat the Samnites as friends to ſpare a province which belonged to Rome. In caſe the Samnites were not prevailed upon by theſe gentle methods, the embaſſadors were directed to give them notice, in the name of the people and ſenate of Rome, to quit the country immediately. But the Samnites, a proud and warlike people, were ſo far from being intimidated by the majeſty of the Roman name, that ther magiſtrates ſent for the commanders of their troops, and ordered them, in the preſence of the Roman embaſſadors, to go inſtantly and ravage Campania. This inſult filled both the ſenate and the people with indignation. All other buſineſs was laid aſide, that they might apply themſelves wholly to the making of preparations for a war, which was declared with all the ceremonies inſtituted by Numa on ſuch occaſions. Two armies being ſoon raiſed, it fell to the lot of Valerius to march with one into Campania, while Cornelius with the other carried the war into Samnium. The ſtreſs of the war lay at firſt on the brave Valerius, who poſted his troops on mount Gaurus in Campania, and continued in that advantageous ſituation, till his men, by frequently ſkirmiſhing with the Samnites, had learnt their way of managing their arms. At length he aſſembled his troops, and having encouraged them in a long ſpeech not to be afraid of a new enemy, to remember their antient valour, and to gain the honours of a triumph for one deſcended from the great Poplicola, marched out of his camp, and drew up his men in battalia. As the two armies were pretty equal in numbers, the victory was long diſputed, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide. The Roman cavalry attempted in vain to break the enemy's battalions. Upon which Valerius putting himſelf at the head of the infantry, and encouraging the legions to tread in his ſteps, threw himſelf into the midſt of the Samnite cohorts, and being followed by his legionaries, made a dreadful havock. The dead lay in heaps round the enemy's ſtandards; yet their cohorts kept their ground, being reſolved to defend themſelves to the laſt. At length Valerius ordered the Roman cavalry to attack the enemy in flank; but they ſtood the ſhock, till night put an end to the conflict. After the battle was over, the Romans owned, that they had never engaged a more ſtubborn or more intrepid enemy; and would not have known that they had gained the victory, had not the Samnites deſerted their camp in the night, and abandoned it to the conquerors.

The Samnites overcome by the Romans.

WHILE the brave Valerius was thus ſignalizing his valour in Campania, his collegue Cornelius, having imprudently left his camp, which was advantageouſly poſted near Saticula on the confines of Samnium, marched his troops through a mountainous country into a foreſt, out of which there was but one paſſage, and that through a deep valley, which, as well as the wood, was lined with the enemy's forces; ſo that he found himſelf, when it was not in his power to alter his march, ſurrounded by the Samnites. This threw the conſul into the utmoſt conſternation; but it fortunately happened, that he had a brave officer among his troops, who drew him out of the danger. This was the famous P. Decius Mus, who was yet only a legionary tribune, and who afterwards ſignalized his love for his country in an eminent manner. The prudent tribune, obſerving an eminence at a diſtance, which commanded the camp of the Samnites and had been neglected by them, propoſed to the conſul, that he might be detached with a ſmall body to take poſſeſſion of it. He added, When you ſee me poſted there, be no longer under apprehenſions of the enemy, but continue your march. The Samnites will not dare attack you, or diſpute your paſſage, when expoſed to our darts. As for us, we ſhall, by the aſſiſtance of the Roman valour and the gods our protectors, find means to diſengage ourſelves from the enemy and rejoin you. The general approved of the deſign, and detached a ſmall body of troops, under the command of Decius, who, taking his way through the wood, concealed his march ſo well, that the enemy did not diſcover him, till he was near the poſt which he was going to ſeize; and then the ſight of the Romans climbing up the rock was ſuch a ſurprize to them that they could come to no determination, being in ſuſpenſe, whether they ſhould attack the conſul or Decius. In the mean time, the Roman general, taking advantage of this irreſolution, marched out of the valley without moleſtation. Decius did not doubt, but the enemy would either attack him on his hill, or at leaſt ſhut up all the avenues to it; but when he perceived that they neither came to fall upon him, nor attempted to ſurround him and cut off his retreat, he took a view of all the avenues to the hill, and placed centinels at them, with orders to return ſilently to the main body at the ſecond watch of the night. When at that hour all his men were re-aſſembled, he laid before them the neceſſity of leaving the place where they were, and put it to the vote, whether to ſtay for day-light, or march off immediately, and force a way through the enemy, while they were aſleep. The latter being univerſally approved, Decius put himſelf at the head of his troop, and marched down the rock in great ſilence. They had got half way through the enemy's camp, when a Roman ſoldier, ſtriking his foot againſt the buckler of a Samnite, awaked a centinel, who gave the alarm in that quarter. The Samnites immediately ran to arms, not knowing whether it was Decius and his troop, the conſul and his army, or ſome Samnite of the camp, who had diſturbed their reſt. In the midſt of this univerſal confuſion, Decius ordered his men to give a great ſhout, which doubled the conſternation of the Samnites, while the Romans gained the plain and made their eſcape, none of the Samnites daring to follow or attack them. When Decius came near the conſul's camp, as it was not yet day, he ordered his men to halt, telling them, that they deſerved to enter the camp in a more glorious manner, than in ſilence and darkneſs. The next morning the whole army marched to meet that brave troop, which had ſaved their lives at the peril of their own, and conducted thoſe valiant men in triumph to the general's tent, who, having ſummoned all his ſoldiers to hear his harangue, was beginning to make the panegyric of Decius; but the brave tribune, liking better to give his general good advice, than to hear his own praiſes, adviſed him to march away immediately, without loſing time in harangues, and ſurprize the camp of the enemy, who, in all probability, had ſent out detachments in queſt of him. This advice was followed; the Romans ſurprized the Samnites rambling about the fields, and purſued them to their camp, which the conſul took and plundered, after having cut in pieces above thirty thouſand of them. As ſoon as Decius returned to the camp, the

the conſul reſumed his panegyric; but, as words were not a ſufficient acknowledgment of his merit, he honoured him with all the military rewards that were ever given to a ſubaltern. Beſides a crown of gold, he had a preſent of an hundred oxen and a white bull with gilt horns. As for the ſoldiers of his detachment, the conſul aſſigned them a double quantity of corn during their life, and gave each of them two ſaga or military habits. The legions likewiſe ſignalized their gratitude to their deliverer, by putting on his head an obſidional crown, which it was cuſtomary among the Romans to beſtow on a general who relieved them when beſieged. This crown was made of the graſs growing in the place, and called corona obſidionalis. And now the detachment itſelf, which Decius had brought ſafe out of the danger into which he had led them, thinking themſelves obliged in gratitude to beſtow ſome mark of diſtinction on their leader, crowned him with a crown of oak-leaves, which was called the civic crown, and thought the moſt honourable of all military rewards. Thus, loaded with three crowns at once, he offered up the white bull in ſacrifice to Mars, by way of thankſgiving, and diſtributed the hundred oxen among the companions of his danger and ſharers of his glory. The reſt of the legions made likewiſe a preſent to the company which had followed Decius, conſiſting of ſome pounds of meal and meaſures of wine [i].

THE campaign did not end with this victory. The Samnites, who had been routed by Valerius, having raiſed new forces, appeared before Sueſſula, a town ſituated between Nola and Capua. Valerius haſtened to the relief of the Sueſſulani; and, in order to deceive the enemy, encamped his troops within as narrow a compaſs as he could, hoping they would attack him in his entrenchments; but the Samnites, judging that the Romans muſt ſoon want proviſions, kept quiet in their camp. Thus both armies continued ſome time inactive; but at length the Samnites themſelves being diſtreſſed the firſt for want of proviſions, Valerius attacked their camp, while the greater part of their forces were diſperſed about the country in queſt of neceſſaries, forced it, and made a great ſlaughter there, while the cavalry chaſed the ſeveral detachments which were abroad foraging. We are told that the Roman ſoldiers brought to their general above forty thouſand of the enemy's bucklers, the the Samnites having thrown them away, that they might not incumber them in their flight. One hundred and twenty ſtandards were likewiſe taken from the enemy in this action. Thus both conſuls returned to Rome, where they were honoured with a triumph. The ſucceſſors of this glorious campaign gave new luſtre to the republic, both among the neighbouring and diſtant nations. The Faliſci changed the truce which they had made with the Romans into a treaty of alliance. The Latins, who had taken up arms, with a deſign to employ them againſt the republic, if ſhe had been worſted in this war, turned their hoſtilities againſt the Peligni, a Samnite nation, as it were to aſſiſt the Romans, whom they had really intended to betray. And laſtly, the Carthaginians ſent to compliment the republic on her ſucceſs, and made a preſent of a crown of gold of twenty pounds weight to Jupiter Capitolinus, by way of thankſgiving for her victories. This year ended with a cenſus, by which it appeared, that the number of Romans able to bear arms, amounted to one hundred and ſixty thouſand. The ceremony cloſed with a luſtrum, which was the twenty-ſecond ſince its firſt inſtitution by king Servius.

THE following year, C. Marcius Rutilus was elected the fourth time to the conſulate, and with him Q. Servilius Ahala. The latter encamped in the neighbourhood of Rome, while the former marched into Campania, where he found a general depravation of manners in ſome cohorts of Roman ſoldiers, who had been left in Capua all winter. He even diſcovered, that they had entered into a plot among themſelves to drive the natives out of Campania, and to ſeize that delicious country for themſelves. To diſappoint this ſcheme, he artfully contrived to ſend the moſt mutinous and enterpriſing, without treating them diſgracefully, or letting his deſign appear. At length the ſoldiers ſuſpecting it, and being alarmed with the apprehenſion of puniſhment, one whole cohort deſerted, and, poſting themſelves advantageouſly near Anxur, in a narrow paſs, between the ſea on one ſide and high mountains on the other, were ſoon joined by great numbers of malecontents from the city and the camp. As they were ſtill at a loſs for a leader, they ſurprized by night in his bed one T. Quinctius, an excellent commander, who had retired ſome time ſince from public life to his farm, and forced him to go along with them as their general to Rome. Their approach ſo terrified the city, that a dictator was named to march an army against the mutineers. The perſon pitched upon was Valerius Corvus, who met them eight miles from Rome, came to a parley with them, and, being extremely beloved by the ſoldiery, prevailed with them to ſubmit. However, the rebels, beſides a general pardon, which was granted by the ſenate and confirmed by the people in comitia, obtained ſome conceſſions from the republic. They inſiſted, that the pay of the cavalry, which was then three times as much as the foot received, ſhould be reduced; and this merely out of revenge, becauſe not one ſingle man of that corps had joined them in their revolt. Some writers tell us, that ſeveral laws were paſſed at the requeſt of the mutineers, viz. 1. That no man, who was a legionary tribune one year, ſhould be a centurion the next. The rebellious ſoldiers preſſed the paſſing of this law, purely to revenge themſelves on one P. Salonius, a ſtrict obſerver of diſcipline, who had been a legionary tribune and a centurion alternately for ſeveral years together, and had ever oppoſed the ſeditious concils of the revolters. The ſenate therefore refuſed at firſt to conſent to a law, which was wholly dictated by revenge againſt an officer, who had ſo ſtrictly adhered to his duty. But Salonius himſelf earneſtly entreating the conſcript fathers to have more regard to the welfare of the public, than to his honour, at his requeſt the law paſſed. 2. That all uſury ſhould be aboliſhed in Rome, and every Roman forbidden to lend money upon intereſt. 3. That both the conſuls might be choſen out of the plebeians. 4. That no man ſhould bear the ſame office twice within ten years, or hold two different employments the ſame year. If the plebeian faction gained theſe articles at this time, it is evident, that the rebel army muſt have been exceeding numerous and formidable.

They ſubmit, but obtain ſome conceſſions from the republic.

THE Romans, by theſe condeſcenſions to the rebels, loſt credit among their neighbours. Privernum revolted, but was quickly reduced by C. Plautius Hypſæus, now the ſecond time conſul. His collegue L. Æmilius laid waſte the country of the Samnites, who were ſo weakened by the two late overthrows, that they dared not appear in the field; but ſued for a peace and an alliance with Rome. Theſe being obtained, they turned their arms once more againſt the Sidicini, who, being refuſed ſuccour, even upon the terms of being ſubject to the republic, gave themſelves up to the Latins, already in arms to recover their independence. The Campanians, forgetting the benefits they had received from the Romans and their engagements with the republic, followed the example of the Sidicini and joined the Latins. An army formed of these three united nations entered Samnium, laying waste all before them; but not being able to bring the Samnites to a battle, soon retired for want of provisions. Their retreat gave the Samnites an opportunity of sending embassadors to Rome to complain of her suffering the Latins and Campanians, her allies and subjects, to commit hostilities in Samnium. The senate did not indeed approve of the hostilities the Latins had committed, but were ashamed to own, that they had no longer power over them. The consul Plautius therefore in the name of the senate returned the following answer: The Campanians are our subjects, and we will therefore force them not to molest you. But as for the Latins, our treaty of alliance with them does not oblige them not to enter into any war without our consent; and therefore we can promise nothing in relation to them. This answer left the Samnites in a melancholy uncertainty, offended the Campanians, and, as it seemed to betray a sense of weakness in the Romans, raised the spirits of the Latins to such a degree, that they imagined they could now demand nothing, which the Romans would dare to refuse them. They secretly combined with the Campanians to fall upon the Romans, though in appearance their preparations were only against the Samnites. But the senate, being informed of their intentions by some friends to Rome among them, resolved to prevent the enemy, and, in order thereto, to bring on the election of new consuls before the usual time. Accordingly, they obliged the present consuls to abdicate; but some religious scruples being raised concerning the holding of the comitia, by consuls deposed before the expiration of their year, the government was reduced to an inter-regnum and two presidents, Valerius Corvus and M. Fabius, were named to govern in the mean time successively, each five days in his turn. While the latter was in office, the people were assembled in the campus Martius; and it being of the utmost importance to chuse two able men to sit at the helm in so tempestuous a season, the centuries pitched upon the famous Manlius Torquatus and Decius Mus, the former a patrician, and the latter a plebeian. The republic promised herself a continued series of prosperity under the administration of these two illustrious magistrates. Torquatus was a man of an inflexible ſeverity in keeping up the military diſcipline; Decius had a more humane temper; and both collegues were equally famous for great piety towards the gods and a tender love for their country. In the beginning of their conſulate, Alexander, king of Epirus and brother to Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, came into Italy on the invitation of the Tarentines, to aſſiſt them againſt the Brutians. This prince hoped to have ſubdued all Italy, with the ſame eaſe as his nephew had reduced Perſia; but was not ſo ſucceſsful in his ſcheme, having to do with more warlike nations. He gained indeed ſome ſmall advantages over the Lucanians and Brutians at his firſt coming; but ſoon found it neceſſary to court the friendſhip of the more powerful nations of Italy, and particularly of the Romans, with whom he concluded an alliance of friendſhip [k].

Ten of the Latin chiefs ſummoned to Rome.

AFTER this the two conſuls made it their whole buſineſs to prevent the revolt of the Latins; and the firſt ſtep they took, in order thereto, was to ſummon ten of the Latin chiefs to appear at Rome, and give an account of their preparations for war. The Latin council ſent one L. Annius, a man of great credit among them, with ten more to Rome, to demand, as a condition of renewing the alliance between the two nations, that one of the conſuls and half of the ſenate be for the future choſen out of the Latins. This demand was rejected with indignation, and war immediately declared. The conſuls ordered levies to be made, and having formed two armies, conſiſting entirely of Romans, they marched through the territories of the Marſi, entered the country of the Peligni that way, and encamped in Campania at the foot of mount Veſuvius, at a ſmall diſtance from the enemy's camp. The night before the battle, which ſoon enſued, both conſuls are ſaid to have dreamt the ſame dream. A man of a gigantic ſtature and majeſtic mein appeared to them, and told them, that the victory was decreed to that army of the two, whoſe general ſhould devote himſelf to the Dii Manes. When it was day the two conſuls communicated their dreams to each other. Perhaps they had courage enough to feign an apparition, which muſt coſt one or the other of them his life, purely to raiſe the courage of their ſoldiers;

ſoldiers; for the love of the Romans for their country and their deſire of glory were apt to ſuggeſt to them ſuch ſchemes. But be that as it will, it is pretended, that the aruſpices made ſuch diſcoveries in the entrails of the victims, as confirmed the dreams. Hereupon it was agreed in a council of war, that Manlius ſhould command the right wing, and Decius the left, in the enſuing battle; and that he, whoſe troops ſhould firſt give way, ſhould devote himſelf to ſave his country, and ruſh into the midſt of the enemy's battalions. In the ſame council of war, conſiſting of the two conſuls, all the lieutenant generals, and legionary tribunes, it was likewiſe determined, that the antient diſcipline ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved in the preſent war, and that no officer or ſoldier ſhould dare to fight the enemy without expreſs orders, or out of his rank, upon pain of death. This was done, becauſe the enemy they were now to engage with ſpoke the ſame language, were armed after the ſame manner, obſerved the ſame way of fighting (T), and were perſonally

(T) The order of battle, in which the Romans drew up their army before an engagement, in Manlius's time, was as follows: They formed the whole body of their troops into three lines, diſtinguiſhed by the names of Haſtati, Principes, and Triarii. The Haſtati, who compoſed the firſt line, were ſo ſtyled from the javelins called Haſtæ, which they bore. The Principes, who made the ſecond line, were ſo called, according to Varro (13), becauſe in more antient times they were placed in the front of the battle and began the attack. They were in thoſe times the richeſt of the Roman youth. The Triarii were ſo named, becauſe they made the third line. They were commonly Veterans, and the main ſtrength of the army. The Principes were armed with ſwords, and the Triarii with javelins, called Pila, whence they borrowed the name of Pilani Milites, and the ſoldiers of the two lines before them that of Milites Antepilani. In after-ages, the Haſtati, Principes, and Triarii, ſeem to have bore much the ſame arms, ſince Polybius has not divided them in his deſcription, but ſpeaks of them all together. Each of theſe three lines was antiently entire, without any intervals between the manipuli or companies that compoſed it. Neither were there any void ſpaces left between the lines; ſo that the whole body of infantry was cloſe and compact, like the Macedonian phalanx. But at the time of this war with the Latins, there ſonally acquainted with moſt of the Roman officers, having ſerved under them in former wars. It happened ſoon after

there was a ſpace of fifty foot between the firſt and ſecond lines, and of an hundred foot between the ſecond and third. And as ſpaces were left between the lines, ſo likewiſe between the different manipuli, or companies of each line; theſe companies being divided from each other by ſpaces thirty foot wide; ſo that in a line of ten manipuli, there were nine of theſe ſpaces. But theſe openings were not ſo diſpoſed as to yield a direct paſſage to the enemy from the front of the army to the rear; The manipuli of the ſecond line ſtood behind the openings of the firſt, and the manipuli of the third behind thoſe of the ſecond; ſo that the order of the whole reſembled that of trees called by gardeners Quincunx, which is elegantly compared to it by Virgil (14). When the Haſtati happened to be overpowered, they retired in good order, ſtill facing the enemy, toward the Principes, fell into the intervals of their ranks, and, together with them, renewed the fight. If the Haſtati and Principes thus joined were too weak to ſuſtain the fury of the onſet, they fell back into the wider intervals of the Triarii, and then all together, being united into one cloſe body, made another effort much more vigorous than any before. If this aſſault proved ineffectual, the day was entirely loſt as to the foot, there being no farther reſerves. The whole ſecret of the Roman art of war lay in diſpoſing their armies after this manner, and leaving theſe ſpaces open in the firſt and ſecond lines. It was almoſt impoſſible, that this method ſhould prove unſucceſsful, if duly obſerved; for fortune in each engagement muſt have failed them three different times, before they could be routed. As for the Roman cavalry, they were always poſted at the wings of the army, and fought ſometimes on foot, ſometimes on horſeback, as occaſion required, like our dragoons. At this time they were not numerous among the Romans, there being but twelve hundred horſe in an army of twenty thouſand men. As to the ſtations of the commanders, the conſuls and lieutenant-generals took their poſts in the middle of the ſpace between the Principes and the Triarii, where the Roman eagles ſtood. The legati and tribunes were uſually poſted by them, unleſs the former were ordered to command the wings, or the others ſome particular part of the army. The centurions ſtood every man at the head of his century or company. The common ſoldiers were placed in ſeveral ranks, at the diſcretion of the centurions, according to their age, ſtrength, and experience, every man theſe orders were proclaimed through the camp, that young Manlius, the conſul's ſon, being ſent out at the head of a detachment of horſe to obſerve the enemy's motions, met an advanced ſquadron of the enemy, commanded by one Geminius Metius, who, knowing the conſul's ſon, challenged him to a ſingle combat. Manlius, piqued in point of honour, and forgetting the late orders of the generals, accepted the challenge. Whereupon both parties drew back, and left the field open for the two champions. They rode full ſpeed againſt each other, and Manlius's lance only glanced upon his adverſary's helmet. Then the two combatants wheeling about returned to the charge, when Manlius wounded Metius's horſe on the head with his lance. The violence of the blow made the horſe rear, and the ſuddenneſs of the ſhock threw Metius to the ground. He endeavoured to raiſe himſelf with his buckler and lance, but Manlius gave him ſo violent a thruſt in the throat, that he drove the point of his lance out at his ſide; and having ſtripped him of his fine armour, returned to the camp full of glory for his victory, but uncertain of the reception he ſhould meet with from the conſuls. He paſſed triumphantly through the midſt of the army, and going ſtrait to his father's tent, accoſted him thus: "Father, I have fol"lowed your example; I was challenged like you by an

"inſulting enemy; and here I lay his ſpoils at your feet."
But the conſul, at theſe words turning his back upon his ſon, ordered the troops to be immediately aſſembled, and in their preſence made him this reply: "Since you, Titus Manlius, have been ſo raſh, as to fight the enemy with-man having three foot ſquare allowed him to manage his arms in. The Latin troops being drawn up in the ſame manner as the Romans, it was probable, that the centurions of the two armies would encounter each other. But the Romans not being men of ſo much bodily ſtrength as the Latins, Livy tells us, that the centurions of the Roman legions obtained leave of the conſuls to have each of them a ſub-centurion to defend and aſſiſt him (15).
"out my orders, you muſt expiate your crime yourſelf.

(15) Liv. l. viii. c. 8.

" You have indeed conquered, and therefore deſerve to " be rewarded. But your diſobedience muſt be puniſhed " with the utmoſt ſeverity. How could you deſpiſe the " authority both of a father and a conſul? How could you " break through that diſcipline, to the ſtrict obſervance of " which Rome has hitherto owed her preſervation? Hard " is the neceſſity you reduce me to, when you force me, " either to forget that I am a father, or that I am a judge. " But neither your grief nor mine ſhall prevail over the " fidelity I owe my country. We ſhall be a melancholy " example to poſterity, but a wholeſome precedent to the " Roman youth. In you I loſe a ſon, endeared to me by " the tender affection of a father and by your late victory. " But alas! ſince I muſt either eſtabliſh the conſular au- " thority by a rigorous act of juſtice, or weaken it by your " impunity, die as bravely as you have conquered. If " you have but one drop of the Manlian blood in your " veins, you will not refuſe to repair the breach you have " made in the military diſcipline, by undergoing the pu- " niſhment due to your offence." This ſaid, he firſt crowned his ſon as a victor, and then ordered the lictors to tie him to a ſtake. All preſent were ſtunned at the cruel ſentence, as if it had been pronounced againſt themſelves; and when the lictor lifted up his ax to ſtrike off the young conqueror's head, a great outcry was raiſed by the whole army, as if the ſtroke had been to fall upon each officer and ſoldier then preſent. However, they offered no violence either to the conſul or the lictor; but, ſeeing the young man's head ſtruck off and his blood guſh out, vented their rage againſt the general in imprecations and invectives. They covered the dead body with the ſpoils of his conquered enemy, and expreſſed their affliction by the moſt pompous obſequies they could perform for him in the field. It is ſcarce to be imagined, how tractable this ſeverity of Manlius made his army for the future: his orders were obſerved and put in execution with all poſſible exactneſs, which greatly contributed to the victory he gained a few days after[1].

When the day of battle came, both armies drew up in the plains at the foot of mount Veſuvius, in the road leading to the town of Veſeris. As they were pretty equal in numbers numbers and quite uniform in their way of fighting, the onſet was furious on both ſides, neither party for ſome time gaining any advantage over the other. At length the left wing of the Romans, commanded by Decius, being vigorouſly preſſed by the Latins, gave ground; ſo that the firſt line was forced to retire, without turning their backs to the enemy, into the intervals of the ſecond line. This diſadvantage put Decius in mind of his agreement with his collegue, viz. that the conſul, whoſe wing firſt gave way, ſhould devote himſelf to the Dii Manes. He therefore called out to Valerius, the pontifex maximus, to perform on him the ceremony of conſecration, that he might devote himſelf in due form. Valerius ordered him to quit his military habit, and put on the robe he wore in the ſenate. Then he covered his head with a veil, ordered him to put up his hand under his robe to his chin, and, ſtanding with both his feet upon his javelin, to repeat after him the following words: "O Janus, Jupiter, Mars, Ro-

" mulus, Bellona, and ye Lares, and Novenſiles (U):
" O all ye heroes, who dwell in heaven, and all ye gods,
" who rule over us and our enemies, eſpecially ye gods of " hell, I honour you, invoke you, and humbly entreat
" you to proſper the arms of the Romans, and to transfer
" all fear and terror from them to their enemies; and I do,
" for the ſafety of the Roman people and their legions,
" devote myſelf, and with myſelf the army and auxiliaries
" of the enemy, to the infernal gods and the goddeſs of " the earth." Decius, having finiſhed this prayer, ordered his lictors to go and acquaint his collegue, that he had devoted himſelf for the ſafety of the army. Then, tucking up his robe and girding it round him, he mounted his horſe, and rode full ſpeed into the thickeſt of the enemy's battalions. Both the Romans and Latins were ſurpriſed at this fight. The conſul broke through the firſt line of the Decius Mus devotes himſelf.

(U) This word Novenſiles is variouſly interpreted; ſome are of opinion, that it ſignifies the new created gods, or thoſe whoſe worſhip had been lately introduced in Rome. Others pretend it ſignified the nine muſes. Varro by the word Novenſiles underſtands the nine deities brought to Rome by the Sabines, viz. Lara, Veſta, Minerva, Feronia, Concord, Good Faith, Fortune, Chance, and Health. Some read Nonvenſides inſtead of Novenſiles, and underſtand thereby another kind of gods who preſided over novelties.

enemy's army and penetrated to the centre, the Latins being terrified at this new ſight, and ſeeming as if they were thunderſtruck. At length, recovering from their ſurpriſe, they diſcharged a ſhower of darts at the devoted conſul, who fell to the ground with numberleſs wounds. The death of the conſul gave new courage to the Romans. Thoſe who had retired, returned to the charge with more vigour than ever. However, the Latins ſtill kept their ground, and in ſome places had the advantage. When the news was brought to Manlius of his collegue's death, he ſhed ſome tears, giving him the praiſes he deſerved; and then, as he was now left to command alone, he ordered a body of voluntiers to advance into the firſt line, reſerving the triarii, or thoſe of the third line, who were the main ſtrength of the army, to the laſt extremity. The Latins being hard preſſed by theſe freſh troops, and taking them for the Roman triarii, ordered their own triarii to advance; and this miſtake determined the victory, hitherto doubtful, in favour of the Romans. For the Latins being quite tired out, and having for the moſt part broken or blunted their weapons, in repulſing the Romans once more, when they thought themſelves ſure of the victory, the Roman triarii, by order of Manlius, appeared on a ſudden, and having given a ſhout, which diſmayed the enemy, fell upon them, while fatigued, with ſuch fury, and made ſo terrible a ſlaughter, that ſcarce a fourth part of their army remained alive. The Samnites, for whoſe ſake this battle was fought, had no ſhare in it; but continued drawn up in battalia at ſome diſtance from the Roman army at the foot of mount Veſuvius, and only ſerved to keep the enemy a little in fear. The chief honour of the victory undoubtedly belonged to Manlius, both Latins and Romans agreeing afterwards in this, that the former would have conquered, had Manlius been their general[m].

The Latin army routed by the conſul Manlius in two engagements.

THE Latins, who eſcaped the ſlaughter, fled to Minturnæ, a little above the mouth of the Liris. There Numicius their general, by cauſing letters to be ſpread about in Latium and the country of the Volſci, repreſenting the flight of the Latins only as an honourable retreat, drew many to his camp, who had not been preſent at the late action. Having thus formed a new army, he took the road

road to Capua, being determined to try the fortune of arms once more with the Romans, and hoping to ſurpriſe them with his ſudden return. But Manlius, being informed of his motions, met him on his march, at a village called Trifana in the neighbourhood of Sinueſſa, gave him a ſecond overthrow, and then entering Latium, laid it waſte without oppoſition. All the Latin cities ſurrendered at diſcretion, as did Privernum in the territory of the Volſci. All Campania, with Capua its capital, was brought into ſubjection to its former maſters. The conſul diſpoſſeſſed the Campanians, Latins, and Privernates of their lands, and diſtributed them among the people of Rome. However, the Laurentini in Latium, and the Campanian knights, who were the flower of the nobility of the country and had not been concerned in the revolt, were continued in their poſſeſſions and privileges; nay, theſe faithful knights, to the number of ſixteen hundred, were made citizens of Rome, but without right of ſuffrage. And that this grant might be the more authentic, it was engraven on braſs and fixed up in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux. An annual penſion of forty-five denarii, that is, 1l. 9s. was alſo aſſigned to each of them out of the public revenues of Campania. It is not to be doubted, but Manlius, after ſo many ſignal conqueſts, obtained the honours of a triumph, notwithſtanding Livy's ſilence on this head. He ſoon after fell ſick, and, as a Roman general was wanted in the field, to oppoſe ſome freſh incurſions of the Antiates, he nominated L. Papirius Craſſus, then prætor, to the dictatorſhip; who, having appointed L. Papirius Curſor his maſter of the horſe, kept his troops ſome months in the enemy's country upon free quarters, and then returned to Rome to preſide at the election of new conſuls for the next year, when Q. Publilius, a plebeian, aud Tib. Æmilius, a patrician, were choſen. During their adminiſtration, the Latins revolted and formed two armies. Publilius, ſucceeding in an expedition againſt one of them, was honoured with a triumph. But Æmilius, having only gained ſome ſlight advantages over the other, was refuſed that honour, which ſo incenſed him, that no tribune of the people ever inveighed more bitterly againſt the nobility, than the patrician conſul did on this occaſion. Hereupon the ſenate, to prevent diſturbances, ordered him to name a dictator. Æmilius obeyed, but in revenge named to

that

that dignity his plebeian collegue, who appointed Brutus Scæva, another plebeian, to be his general of the horſe. The dictator, who was entirely devoted to the people, employed all his power and influence to eſtabliſh their rights on a ſolid foundation. This he effected by three laws, which he either made or revived. The firſt was, that the decrees made by the people, at the requeſt of the tribunes, ſhould bind all the ſubjects of the republic in general. The ſecond, that for the future the laws, which were to be paſſed by the centuries, ſhould be firſt approved by the ſenate, and that the people ſhould put the laſt hand to them. Hitherto the comitia uſed to paſs the laws firſt, and the ſenate had a power of accepting or rejecting them. The third law was, that one of the cenſors ſhould always for the future be a plebeian. The ſenate, to pique Æmilius tender of his honour, ordered the next year's conſuls, L. Furius Camillus, grandſon to the great Camillus, and C. Mænius, a plebeian, to put an end to the war which he had left unfiniſhed. And that the new conſuls might not fail of ſucceſs, they plentifully furniſhed them with men, ammunition, arms, &c. by which means the united forces of the Latins were defeated, the town of Pedum taken by aſſault, and all Latium brought under ſubjection. The conſuls, having finiſhed the war with great glory, returned to Rome, where they were honoured, not only with a triumph, but alſo with two equeſtrian ſtatues erected in the forum[n].

But are defeated anew, and brought under ſubjection.

Year of the flood 2666. Before Chriſt 333. Of Rome 415.

THE conſuls having yet ſome time to continue in their office, employed it in determining the fate of the conquered. Camillus was inclined to inclemency, and adviſed the fathers rather to encreaſe the ſubjects of the republic, by admitting the Latins to the privileges of Roman citizens, than to exterminate them and reduce their country to a deſart. The chief men in the ſenate were for following the conſul's advice. But as ſome cities had been more criminal than others, it was thought proper to make a diſtinction in the treatment of them. Lanuvium, Aricia, Nomentum, and Pedum, were made Roman Municipia, their ſoldiers had the privilege of being incorporated in the legions, ſhared all the advantages of the Roman ſoldiery, and were no longer upon the foot of auxiliaries. The Tuſculans

Tuſculans were reſtored to the enjoyment of their antient privileges, the ſenate being unwilling to condemn a whole country for the faults of a few, who had joined the enemies of the republic. Velitræ was razed, and its ſenate and inhabitants removed into another city beyond the Tiber. The Antiates were granted the freedom of Roman citizens; but their fleet, conſiſting of ſix gallies, was partly burnt, and partly carried into the Roman ports. With the braſs beaks of their veſſels, called in Latin Roſtra, the conſul Mænius adorned the pulpit, from whence the Roman magiſtrates harangued the people; and hence it was ever after called the Roſtra. The inhabitants of Tybur and Præneſte were deprived of all their lands, not ſo much on account of their late revolt, as for having formerly aſſiſted the Gauls. And laſtly, all the Latins in general were forbidden to aſſemble their diets as uſual, to marry out of their reſpective tribes, or to have common markets or fairs for trade. As for the cities of Campania, their lands were taken from them, and divided among the Romans. Thus were the two moſt fruitful provinces of Italy ſubdued by the republic, and the Latins, from allies of Rome, made her ſubjects[o].

From the rebuilding of Rome, to the first Punic or Carthaginian war.

IN the following conſulate of C. Sulpicius Longus and P. Ælius Pætus, Publilius, tho' a plebeian, obtained the prætorſhip, the only great dignity which the plebeians had not before ſhared with the nobility. And thus the people being arrived at the height of their deſires, all pretences for faction were entirely taken away. The conſuls of the new year, L. Papirius and Cæſo Duilius, led an army againſt the Sidicini and Auſones, who had invaded the country of the Aurunci, at this time in alliance with Rome, defeated them in the field, and, having obliged them to take [illegible] of their cities, returned [illegible] following [illegible] conſulate of M. Valerius Co[illegible] fourth time, M. Atilius [illegible] College [illegible] Cale, metropolis of [illegible] covered galleries [illegible] on this occaſion [illegible] and Calee[illegible] carrying on of the [illegible] without moleſtation.

The Sidicini and Auſones conquered.

both conſuls marched againſt the Sidicini; but their year being expired before they had finiſhed their conqueſt, their ſucceſſors, T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Poſthumius Albinus, putting themſelves at the head of the troops which Valerius had commanded, entered the enemy's country and laid it waſte, without oppoſition. Upon the return of the conſuls to Rome, a report being ſpread, that the Sidicini had aſſembled a formidable army and were joined by the Samnites, a dictator, viz. P. Cornelius Rufinus, was appointed to march out againſt them. But his authority did not laſt long; the augurs found his nomination defective in ſome circumſtances, and obliged him to abdicate. Nay, as a plague raged at this time in Rome, the aruſpices, carrying their ſuperſtition ſtill farther, declared, that all the auſpices of the year had been infected by the contagious air, and that the inauguration of the conſuls themſelves had been faulty. On this ſuperſtitious prejudice, the chief magiſtrates of Rome were diſplaced, and the republic reduced to an inter-regnum. The next year the faſces were transferred, according to the Faſti Capitolini, to L. Papirius Curſor and C. Pætelius Libo Viſolus, who, in all likelihood, reduced the Sidicini, for we find no other epoch of their reduction. Livy neither mentions theſe conſuls, nor gives us any account of this year; which is a great omiſſion, and would confound the whole chronology of the republic, were it not for the Faſti Capitolini, which name the above-mentioned conſuls. They were ſucceeded by A. Cornelius, a ſecond time conſul, and Cn. Domitius, who were obliged to name a dictator upon a groundleſs report, that the Gauls were preparing for a war with the republic. Papirius Craſſus was the man they pitched upon, and he choſe Valerius Poplicola for his maſter of the horſe. While the dictator was raiſing an army, more certain news came, that all was quiet on that ſide. However, as the Samnites had raiſed a formidable army to oppoſe Alexander king of Epirus, the dictator kept his army in the field, till the Samnites, upon the return of the prince, diſbanded their troops. In this year a number of Roman citizens being greatly increaſed, two of the Latin tribes, two new tribes were added to the

The addition of two new tribes.

[illegible] enjoyed after the reduction [illegible] ſprung up in her boſom a new king of monſters more to be dreaded than any foreign enemy. Some women of diſtinction, according to ſome

ſome three hundred and ſixty, according to others a hundred and ſeventy, plotted together, upon what provocation we know not, to take off the husbands by poiſon, and took the opportunity of an epidemical diſtemper to put their wicked deſign in execution. People were ſurpriſed in Rome to ſee ſo many men of note die, and all with the ſame ſymptoms; but had no ſuſpicion of this kind of aſſaſſination, as we may call it, ſo contrary to their manners, that there was then no law againſt it. At length the wickedneſs of theſe furies was diſcovered by a woman, who was in the ſervice of one of theſe criminals, and aſſiſted her in preparing her poiſon. This ſlave applied herſelf to Q. Fabius, who was at that time curule ædile, and having upon promiſe of impunity diſcovered to him the whole myſtery of iniquity, the ædile imparted the ſecret to the conſuls, and the conſuls to the ſenate; by whoſe order the ſlave, attended by ſome officers, went to the houſes of above twenty Roman ladies, who were all found busy in preparing poiſons. Among theſe were two patrician women, Sergia and Cornelia, who being brought before the aſſembly of the people and there examined, maintained, that they had prepared only medicines for the ſick, in which there were no poiſonous ingredients. Hereupon the ſlave, finding herſelf ſuſpected of calumny, propoſed, that the two ladies ſhould take their own potions. The experiment being, at her requeſt, ordered to be made, Cornelia and Sergia deſired to confer with their accomplices; which being granted, they all by agreement drank their own poiſon, and ſo delivered themſelves from a more cruel death. Nothing could be more ſurpriſing to the Romans, than ſuch an exceſs of wickedneſs in a ſex, which had hitherto preſerved its reputation unſullied. The republic aſcribed this unheard-of prodigy to a ſpirit of madneſs, ſent as a puniſhment by the angry gods; and therefore, to appeaſe their wrath, had recourſe to the ceremony which ſhe had formerly practiſed in the time plagues and general calamities. The [illegible]ed the conſuls to nominate a dicta[illegible]e wall of the temple of Jupiter Capito[illegible]raiſed to that d[illegible]al of the horſe, [illegible]; which was no ſoone[illegible]ent dignity, and gave w[illegible]pirius Craſſus, a ſecond time conſul, and L. Plautius Venn[illegible]. In the beginning of their year, the Privernates, in conjunction with ſome of the inhabitants of Fundi, revolted at the inſtiga-

tion of Vitrius Vaccus, a native of that city, but who enjoyed all the rights of a Roman citizen, and had even made himſelf an inhabitant of Rome. The Privernates, on the approach of the two conſuls, retired into their city. Hereupon Plautius, with one part of the army, entered the territory of Fundi, where he was met by the ſenate of that city, who proteſted that they had no ſhare in the revolt. The conſul wrote to Rome in their favour, and then marched to join his collegue, who had already blocked up Privernum. But while that ſiege was carrying on, one of the conſuls was called back to Rome to preſide in the comitia for electing new conſuls, the city being alarmed at the news of the Gauls being in motion. The new conſuls, L. Æmilius, a ſecond time, and C. Plautius, entered upon their office, the very day they were choſen, though before the uſual time, and drew lots for their commands. It fell to Æmilius to act againſt the Gauls; and to his collegue to carry on the ſiege of Privernum. Æmilius made the levies with the utmoſt vigor, admitted of no excuſe, but put all, without diſtinction, who were able to bear arms, upon the military roll. Such was the terror the very name of the Gauls ſtruck into the Romans. But the great army, raiſed on this occaſion, marched no farther than Veii, where the conſul received certain advice, that all was quiet among the Gauls. He then joined his collegue before Privernum, which, being already fatigued with a long ſiege, ſurrendered, and delivered up Vitrius, the author of the revolt, who was, by an order from the ſenate, firſt beaten with rods, and then beheaded. The two conſuls on their return to Rome, were honoured with a triumph, and Æmilius moreover with the ſirname of Privernas. What now remained was to puniſh the Privernates. Such of the ſenators, as had continued in the place after the revolt, were removed beyond the Tiber, and forbad to paſs the river under the penalty of a great fine. As for the innocent multitude and the priſ[illegible] in the war, the conſul Plautius uſed [illegible] his int[illegible] he led the cap[illegible] made a mov[illegible] were divided [illegible] ners to ſeverity [illegible] py men was humble ſupp[illegible] Volſci, that is, a nation as pre[illegible] and capable of as generous ſentiments, as the Romans themſelves. ment he and his fellow-captives deſerved? anſwered with great intrepidity, We deſerve that puniſhment, which is due to men who are jealous of their liberty, and think themſelves worthy of it. Plaut. perceiving that his anſwer exaſperated ſome of the ſenators, endeavoured to prevent the ill effects of it, by putting a milder queſtion to the priſoner. How would you behave, ſaid he, if Rome ſhould pardon you? Our conduct, replied the generous captive, depends upon yours. If the peace you grant us, be an honourable one, you may depend on a conſtant fidelity on our parts: if the terms of it be hard or diſhonourable, lay no ſtreſs on our adherence to you. Some of the judges conſtrued theſe words as menaces, but the wiſer part, finding in them a great deal of magnanimity, cried out, that a nation, whoſe only deſire was liberty, and only fear that of loſing it, was worthy to become Roman. Accordingly, a decree paſſed in favour of the priſoners, and Privernum was declared a municipium. This the bold ſincerity of one man ſaved his countr[illegible] and gained it the privilege of being incorporated into the Roman ſtate [o].

A noble answer given by one of the inhabitants of that ci

THE next year, in the conſulate of C. Plautius Proculus and P. Cornelius Scapula, the Romans gave umbrage to the Samnites, by planting a colony in Fregellæ, which ſtood in their neighbourhood, and proved the occaſion of that bloody war, which ſoon after broke out between the two nations. In the mean time, the Palæpolitans, taking advantage of this new diſcontent of the Samnites, committed hoſtilities in the Roman territories. Theſe people were originally Eubæans, who coming into Italy, built Cumæ, and thence ſpreading themſelves farther, founded the city of Naples or Neapolis, that is, The New City. Their confidence was founded upon a report ſpread abroad, that the Samnites would ſoon be at war with the Romans. The news of this unexpected invaſion was brought to Rome, juſt before the comi[illegible] by centuries were aſſembled to appoint new conſul[illegible]d in the comitia by tribes to chuſe new tribun[illegible] of the ſenate order latter choſe one Q. teſtations that he was innocent. Upon this Valerius, who bore him an irreconcileable hatred, cried out with a louder voice, What is that to me, whether thou art guilty or innocent, provided thou be deſtroyed? The tribes were ſo offended at theſe words, that they immediately acquitted Flavius, tho' evidently guilty, by a great majority of ſuffrages. A few months after he loſt his mother, and, as it was then cuſtomary to offer ſacrifices in honour of the dead, he offered a greater number of victims than uſual, and diſtributed the fleſh among the people, who had favoured him at his trial. This gratitude proved more beneficial to him than he expected. The people remembered him in the comitia, and choſe him, though abſent, for one of their tribunes [p].

The conſul Publius marches againſt them,

THE comitia by centuries raiſed to the conſulate L. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Publilius Philo, a ſecond time. The latter marched againſt the Palæpolitans, and, in order to cut off their communication with Neapolis, from whence they were ſupplied with men and proviſions, encamped on a narrow tract of ground between thoſe two cities. His collegue poſted himſelf with another army near Capua, to keep the Campanians in awe. In this camp he received undoubted intelligence, that the Samnites, jealous of the progreſs of the Roman arms, had ſolicited the inhabitants of Privernum, Fundi, and Formia to revolt. Upon this the ſenate ſent an embaſſy into Samnium, complaining of a conduct ſo contrary to the faith of treaties. The embaſſadors met with a haughty reception: but, without loſing their temper, after having heard the complaints of the Samnites, which chiefly related to the rebuilding and fortifying of Fregellæ, returned the following anſwer: The injuries you complain of require a great deal of time to be examined. As therefore we have common friends and allies, let us refer our differences to their arbitration. Arbitrators, cried the Samnites, we will have none. Let the gods and our ſwords, Battles will determine our pretenſions better than words. Mars ſhall put an end to our diſputes in the plains of Campania. them. In the mean while, the time for the new elections drawing near, the ſenate, without recalling the conſuls, ordered a dictator to be named, to preſide in the comitia. The conſul Cornelius nominated L. Claudius Marcellus, a plebeian, who choſe Sp. Poſthumius Albinus for his maſter of the horſe. But the augurs pretending that the nomination was invalid, Marcellus was obliged to abdicate the dictatorſhip, and Poſthumius the command of the horſe. The people, imagining that the view of the augurs was only to wound the plebeian intereſt, made loud complaints, and murmured at that ambitious college; but in the end ſuperſtition prevailed, and, the government falling into an inter-regnum, C. Pætelius Libo and L. Papirius Mugellinus were choſen conſuls for the enſuing year. Theſe, putting themſelves at the head of the army, which Cornelius had commanded, entered Samnium, and being joined by the Lucanians and Apulians, two nations to which the Romans had been hitherto ſtrangers, penetrated farther into the enemy's country, ravaged their lands, and ſeized three of their cities, viz. Allifæ, Callifæ, and Rufrium. On the other hand, Publilius, being continued by the people, at the motion of their tribunes, at the head of the ſame army he had commanded the year before, with the title of proconſul, took at length Palæpolis, by a ſtratagem laid and executed by two of the citizens. Four thouſand Samnites and two thouſand of the inhabitants of Nola, a city of Campania, having got into the town before it was inveſted, under pretence of ſtrengthening the garriſon, kept the inhabitants in a cruel ſtate of ſlavery, and committed all ſorts of debaucheries, which they extended even to the wives of that unhappy people and their children of both ſexes. In this diſtreſs the Palæpolitans, having long waited in vain for relief from the Tarentines, reſolved at length to have recourſe to their enemies, in order to deliver themſelves from the oppreſſion of their defenders. Nymphius and Charilaus, the two chief magiſtrates of the city, took upon them, with the conſent of the principal inhabitants, the execution of the enterpriſe. Charilaus [illegible] he impart[illegible] had taken. [illegible] had [illegible] oper time, the head of three [illegible] Palæpolis, the Samnites were to attack the town in that part where [illegible] defended it. In the mean time, Nymphius, who had ſtaid in Palæpolis, and all along kept a private correſpondence with with his collegue, contrived another ſtratagem, and with his Grecian artifice ſo blinded the Samnite commanders, that they fell without any ſuſpicion into the ſnare he had prepared for them. He adviſed them to equip the fleet, which lay in the port, and make a deſcent in the Roman territories, in order to oblige the Romans to quit Samnium and the neighbourhood of Palæpolis. This motion being approved, Nymphius contrived to employ the Samnite troops in the laborious work of ſetting the ſhips afloat, which lay dry on the ſhore. By this means, that part of the wall, which the Romans were to attack, being but weakly guarded, Charilaus, being acquainted therewith by his collegue, advanced at the head of three thouſand Romans, and being favoured by his friends, made himſelf maſter of the place. The Samnites, who were employed on the ſhore, finding themſelves ſhamefully over-reached, fled with precipitation, for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans, and arrived in their own country, without either arms or baggage, where they were expoſed to the ridicule of all their neighbours, who continually reproached them with the equipment of the Palæpolitan fleet [q]. Some writers tell us, that the Samnites, and not the Greeks, delivered the place up to the Romans. But the authors of beſt note relate this adventure as we have done. Beſides, Neapolis, one of the chief cities of Great Greece, entered at this time into an alliance with Rome, a manifeſt proof that the Greeks ſurrendered voluntarily, and not compelled by any foreign force. For this ſucceſs, Publilius, in ſpite of the nobility, obtained a triumph, though he was neither conſul nor dictator. He was the firſt, as Livy obſerves, who was decreed a triumph for exploits performed in an inferior ſtation. But he was a plebeian and the idol of the people, and therefore triumphed in ſight of the conſuls of the year, who were refuſed that honour, though they had made conſiderable conqueſts in Samnium. Thus the plebeians revenged the affront they had received the laſt year, when a plebeian dictator was by the augurs obliged to lay down his office.

Romans, into a league with the Samnites. They bribed a company of young Lucanians of good families to tear their backs with whips, and then ſhew themſelves to the people, pretending, that they had been treated in that cruel manner by order of the Roman conſuls, to whoſe camp curioſity had led them. The Lucani, who were but a ſtupid people, ſuffering themſelves to be impoſed upon by ſo groſs a cheat, immediately convened a national aſſembly, and, without examining into the truth of ſo improbable a fact, decreed, that war ſhould be declared with the Romans, and their antient alliance with the Samnites renewed. Purſuant to this reſolution, an embaſſy was ſent to the latter, who could ſcarce believe the deputation real; and therefore would not hearken to their propoſals, till hoſtages were delivered, and Samnite garriſons put into all their towns. The Lucanians complied with all their demands, without diſcovering the impoſture, till it was too late to repent.

Creditors diſabled from ſeizing the perſons of their debtors.

WHILE the affairs of the republic were proſperous abroad, the poor debtors had the good fortune to ſhake off the only yoke, which now lay heavy upon them. By one of the laws of the twelve tables, creditors were empowered to ſeize their inſolvent debtors, and keep them in their houſes, till by their ſervices or labour they had diſcharged the ſum they owed. Theſe poor citizens were in all reſpects ſlaves, except in name. They were called Nexi, that is, bound, their liberty being, as it were, bound and ſuſpended for a time; whereas the ſlaves were called Servi. A young Plebeian of extraordinary beauty and of a good family, by name Publilius, had voluntarily made himſelf a ſlave to one L. Papirius, in order to pay his father's debts. Papirius, conceiving a deteſtable paſſion for the young man, and not being able to get the better of his virtue by promiſes and careſſes, cauſed him to be whipped moſt unmercifully. After this cruel treatment, Publilius, having found means to make his eſcape, complained publicly of the inhuman uſage he had met with, and told the occaſion of it. The people, filled with compaſſion for the young plebeian, [illegible] reſentment againſt his maſter, forced the conſuls [illegible] ſentence, [illegible] preſenting Publilius before them [illegible] in form, demanded juſtice on [illegible] gally, regard to their cries, and, without [illegible] ing any [illegible] againſt Papirius, whoſe crime was not ſufficiently proved, paſſed a decree, which was readily accepted and confirmed in the comitia. It enacted, That for the future no perſon whatſoever ſhould be held in fetters or other bonds but for ſome crime that deſerved it, and only till the criminal had ſuffered the puniſhment due by law; and that creditors ſhould only have a right to attach the goods, and not ſeize the perſons, of their debtors.

The Veſtini defeated by the conſul Brutus.

In the following conſulate of L. Furius Camillus and D. Junius Brutus, the Veſtini, a people on the coaſts of the Adriatic ſea, took arms againſt Rome, but were defeated by Brutus, who took from them the two cities of Cutina and Cinglia. Camillus, who was to act againſt the Samnites, falling ſick named to the dictatorſhip L. Papirius Curſor, who appointed Q. Fabius Rullianus to be his general of the horſe. The dictator took the field againſt the Samnites, but ſoon after returned to Rome, on account of ſome religious ſcruples relating to the auſpices conſulted before his departure. Before he left the army, he forbad Fabius, whom he entruſted with the command of it, to venture a battle in his abſence. But Fabius, diſdaining to have his hands ſo tied up, notwithſtanding the dictator's prohibition, attacked the Samnites, and gained a complete victory, having killed above twenty thouſand of them on the ſpot. The young conqueror, elated with this ſucceſs, inſtead of lodging the ſpoils of the enemy in the quæſtor's hands, cauſed them all to be burnt, that they might not encreaſe the pomp of the dictator's triumph. Beſides, he did not ſend any account of his victory to the dictator, under whoſe auſpices he had fought, but only to the ſenate. Hereupon the dictator ſet out in all haſte from Rome to puniſh his diſobedient general of the horſe. But Fabius, having timely notice of his coming, and of his deſign, called together the troops, and in a ſeditious harangue committed to them the defence of his life and fortune. His ſpeech was applauded by the legions; they all promiſed him their aſſiſtance, and proteſted, that nothing but death ſhould ſeparate them from a commander, under whoſe conduct they had gained ſo ſignal a victory. In the mean time the dictator arrived, and, having aſſembled the troops, ordered the crier to call the general of the horſe to appear before him. Fabius, inſtead of anſwering to the ſummons, and being queſtioned concerning his diſobedience, returned an inſulting anſwer to the meſſengers. As he could offer nothing in defence of his having fought a battle, Papirius ordered the lictors to ſtrip him, and prepare their rods and axes. But while the executioners were tearing off his cloaths, he found means to eſcape out of their hands, and to

to retire among the Triarii. A loud ſhout was immediately heard from the place whither Fabius had fled, which was anſwered by the whole army. The ſoldiers all to a man declared in his favour; but expreſſed their ſentiments very differently. Some threatened the dictator; others begged pardon for the offender. Thoſe who ſtood next to the tribunal deſired, in a ſuppliant manner, Papirius to ſpare the life of his general of the horſe, and not condemn all the troops in him. The lieutenant-generals of the army, who ſurrounded the dictator, entreated him to put off the execution till the next day, to give the ' iers time to cool, and to take ſome time himſelf to calm his mind. But the dictator continued inflexible; nay, he commanded, with an angry tone, the lieutenant-generals t leave the tribunal. Hereupon the ſedition encreaſed, and the ſoldiers grew more furious. The dictator commanded ſilence, but neither he nor his criers could be heard. The legionaries were ready to offer violence to their general, but night coming on put an end to the tumult. Fabius, not thinking it prudent to ſtand another trial, eſcaped to Rome, where his father immediately got the ſenators aſſembled, in order to obtain a favourable decree for him. But Papirius, arriving on a ſudden, took his place in the ſenate, and ordered the lictors to ſeize young Fabius. In vain did the ſenators intercede for the criminal; Papirius was inexorable. Hereupon the father, having no other reſource, appealed to the people in comitia. There had never yet been any inſtance of an appeal from the ſentence of the dictator. But nevertheleſs, Papirius did not think fit to diſallow the ſuperior authority of the people, ſo that the cauſe was brought before the comitia, aſſembled in the forum. Thither repaired the dictator with few attendants; but the Fabii were guarded by all the people of diſtinction in Rome. Both the Fabii aſcended the roſtra with the dictator. The ſon had a right to harangue the people from thence, as general of the horſe; but the father had no right, it being the privilege of magiſtrates only to appear there. Papirius therefore ſternly ordered [illegible] to be pulled down, [illegible] being in office; and alſo th[illegible] as a criminal, wh[illegible] forfeited the privileges an[illegible] to his office. [illegible]er, placing himſ[illegible] then at [illegible] of the [illegible] out into bitter vectives a[illegible] the haughtineſs and cruelty of Papirius, cited the [illegible]es of Minucius and L. dictators, and omitted nothing that could be ſaid in ſo bad a cauſe. He clamoured, he complained, he called upon the gods and men for help, and, embracing his ſon, wept a flood of tears. The whole aſſembly, ſays Livy, was on the ſide of the Fabii; but Papirius had on his ſide the military laws, the rules of diſcipline, which were deemed inviolable, the dignity of his office, the dictatorial edicts, &c. He reproached the Romans with a degeneracy from that heroic love of their country, which uſed to prevail over all paternal affection and private views; he urged the examples of Manlius and Brutus, who had courage enough to ſacrifice their own children for the ſake of the public good, expatiated on the evil conſequences to the republic of admitting appeals from the dictator to the people, and eſpecially in caſes of diſobedience in war, and concluded with aſking the tribunes, whether they were willing to anſwer thoſe conſequences with their heads. Theſe words threw both the tribunes and the people into great perplexity. They pitied the Fabii; but could not condemn the ſeverity of Papirius. The receiving of appeals from the ſentence of the dictator would indeed encreaſe the power of the plebeians; but they were afraid of the conſequences of ſo dangerous an incroachment on a ſovereign authority. Inſtead therefore of taking upon them to judge in the affair, they became interceſſors for the criminal, humbly beſeeching the dictator to pardon his general of the horſe. The Fabii themſelves fell proſtrate at the dictator's feet and implored his clemency. Upon this the dictator, cauſing ſilence to be made, ſpoke thus from the Roſtra: Both military diſcipline and the authority of generals are preſerved inviolate. The temerity of Fabius expoſed both to great dangers: but he has not been judged innocent; only pardon is aſked for him. This I readily grant in deference to the Roman people, and to the interceſſion of their tribunes. They have not pronounc[illegible] him innocent as judges, but intercede for him as friends. Live then, Quintus Fabius, more fortunate in this unanimous conſent of all orders in the [illegible]ublic to ſave you, [illegible]n the victory you lately gained. [illegible]ve, Fabius, thoug[illegible] have dared to commit a crime, [illegible]ich your father [illegible]d he been in my place, would have expiated [illegible] your blood. You ſhall be received again into my favour at your pleaſure. But as to the Roman people, to whom you owe your life, you can never expreſs your gratitude to them better than by punctually punctually and implicitly obeying, whether in peace or in war, your lawful commanders. Go; you are at liberty. Theſe words were followed by univerſal acclamations, ſome congratulating Fabius, others expreſſing their gratitude to Papirius. Both the dictator and his general of the horſe were conducted back to their houſes by crouds of people of all ranks[r]. The many triumphs, with which we ſhall ſee him hereafter honoured, will prove him worthy of the zeal which Rome ſhewed for his deliverance.

WHILE Papirius ſtaid in Rome, the Samnites, taking advantage of his abſence, inſulted the Roman army, knowing that they would not ſtir out of their camp to engage them, for fear of meeting with the ſame fate as young Fabius. And indeed M. Valerius, one of the lieutenant-generals, ſuffered a detachment of Romans, who were eſcorting a convoy, to be cut in pieces, though he might eaſily have reſcued them, ſaying, that he dreaded the ſeverity of the dictator, more than the enemy's forces. This accident greatly contributed to encreaſe the hatred of the ſoldiery to their general, who ſoon after arriving in the camp, with his new general of the horſe, L. Papirius Craſſus, a relation of his own, found his men ſo exaſperated againſt him, that [illegible]oſt all hopes of making any great progreſs. The Samnites, informed of the preſent diſpoſition of the Roman army towards their general, immediately marched out and offered him battle. Papirius, thinking himſelf obliged in honour to accept the challenge, drew up his men, and in order to ſupply the want of affection in his ſoldiers by his ſkill in war, poſted them ſo advantageouſly, that it was not poſſible for them to be entirely defeated. They fought indeed very faintly for fear of encreaſing the glory of their general; but after all they did not loſe the battle, there being more Samnites killed than Romans, though the number of the wounded was much greater on the ſide of the latter. After the battle Papirius acted a part which ſurpriſed every body. Not one officer, or ſoldier, who had behaved negligently in the engagement, was ſo much as reprimanded. Laying aſide the ſeverity and majeſty of a dictator, he went about with his lieutenants, viſited the wounded ſoldiers, put his head into their tents, aſked them how they did, and charged their tribunes to take particular care of them. As in this ſudden change he did not diſcover the leaſt affectation

affectation; the army, which had always had a great eſteem for him, came in a ſhort time to ſhew him a moſt tender affection. The people in the city, being informed of this unexpected alteration, thought fit to continue him ſix months longer in his employment, during which time he gave the enemy a total overthrow, over-ran Samnium, and reduced the enemy to ſue for peace. This the dictator granted them on theſe three preliminary conditions; 1. that they ſhould cloath all his troops: 2. that they ſhould give them a year's pay: and, 3. that they ſhould get the treaty confirmed by the ſenate. Papirius on his return to Rome was decreed a triumph, after which he preſided at the election of the new conſuls, C. Sulpicius Longus and Q. Aulus Cerretanus, and then reſigned his dignity. The Samnites, to whom the ſenate had only granted a year's truce, no ſooner heard that Papirius had quitted the dictatorſhip, than they took the field. As the Apulians declared for them againſt Rome, the forces of the republic were divided between the two conſuls. Aulus marched againſt the Apulians, and Sulpicius againſt the Samnites; b[illegible]le progreſs was made in the war this year, both Samnites and Apulians keeping themſel[illegible] cloſe in their ſtrong-holds. But the next year, when Q. Fabius, who had been general of the horſe to Papirius, and L. Fulvius Corvus were conſuls, the Samnites, having raiſed a formidable army, ſurprized the Romans, commanded by the two conſuls, in a very diſadvantageous poſt, and obliged them to hazard a battle, which laſted many hours without either ſide's giving way. At length the imprudence of the Samnite cavalry turned the fortune of the day in favour of the Romans. For the conſuls, having deſignedly ſent away the baggage of the army under a ſmall guard, the enemy's horſe, not being aware of the ſnare, wheeled off to ſeize it. But when they had put themſelves into diſorder, and loaded their horſes with the plunder, the conſuls detached all the Roman cavalry with orders to fall upon them; wh[illegible]h they did with ſuch ſucceſs, that few of [illegible] eſcaped. Then the Roman cavalry, marching a[illegible] way about, fell on the rear of the Samnite infan[illegible]ich had not yet given ground. This unexpected attac[illegible]uck them with terror, and threw them into confuſion. The Romans, purſuing their advantage, cut all thoſe Samnites who kept th[illegible] ground, in pieces. Thoſe who fled were for the moſt part put to the ſword by the horſe, and among the reſt the general himſelf.

ſelf. The Samnites, after this defeat, repenting of their breach of the truce, endeavoured to pacify the Romans, by making eſtitution of what plunder they had taken contrary to the faith of the treaty. They likewiſe paſſed a decree, that Brutulus Papius, a man of diſtinction among them, but the chief author of the breach, ſhould be delivered up to the Romans. But he having laid violent hands on himſelf, his dead body was carried to Rome with all the captives and ſpoil taken in the time of the truce. After this the conſul Fulvius returned to Rome; but his collegue led an army into Apulia, where he muſt have been attended with ſucceſs, ſince he is ſaid in the Faſti Capitolini to have triumphed over the Samnites and Apulians, and his collegue Fulvius over the Samnites only. One A. Cornelius was choſen dictator this year to preſide at the games in the abſence of the conſuls, and during the ſickneſs of the prætor for the year. And hence comes the miſtake of ſome memoirs, which Livy followed. That writer, finding that the government was in the hands of a dictator at the time of the defeat of the Samnites, aſcribes to him all the glory of that exploit. But the Faſti Capitolini inform us better, and, upon their authority, we have rectified the miſtake of the Latin hiſtorians[s].

THE Samnites, being refuſed a peace, notwithſtanding the ſatisfaction they had made for the breach of the truce, made the neceſſary preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. They appointed one Pontius, an able and experienced officer, to command their troops. He was the ſon of Herennius, who had been at the head of their armies in his younger days, but now led a private life, and was on account of his wiſdom looked upon as a kind of oracle. On the other hand, the Romans in their comitia choſe T. Veturius and Sp. Poſthumius conſuls, who, putting themſelves at the head of the army, took their rout to Calatia, a city of Campania. When they arrived at that place, Pontius, who had encamped among the woods and mountains, in the neighbourhood of Caudium, a little town in Samnium, about a league from Calatia, cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the Samnite army was laying ſiege to Lucera in Apulia; and that more effectually to deceive them, he ſent ten of his ſoldiers in the habit of herdſmen to lead flocks into different parts between Caudium dium and Calatia, with inſtructions to agree all in the ſame report, when taken by the enemy. The ſtratagem had the deſired effect; and the Romans in a council of war reſolved to march into Apulia and relieve Luceria. Some were for marching the fartheſt way about, through the open country; others, fearing leſt the place ſhould in the mean time fall into the enemy's hands, preferred the ſhorteſt way to the ſafeſt; and their opinion prevailing, the army began to march through narrow paſſes, and climb up rocks, which ſeemed inacceſſible. At length they came to the fatal place, which has been ſince known by the name of the Caudine Forks. The conſuls marched their troops through a narrow hollow way, having on each ſide thick foreſts; and from thence deſcended into a valley, ſo ſurrounded with hills that it looked like an amphitheatre. The hills were ſo covered with trees and briars, as to be abſolutely unſurmountable. The valley itſelf was very marſhy, being continually watered by torrents, rolling down from the rocks, and frequent ſprings. There was but one way out of it, which was narrow and ſteep; and the Samnites had taken care to ſtop it with huge ſtones and trees laid acroſs. The conſuls gave orders to clear it; but finding it quite impracticable, and diſcovering at the ſame time great numbers of the enemy on the tops of the eminences, they began to fear an ambuſcade. To avoid therefore being inveſted, they inſtantly turned back, and endeavoured to get out of the valley by the hollow way, through which they had entered it. But in vain, for the Samnites had already blocked up the paſſage with trees cut down in haſte and vaſt heaps of large ſtones. The legions, finding themſelves thus ſhut in, without a poſſibility of eſcaping, ſtood immoveable, fixing their eyes on one another, and wiſhing to diſcover ſome ſigns of hopes in their companions faces. The conſuls, to put a good face upon the affair, pitched their tent, and ordered fortifications to be raiſed, as if they had a mind to continue there. The ſoldiers laughed at this fruitleſs precaution, but nevertheleſs raiſed a rampart along the water, though they were all the while ſcoffed at and inſulted by the enemy from the tops of the eminences. As ſoon as the army was encamped, the chief officers repaired of their own accord to the conſuls tent; but the time of the conſultation was rather ſpent in lamentations, than in finding out wholeſome expedients, the gods themſelves not being able, as Livy ſays, to deliver them without a miracle. In the mean time, night came on, on, which the ſoldiers, inſtead of taking their reſt, ſpent in diſcourſing about the unhappy ſituation of their affairs. On the other hand, the Samnites, elated with this ſurpriſing ſucceſs, could not agree among themſelves what uſe to make of it. In this irreſolution, it was unanimouſly agreed in a council of war to conſult old Herennius, the general's father and the oracle of the nation. A meſſenger was therefore diſpatched to him with a letter, informing him of the extremity, to which his ſon had, by his addreſs, reduced the Roman army, and deſiring him to adviſe them how they ſhould treat an army, hitherto invincible, but now entirely at their mercy. The wiſe old man returned by the meſſenger the following anſwer: I adviſe my ſon to open a paſſage for the Romans, and to let them return home without doing them the leaſt harm. The officers, ſurpriſed at this anſwer, and imagining the meſſenger had miſunderſtood Herennius, ſent him back to him; and then the old man gave a very different anſwer from the former: Tell the council, ſaid he, that I would not have them ſpare the life of one Roman; let them be all put to the ſword without diſtinction. The ſtrange difference between theſe two anſwers made the Samnites imagine, that there was ſome myſtery in the matter, and preſs Pontius to have his father brought to the camp to explain himſelf. When the wiſe Herennius was come and introduced to the council, he told them, that Rome was a powerful ſtate, from whoſe affection they might promiſe themſelves the greateſt benefits, and from whoſe enmity they had reaſon to fear the greateſt misfortunes. If we gain her affection, ſaid he, by a ſignal act of generoſity, we ſecure to ourſelves a happy and laſting tranquillity. On the other hand, if we cut off all the flower of her youth at one blow, we ſhall be ſafe in at leaſt for a time. In good policy, there is no medium between theſe two extremes. Either ſave the Romans in ſuch manner as to make them your friends, or deſtroy them ſo effectually as to render them leſs formidable enemies. But Pontius and his officers, rejecting this advice, choſe a middle way, not ſo generous as the former, nor quite ſo rigorous as the latter. They ſpared their lives, but at the ſame time treated them as conquered enemies.

WHILE the Samnites were thus deliberating about the fate of the Romans, the ſcarcity of proviſions encreaſed daily in the inveſted camp; and no hopes of relief appeared, nor poſſibility of eſcaping. Some ſoldiers indeed attempted to get out of the ſnare, but were met and driven back by the

the enemy's parties. In this deſperate condition, the conſuls ſent a deputation to the Samnites to deſire a peace upon equitable terms, and in caſe of refuſal to invite them to a battle. Pontius, with a haughty air, gave the deputies the following anſwer: We have no battles to fight; the victory is already gained. Not a man of your legions ſhall eſcape, till you have all been diſarmed, and paſſed one by one under the yoke. This is a preliminary, which I abſolutely inſiſt upon. Beſides this, the Romans ſhall leave Samnium, and withdraw their colonies from all the cities which they have taken from us. Tell the conſuls this from me; and, if they do not accept the terms propoſed, appear no more in my preſence. This anſwer occaſioned as great a conſternation in the camp, as if they had received advice that they muſt die. Nothing was heard but ſighs and lamentations. The conſuls, ſtruck dumb, durſt not declare themſelves for ſo ſhameful a treaty, and yet could not reject it in the extremity to which they were reduced. While they were thus heſitating, L. Lentulus, an officer of diſtinction, who by his wiſe conduct had raiſed himſelf to one of the chief poſts in the army, and had been at the head of the deputation to the Samnites, broke ſilence, and in a long harangue ſhewed the neceſſity of complying with the conditions impoſed, if they deſired to ſave their own lives, or had any regard to the preſervation of Rome. His advice was followed; and the conſuls ſignified to the Samnite general, that they conſented to lay down their arms and paſs under the yoke; upon which they obtained a conference with him. In this interview, Pontius deſired to conclude a treaty of peace and friendſhip with Rome; but the conſuls declared, that they could not conclude any that would be binding, without the approbation of the people and the miniſtry of the Feciales. Our power, ſaid they, extends no farther than to make promiſes, which we are ready to ſtrengthen by giving hoſtages. The ſtipulation was accepted, and, on the day appointed, the conſuls, lieutenant generals, quæſtors, and military tribunes went to the camp of the Samnites to ſign it. They promiſed to quit Samnium, [illegible] the places where they had planted colonies, and ſuffer the Samnites to live in peace, according to their own laws. To ſecure the performance of this convention, the Samnites demanded ſix hundred Roman knights as hoſtages; with this condition, that they might cut off their heads, if the republic did not perform the conſuls promiſes. Upon the return of the conſuls, ſorrow and

rage filled the hearts of the Roman ſoldiers. They could ſcarce refrain themſelves from offering violence to their generals, and cutting them in pieces. They formed dreadful ideas of their future diſhonour, and were ready to eſcape it, by laying violent hands on themſelves, and periſhing by each others ſwords. At length the fatal hour came. The ſix hundred knights marched firſt out of the camp, unarmed and with their under garment only. Theſe were put into the enemy's hands, who conducted them to a place of ſafety. The two conſuls appeared next, and were ordered to pull off their paludamenta, or military clokes, the enſigns of their dignity. At this ſight the ſoldiers, though full of rage againſt their generals, turned away their eyes, and changed their anger into compaſſion. They could not ſee officers of ſo high a rank treated with with ſo much indignity, without the utmoſt concern. While the legions were lamenting their hard fate, the conſuls paſſed firſt under the yoke, ſtripped of their habits and half naked; the inferior officers followed according to their rank, and at laſt the ſoldiers, one by one. The Samnites inſulted them as they paſſed; and if any Roman returned but a fierce look, he was immediately knocked down or killed. When they had all paſſed thus under the yoke, they were allowed to depart, and might have reached Capua the ſame day; but, partly out of diſtruſt of that city, though allied to Rome, and partly out of ſhame to be ſeen there in ſo miſerable a condition, they threw themſelves on the ground at ſome diſtance from that city, with a deſign to paſs the night in the open air, without food or refreſhment. But the Capuans, being informed of their misfortune and forlorn condition, immediately ſent cloaths, horſes, arms, and even lictors and faſces to the conſuls, with great plenty of proviſions for the whole army. And when, the next day, they drew near the city, the ſenate and people went out to meet them, with all demonſtrations of friendſhip and kindneſs. But the conſuls and their troops, overwhelmed with ſhame, ſeemed unaffected with their friendly hoſpitality. With their eyes fixed on the ground they perſiſted in ſilence and ſhunned all diſcourſe. They were attended by the flower of the Campanian nobility to the frontiers of their country; but they ſtill obſerved the ſame behaviour, and ſhewed the ſame dejection of mind; which made the Capuans conclude, that the Roman courage was for ever loſt, and paved the way for a revolt. One of them, however, a venerable old man, by name Oſilius Calavius, judged differently of the dull confuſion of the Romans. Their eyes, ſaid he, fixed on the ground, ſhew much they are bent on revenge; and their refuſing to be comforted is a proof, that they will never forgive the affront they have received.

At Rome the people began to be in pain for the conſular army. News had been brought thither, that it was ſurrounded by the enemy, and ſome levies had been made to march to their aſſiſtance. But, in the mean time, the ſenate receiving an account of the ſhameful peace, a ſtop was put to all further preparations. The people, as ſoon as it was communicated to them, put on the deepeſt mourning, without waiting for orders from the ſenate. The adminiſtration of juſtice was neglected; the ſhops in the forum were ſhut up; the Roman matrons laid aſide their jewels and gold-rings, the magiſtrates their robes, &c. In ſhort the city was in as gr at conſternation as the army. Every one made moſt bitt invectives againſt the cowards, as they ſtiled them, and the authors of ſo ſhameful a treaty. The multitude were even for ſhutting them out of the city, as wretches that did not deſerve to ſee their native country again. But the indignation of the Roman people was ſoon turned into pity. For their unhappy countrymen no ſooner appeared at the gates, but the whole city flocked out to ſee them, every one lamenting with tears in their eyes the misfortunes of thoſe unhappy men. However, they did not enter the city till night, and then every one ſtole home, and hid himſelf in his own houſe. Even the conſuls, looking upon themſelves as diſgraced and in a manner degraded, baniſhed themſelves from public ſociety, and only performed one function of their office, which was indiſpenſable; that is, they named a dictator to preſide in the comitia for the election of new conſuls, thinking themſelves unworthy to appear at the head of the republic in the Campus Martius. The dictator they nominated was Q. Fabius Ambuſtus, who chooſe Æmilius Pœtus for his general of the horſe; but, ſome defect being found in his nomination, Æmilius Papus was ſubſtituted in his room; and the general of the horſe he choſe was Valerius Flaccus. But the people were ſo diſſatisfied with all the magiſtrates of this unfortunate year, that the latter promotion was as much diſliked as the former. Whence it was thought expedient to let the republic fall into an inter-regnum, in order to have a more fortunate preſident of the comitia than either of the dictators, whom ſuch cowardly conſuls had named. And now two of the greateſt men in the republic were unanimouſly choſen, viz. Papirius Curſor, a ſecond time, and Publilius Philo, a third time. They entered upon their office the very day of their election, which was a ſort of degradation to their predeceſſors, who had deſerved this affront by their ill conduct. The firſt buſineſs of the new conſuls was, to get themſelves inveſted in their office by a decree of the ſenate, declaring, that in point of religion there had been no defect in their inauguration. After this the treaty with the Samnites being laid before the ſenate, Poſthumius, one of the conſuls who had been parties to it, declared, that the Roman people were not bound by it, as not being made by their order. He added, that the honour of the republic would be ſaved, by ſurrendering him and the reſt of the officers concerned in the treaty to the Samnites; which he moved might be forthwith done. The ſenators were ſtruck with admiration at the generoſity of Poſthumius, and ſhewed no leſs compaſſion for him than eſteem. However they approved of the propoſal and paſſed it into a decree. Two tribunes of the people, who had been raiſed to that office ſince their return from the Caudine Forks, oppoſed at firſt the decree, maintaining that the ſatisfaction deſigned for the Samnites was no ways ſufficient to diſcharge the demands they had upon Rome, and that as to themſelves, they were ſacroſanct magiſtrates, inviolable, and, though concerned in the treaty, not to be delivered up to the enemy. But Poſthumius offered ſuch arguments, to prove the invalidity of the Caudine convention and the ſufficiency of the deſigned ſatisfaction, that the two tribunes conſented at laſt to follow the fate of their companions, and with that view laid down their office. The Romans talked of nothing now but Poſthumius; they compared his devotement to that of Decius, and thinking that their republic was obliged in juſtice to nothing more than to deliver up into the hands of the Samnites those who had ſigned the treaty, thus began to make the neceſſary preparations for a new war. There needed no orders to raiſe troops; an army was ſoon formed almoſt wholly of volunteers, the Roman youth burning with rage againſt the Samnites. The Caudine legions were again enrolled, and a powerful army, marching from Rome in a few days, arrived in the neighbourhood of Caudium.

The treaty with the Samnites declared null.

The conſuls, who had made the treaty, delivered up to the Samnites.

As the Samnites were encamped at a ſmall diſtance, preparations were made for ſurrendering up the Roman officers in due form by a fecialis. Cornelius Arvina, who was deputed by the republic to perform the ceremony, began with commanding Poſthumius's hands to be tied. But the officer, who was to do it, not tying the cord hard enough, out of reſpect to ſo great a man, the generous Poſthumius reproved him. Why do you ſpare me, ſaid he? Tie me in ſuch a manner, that the enemy may have nothing to ſuſpect in my ſurrender. In this captive ſtate, the Roman officers were led to the Samnite camp, and preſented to Pontius by the fecialis, who expreſſed himſelf in theſe words as he had been directed: Since theſe men undertook to conclude a peace with you without any commiſſion, and committed a crime in ſo doing, we deliver them up to you, in order to free ourſelves from any ſhare in the puniſhment, which they alone have deſerved. Upon this Poſthumius, as offended at what the fecialis ſaid, immediately gave him a blow on the thigh with his knee, and ſternly ſaid, I am now a Samnite and you an embaſſador of Rome. I have therefore by this blow violated the law of nations; and you are thereby authorized to make war upon us. But this little, low artifice ſerved only to raiſe the indignation of the Samnite general, who laid before the fecialis a Poſthumius the injuſtice and baſeneſs of their proceedings. He told them, that they were obliged in juſtice either to obſerve the treaty, or ſend the Roman army again to the Caudine Forks. There, ſaid he, your conſuls may reject the peace, if they diſlike it. Your honour will then be untainted, and your fidelity, as well as the law of nations, will be preſerved inviolate. But ſhall the lives of your troops be ſaved, and you enjoy all the advantages of the peace, while we reap no benefit from our conventions? Are theſe the equitable maxims upon which your feciales are ordered to act? Is this the juſtice with which you proceed in treating with foreign nations? As for you, Poſthumius, do you think the gods will take you for a Samnite, and conſider the blow you have given, as an inſult offered to the Roman people by our nation? Is it thus that you ſport with religion and the faith of treaties? Are ſuch ludicrous tranſactions becoming the gravity of a conſul and the dignity of a great nation? Lictors untie the priſoners, and leave them free to go where they pleaſe [t].

[t] Liv. l. ix. c. 8—12.

Poſthumius and his company returned ſafe to the camp, where all things were getting ready to enter upon action. On the other hand, the Samnites kept cloſe within their entrenchments, having, as Livy ſays, a foreboding of the misfortunes which afterwards befel them. They repented, but too late, of their not having hearkened to the wiſe counſels of Herennius. So that Pontius, though conqueror, loſt in great meaſure his reputation, while Poſtumius, tho' conquered and obliged to paſs under the yoke, gained immortal glory among his countrymen. For the Romans looked on the liberty he had gained them of making war as a certain victory. Not long after the inhabitants of Satricum revolted from the Romans, and, being ſupported by a detachment of Samnites, ſurprized Fregellæ a Roman colony. The Fregellani, running to arms, attempted to drive the enemy out of their city. All the inhabitants, women and children not excepted, ſtood up in defence of their lands, their altars, and their houſhold gods, and from the tops of their houſes made a dreadful ſlaughter of the enemy. The Samnites and Satricani, fearing they ſhould be obliged to abandon the city, cauſed a proclamation to be made, offering quarter to all thoſe who ſhould lay down their arms. Upon this many ſubmitted; but the Samnites, not thinking themſelves obliged to keep their word with any of the Roman name, cauſed all, who had ſurrendered, to be burnt alive. Only a ſmall number of the Fregellani, who had not hearkened to the enemy's promiſes, retired fighting, and with their ſwords cut themſelves a way through the midſt of the Samnite troops. At the ſame time ſome of the chief citizens of Capua entered into a ſecret plot to ſhake off the Roman yoke. Theſe commotions induced the republic to have recourſe to the uſual remedy in times of great danger; a dictator was named, viz. C. Mœnius, who appointed M. Foſſius, ſurnamed Flaccinator, to be his general of the horſe. The dictator's commiſſion was, contrary to cuſtom, confined to enquiring into crimes againſt the ſtate and puniſhing them. The error of a judge, from whom there lay no appeal, ſo terrified the heads of the conſpiracy at Capua, that they kill themſelves to avoid a more ſevere death. As it is common for perſons, who charged with an extraordinary commiſſion, to ſtretch their power to the utmoſt extent, the dictator pretended, that this authority extended not only to the traiterous practices of the Capuans, but to all conſpiracies, whatſoever, and wherefoever formed againſt the Roman ſtate. By conſpiracies the dictator, who was a plebeian, as well as his general of the horſe, meant all intriguing and canvaſſing for offices; and accordingly ſummoned ſeveral of the patricians to appear before him on accuſations of that kind. Hereupon, not only the accuſed, but the whole body of the nobility, taking the alarm, threatened to proſecute the dictator and his general of the horſe, as ſoon as their magiſtracy ſhould be expired, for the ſame crime which was laid to their charge. Our birth alone, ſaid they, leads us to the higheſt poſts. It is only for the common people, and ſuch upſtarts, as the dictator and his general of the horſe, to raiſe themſelves by intrigues. Mœnius, tho' free from guilt, yet fearing leſt his reputation ſhould ſuffer by the reports that began to be ſpread abroad, aſſembled the people, and having laid before them the uprightneſs of his intentions, abdicated the dictatorſhip, that he might be brought to a trial. Foſſius likewiſe reſigned his office for the ſame purpoſe. The ſenate by a ſpecial commiſſion appointed the conſuls to be their judges. Thoſe of the nobility, who appeared againſt them, were examined; and upon a full hearing the accuſed were acquitted in a very honourable manner[u].

It appears from ſeveral paſſages in Livy and from the Faſti Capitolini, that the operations of the campaign this year were carried on by Cornelius Lentulus, dictator, and Papirius Curſor, not in quality of conſul, but of general of the horſe to Cornelius. Theſe two divided their forces; Cornelius, at the head of the troops that had paſſed under the yoke, encamped near Caudium; while Papirius marched with the reſt of the army to Luceria in Apulia, where the ſix hundred Roman knights, who had been delivered up to the Samnites as hoſtages, were kept. Pontius would have willingly marched to the relief of Luceria; but on the other hand, he could not leave his own country open to the Romans; and beſides, he was afraid the dictator would fall on his rear. He therefore reſolved to put all to the iſſue of a battle, and accordingly, marching out of his intrenchments, he drew up his men. As ſoon as the Samnites appeared in order of battle, the dictator aſſembled his men, in order to exhort them, as was uſual on ſuch occaſions, to behave themſelves valiantly. But the ſoldiers, animated with an eager deſire of revenge, demanded a battle with ſuch clamours, that the general's harangue could not not be heard. When they drew near the Samnites, they preſſed their ſtandard-bearers to march faſter, and fell upon the enemy with ſuch fury, as cannot be expreſſed. It was then uſual to begin general actions with ſome diſcharges of darts and ſtones; but the ardor of the Romans was ſo great, that they threw down the darts they had in their hands, and without orders drew their ſwords, and ruſhed upon the enemy with an impetuoſity, that ſeemed a kind of madneſs. This irregular animoſity, or rather rage, did more than could have been expected from the wiſeſt conduct. Nothing could ſtand before them; the Samnite army was put to the rout at the firſt onſet, and their camp taken and plundered. All the Samnites found in the camp were put to the ſword, and as great a ſlaughter of them was made there as in the battle.

Cornelius Lentulus gives the Samnites a great overthrow.

AFTER this victory the dictator marched his army into Apulia, to aſſiſt his general of the horſe in the reduction of Luceria. And indeed the arrival of the victorious army proved very ſeaſonable, Papirius being greatly ſtreightened for want of proviſions. The dictator diſperſed his legions about the country, and by that means facilitated the bringing of proviſions to the camp, and at the ſame time intercepted the convoys that were ſent to the beſieged. The Samnites, who had likewiſe an army near Luceria, finding it impoſſible for the beſieged to hold out long, reſolved to give the beſiegers battle, which Papirius did not decline. But while every thing was getting ready for a general action, embaſſadors arrived from Tarentum, ordering both parties to put a ſtop to all further hoſtilities, and proteſting, that their ſtate would declare againſt that nation, which ſhould obſtinately perſiſt in carrying on the war. Papirius was not a man to be terrified with the threatenings of the Tarentines. But nevertheleſs, he pretended to pay a regard to them, and anſwered the embaſſadors, that he would confer with the dictator. And indeed the two generals had a conference; but it was only about the moſt proper meaſures to be taken with relation to the engagement. While the Romans were ſacrificing, as was uſual a-mary before a battle, the embaſſadors came for their anſwer. Papirius accoſted them, and with an air, which ſhewed how little account Rome made of the menaces of ſo inſignificant a people, The chickens, ſaid he, feed perfectly well: the gods too are much pleaſed with our ſacrifices: under their protection therefore we are going to fight, as you perceive. He then led his troops out of the camp, in order to engage the enemy. But the Samnites, being ſeized with a ſudden fright at their approach, declared, that they would keep themſelves within their camp upon the defenſive, out of reſpect to the Tarentines. The legionaries, encouraged by this timorouſneſs of the enemy, attacked their intrenchments with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that they ſoon forced them, and put all to the ſword, who came in their way, ſparing neither men, children, ſlaves, nor even the beaſts of burden. Scarce any of the Samnites would have eſcaped, had not the generals reſtrained the fury of the ſoldiers, thirſty of blood, in regard to the ſix hundred knights in Luceria, whom the beſieged, if reduced to deſpair, might put to death, for the ſake of having the barbarous pleaſure of ſacrificing them, before they periſhed themſelves [w].

NOTHING now remained, in order to put a glorious end to the campaign, but the reducing of Luceria, which was vigorouſly defended both by the inhabitants, and by thoſe Samnites, who had eſcaped from the battle and taken refuge in the beſiged city; among whom was, as ſome authors tell us [x], Pontius himſelf. But notwithſtanding this reinforcement, the garriſon, being greatly diſtreſſed by famine, offered to capitulate, and to releaſe the ſix hundred hoſtages, on condition that the Romans would raiſe the ſiege. But Papirius peremptorily inſiſted, that all the ſoldiers in the place, to the number of ſeven thouſand, ſhould, unarmed, and with one garment each, paſs under the yoke, and Pontius at the head of them. Theſe conditions were accepted, and the Romans had the pleaſure of retaliating upon Pontius and his Samnites the ignominy, which he had made them and their conſuls undergo at the Caudine Forks. But their greateſt ſatisfaction was the recovery of the hoſtages, which had been delivered up to the Samnites, as ſecurities for the execution of a ſhameful treaty.

THE next year Papirius was raiſed to the conſulate, a third time, and Q. Aulius Cerretanus, a ſecond time. The latter defeated the Samnites in Apulia, and made himſelf maſter of Ferentum, which was either ſubject to, or in alliance with them. The former reduced Satricum, and put all the Samnites, who were there in garriſon, to the ſword. The chief authors of the revolt were firſt beaten with rods, and then beheaded, and a ſtrong body of troops was left in the place to keep the inhabitants in awe. Papirius, after the the reduction of this important place, returned to Rome, where he received the honours of a triumph, which he had not obtained the preceding year for far greater exploits, becauſe he had acted under the auſpices of a ſuperior magiſtrate. The people were overjoyed to ſee him enter Rome, with all the pomp due to a man, who had recovered the luſtre of the Roman name. Livy repreſents Papirius as a hero who would have been a match for Alexander the Great, had he attempted the conqueſt of Italy. But be that as it will, it is certain, that no general in Italy equalled him in military ſkill, or ſurpaſſed him in courage. He was very remarkable for his ſtrength of body and wonderful ſwiftneſs in running, whence he had the ſurname of Curſor. He was a man of a tall ſtature and majeſtic mein, indefatigable in military labours, and always in motion, ſharing with the common ſoldiers t' ſevereſt toils of war; and whether it was owing to his r uſt conſtitution, or continual exerciſe, no man exceeded him in eating and drinking. No general ever kept his troops to harder ſervice. We are told, that his cavalry having one day deſired a little relaxation from their fatigues, after they were returned from a ſucceſsful expedition, he pleaſantly anſwered; Yes, by all means, nothing is more juſt: when you alight from your horſes, I excuſe you from the trouble of ſtroaking their backs. Such was the character of the famous Papirius, a man greatly celebrated by all the Latin writers[y].

His character.

IN the following conſulate of L. Plautius and M. Foſlius, many of the Samnite cities ſent deputies to the Roman ſenate to aſk peace; but could only obtain a two years truce. In Apulia the conſul Plautius ſpread ſo much terror, that the cities of Teanum and Canuſium ſurrendered and gave hoſtages. At this time Capua was ſo divided by inteſtine broils, that the inhabitants deſired the Romans to give them a governor and new laws to keep them in order; and it was on this occaſion, that the Romans turned Campania into a præfecture, and ſent thither a præfect. Two new tribes were formed this year, one in Campania, perhaps to make the Campanians ſome ſort of amends for their liberty, which they had voluntarily given up: one was called the Falernian tribe, no doubt from the hill Falernus. The other was eſtabliſhed in the country watered by the Ufens on the confines of Latium, and therefore called Tribus Ufentina; ſo that the Romans had now thirty-one tribes, all with the right of ſuffrage in the comitia by tribes [z]. This year ended with a cenſus, taken by L. Papirius Craſſus and C. Mœnius, cenſors; by which it appeared, that the number of men in Rome fit to bear arms amounted to two hundred and fifty thouſand.

All Apulia ſubdued.

THE next year, Q. Æmilius and C. Junius being conſuls, all Apulia was ſubdued; ſo that this year proved no leſs proſperous for the republic than the former. At the ſame time Antium followed the example of Capua, in having recourſe to Rome for a governor and laws, which the republic readily granted (W). The ſucceeding conſuls, Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius, no ſooner entered upon their office, but they were obliged by the ſenate to nominate, contrary to cuſtom, a dictator to carry on the war. Perhaps the people had but an indifferent opinion of their ability in warlike affairs. At leaſt, it is certain, that they did not appear at the head of the army, but continued at Rome the whole time of their adminiſtration. L. Æmilius, who was appointed dictator and choſe L. Fulvius for his general of the horſe, received the command of the legions from the preceding conſuls, and with thoſe troops began the campaign, by laying ſiege to Siticula, a city of Campania in alliance with the Samnites, who came with a very numerous army to relieve the place. But the dictator defeated them in a pitched battle, after which they abandoned their camp in the night, and left the Saticulans without any hopes of relief. However, the beſieged made ſuch a vigorous reſiſtance, that the dictatorſhip of Æmilius expired, before he could make himſelf maſter of the place. The new conſuls were the famous Papirius Curſor and Publilius Philo, both choſen the fourth time. They had both triumphed more than once over the Samnites, were men of diſtinguiſhed merit, and the greateſt and moſt experienced generals the Romans had. But nevertheleſs, they had the mortification to ſee the carrying on of the war committed to another general, while they continued inglorious and in a manner out of office at Rome. Such mortifications are often

(W) Antium was not made a Præfecture, nor was any ſingle magiſtrate ſent thither to give her laws. This was left to the patrons of the colony, it being then cuſtomary, not only for private families, but for cities and whole provinces to have patrons, who were often of the chief nobility of Rome. The patrons of the municipia were generally of the families of thoſe conſuls and generals who had conquered them; and the patrons of the colonies were the children of thoſe who had received the commiſſion to plant them.

often given to men of the greateſt merit in popular governments. The people obliged the conſuls of the preceding year to raiſe to the dictatorſhip Q. Fabius Maximus, who had been formerly general of the horſe to Papirius, and ever ſince his implacable enemy. The new dictator immediately ſet out for Saticula, where he received the command of the legions, not from the conſuls, but from Æmilius the dictator, whoſe office was expiring. No ſooner had the Roman army changed its general, but the Samnites, who after their defeat had laid ſiege to Pliſtia, a city in alliance with Rome, returned to Saticula, in order to try their ſtrength with the new general. Fabius, without being alarmed in the leaſt at the great number of their troops, continued his attacks with the infantry, while his cavalry guarded the camp, under the command of Aulius Cerretanus his general of the horſe. The Samnites having one day advanced to the very gates of the camp, and there inſulted the Roman cavalry, Aulius, without conſulting the dictator, ſallied out with the Roman knights. This was a breach of diſcipline, like that which Fabius himſelf had been formerly guilty of. Aulius at firſt repulſed the enemy, but the Samnite general rallied his troops, revived their courage, and led them back to the charge. Aulius diſcovering him, ruſhed on him and laid him dead on the ground with one blow. The Samnites, not in the leaſt diſheartened at the death of their general, thought of nothing but revenge. Aulius, having penetrated too far into the enemy's ſquadrons, could not retire. Whereupon the Samnites, having ſurrounded him on all ſides, called upon their general's brother, that he might have the glory of revenging his death. Accordingly, he diſmounted Aulius, and, full of rage, ſtabbed him as he lay on the ground. It was then thought a ſingular honour to get poſſeſſion of the body of a general, who had been ſlain in battle. The Samnites therefore exerted their utmoſt efforts to carry off the body of Aulius. Hereupon the Roman knights alighted from their horſes to recover it, and free Rome from ſo terrible a reproach. The example of the Roman cavalry was followed by the Samnites; ſo that a battle was fought between them on foot, in which the Romans at length prevailed, and carried back to the camp the body of their general. After the loſs of the battle, the Samnites returned to the ſiege of Pliſtia, which they took by aſſault. Fabius purſued that of Saticula, which at length capitulated. From Saticula the dictator, without loſs of time, marched to beſiege Sora, a city in the country of the Volſci, which had declared for the Samnites, after having maſſacred a Roman colony ſettled in their territory. The Samnites, after the reduction of Pliſtia, followed him; which Fabius no ſooner underſtood, than he turned back to meet them, and came to an engagement with them near the narrow paſs of Lentulæ, not far from the Pomptin marſhes. Night put an end to it before either party could claim the victory; and both armies next day continued their march to Sora, the one to attack, the other to defend, it. In the mean time, the dictator having choſen a new general of the horſe, L. Fabius, a relation of his own, he ordered him to go to Rome, to bring freſh levies from thence, and, concealing his march from the enemy, to wait, in ſome ſecure place near Sora, the ſignal for entering upon action. The dictator's orders were obeyed: and Fabius ſoon arrived with a ſtrong reinforcement. Hereupon the dictator, pretending fear, kept cloſe in his intrenchments, in order to draw the enemy's army near his camp. Accordingly, the Samnites marched up to the very rampart, when the Roman general all on a ſudden, without informing his legions of the ſuccours Rome had ſent him, hung out a red ſtandard over his tent, which was the ſignal for battle. By the fright the dictator ſhewed and his ſudden reſolution of giving battle, the ſoldiers thought themſelves in great danger, and imagined they had no remedy left but to make a briſk ſally on the enemy. The dictator confirmed them in this opinion, by telling them, that their caſe was ſuch, that they muſt either conquer or periſh; that he had ordered fire to be ſet to their baggage and tents; but that they might ſoon make up the loſs by the plunder of the cities, which had ſhaken off the Roman yoke and ſided with the enemy. However, he gave private orders to ſet fire to thoſe tents only which were next to the ramparts; and this was the ſignal for the general of the horſe to put his troops in motion, and fall upon the enemy's rear. As every thing was executed with wonderful harmony, the enemy was at the ſame time attacked in the front and the rear with ſuch fury, that they were forced to give way, and leave the Romans, not only maſters of the field, but alſo of their camp, which was taken and plundered. After this the dictator led his troops back to their own camp, where, to their great joy and ſurprize, they found that only a ſmall number of their tents had been burnt. After this victory, Fabius laid ſiege to Sora, which was continued by his ſucceſſors ſors in the command of the army, M. Pætilius Libo and C. Sulpicius Longus, the new conſuls. We know not what motives could induce the public to diſappoint Fabius of the honours of a triumph, which he had well deſerved, but did not obtain on his return to Rome. The two conſuls encamped cloſe to the walls of the beſieged city, in order to keep the garriſon continually in play. But the inhabitants, not in the leaſt intimidated, either by the nearneſs of the Romans, the number of their troops, or the late defeat of the Samnites, defended themſelves with incredible bravery. While the conſuls were under great perplexity, as not knowing in what part to make their attacks, the walls being every-where well guarded, a deſerter from the town came to the Roman camp, and offered to put the place into their hands with the help of ten choſen men only. The conſuls, having examined and approved of his ſcheme, removed by his advice their camp ſome miles from the city, which brought the garriſon into a kind of ſecurity. Then the deſerter, at the head of his ten men, ſtealing in the night time into a part of the upper city, where the wall was unguarded, becauſe thought inacceſſible, placed them in a narrow ſteep path, leading from the citadel to the lower town. This done he ran down into the lower town, crying, To arms, to arms; the enemy are in poſſeſſion of the fortreſs. The inhabitants, ſeized with fear, thought of nothing but ſaving their lives by flight; men and women, leaving their houſes, ruſhed in confuſion out at the gates, which the Romans on their approach finding open, entered the city without reſiſtance, and put all thoſe to the ſword whom they met in the ſtreets. The conſuls ſent the authors of the revolt and of the maſſacre of the Roman colony to Rome, where they were all, to the number of two hundred and twenty-five, by an order from the ſenate, firſt beaten with rods, and then beheaded. From Sora the conſuls marched into the country of the Auſones, and upon an accuſation, without proof of their having formed any deſign to revolt, ſent detachments to ſurprize their three chief cities, Auſona, Minturnæ, and Veſcia. As the troops employed in this enterprize were out of their commanders ſight, they ſet no bounds to their fury. The three cities were taken, on the ſame day and at the ſame hour; the Roman ſoldiers, having got into them under various diſguiſes, put all the inhabitants to the ſword without diſtinction of ſex or age; and this upon the bare ſuſpicion of a rebellion. and maſſacred the colony which Rome had ſent thither, was taken th ſame year by aſſualt; and both the inhabitants and ' nnites, who defended it, put to the ſword. The ſenate was at firſt inclined to raze a city, which had ſo often revolted; but it was afterwards reſolved, that a colony of two thouſand five hundred men ſhould be ſent thither from Rome, to ſecure that important city, which kept all Apulia in awe [a].

THE Campanians, notwithſtanding theſe examples of ſeverity, prepared once more, as they were a reſtleſs and factious people, to ſhake off the Roman yoke. Rome therefore thought fit to name a dictator to keep the inhabitants in ſubjection, by arms and the fear of an abſolute magiſtrate.

C. Mœnius dictator.

C. Mœnius was raiſed to that dignity the ſecond time; and he choſe the ſame general of the ' ſe, M. Foſlius, whom he named to that poſt in his fo. ner dictatorſhip. The dictator entered Campania, and encamped near Capua, while the conſul Sulpicius, at the head of another army, drew near Caudium, where the Samnites waited for the inſurrection of the Campanians. The two armies came ſoon to an engagement, in which the Samnites gained at firſt the advantage; but, by the prudent conduct of the conſul Sulpicius, were in the end entirely defeated, with the loſs of thirty thouſand men killed or taken. After this victory the conſul marched to Bovianum, one of the chief cities of Samnium, and, having poſted his troops round it in quarters of refreſhment, returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph [b].

The Samnites overthrown with the loſs of thirty thouſand men.

THE enſuing year L. Papirius Curſor, a fifth time, and C. Junius Brutus, a ſecond time, were raiſed to the conſulate. But nevertheleſs, a dictator was nominated to carry on the war againſt the Samnites. The perſon honoured with that dignity was C. Pœtilius Libo, ſirnamed Viſolus, ' , having choſen Pœtilius Libo, on of the laſt year's ſuls, for his general of the horſe, ſet out for Bovianum, re the legions were cantoned; but in a ſhort time ted that poſt t retake F læ, which the enemy ndoned at his app ch. Afte he had placed a ſtrong garriſon in it, he led his army againſt Nola, which he quickly reduced, as he did likewiſe the cities of Atina and Calatia, both in the ſame province. The following year, when M. Valerius Maximus and P. Decius Mus were in the the conſulate, the Romans, being alarmed with the apprehenſions of a war with all Hetruria, appoin[illegible]C. Sulpicius Longus dictator to conduct it. But, the H[illegible]urians continuing quiet within their own bounds, no hoſtilities enſued on either ſide, the dictator being unwilling to ſtir up new enemies againſt his republic.

At home the city was greatly diſturbed by the innovations of Appius Claudius, at this time cenſor. He was a man extremely wedded to his own opinion, and had boldneſs enough to undertake any thing, and ſteadineſs to maintain whatever he undertook. He was [illegible] able civilian, and looked upon as the oracle of Rome in all knotty points of law; but a lover of reformations, and one who took delight in overturning the moſt antient inſtitutions and ſetting up for a legiſlator. This great man, for he was really ſo notwithſtanding ſom[illegible] faults, in his cenſorſhip took upon him to humble the pride of the ſenate. It belonged to the cenſors to draw up and read, after every luſtrum, a liſt of thoſe citizens, who had a right to ſit and vote in the ſenate. Hitherto none but patricians, or the moſt conſiderable among the plebeians, had been admitted into it. But Appius introduced the libertini, that is, the ſons of thoſe who, having been ſlaves, had obtained their liberty. Having thus debaſed the ſenate, he attacked the prieſthood, which was confined to the nobility alone. The moſt antient prieſthood in Rome was that of the temple of Hercules, and of the altar, which had been conſecrated to him under the name of Ara Maxima by Evander, in memory of his victory over Cacus. This prieſthood, when firſt inſtituted, had been conferred upon a venerable old man of the Aborigines, named Potitius, and had continued ever ſince in his family. But Appius prevailed upon the Potitii to reſign this venerable prieſthood to the ſlaves belonging to th[illegible] public, a moſt contemptible race of men. By this mea[illegible] he gave the nobility a fatal blow, the prieſthood being t[illegible] only dignity which the plebeians at this time did not ſha[illegible] with the patricians. L[illegible]y, who has affected to fill [illegible] hiſtory with wonderful events, ſpeaks of a tradition, that the whole name of the Potitii, conſiſting of twelve families, in which were thirty perſons, at or paſt the age of puberty, periſhed within the year, Hercules thus revenging himſelf on the family which had deſpiſed him. The ſame author adds, that Appius was ſtruck blind ſome years after by the angry gods, as a puniſhment for his profaneneſs. But Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Appius confined himſelf to his houſe, and that he only pretended to be blind, leſt, if he appeared in public, he ſhould be reproached by the patricians, when he had highly exaſperated [c]. Thus Appius brought a blemiſh on the ſenate and prieſthood; but made his country amends by the uſeful works he undertook with ſucceſs. For, by an aqueduct ſeven miles long, he ſupplied Rome with plenty of wholſome water, which it wanted before, and made the famous road from Rome to Capua, which laſted entire above eight hundred years. The remains of this wonderful work are the admiration of all the nations in Europe to this day (X).

[c] Liv. l. ix. c. 29. Diodor. Sicul. l. xix. Feſt. voce Potitius.

(X) The aqueduct of Appius began ſeven miles from Rome, and, after having run a great way under ground, diſcharged part of its waters between the great Capena and Trigemina, and conveyed the reſt quite to the campus Martius. It was dug underground and laid very deep, ſays (16) Frontinus, either becauſe the art of levelling was not then brought to perfection; or becauſe the Roman territory was yet too much expoſed to the incurſion of her enemies, who might have deſtroyed the ſtately arches, and intercepted the water. This water was for many ages called Aqua Appia from the cenſor's name. The other work he undertook was equally uſeful to the republic. The Road from Rome to Capua was almoſt impaſſable, eſpecially for the Roman armies, which were often obliged to croſs the Pomptin marſhes to make war in Samnium and in the eaſt of Italy. The cenſor therefore levelled a way through rocks and hills, and built bridges over the rivulets and marſhes for the conveniency of the troops and of travellers. This road was called the Appian way, and alſo the queen of roads. Procopius gives us the following deſcription of it (17): This way was made, ſays he, nine hundred [illegible]ars ago, by the order and direction of Appius Claudius, who [illegible] then cenſor. It reached from Rome to Capua, that is, about [illegible]undred and forty two miles. It was broad enough for two [illegible]riots to go abreaſt without incommoding each other. The [illegible]es, which Appius employed in th[illegible] great work, were brought [illegible]om a great diſtance, and as hard as flints. Theſe great pieces of [illegible]ock were ſquared and ſmoothed by the moſt ſkilful workmen. The ſtones were ſo artfully joined together without any cement, that they looked like one ſingle ſtone for ſeveral miles together. This vaſt work continues entire to this day without having received

THE ſucceeding conſuls, C. Junius Brutus a third time, and Q. Æmilius Barbula, a ſecond time, elled, with the conſent and approbation of the people, new liſt of ſenators, which Appius had made, and reſtored that venerable body to its former luſtre. This ſame year the people recovered a privilege, which the conſuls and dictators had uſurped from them. A law had been formerly made, by which the people aſſembled in the comitia were empowered to chuſe ſix legionary tribunes (Y), out of the twenty-four in the conſular armies conſiſting of four legions.

ceived the leaſt injury from carts and carriages. Thus far Procopius. This famous road began at the gate Capena, and did not for a great while reach far her than Capua, though the author of the lives of illuſtrious men gives Appius the honour of carrying it from Rome quite to Brunduſium, in the extreme parts of Italy on the Adriatic ſea. But that writer is herein certainly miſtaken, the provinces through which he muſt have carried this work, in order to bring it to the ſea, not being at that time ſubject to the Romans. In the beginning of Auguſtus's reign it reached indeed to Brunduſium, that is, two hundred thirty-eight miles further. But no hiſtorian tells us who was the author or manager of this ſecond work. Moſt writers gueſs, that it was done by Julius Cæſar; for Plutarch tells us, that the Roman people committed the inſpection of the Appian way to him, and that he ſpent great ſums of money upon that work. The Appian way is ſtill in many places for ſeveral miles together as entire as when it was firſt made (18). It was paved with ſeveral beds of great ſtones, and bounded on each ſide with a deep ditch to receive and carry off the water.

(Y) There were, generally ſpeaking, ſix legionary tribunes in each legion, which they commanded by turns; that is, firſt, two of theſe tribunes commanded in chief at a time, and then were ſucceeded by two others, and ſo round. Varro tells us, that theſe officers were called tribunes from the beginning of the monarchy, becauſe a legion then conſiſted of three thouſand men only, and had but three tribunes, there being as many legionary tribunes as thouſands of men in each legion. Polybius tells us, that of the twenty-four tribunes, who were in each conſular army conſiſting of two legions, fourteen were choſen out of the equites or knights, who had ſerved five years, and the other ten out of ſuch as had ſerved in the foot full ten years. The former were called Tribuni Juniores, and the latter, Tribuni Seniores. But theſe qualifications were not rigorouſly inſiſted on till the latter ages, when the Roman diſcipline became more regular.

(18) See Dr. Burnet's letters, letter 4.

Each conſul had two legions under his command, which made a conſular army; and each legion was commanded by ſix tribunes. The generals had for ſome time taken upon them to nominate all the legionary tribunes, without any regard to the right of the people. L. Attilius therefore and C. Marcius, two tribunes of the people, got a decree paſſed in the comitia, empowering the people, not only to chuſe ſix tribunes, as formerly, but ſixteen out of the twenty-four. But this law was not of long duration. Though the republic at this time ſtood in no need of a fleet, having no wars to maintain but with the Samnites and Hetrurians, yet the people, at the motion of Decius Mus, one of their tribunes, appointed two officers, ſtiled by the Latin hiſtorians Duumviri Navales, to take upon them the care of naval affairs [d].

Duumviri Navales.

In the mean time, the two conſuls took the field, Brutus againſt the Samnites, and Æmilius againſt the Hetrurians. The latter found the enemy ready to lay ſiege to Sutrium with a very numerous army, all the leucumonies, except that of Arretium, having furniſhed their contingents of troops. The conſul no ſooner appeared, but the Hetrurians, depending on their numbers, offered him battle, which Æmilius did not decline. Both Romans and Hetrurians behaved with extraordinary courage and reſolution. The latter, being obſtinately bent to conquer or die, fell in great numbers about their colours, without giving ground or being put into diſorder. The battle laſted till night put an end to it, when both armies retired in good order to their reſpective camps. But as the Hetrurians had loſt more men than the Romans, they thought fit to retire in the night, and leave the conſul maſter of the field. Livy robs Æmilius of the glory of a triumph for this victory, which he repreſents as very inconſiderable; but it is certain from the Capitoline marbles, that he entered Rome triumphantly on the ides of the month Sextilis [e]; whence we are inclined to think, that this victory was more complete than that writer makes it. As for the other conſul, he took from the Samnites firſt Cluvia, and then Boviaſium. All thoſe in the former, who were able to bear arms, were put to the ſword; the latter was given up to be plundered by the ſoldiers, but the lives of the citizens were ſpared. And now the Samnites had no refuge but in artifice; they endeavoured to draw the Romans into new Caudine

Caudine Forks, and with this view ſpread a report in the Roman camp by their emiſſaries, that they had conveyed all their proviſions and effects into the for[illegible] of Avernus, between Cumæ and Pute[illegible] in Campania. The Roman troops, allured by the ho[illegible] of booty, entered the foreſt, where they were all on a ſudden ſurrounded by the enemy's forces, who lay concealed among the buſhes. But the legions, rallying in an inſtant, threw all their baggage in a heap, and, without waiting for the word of command, drew up in battalia, and falling upon the enemy, obliged them to ſeek an aſylum in thoſe very woods, which they intended to have rendered fatal [illegible] the Romans. As the Samnites could not eaſily retire on account of the brambles and thickneſs of the foreſt, the Romans maſſacred them without mer[illegible], and left twenty thouſand of them dead upon the ſpot. For this victory Junius Brutus enjoyed the hor[illegible]rs of a triumph, though Livy does not mention it, on the nones of the month Sextilis [f]. During the adminiſtration of the following conſuls, Q. Fabius, a ſecond time, and C. Marcius, the cenſor Appius obſtinately refuſed to quit his office, th[illegible]gh his eighteen months, the legal time for its duration, were expired, preſuming on the favour of the people, who were greatly pleaſed with his aqueduct and new road. Nevertheleſs, Sempronius Sophus cited him to appear before the people for this infraction of the law. Seven of the tribunes were for committing him to priſon; but the other three taking him under their protection, he carried his point, and kept the cenſorſhip alone, his collegue having reſigned it in compliance with the law, more than three years longer.

DURING theſe diſturbances, the Hetrurians, having drawn together all their forces, encamped in the neighbourhood of Sutrium. But the conſul Fabius falling u[illegible]n them gave them a total overthrow, took thirty-eight ſta[illegible]ards from them, and made himſelf maſter of their camp and all their baggage. Thoſe, who eſcaped the ſlaughte[illegible], took refuge in the Ciminian foreſt. Whereupon Fabius propoſed in a council of war to purſue the conquered, e[illegible] into the moſt impenetrable parts of the wood. But [illegible] one officer was for marching in queſt of the Hetrurians, [illegible] the hazard of finding the Caudine Forks of Samnium in Hetruria. And indeed the Ciminian Foreſt, ſays Livy, was at that time more impaſſable and dreadful than the

Hercynian foreſt in Germany. No body, not even the merchants, had ever attempted to paſs through it. However, Fabius reſolved to enter it, thinking his victory was not compleat, ſo long as the enemy could conceal themſelves in this thick foreſt. He had then with him a near relation, by name Cæſo Fabius, who, knowing perfectly well the Hetrurian language, as he had been brought up at Cære, undertook to examine the foreſt and places about it. He took only one ſlave with him, who, having been brought up with him, had learnt the language of the country, as well as himſelf. Before they ſet out, they diſguiſed themſelves in the habit of ſhepherds, bearing each a hatchet and two javelins, after the manner of the peaſants. But their chief ſecurity againſt a diſcovery was, the general notion that no ſtranger would dare to enter that foreſt. In this diſguiſe they ſet out, and travelled as far as Camerinum in Umbria; where Fabius diſcovering himſelf to be a Roman, treated with the magiſtrates of the place in the name of the conſul, and obtained a promiſe, that if the Roman army ſhould come into thoſe parts, they would ſupply it with a reinforcement of men and thirty days proviſions. Upon the report made by Fabius at his return, the conſul reſolved to enter the foreſt, and carry the war that way into the very heart of Hetruria, and executed his deſign with a great deal of addreſs. He ordered all his baggage to be removed out of the camp in the evening, and the infantry to follow it to the place where he deſigned to enter the foreſt. He continued himſelf in the intrenchments with the cavalry, which he marched early in the morning to the ſkirts of the wood, where the enemy had placed ſome centinels. Having by this means kept the enemy in play, he returned, after ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes, to his camp; but ſoon marched out of it again by another gate to join his infantry, which he came up with before night, and together with them entered the narrow paſſes on the oppoſite ſide to the enemy. The next morning by day-break he reached the top of the hill Ciminus, which gave name to the foreſt. From thence he ſurveyed with pleaſure the vaſt and fruitful plains of Hetruria; was charmed that he had broke through a barrier, which had been hitherto impenetrable to the Romans, and promiſed himſelf much ſpoil and great conqueſts. From mount Ciminus he ſent a detachment of legionaries, who not only brought off an immenſe booty, but defeated a tumultuous army, that had got together to reſcue it out of their hands. After this expedition pedition Fabius returned to his camp, where he found two tribunes of the people ſent thither to forbid him, in the name both of the ſenate and people, to venture upon ſo dangerous an expedition. But the tribunes, extremely pleaſed to find that the prohibition was come too late, and that the ſucceſs of the project had put an end to the public fears, returned to Rome, with the joyful tidings that a way was opened into Hetruria.

THE detachments, which Fabius had ſent out to plunder, having alarmed all Hetruria and the people on the confines of Hetruria, theſe nations took the field together, and came to the camp before Sutrium, where they drew up in the plain, and offered the Romans battle. But Fabius, pretending fear, kept cloſe within his intrenchments, and having by this means lulled the enemy into a falſe ſecurity, he drew up his men, about the fourth watch of the night, within the intrenchment of the camp, cauſed the ramparts to be levelled, and the ditch to be filled, and then marched out and ſurpriſed the enemy, while half aſleep and lying ſcattered over the plain. Of the Hetrurians were ſixty thouſand men ſlain, or taken priſoners. Their camp was ſeized and plundered, thoſe, who had the good luck to eſcape, flying to the wood. Hiſtorians do not agree about the place where this important victory was gained, ſome contending that it was beyond mount Ciminus near Perufia. But be that as it will, this overthrow was ſo great, that the three leucumonies of Cortona, Arretium and Perufia immediately ſent deputies to Rome to deſire a ſuſpenſion of arms, which they obtained for thirty years.

The Hetrurians overcome by Fabius.

THE conſul Marcius was not attended with the ſame ſucceſs againſt the Samnites. For, though at firſt he gained ſome advantages over them, and took Allifæ, a conſiderable place on the Vulturnus, with ſeveral other caſtles and villages, he had the mortification to hear of the misfortune which befel the Roman fleet, the firſt Rome had ever put to ſea. It was commanded by P. Cornelius, who having made a deſcent at Pompeii beyond cape Palinurus, ſuffered his troops to penetrate too far into the country, and thereby gave the inhabitants time to aſſemble and cut off their retreat. The Romans were forced to relinquiſh their booty; ſeveral of them were ſlain, and thoſe who eſcaped were driven to their ſhips. This news, with a report ſpread among the Samnites, that Fabius had met with the Caudine Forks in the Cimini foreſt, revived their courage to ſuch a degree, that they gave Marcius battle, which is allowed by all hiſtorians to have been a very bloody one, and to have coſt both parties very dear. At Rome the Romans were thought to have loſt it. A great number of the Roman knights and ſeveral legionary tribunes were killed; one of the lieutenant-generals was left dead upon the ſpot, and the conſul himſelf was dangerouſly wounded. In order therefore to prevent the misfortunes which were thought imminent, the republic judged it neceſſary to chuſe a dictator, and caſt her eyes on Papirius Curſor, whoſe fate it was to be the refuge of his country in times of public danger. The difficulty was how to get him nominated. It was doubted whether the conſul Marcius was alive; and beſides, the Samnites had ſtopt up all the avenues to his camp. As for Fabius, it was much queſtioned whether he could be prevailed upon to raiſe his mortal enemy to the dictatorſhip, and whether Papirius would accept of that dignity from the hands of his old rival in glory. Under theſe difficulties the ſenate thought fit to paſs a decree, commanding Fabius to nominate Papirius to the dictatorſhip, and enjoining Papirius to accept it. This decree was ſent by the ſenate to Fabius's camp at Sutrium, with a deputation of their own body, conſiſting of ſuch perſons as had all been conſuls. When they read to him the decree of the ſenate, he was ſtruck with ſurpriſe and confuſion; but kept his temper, and retired to his tent without coming to any determination. At length his love for his country getting the better of his private reſentment, at midnight, according to the ſuperſtitious cuſtom, he declared Papirius dictator; who having appointed C. Junius Bubulcus to be his maſter of the horſe, without loſs of time marched away with an army, which had been ſuddenly raiſed upon the alarm of Fabius's danger in paſſing the Ciminian foreſt, and arrived at Longula on the frontiers of the Volſci, where Marcius delivered up to him the troops under his command. Papirius offered the enemy battle, but they declining it, both armies continued ſome days quiet in their camps watching each other.

Papirius Curſor dictator.

In the mean time, Fabius, who was continued in the command of the army in Hetruria with the title of proconſul, carried the war into Umbria, at that time in alliance with the Hetrurians, and gained a complete victory over the Umbrians, who no more appeared in the field. While Fabius was waging war in Umbria, the Hetrurians aſſembled the moſt numerous army they had ever raiſed, on the banks of a little lake called Vadimonius. All the ſoldiers, who

who compoſed it, had made a vow to conquer or die. At leaſt this is ſuppoſed to be the meaning of their ſacred law, by which they are ſaid to have bound themſelves. But, whatever we underſtand by it, it is certain, that the Hetrurians ſhewed by their obſtinacy in maintaining the fight, how much power their ſacred law had over their minds. What helped to promote unanimity and create emulation among their troops was, the leave which was given to every private man to chuſe himſelf a companion to fight by him. But Fabius was not afraid to engage an enemy who had even made it a point of religion not to give way. Both armies were ſo warmly bent on trying each other's ſtrength, that, as ſoon as they drew near, they ruſhed upon one another ſword in hand, without loſing time in throwing darts, as was uſual, by way of prelude to the battle. The ſucceſs was long doubtful, and this uncertainty encreaſed the ardor of both parties. The Romans could ſcarce believe, that they were contending with the ſame people they had ſo often conquered. On the ſide of the Romans, their firſt line was cut in pieces and ſecond repulſed; ſo that the proconſul was obliged to bring his triarii to the charge, which was never done, but in the utmoſt extremity. Nor was even this ſufficient; it became neceſſary for the Roman cavalry to diſmount and ſupport the foot. But when the Roman knights, who were quite freſh, paſſing over heaps of dead bodies, had placed themſelves in the front of the battle, they fell upon the enemy with ſuch fury, that the Hetrurians began at length to give way. Hereupon the legions, ſhattered and fatigued as they were, returned to the charge, overpowered the enemy, and obliged their whole army to fly in the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion. The Hetrurians loſt the flower of their youth in this action; their camp was taken and plundered, and their whole nation thrown into the utmoſt confuſion [g].

The Hetrurians overcome by Papirius.

THE dictator Papirius was no leſs ſucceſsful againſt the Samnites, whoſe general, to raiſe the courage of his men, had given them finer arms than uſual. He divided his army into two bodies, one of which he cloathed in ſtuff of various colours and furniſhed with gilt bucklers; the other was armed with ſilvered bucklers and clad in white habits. That this novelty might not ſurpriſe the Roman ſoldiers, their officers put them in mind, that true glory conſiſted in martial courage, that gold and ſilver were of no uſe in battle but but to enrich the conquerors, and that thoſe, who at the beginning of an engagement were the pooreſt, often proved the richeſt at the end of it. The officers having thus raiſed the courage of their men with the hopes of booty, Papirius drew up his army in the plain. He commanded the right wing himſelf, and his general of the horſe, Junius Bubulcus, the left, which faced the white battalions. Bubulcus, advancing with his legions, cried out, I devote all theſe white men to the black Pluto; and immediately falling upon them, forced them to give ground; which the dictator obſerving, cried out, What! will you, who have a dictator at your head, ſuffer the chief glory of the action to be gained by another? This ſaid, he preſſed his ſoldiers to advance, and encouraged them with his example. At the ſame time his two lieutenants, M. Valerius on the right and P. Decius on the left, who had both commanded armies in chief as conſuls, putting themſelves at the head of the cavalry, each on his own ſide, attacked with great fury the enemy in flank. Then the Samnites, ſeized with terror, broke their ranks and fled with all ſpeed to their camp. All the plain was covered with gilt and ſilvered arms, and dead bodies in white cloth and ſtuffs of various colours.

Papirius gains a complete victory over the Samnites.

The victory was ſo complete, that the Samnites abandoned their camp, which before night was taken and burnt. Papirius, having thus retrieved the glory of the Roman arms in Samnium, returned to Rome, where he was decreed a triumph, which was embelliſhed with the fine arms he had taken from the Samnites. About the ſame time Fabius arrived from Hetruria, and triumphed the ſame year as the dictator; the former on the ides of November, and the latter on the ides of October [h]. Papirius, after his triumph, retired for the reſt of his life from public buſineſs; whence we ſhall not ſee him appear on the ſtage any more. The circumſtances and time of his death are unknown; but all agree, that in him Rome loſt one of the greateſt generals ſhe ever had.

When Papirius's dictatorſhip was expired, Q. Fabius, the third time, and Decius Mus, the ſecond time, were raiſed to the conſulate. Samnium fell by lot to the former, and Hetruria to the latter. Fabius took Nuceria, which had ſome time ſince joined the Samnites; whom he defeated afterwards in a battle, but without gaining any great advantage over them. As for Decius, he was attended with with ſuch ſucceſs in Hetruria, that the whole nation deſired an alliance with Rome. But as the way was now open for making the conqueſt of this rich country, the conſul granted them only a truce for one year; and even that coſt them dear: for Decius made them pay his troops, and furniſh every ſoldier with two ſuits of cloaths. While all was quiet in Hetruria, the Umbrians, having armed all their youth, without concerning themſelves about the conſul who was in Hetruria, formed a deſign of marching directly to Rome. This put both the conſuls in motion. The prudent Decius, leaving Hetruria, by long marches came and encamped in a place called the Pupinian field, lying in the way between Umbria and Rome, and there quietly waited for the arrival of the enemy. But the bold and enterpriſing Fabius no ſooner received orders from the ſenate to cover Latium, than he left Samnium, croſſed Sabinia, and entering Umbria, encamped in the very heart of the country near a city called Mevania, on the banks of the Clitumnus. His ſudden and unexpected appearance among them ſo terrified them, that ſome retired into their ſtrong-holds, and others fled to the woods. However, a conſiderable body of the moſt reſolute had courage enough to offer the conſul battle, in which they behaved more like women than men. The Romans ruſhing upon them, beat them down with their bucklers, without making any uſe of their ſwords. They took the ſtandards from thoſe who guarded them, and carried the ſtandard-bearers to the conſul. They even ſurrounded whole bodies of troops, and made them priſoners without ſtriking a blow. For the words, Lay down your arms, were no ſooner heard in the ranks, but they all obeyed, and even delivered up to Fabius the authors of the war. So that little or no blood was ſpilt, but the whole army were made priſoners, and the reſt of the nation ſoon after ſubmitted to Rome. After this Fabius haſtened back to Samnium, to oppoſe the enterpriſes of that warlike people[i].

The Umbrians vanquiſhed.

WHEN the time came for the electing new conſuls, Appius Claudius, who had kept the cenſorſhip five years in direct defiance to the laws, ſtood candidate for the conſulate. He was no ſoldier, and it ſeemed very improper at that time to beſtow the faſces upon any but great commanders. However, Appius, being ſupported by the

the people, carried his point, and was promoted to the conſulate the firſt time with L. Volumnius Flamma. But, as he was not qualified for the command of the army, the ſenate obliged him to continue in the city, and left Fabius in quality of proconſul at the head of the army, which he had commanded the year before. Appius, upon what motives we know not, did all that lay in his power to prevent Fabius from having the ſole command of the army, and adviſed the ſenate to appoint him a collegue. But his propoſal was rejected; and Fabius continued without any aſſociate in the command of all the troops in Samnium, where he made the campaign with great ſucceſs. The Samnites had advanced as far as Allifæ on the banks of the Vulturnus, and there the proconſul attacked them and gained a complete victory. The conquered fled to their camp, which Fabius, as the day was already far ſpent, did not attack then, but kept it inveſted all night. Early next morning, while he was preparing to force it, the Samnites thought fit to capitulate and ſurrender upon articles; the chief of which was, that all the natives of Samnium ſhould have their lives ſpared and be ſent home; but that they ſhould march out of the camp with only one garment, and paſs under the yoke. As for the allies of the Samnites, the proconſul made no terms with them; ſo that they were all, to the number of ſeven thouſand, made ſlaves and ſold by auction. The Hernici were ſeparated from the reſt, and ſent to Rome to be examined, whether they had joined the Samnites as voluntiers, or by a public order of their nation. The conſcript fathers, after having examined them, kept them as ſlaves, and diſtributed them about in the villages and municipal towns near Rome [a].

Q. Fabius gains a complete victory over the Samnites.

While Fabius was thus employed againſt the Samnites, the conſul Volumnius made war on the Salentines in the [illegible]heſt part of Italy; with whom he fought ſome battle with ſucceſs, and paved the way for his ſucceſſors to make an entire conqueſt of that fruitful country. In the mean time, the conſular year being expired, the faſces were transferred to Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina, and at the ſame time Appius was created prætor, a poſt, which, as he was an able civilian and eloquent orator, well ſuited his talents. Marcius marched againſt the

the Hernici, who had taken up arms, provoked at the ſevere treatment which ſome of their countrymen, made priſoners in the late battle with the Samnites, had met with at Rome. The Hernici, formerly ſo formidable, were now, it ſeems, become a contemptible people. For Marcius in a few days took three different camps from them, and obliged them to ſurrender at diſcretion. The conſul, having ended this war, haſtened to join his collegue, who ſtood in great want of his aſſiſtance, having ſuffered himſelf to be inveſted by the Samnites in narrow paſſes, where all his convoys were intercepted. The enemy, hearing of his march, went to meet him, and gave him battle, while his troops were fatigued with long marches and in ſome diſorder. The battle began with the uſual fury of men under a neceſſity of conquering or dying; both the Samnites and Romans fighting with incredible reſolution. As the attack was made not far from the camp of Cornelius, by the ſhouts he heard and the clouds of duſt which were raiſed, he judged that his collegue was engaged with the enemy. Whereupon he immediately ordered his troops to arms, marched out of his intrenchments, and falling upon the enemy in flank, broke through them, and made his way to their camp, and ſet fire to it. At the ſight of the flames the Samnites were ſo diſcouraged, that they betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight, every man ſhifting for himſelf in the beſt manner he could. The Romans purſued them, cutting them in pieces, till they were tired with ſlaughter, and then returned to their camp. In this action the Samnites loſt thirty thouſand men. While the Roman generals were congratulating each other on their victory, news was brought that a new body of Samnites appeared near the field of battle. Theſe were new levies raiſed all over Samnium, and ſent to recruit the army. They no ſooner appeared, than the victorious legions forgetting the fatigues they had already undergone, aſſembled before they had received the conſuls orders, drew up in battalia, and falling upon the new-comers, diſperſed them with great ſlaughter. The Samnites, now quite diſheartened, ſent deputies to the conſuls to ſue for peace. The conſuls referred the ſuppliants to Rome, after having obliged the vanquiſhed to ſupply, by way of preliminary, the two armies with three months proviſions, to give them a year's pay, and furniſh each ſoldier with one habit [1].

The Hernici ſubdued.

[1] Liv. l. ix. c. 43.

THE two conſuls being in the field, when the time came for electing new magiſtrates, P. Cornelius, ſurnamed Barbatus, was appointed dictator to preſide in the comitia. He choſe Decius Mus for his general of the horſe, and the people Poſthumius Megillus and Tib. Minucius Augurinus for their next year's conſuls. At the ſame time the ſenate determined the fate of the Hernici. The cities of Alatrium, Ferentinum, and Verulum, which had continued faithful to the Romans, were allowed to chuſe, whether they would be governed by their own laws, or have the right of Roman citizens; and they preferred the former. The inhabitants of the other cities were obliged to be governed by the laws of Rome, and declared Roman citizens, but without the right of ſuffrage. They were forbid to hold any aſſemblies, or t[illegible]ry out of their own cities. This law the Romans uſed to impoſe on conquered nations to prevent a too ſtrict union among them. At this time deputies arrived from Carthage with a compliment and preſents, which the republic accepted, and made others in return. The new conſuls were both ordered into Samnium, each at the head of a conſular army, that is, of an army conſiſting of two legions. The Samnites, notwithſtanding their loſſes, had entered Campania and laid waſte the fruitful country of Falernum. Marcius therefore encamped in the neighbourhood of Bovianum, and Poſthumius took his rout towards Tifernum. The latter came to an engagement with the Samnites, the ſucceſs of which being equal, Poſthumius pretended to be worſted, and, in order to deceive the enemy, decamped in the night-time and retired to the mountains. The Samnites followed him, and poſted themſelves within two miles of his camp. Hereupon Poſthumius, having finiſhed his intrenchments with the utmoſt diſpatch, and left a ſufficient number of troops to defend them, marched out at midnight with the reſt of his army, and joined his collegue Minucius, who lay in ſight of another body of Samnites. Minucius, being thus reinforced, marched with his two legions alone into the plain, and offered the enemy battle; which they accepted, not knowing that the other conſul was arrived. The victory was diſputed wish great warmth on both ſides. But when the Samnites were much fatigued, Poſthumius and his troops falling upon them with freſh vigour, they could no longer hold out, but were forced to ſave themſelves by flight. The Romans made a dreadful ſlaughter of them, and took one and twenty enſigns. After this victory the conſuls without delay led their victorious troops to Poſthumius's camp, and from thence ſallied out upon the body of Samnites, which was poſted there. This battle was more bloody than the former; the conſul Minucius was killed in it, and Statius Gellius, the Samnite general, made priſoner. At length the Romans carried the day, and took twenty-ſix enſigns from the enemy. Upon the news of Minucius's death the people at Rome immediately appointed Fulvius Curvus to ſucceed him, who took Bovianum and other cities, for which he triumphed on his return to Rome. Why Poſthumius, who ſeems to have deſerved the ſame honour, did not triumph with him, we know not. The Faſti Capitolini do not allow him this honour, though Livy does; as that author makes him triumph with Minucius, who was killed in the battle, we choſe to follow the Faſti [m]. In the ſucceeding conſulate of Sempronius Sophus and P. Sulpicius Saverrio, the Samnites, quite exhauſted with the war, ſent deputies to Rome to deſire a renewal of their antient confederacy with the republic. The ſenate granted them their requeſt, after they had given certain proofs of their ſincerity, by receiving every-where the conſular army under the command of Sempronius with marks of reſpect, and ſupplied the troops with all ſorts of proviſions. The conſuls, being now diſengaged from the Samnitic war, marched againſt the Æqui, who, ſeduced by the bad example of the Hernici, had declared againſt Rome and joined the Samnites. They were no more that formidable nation, which had often ſtruck terror into the Roman legions; long inaction had enervated them, ſo that they had not courage enough to keep the field, but ſheltered themſelves behind the walls of their cities, which the two conſular armies inveſted, over-running their country, and laying it every-where waſte. The conquerors made themſelves maſters of forty-one towns in fifty days, moſt of which they razed or burnt, and thereby almoſt exterminated the whole nation of the Æqui. Theſe rapid conqueſts ſpread ſuch terror among the neighbouring nations, that the Marſi, Peligni, Frentani, and Marrucini, ſent to demand an alliance with Rome, which they eaſily obtained. By this memorable expedition the conſuls merited, and obtained, the honours of a triumph.

Minucius the conſul killed.

[m] Liv. l. ix. c. 45.

THE renowned Q. Fabius, being this year cenſor with P. Dec[illegible] Mus, reformed an abuſe introduced by Appius, who h[illegible] diſperſed great numbers of freedmen and the meaneſt of the people among the country-tribes, and by that means had got a great influence in all elections, thoſe men being entirely devoted to him. Fabius re-incorporated into the four city tribes the rabble Appius had taken from thence, ſo that for the future they could influence no more than four tribes, and in theſe their party was not the ſtrongeſt. This reformation was ſo agreeable to the republic, that the Romans gave Fabius for this ſingle act the ſurname of Maximus, a title which he had not acquired by ſubduing the Hetrurians, the Samnites, and the Umbrians. This ſurname was ever after pre rved in his branch of the Fabian family. The next year [illegible]n Cornelius Lentulus and L. Genucius were con[illegible] w[illegible]pent chiefly in ſending colonies to the conq[illegible]cities. In the ſucceeding conſulate of Livius Denter and Æmilius Paulus, the art of painting was introduced at Rome by C. Fabius afterwards conſul, who painted the walls of a new temple dedicated to the goddeſs of Health, and thence got the ſurname of Pictor, or, The Painter. The following year the republic had no conſuls, but was governed by two dictators ſucceſſively created, Q. Fabius and Valerius Corvus. The former marched an army againſt the Marſi, who had revolted, and by one ſingle victory brought them back to their duty. The latter was created dictator to conduct a war againſt the Hetrurians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, though ſtuſhed with the advantage which they had gained a few days before over Sempronius Sophus his general of the horſe, who had fallen into an ambuſh, and loſt a great number of men and ſome ſtandards. The Hetrurians, humbled by this overthrow, ſued for peace, but could obtain only a truce for two years. Valerius on his return entered Rome in triumph the fourth time, on the tenth of the calends of December.

Q. Fabius, being cenſor, acquires the ſurname of Maximus.

The Marſi reduced, and the Hetrurians defeated.

AT the next election Valerius Corvus was promoted a fifth time to the conſulate, and Q. Apulius Panſa appointed to be his collegue. During their adminiſtration, all being quiet abroad, two tribunes of the people of the ſame family, and probably brothers, endeavoured to ſtir up the people againſt the nobility. The one was named Quintus Ogulnius, and the other Cneius Ogulnius. Theſe two complained, that all the pontifices and augurs were created out of the patricians, and urged, that the plebeians might alſo partake partake of thoſe offices. The nobility were highly offended with this propoſal, which tended to deprive them of the only diſtinction between them and the plebeians; but made no great oppoſition to this new incroachment, knowing that their attempts to exclude them from theſe dignities would prove fruitleſs, the people having carried their point in all their ſtruggles with the nobility. However the famous Appius Claudius, though wholly devoted to the plebeian party, became on this occaſion, no doubt out of pure caprice, a moſt zealous defender of the nobility. He had debaſed the ſenate by introducing the ſons of freedmen into it, and profaned the prieſthood by lodging it in the hands of the public ſlaves. But now he exerted all his eloquence in favour of the nobility. On the other hand, P. Decius Mus, a plebeian of great diſtinction, who had been twice conſul, once dictator, and once cenſor, ſpoke in behalf of the people, with all the weight of dignity, which his employments, his credit, and the reputation of his virtue gave him. The debate was in the aſſembly of the curiæ; but the tribes being afterwards ſummoned, the affair was almoſt unanimouſly determined by them in favour of the plebeians, and a decree paſſed for chuſing four new pontifices and five new augurs out of the plebeians; ſo that the college of the pontifices was now made to conſiſt of eight perſons, and that of the augurs of nine; which regulation continued to the dictatorſhip of Sylla, who encreaſed the number both of the pontifices and augurs to fifteen. Decius Mus was choſen one of the new pontifices [a].

Plebeians admitted to the pontificate and augurate.

The Ogulnian law was the work of the tribunes: but the conſul Valerius undertook to revive another law, which had been made by Valerius Poplicola, and had afterwards been revived by another of his anceſtors. By this law it was enacted, that in capital cauſes the accuſed ſhould have a right of appealing to the tribunal of the people. The patricians had by their intereſt rendered this law ineffectual, and often prevented the execution of it; ſo that it was become obſolete. Valerius therefore now reſtored it once more, and drew it up in more diſtinct terms than before. But the only puniſhment denounced againſt the tranſgreſſors of it was, that they ſhould be deemed guilty of a diſhoneſt action. A ſlight puniſhment indeed for a more corrupt age, but ſufficient at this time to reſtrain the Romans, who piqued themſelves on their virtue, and were never choſen for great employments, unleſs they had preſerved their reputation pure and untainted.

THE conſuls choſen for the new year were M. Fulvius Pætinus and T. Manlius Torquatus. The former marched into Umbria to carry on the ſiege of Nequinium, which Apuleius, one of the former conſuls, had begun. This city was, with regard to its ſituation, one of the ſtrongeſt in Italy. It was built upon the edge of a ſteep rock, and ſurrounded in great part by the river Nar. But the treachery of two Nequinians facilitated the taking of a place, which was deemed impregnable. Theſe traitors from their houſes, which were near the ramparts, dug by dint of hand-labour a paſſage under-ground, quite to the advanced-guard of the Romans, on the ſide of the [illegible] where there were no rocks. The conſul before whom they appeared quite unexpected, after having examined them, detained one of them as an hoſtage, and ſent the other back to the city through the ſubterraneous paſſage with two Roman ſoldiers. Theſe upon their return made ſuch a report as encreaſed the confidence of the conſul, who ordered three hundred choſen men to follow them, and inlarge the way underground; which they did accordingly, and, having entered the city in the night, ſeized [illegible]e of the gates, and let in the reſt of the army. The [illegible]ſul having by this means made himſelf maſter of the city without ſtriking a blow.

for the Nequinians immediately threw down their arms, obliged the inhabitants to receive a Roman colony, which might keep the reſt of Umbria in awe. This was the only puniſhment he inflicted upon them. The colony changed the infamous name of Nequinium, derived from Nequitia roguery, into that of Narnia from the river Nar. For this exploit Fulvius was rewarded with a triumph which he obtained on the ſeventh of the calends of October [o]. In the ſame conſulate the Hetrurians broke their truce with Rome; but, while they were preparing to enter the Roman territories, they were obliged by an irruption of the Gauls to ſuſpend the execution of their deſign. However, their animoſity againſt the republic was ſo great, that they choſe rather to gain over theſe new enemies by money than to repel them by force. Accordingly, they paid them large ſums, on condition that they ſhould not only forbear pillaging Hetruria, but join them againſt Rome. The Gaul

Gauls accepted the offers made them, took the money, and left Hetruria in tranquillity. But when they were to march towards Rome, they excuſed themſelves, unleſs the Hetrurians would ſecure them a retreat in their country, by aſſigning them lands to ſettle on. This the Hetrurians abſolutely refuſed. The Romans, being informed of theſe negotiations between the Hetrurians and Gauls, ordered the conſul Manlius to march into Hetruria, and puniſh the inhabitants for their breach of faith. But Manlius being killed by a fall from his horſe, the centuries met to appoint him a ſucceſſor; and all to a man, which had never happened ſince the foundation of Rome, gave their ſuffrages in favour of Valerius Corvus, who was now the ſixth time raiſed to the conſulate. The Hetrurians no ſooner underſtood that the formidable Valerius was marching againſt them, then they quitted the field, aud retired within the walls of their cities. The brave conſul over-ran the whole country, committing every-where great devaſtations, in order to draw the enemy into the field. But they, more concerned about preſerving their lives than their eſtates, kept cloſe within their ſtrong-holds. This was a kind of victory, which brought great glory to Valerius, and was the laſt of his exploits. On his return to Rome, as he was now in a very advanced age, he retired to enjoy the tranquillity of a private life, after ſo many labours and ſo plentiful a harveſt of glory. In what year he ended his days is not known; but it is certain, that he lived above an hundred years. He was a true pattern of the zeal men in public ſtations owe their country. He was twenty-one times promoted to offices, that intitled him to ſit in the curule chair, which can be ſaid of no Roman but himſelf. When the republic ſeemed to forget him, he took advantage of thoſe intervals of reſt to improve his paternal eſtate and manure his lands. He was great in peace, and greater in war, and may be ſaid to have appeared eminent among thoſe heroes, whom Rome produced in her moſt glorious and virtuous age [P].

Valerius Corvus overruns Hetruria.

TOWARDS the cloſe of this year, the republic, whether by the death of Valerius or ſome other accident is unknown, fell into an inter-regnum. When the comitia were aſſembled to elect new magiſtrates, Appius took it into his head to prevent any plebeian from being choſen to the conſulate. But Curius Dentatus, one of the tribunes, withſtood the eloquence and authority of Appius, and obliged the ſenate to confirm the cuſtom of chuſing one of the conſuls out of the plebeians; ſo that L. Cornelius Scipio and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, a plebeian, were raiſed to that dignity. During their adminiſtration, the republic was engaged in a war with the two moſt formidable nations in her neighbourhood, the Hetrurians, who had broken the truce, and the Samnites, who, notwithſtanding their treaty of alliance, had openly declared war. Scipio marched againſt the Hetrurians, who met and engaged him in the plains of Volaterræ. The battle laſted all day, and when night put an end to it, the victory was ſtill doubtful. But an unaccountable terror ſeizing the enemy, they retired in the night-time in ſmall companies to their reſpective leucumonies. Hereupon the conſul plundered and laid waſte the whole country. This is the account Livy gives of the campaign in Hetruria. But a more authentic monument than Livy's hiſtory aſcribes the defeat of the Hetrurians to Fulvius the plebeian conſul; and adds, that having finiſhed his expedition againſt the Hetrurians, he haſtened into Samnium, and there obtained a complete victory over thoſe antient en[redacted]f his republic, while his colleague Scipio continued in[redacted]at Rome. On his return a triumph was decreed him [redacted]ving conquered the Samnites and Hetrurians. He triumphed on the ides of November [q]. A report being ſpread, before the comitia aſſembled for electing new conſuls, that both the Hetrurians and Samnites were making mighty preparations to repair their loſſes, the firſt care of the Romans was to chuſe conſuls of valour and experience, to diſappoint the deſigns of the two nations, more enraged againſt Rome than ever. The centuries immediately caſt their eyes upon Fabius; but he, from what motive is hard to gueſs, declined the honour, and would not accept of it, till he was in a manner forced by the people and their tribunes. He then deſired, that they would oblige him ſo far, as to give him a collegue to his own mind, and propoſed to them Decius Mus, who was at his requeſt unanimouſly choſen. While the two new conſuls were preparing to take the field, the Hetrurians came to a reſolution to aſk a peace. Hereupon the conſuls marched both into Samnium, Fabius by the territory of Sora, and Decius through the country of the Sadicini.

cini. Fabius was informed on his march, that the Samnites lay in an ambuſh on the banks of the Tifernus, and there waited for his coming into a deep valley, with a deſign to attack him from the hills. This advice did not make the brave Fabius change his rout: he choſe to ſurpriſe and attack the enemy in their ambuſcade. Accordingly, having lodged his baggage in a ſafe place, he marched with his troops in battle-array towards the enemy, who, finding their projects diſcovered, left their ambuſh and drew up in the plain. Their firſt onſet was terrible: they had aſſembled all the forces of their country, and, looking upon this battle as the deciſive ſtroke, exerted their utmoſt efforts. The brave reſiſtance of the enemy gave Fabius no ſmall uneaſineſs. He therefore commanded the cavalry to ruſh full ſpeed on their battalions. But this proved ineffectual, the Samnite infantry ſtill keeping their poſts without loſing an inch of ground. Fabius, finding he could not by force break thoſe impenetrable battalions, had recourſe to ſtratagem, and ordered Scipio, one of his lieutenants, to march with the haſtati ſilently round the top of a neighbouring hill, and from thence to fall on the enemy's rear. The conſul's orders were executed with ſuch addreſs, that neither the Samnites nor Romans perceived this motion. In the mean time, the former, proud of having repulſed the Roman cavalry, took new courage, and obliged the firſt line of the conſular army to give way, and retire through the ſpaces of the ſecond line. Then the principes, who formed that line, engaged in their turn, and, as they were quite freſh, put a ſtop to the impetuoſity of the Samnites for ſome time. But they likewiſe were obliged in the end to give way. When the Samnites thought themſelves ſecure of the victory, they diſcovered at a diſtance the enſigns of a body of troops, which advanced in good order to the field of battle. This was the detachment commanded by Scipio, coming down the hill to attack the enemy's rear. The conſul, in ſeeing it, cried out, What unexpected good Fortune! I ſee my collegue Decius haſtening to our aſſiſtance. The general's words paſſing from legion to legion, were ſoon carried through the whole army, and heard by the enemy's battalions. The Romans took freſh courage; but the Samnites, already tired with fighting and afraid to engage another conſular army, were ſo diſcouraged, that, without waiting for their general's orders, they diſperſed and fled in confuſion, leaving only three thouſand four hundred men dead upon the plain, plain, a very inconſiderable loſs. The Romans took twenty-three ſtandards. On the other hand, Decius gained a conſiderable victory over the Apulians, as they were marching to join the Samnites. After this the two conſular armies entering Samnium, laid the whole country waſte. Decius changed his camp forty-five times, and Fabius his eighty-ſix. By this means the fields were every-where laid waſte, and the country, which had been in a flouriſhing condition during a pretty long interval of peace, utterly ruined. Fabius took alſo the city of Cimetra and razed it. Two thouſand four hundred priſoners were taken in theſe expeditions, and all the inhabitants, who were found with arms, put to the ſword.

THE campaign being ended, Fabius was recalled to preſide in the comitia for the election new conſuls. Upon his arrival he found, that Appius had once more formed a ſcheme to exclude the plebeians, and confine the conſulate to the patricians. In order to this, having ſecured his own election beyond a poſſibility of failing, he engaged the centuries to continue Fabius in his office for the enſuing year. As the Romans, eſpecially the patricians, had a great eſteem and veneration for that able commander, the firſt centuries, conſiſting chiefly of the nobility, unanimouſly voted in his favour. [redacted] Fabius himſelf oppoſed his election, proteſting, that he would never give the republic ſo pernicious a precedent, as to ſuffer himſelf to be elected in the comitia where he preſided. The whole body of the patricians ſurrounded his tribunal, conjuring him to reſtore the conſulate to its antient luſtre. But Fabius could not by any means be prevailed upon to fall into Appius's ſcheme; ſo that Volumnius Flamma, a plebeian, was joined with Appius in the conſulate. However, Fabius and his collegue Decius were continued, with the title of proconſuls, in the command of the armies in Samnium for ſix months longer; which Fabius ſpent in keeping in awe the Lucanians, who had revolted, and preventing them from joining the Samnites. As for Decius, after having laid waſte all Samnium, he purſued the ſmall army that unhappy people had ſtill on foot from place to place, in order to draw them to a battle, and ſo harraſſed them, that they were at length obliged to diſband and retire into the neighbouring countries. Then Decius, having no enemy in the field to contend with, laid ſiege to their cities, and made himſelf maſter of Murgantia, Romulea, and Ferentinum, three important cities; in the firſt he made two thouſand thouſand one hundred and ten priſoners; in the ſecond he put two thouſand three hundred of the inhabitants to the ſword and took ſix thouſand; in the third about three thouſand men, who defended the place, and made a deſperate reſiſtance, were killed upon the ramparts. Thus Samnium was reduced to the laſt extremity; and, to complete the deſtruction of this unhappy country, the new conſul Volumnius entered it with another army of two legions and fifteen hundred auxiliaries [r].

THE Samnites, being thus driven out of their own country, took refuge in Hetruria; where, in a diet held at their requeſt, they prevailed upon the ſeveral leucomonies to join in a war againſt Rome, and offered to ſerve under them at their own expence. The Hetrurians, looking upon this reinforcement as ſent them from heaven, raiſed a formidable army, and even engaged with ſums of money ſome troops of Gauls to join them. The ſenate being informed of theſe motions, diſpatched Appius, to whom Hetruria had fallen by lot, to make head againſt ſo poweful an enemy, with an army conſiſting of two legions and twelve thouſand auxiliaries. Appius came and poſted himſelf within reach of the enemy. But, as he neither knew how to time a battle nor to chuſe his ground, he was worſted in every ſkirmiſh and ſlight action, in which he ventured to engage. Theſe ſmall advantages encreaſed the enemy's confidence, and gave them certain hopes of victory in a general action. In ſhort, things were come to that paſs, that the ſoldiers diſtruſted their general, and the general his ſoldiers. In this extremity, Appius is ſaid [s], for the fact is not abſolutely certain, to have written to his collegue, begging him to leave Samnium, and haſten to his aſſiſtance. Volumnius, upon the receipt of the letter, immediately came and joined him, to the inexpreſſible joy of the troops of Appius. But Appius himſelf, pretending to be ſurprized, aſked his collegue ſternly, what had brought him from Samnium, diſowned his letter, and told him, that he had acted a diſhonourable part in quitting his own province, in order to gain credit by giving aſſiſtance to others, who did not want it. Hereupon Volumnius was for returning immediately into Samnium; but the officers of both armies prevailed upon him to ſtay in Hetruria, where the common cauſe called for his aſſiſtance, and to deſpiſe the reproaches and unaccountable behaviour of Appius. At the requeſt of

of the officers the two conſuls afterwards had an interview, in that part of the camp where the generals uſed to harangue their ſoldiers, and there in the preſence of the army made their complaints of each other. Volumnius, though naturally no orator, ſpoke on this occaſion with great eloquence; for he had the better cauſe. Upon which Appius, who had had Volumnius for his collegue in the conſulſhip ten years before, could not forbear rallying him: Wonderful indeed! ſaid he, I have made a dumb man ſpeak, Volumnius in our firſt conſulate ſcarce opened his mouth for ſome months. He had then no tongue; but now is become eloquent, a perfect maſter of oratory. What a miraculous change have I wrought in him! Since you have taught me to ſpeak, replied Volumnius, I wiſh I could in return for your kindneſs, teach you to fight. In our preſent ſituation it is of ſmall importance to be able to talk well. If you have a mind to know which of us underſtands beſt the conduct of an army, we have wars to carry on in two places, Samnium and Hetruria; make your choice; it is indifferent to me in which province I command. At theſe words the ſoldiers cried out with one voice, that both conſuls ſhould carry on the war in Hetruria. Volumnius anſwered, that he was willing to ſtay, but deſired the troops to ſignify to him their inclinations by a general ſhout. Inſtantly the army made ſuch loud acclamations, as were heard in the enemy's camp, who, taking the alarm, drew up in order of battle. Volumnius immediately marched out with his troops to engage them. But Appius was for ſome time in ſuſpence, whether he ſhould join in the battle or not; and nothing determined him but the fear of being deſerted by his troops, who ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to follow Volumnius, in defiance of their general's orders. It fell to Volumnius to engage the Hetrurians, and to his collegue to oppoſe the Samnites, who, full of rage, advanced againſt him. Emulation for glory and the ſhame of being obſcured by a rival rouzed Appius to ſuch a degree, that he behaved himſelf with more courage than could have been expected. He gave his orders like a good commander, fought with intrepidity, inſpired his men with ardor, and in ſhort equalled his collegue both in bravery and conduct. The united Samnites and Hetrurians, not being able to withſtand two conſular armies, were entirely defeated, and their camp taken and plundered. The enemy left ſeven thouſand three hundred men dead upon the field of battle, and two thouſand of them were made priſoners. it muſt be owned, that

Appius and Volumnius defeat the united Hetrurians and Samnites.

Appius

Appius bore a good ſhare in this glorious action, and that if he inſpired Volumnius with eloquence, Volumnius inſpired him with courage. After this victory, which put an end to the miſunderſtanding between the two conſuls, Volumnius was obliged to return into his own province and oppoſe the Samnites, who, notwithſtanding their late loſſes, had raiſed a new army and were actually ravaging Campania. Volumnius ſurpriſed them near the Vulturnus, ſlew ſix thouſand of them, and recovered all the ſpoil they had taken [1].

THE republic, being alarmed by accounts from Appius of the vaſt preparations for war, which the Hetrurians and their allies, the Umbrians, Gauls, and Samnites, were making, turned their eyes again upon Fabius, and in the comitia, which were held ſoon after, raiſed him the fifth time to the conſulate. The collegue they deſigned to give him was Volumnius who preſided in the comitia; but Fabius refuſing to accept the office, unleſs he had again Decius for his collegue, Volumnius, though the firſt tribes had already voted for him, approved of Fabius's requeſt; and making a fine elogium upon Decius, exhorted the tribes to chuſe him; which they did accordingly, beſtowing that honour upon him a fourth time. Appius, who was then in Hetruria, was appointed p or; and Volumnius continued in the command of the army in Samnium, with the title of proconſul. It was cuſtomary for the new conſuls to draw lots for their reſpective provinces; but it was natural to ſuppoſe, that Decius would compliment Fabius with the command in Hetruria, where the ſtreſs of the war lay, induced thereunto by gratitude, as well as by the age and ſuperior merit of his collegue: and this he was very willing to do; but the patricians making it a point of honour not to permit any other than Fabius to have the conduct of the Hetrurian war, the plebeians would not ſuffer him to have it, unleſs it fell to him by lot, fearing leſt the patrician conſul ſhould, for the future, claim a right of chuſing his province. How difficult is it for a man to avoid being carried away by the ſtream of a party in which he once engages! The pacific Decius was compelled, contrary to his temper and inclination, to go with the current of his party, and inſiſt on its being determined by lot, whether he or Fabius ſhould command in Hetruria. The affair was firſt brought before the ſenate, where it was determined in favour favour of Fabius. Hereupon Decius appealed to the people; and the comitia being aſſembled, the two competitors pleaded each his own cauſe, more like ſoldiers than orators. When they had both done ſpeaking, the people began to vote, when Fabius riſing up again, deſired them in a few words, to hear Appius's letters read, before they decided on the preſent diſpute. Appius, in the letters he had lately written from Hetruria, had painted the danger with which the republic was threatened in very lively colours, and given a very particular account of the four armies which were to fall upon Rome. The bare relation of the danger determined the people to have recourſe to the ſureſt remedy; and Fabius was inſtantly appointed to command the army in Hetruria. And now all the Roman youth were eager to ſerve under ſo great a commander; but he would carry with him no larger a reinforcement than four thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe. At the head of this ſmall body he marched towards the camp, which the fearful Appius was ſtill ſtrengthening with new fortifications. As he drew near it, he met a detachment ſent to cut wood in a neighbouring foreſt. Whither are you going, fellow-ſoldiers? ſaid Fabius. The ſoldiers anſwered, To cut wood to fortify our camp. What! replied the general, is it not already fortified? We are already ſurrounded, returned the ſoldiers, with a double ditch and a double rampart, and yet we are ſtill afraid. Since that is the caſe ſaid Fabius, return to the camp and level the firſt rampart. The detachment immediately returned, and put their new general's orders in execution; which greatly alarmed Appius: but Fabius arrived the ſame day, to the inexpreſſible joy of the army, every one hoping affairs would take a better turn under ſo able a general. The next day Appius ſet out for Rome, to take upon him the prætorſhip, which had been aſſigned him, and better ſuited his talents than the conduct of an army. Fabius, inſtead of ſhutting up his ſoldiers within lines, which, he ſaid, betrayed fear, kept them in conſtant motion, by frequent marches and counter-marches; but, before he entered upon action, he returned to Rome, for what reaſon is uncertain. Upon his arrival, the ſenate, alarmed at the dreadful repreſentation, which Appius had made of the enemy's forces, judged it neceſſary to ſtrengthen him by a ſecond army. Fabius, when this was firſt propoſed to him, told the conſcript fathers, that he ſhould acquieſce in what they thought proper, on account of the fears of others, not his own; but deſired, that, if another general general was to be joined with him, Decius might be the perſon, ſhewing thereby, that his late conteſt with him had not leſſened the eſteem he had for ſo great a man. The ſenate and people readily granted him his requeſt; and then the two conſuls, before they left Rome, made the following regulations: they ſent the proconſul Volumnius with two legions into Samnium, and, in order to cover the city on the ſide of Hetruria, directed two camps to be pitched, one near Rome on the hill Vaticanus, and the other on the banks of the Tiber in the country of the Faliſci. After theſe regulations, the two conſuls ſet out for the camp in Hetruria. Upon the road they were informed, that a legion, which Fabius had left under the command of Scipio, had been entirely cut off by the Gauls called Senones. However, the two generals, without being diſcouraged by this accident, continued their march; and as their army conſiſted of four legions, a good number of Roman knights, a thouſand Campanian horſe, and a body of auxiliaries, more numerous than all the Roman forces, they divided it into two parts, and encamped ſeparately, but within reach of each other, in the plain of Sentinum, about four miles from the enemy. We are told, that the forces of the Gauls and Samnites, who encamped together, amounted to one hundred and forty-three thouſand three hundred and thirty foot and forty-ſix thouſand horſe. What the number was of Hetrurians and Umbrians, who jointly made another camp, we find no-where recorded. As theſe confederates were ſeparated in their camps, they agreed, that the Gauls and Samnites ſhould engage the Romans, while the Hetrurians and Umbrians attacked their two camps in the heat of the action. Fabius, being informed of this deſign by deſerters, immediately ſent orders to the two proprætors, Fulvius and Poſthumius, who commanded in the camps that covered Rome, to enter Hetruria without delay and lay it waſte. Hereupon the Hetrurians and Umbrians haſtened to the relief of the unfortunate people, whoſe houſes were burnt and land ravaged. Fabius, having thus obliged the enemy to divide their forces, took advantage of the diverſion he had made, and, in the abſence of the Hetrurians and Umbrians, brought the Gauls and Samnites to a battle. Fabius commanded the right wing, which faced the Samnites, and Decius the left, which engaged the Gauls. Both parties ſuſtained the firſt onſet with equal bravery, and the reſiſtance of the enemy made the Romans

ſenſible, that they could never have withſtood the four armies, had they all engaged at once. The advantage firſt appeared in favour of the Gauls, who ſurprized the Romans, ſoon after the action began, with a new way of fighting, never heretofore uſed in the wars of Italy. They drove full ſpeed armed chariots againſt the Roman cavalry, which, with the noiſe of the wheels and the novelty of the fight, frightened the horſes and put them into diſorder. They fell afterwards on the firſt line of the infantry and broke into the ranks, carrying every-where terror and confuſion. The conſul Decius, having in vain endeavoured to rally his terrified ſoldiers, reſolved to follow the example of his father, and in the ſame manner devote himſelf to the dii manes. Purſuant to this reſolution, he commanded the pontifex M. Livius to pronounce the words uſed in devotements; and, having repeated them after him, rode full ſpeed into the thickeſt of the enemy's battalions, where he was killed, after having received numberleſs wounds. How great is the power of credulity and ſuperſtition! The Romans, after the death of their general, looking upon the enemy as devoted to deſtruction, took new courage and returned to the charge, as it were to put the decrees of the gods in execution. The pontifex Livius, who was himſelf an able commander, taking advantage of their prejudi[illegible] put himſelf at their head, crying out, We have c[illegible]red: the death of Decius has ſecured to us the victo[illegible] the Samnites and the Gauls are devoted to the manes, [illegible] muſt inevitably periſh. Having thus ſpoke, he renewed the battle with great fury, and being ſeconded by ſome troops ſent by Fabius from the rear, under the command of L. Cornelius and C. Marcius, he ſoon changed the fortune of the day in favour of the Romans in the left wing.

Decius devotes himſelf.

In the right wing Fabius had attacked the Samnites but faintly, or rather kept himſelf upon the defenſive, till the enemy had quite ſpent their ſtrength and were exhauſted; and then becoming in his turn the aggreſſor, he ordered his cavalry to wheel about and flank the wings of the enemy, while he, at the head of the legions attacked them in front. All the troops being thus put in motion at once, the ſhock was ſo violent, that the Samnites not being able to ſtand it, fled in diſorder to their camp, leaving the Gauls to ſhift for themſelves. Theſe brave men, not diſheartened at the rout of their allies, ſtill kept their ground, and covering their heads with with their bucklers, formed a tortoiſe. Fabius therefore, to break theſe impenetrable troops, detached a body of five hundred Campanian horſe to fall upon their rear, ordering the principes to follow the detachment, and penetrate into their battalions, when once broken. This motion ſucceeded ſo well, that the Gauls were at length obliged to retire, which they ſeem to have done in good order; for Livy does not tell us, that they were put into confuſion, but only that they gave way, and left the Romans maſters of the field. Fabius did not purſue them; but led his forces againſt the camp of the Samnites, where he made a dreadful ſlaughter. Twenty-five thouſand of the Samnites and Gauls were killed in this action, and eight thouſand taken priſoners. Among the former was Gellius Egnatius, an eminent commander of the Samnites, who had negotiated the alliance of the four nations. On the ſide of the Romans, the number of the dead in the left wing amounted to ſeven thouſand; but in the right, where Fabius commanded, only twelve hundred were killed. As for the two proprætors, Fulvius and Poſthumius, they gained no ſmall advantages over the Hetrurians and Umbrians; and the ſame year the proconſul Volumnius defeated the Samnites in a pitched battle at the foot of mount Tifernus. After all theſe ſucceſſes, Fabius returned to Rome, and triumphed the day before the nones of September. He had ſcarce left the country, when the Hetrurians raiſed a new army, which obliged him to lead his troops thither again. Upon his arrival, he attacked the Hetrurians, killed four thouſand five hundred of them on the ſpot, took one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty priſoners, and ſtruck the reſt with ſuch terror, that they made no further attempts that year. This was the laſt exploit of a hero, who did not leave off conquering, till age diſabled him from ſerving his country. He had a ſon, ſurnamed Gurges, that is, the gulph, on account of his exceſſive intemperance in his youth. After he had ſquandered away immenſe ſums in debauchery, he corrected his way of living, and became a zealous reformer of manners, in order to wipe off the ſhame of his paſt exceſſes. In his ædileſhip, he accuſed before the people a great many patrician women of adultery, and having convicted them, perpetuated the ſhame of the criminals, by building with the money accruing from their fines a temple to Venus, as a laſting monument of their infamy [u].

In the mean time, the Samnites, notwithſtanding their loſſes, brought two new armies into the field. With one they encamped on the banks of the Vulturnus; with the other they entered Campania and pillaged the territories of Veſcia and Formiæ. Hereupon Appius the prætor was ordered into Samnium, at the head of the army which Decius had commanded. The proconſul Volumnius, who was already on the ſpot, joined his forces to thoſe of Appius; and both theſe generals, by purſuing the Samnites from place to place, obliged them to unite their two armies in the Campi Stellates, between the Vulturnus and the Savo. There the Samnites reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle; and, as they looked upon it as a deciſive ſtroke, they behaved with extraordinary courage ond reſolution: but the Romans at length prevailed, after having loſt two thouſand ſeven hundred men. Of the Samnites there fell in the battle and purſuit ſixteen thouſand three hundred.

The Samnites again defeated.

Rome had now made war with the Samnites for forty years, almoſt without interruption, and always with ſucceſs. The laſt campaign ſeemed enough of itſelf to extinguiſh their martial ardor. They had loſt four battles in one year; the braveſt of their generals had been killed; all the flower of their youth cut off; the Hetrurians, Umbrians, and Gauls, wh m they had drawn into a confederacy, were not now in a condition to lend them any aſſiſtance. However, they were not ſo far diſcouraged, as to loſe all hopes of being able one day to conquer. They made great preparations to take the field once more. The ſenate being alarmed ordered the two new conſuls, L. Poſthumius Megillus, who was raiſed to that dignity a ſecond time, and M. Attilius Regulus, to carry the war jointly into Samnium; but Poſthumius falling ſick; the whole management of affairs was committed to Attilius, who, haſtening into Samnium, met the Samnites on the confines of Campania. The conſul was no ſooner encamped, than the enemy, tho' ſo often vanquiſhed, undertook to execute what the Romans themſelves would ſcarce have attempted; they formed a deſign of forcing the conſul's lines, and marching out of their camp undiſcovered, by means of a thick fog, ſurpriſed the advanced guards, made themſelves maſters of the Decuman gate, and penetrated to the quæſtor's tent, where the military cheſt was kept. In the mean time the alarm ſpreading to the general's quarters, he put himſelf at the head of ſome manipuli, and obliged the enemy to retire by the gate through which they had entered. The Romans would have purſued them; but Attilius, fearing ſome ambuſcade, would not ſuffer them to march out of their entrenchments. The Samnites, not doubting but fortune would favour their bold attempts another time, encamped cloſe to the Roman lines, and kept the conſular army ſo cloſely ſhut up, that they could not enter Samnium, to live upon free quarter there as they had deſigned; but were obliged to bring th[illegible]viſions from the countries behind them, to which alone they had acceſs.

THE ſenate and people of Rome, alarmed at this diſadvantageous ſituation of the army, diſpatched Poſthumius, tho' not yet perfectly recovered, with another conſular army, to the aſſiſtance of his collegue. Upon his arrival, the Samnites, who were not in a condition to make head againſt two conſular armies, decamped in haſte and left their country a prey to the enemy. Hereupon the two generals ſeparated, to pillage and lay waſte the whole country. tum, two places of great ſtrength. The former was taken by aſſault, after a vigorous defence, and given up to be plundered by the ſoldi[illegible]; three thouſand two hundred Samnites were cut in piec[illegible] on the ramparts, and four thouſand two hundred made priſoners. Triventum was abandoned by the inhabitants; ſo that the conſul made himſelf maſter of it without ſtriking a blow [w].

WHILE Poſthumius was thus employed, Attilius marched to the relief of Luceria in Apulia, beſieged, as he was told, by the Samnites. On his march he met the enemy and came to a battle with them, the ſucceſs of which was ſuch, that neither army cared to try a ſecond engagement. The Samnites were wholly bent on decamping the next day and returning home; but as the place where they were encamped was a kind of defile, and the Romans were between them and Samnium, after much deliberation, they reſolved to march directly to the Roman camp, take their rout by the ſide of it, and thence advance into the plain. The conſul no ſooner perceived them, than he gave orders to his legions to prepare for battle, not doubting but they were coming to attack him. But now Attilius perceived how much the action of the day before had diſcouraged his troops; his officers told him, that they were ready to obey his orders; but that the ſoldiers were extremely fatigued and intimidated, and that they would certainly be overcome as ſoon as attacked. This gave Attilius great uneaſineſs; he went in perſon to viſit them in their tents, and endeavoured by ſoft words to rouſe their courage; but all to no purpoſe: he could not by any means prevail upon them to ſtir. In the mean time, the Samnites drawing near, the Romans obſerved, that they were loaded with ſtakes and faſcines. Whereupon the conſul, believing they deſigned to ſhut him up in his camp, proteſted, that he would march out and meet the enemy alone; and that, if he were cut in pieces, he ſhould at leaſt eſcape the mortification of ſeeing his camp at the mercy of a people ſo often conquered. His words and the ſhame of abandoning their general induced them at length to take to their arms and march out; which they did with great reluctance, and very ſlowly, the battalions not being cloſe, but broken in ſeveral places. This motion of the Romans was a great diſappointment to the Samnites, who were no leſs afraid than they, and equally deſirous to avoid a battle; but when they found it was neceſſary to fight, they acted like brave men, threw down all their baggage in a heap, and, placing it in the centre, drew up in battalia. When the two armies drew near, they both betrayed ſo little inclination to fight, that they would have retired without action, had they not feared, that the firſt which drew off would be attacked in the rear by the other. However, they charged at length each other, but in a very faint manner, and without drawing ſo near as to come to a cloſe engagement. The Romans ſoon began to give ground, which ſo encouraged the Samnites, that they now exerted their uſual vigour, and preſſing upon the legions, drove them back quite to their entrenchments, which they would have entered and left the Samnites maſters of the field, had not Attilius ordered a body of horſe to advance to the gate of the camp, with directions to kill every Roman who ſhould attempt to enter it. By this means the run-aways being obliged to return to the charge, rallied, and renewed the fight with ſuch vigour, that the Samnites, who purſued them, were forced to fly in their turn. Thus the victory fell in the end to the Romans, after they had loſt ſeven thouſand three hundred men. Four thouſand eight hundred of the Samnites were killed upon the ſpot, and ſeven thouſand taken priſoners, whom the conſul made all paſs under the yoke.

Attilius gains a complete victory over the Samnites.

The

The conſul Attilius would have gained but little honour this campaign, had he not repaired his loſſes by a new advantage; for, on his march homewards, having accidentally fallen in with a body of Samnites, loaded with the booty which they had made in the country of the Volſci, he cut them in pieces, recovered the booty, and releaſed many Roman priſoners, whom they had taken in the incurſion. After this, he left his army in winter-quarters, and returned to Rome, to preſide at the elections. In the mean time, Poſthumius, uneaſy to find nothing to do in Samnium, left that country, without orders from the ſenate, and marching into Hetrutria, where there was more booty and more glory to be gained, defeated the Hetrurians, took Ruſſellæ, and obliged the three leucumonies of Volſinii, Peruſia, and Arretium to ſue for peace. Nevertheleſs the ſenate, on his return, refuſed him a triumph, on account of his irregular proceedings; but he appealed to the people, who, in ſpite of the ſenate, decreed him a triumph, for his victories over the Samnites and Hetrurians [x].

The Hetrurians overcome by Poſthumius.

In the new conſulate of L. Papirius Curſor, ſon of the famous Papirius, and Sp. Corvilius, Samnium became again the ſeat of war. That martial nation reſolved to make a new and more vigorous effort than ever. They publiſhed a law, commanding all, who were of age to bear arms, to appear upon the firſt ſummons from the general of their nation, upon pain of death. The heads of thoſe who diſobeyed this law were dedicated to Jupiter, and it was lawful for any one to kill them, where-ever they were found. The general rendezvous was appointed in the neighbourhood of Aquilonia, a city of Hirpinia, whither fear brought all the youth of the country, to the number of forty thouſand and upwards. In order to inſpire them with courage, the heads of the nation obliged ſixteen thouſand of the braveſt men among them to take the following oath, which was adminiſtered to them with great ſolemnity; "May all the curſes of the gods fall upon me and my poſterity, if I do not follow my generals where-ever they ſhall lead me; if I ever turn my back, or do not kill thoſe whom I ſhall ſee attempting to fly." Thoſe, who heſitated at loading themſelves and their poſterity with ſuch imprecations, were immediately ſtabbed, and their bodies thrown amoug the carcaſes of the many victims that were ſacrificed on this occaſion. Thoſe who took the oath were called legio linteata, or the linen legion, becauſe they had bound themſelves by it under a canopy or covering of linen. Magnificent bucklers were given them, and, that they might the better be diſtinguiſhed in an engagement, their helmets were adorned with ſtately creſts. In the mean time, the conſul Corvilius, having left Rome, and put himſelf at the head of the army which Attilius had commanded, took his way towards Samnium, which he entered without oppoſition, the enemy not having yet finiſhed their preparations. His firſt exploit was the taking of Amiternum, a city in Sabinia but ſubject to the Samnites, where he cut in pieces two thouſand eight hundred men, and made four thouſand two hundred and ſeventy priſoners. On the other hand, Papirius, having haſtened his levies in Rome, took the field, made himſelf maſter of Furconia, in the neighbourhood of Amiternum, and then joined his collegue. After they had laid waſte that part of the Volſcian territory which was ſubject to the Samnites, they parted again, Corvilius turning off towards Cominium, on the confines of the eaſtern part of Samnium, with a deſign to beſiege it; and Papirius marching towards Aquilonia, the place of the enemy's general rendezvous. The latter encamped within ſight of the enemy, and tried their ſtrength and courage in ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes before he came to a general action; which he at length reſolved to venture, and therefore ſent an expreſs to his collegue, deſiring him to preſs the ſiege of Cominium, leſt the enemy ſhould ſend detachments from thence to reinforce their army near Aquilonia. He then called his troops together, and ſo animated them, that they all cried out to him, that they were ready to follow him whitherſoever he ſhould lead them. From the general to the meaneſt ſoldier all were equally eager to engage; they were only uneaſy to ſee the battle put off to the next day. Even the augur, whoſe buſineſs it was to obſerve the preſages, choſe rather to make a falſe report, than to check this general ardor. It was then cuſtomary to judge of the ſucceſs of battles before-hand, by the haſte or ſlowneſs with which the ſacred chickens picked up their food. The augur obſerved, that the chickens fed but ſlowly, which was a bad omen; but, as the miniſters of religion are not always the moſt ſcrupulous, or the moſt credulous, the augur, depending more on the ardor of the ſoldiers, than the greedineſs of his chickens, declared, that they had fed greedily. Papirius heard the augury with joy and immediately ordered his men to prepare for battle; but the next day, when the army was ready to march out and engage, the report being ſpread among the troops, that the preſages were not favourable, the Roman knights, thinking it a matter of ſuch importance as ought to be communicated to the general, prevailed upon young Papirius, the conſul's nephew, to diſcover to him the error he was in concerning the auguries. Be of good courage, anſwered the general, and behave yourſelf in the action like a brave man. If the augur has made me a falſe report, he has drawn the vengeance of the gods upon himſelf by his irreligion. As for me, I conclude the augury to be favourable, ſince it was ſo declared. Thus ſpoke Papirius, and then ordered the unfaithful keeper of the ſacred chickens to be placed at the head of the firſt line, where he was killed by an unknown hand, before the two armies came to a cloſe engagement. He was probably killed by order of the conſul, who, pretending to look upon his death as a ſtroke from heaven, cried out, when the news was brought him, The vengeance of the gods has ſpent itſelf on the perſon who deſerved it. We have nothing more to fear from their anger. In the beginning of the action, the linen legion, which lay under the moſt ſacred engagements not to give way, made a moſt gallant reſiſtance, and, notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of the Romans, kept their ground, till all on a ſudden they diſcovered, at ſome diſtance, a cloud of duſt, ſuch as is raiſed by the marching of an army, but was now occaſioned by the ſervants and muleteers of the Roman camp, whom the conſul had mounted upon mules and other beaſts of burden, ordering them to appear in the heat of the action, and raiſe as great a cloud of duſt as poſſible. Papirius, though the author of the ſtratagem, ſeemed to be ſurprized at this new ſight. As the ſervants of the army had provided themſelves with branches of trees, which they trailed on the ground to raiſe the greater duſt, nothing could be ſeen but the tops of ſome ſtandards and lances, and ſomething like cavalry, which ſeemed to flank a body of infantry. While both armies were under no ſmall apprehenſion of this freſh body of troops, Papirius all on a ſudden cried out with an air of joy, Cominium is taken, and my collegue is coming to my aſſiſtance. Courage, fellow-ſoldiers; let us gain the victory ourſelves, before another army comes to ſhare with us the glory and the ſpoils. At theſe words, both the infantry and cavalry fell with new vigor on the linen legion, which was at length obliged to give give way, the fear of the enemy, who had penetrated into the midſt of their battalions, not ſuffering them to attend to any other apprehenſions. Their example was followed by the reſt of the Samnite army; their foot in the left wing retired to Aquilonia, and thoſe in the right regained the camp; but their horſe, which conſiſted of the nobility of the country, fled to Bovianum, a city which was a great way from the field of battle. Twelve thouſand of the Samnites, according to Oroſius, were ſlain in this battle; but, according to Livy, above thirty thouſand. Their camp was taken, and ſoon after the city of Aquilonia, where moſt of the fugitives had taken ſhelter [y].

Cominium taken, with many other cities.

In the mean time, Corvilius made himſelf maſter of the ſtrong and important city of Cominium. The beſieged, after having made a vigorous defence, were at length obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, to the number of fifteen thouſand four hundred, after four thouſand three hundred and eighty had been ſlain in the attacks. After this, the two conſuls joined their forces to complete the deſtruction of the Samnites, who had no army to oppoſe them. Their ſcheme being approved by the ſenate, Corvilius took Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum, all cities of great note. Papirius made himſelf maſter of Sepinum, a town ſituated at the foot of the Appennines, and deemed impregnable. But, in the mean time, the Hetrurians taking arms again, it was thought neceſſary to recal one of the conſuls with his army from Samnium. They were accordingly ordered to caſt lots for the conduct of the Hetrurian war, which fell to Corvilius, who thereupon haſtened to Rome, which he entered in triumph, and thence continued his march into Hetruria, where he took Troſſulum by aſſault, and obliged the Faliſci to ſue for peace, but granted them only a year's truce, for which he made them pay three hundred and ninety thouſand aſſes of braſs; after this he returned to Rome. Papirius arrived much about the ſame time from Samnium, and obtained a triumph, the chief ornaments of which were the ſpoils taken from the Samnites, eſpecially from the linen legion [z] (Z).

In the next election of conſuls, the perſons choſen by the centuries were Fabius Gurges, the ſon of Fabius Maximus, and Junius Brutus, ſurnamed Scæva, of an illuſtrious, though plebeian, family. It is undoubted, that Fabius the father, who was then prince of the ſenate, oppoſed the promotion of his ſon. Perhaps he did not think him well qualified for ſo high a ſtation, or was induced thereunto, as Valerius Maximus is of opinion [a], by a republican principle, judging it a pernicious precedent to heap ſo many honours on one family; for he himſelf had been five times conſul, and his father and grandfather had been likewiſe promoted to that dignity. Junius Brutus, the other conſul, was no better qualified for the conſulate than his collegue; ſo that now the government of the republic was in the hands of two perſons of ſmall abilities, eſpecially for war; which was at this time a very impolitic choice. They had ſcarce entered upon their office, when the Faliſci in Hetruria, encouraged by a plague which raged in Rome, broke their truce; and the old enemies of Rome the Samnites, taking arms again, entered Campania. The conſuls having drawn lots for their provinces, Hetruria fell to Brutus, and Samnium to Fabius. The former, being aſſiſted by Corvilius, whom the republic appointed to be his lieutenant, over-ran Hetruria, defeated the Faliſci, and returned to Rome, loaded with ſpoils. But, on the other hand, Fabius, having raſhly, and even without drawing up his troops, attacked the Samnites, was by them put to flight, after he had loſt three thouſand men in the action. The number of the wounded was greater, and moſt of them died for want of attendance, the conſul having left the ſervants of the army and the baggage a great way behind him. The news of an action ſo ill conducted exaſperated the people and ſenate to ſuch a degree, that the conſul was this temple was fixed a ſun-dial, the firſt that had ever been ſeen at Rome. The Romans, for ſome ages, marked only the riſing and ſetting of the ſun; afterwards they obſerved the hour of noon, but in a very groſs manner. When the ſun ſhone between the roſtra and the houſe appointed for the reception of embaſſadors, one of the conſuls heralds uſed to proclaim with a loud voice, that it was mid-day; but now they could mark the ſeveral hours of the day: and the water-clock, invented ſoon after, enabled them to reckon the hours of the night.

recalled, and would have been depoſed, had not his father ſpoke in his behalf, with all the dignity of a man of his age, merit, and employments, and even offered to ſerve under his ſon the remainder of the campaign, in quality of his lieutenant. This offer was immediately accepted, and Fabius ſet out with his ſon for Samnium, which they had ſcarce entered, when they were met by the enemy, who offered them battle. The Samnites, whom no adverſe fortune could diſcourage, made their firſt onſet with ſuch vigor, that the Romans could ſcarce withſtand them. Pontius Herennius, their general elated with his firſt victory, made incredible efforts to gain a ſecond. On the other hand, the conſul, to wipe off the ſhame of his late defeat, fought as a private ſoldier in the firſt line. But Pontius, having broke through the troop which covered young Fabius, was ſurrounding him on all ſides; which the father perceiving, threw himſelf into the midſt of the enemy's battalions, and by his example animated the legions to exert themſelves with ſuch vigor, that Gurges was reſcued, and the enemy put to the rout. Twenty thouſand of the enemy were ſlain, and four thouſand taken priſoners. Among the latter was Pontius himſelf, who had done in this fatal engagement all that could be expected from an experienced commander and gallant ſoldier. Rome would have been more ſenſibly affected with this victory at any other time; but the plague, which made a dreadful havock of her citizens, much damped her joy. To appeaſe the wrath of the gods, recourſe was had to the uſual remedy, ſuperſtition. The Sibylline books were conſulted, and there it was read, that, to put a ſtop to the plague, the god Æſculapius ſhould be brought to Rome from Epidaurus, a city of Peloponneſus, where he was worſhipped under the figure of a ſerpent. An embaſſy was accordingly appointed for that purpoſe [b].

But Fabius Maximus gives them a dreadful overthrow.

THE conſular year being near expired, and the two conſuls buſied in carrying on the war in their reſpective provinces, a dictator was appointed to ſupply their room; but his nomination proving defective, the republic fell into an inter-regnum, when L. Poſthumius, one of the magiſtrates named to govern the ſtate till the new election, held the comitia, and, by his intrigues, got himſelf elected the third time. His collegue was Junius Brutus, ſurnamed Bubulcus.

cus. Poſthumius, who was a man of a haughty, enterPriſing, and untractable temper, aſſumed to himſelf the command of the war in Samnium, without drawing lots with his collegue, or waiting for a decree of the ſenate in his favour. About this time the god Æſculapius, who had been expected a whole year, arrived from Epidaurus, to the great joy of the people; and the plague is ſaid to have ceaſed ſoon after (A). The two conſuls ſet out for their reſpective

Æſculapius brought to Rome.

(A) Æſculapius was a native of Meſſene, a city of Peloponneſus. As ſoon as he was born, his parents expoſed him, according to the barbarous cuſtom of thoſe times, in a foreſt, where he was found by ſome hunters, who, touched with compaſſion, cauſed him to be ſuckled by a bitch. When he became capable of inſtruction, he was committed to the care of the famous Chiron, who taught him phyſic or ſurgery; for theſe two arts were then confounded. The diſciple ſoon excelled his maſter, and, being grown an able phyſician, ſettled at Epidaurus, a city of Argos, and practiſed his art there. He made ſome diſcoveries in the cure of diſeaſes and wounds; for he is ſaid to have invented the probe, to have firſt made uſe of bandages, and to have been the firſt who invented purges and the art of drawing teeth. For theſe diſcoveries the people were pleaſed to call him the ſon of Apollo, and, after his death to rank him among the gods. He had a temple erected to him in Epidaurus; and the prieſts, who preſided over the worſhip of this new god, bred one of thoſe ſnakes, which were eaſily tamed and taught to follow any perſons where they pleaſed. This ſnake the ſilly vulgar honoured as the god himſelf. His uſual hole was under the fine marble ſtatue of Æſculapius, which the famous ſculptor Thraſymedes of Paros had made; and whenever he came out of it, his appearance was underſtood to prognoſtic the cure of the ſick perſon. The Roman envoys were brought into the temple, and it is probable, that the Epidaurians made them pay dear for the relief they deſired, their reputation and intereſt being then very ſmall in Greece. But however that be, the Epidaurians ſuffered them to carry away the ſnake, which drew all the people in the neighbourhood into the city. We are told, that the ſnake came out of its hole, while the embaſſadors were viewing the ſtatue of Æſculapius, left the temple of its own accord, paſſed all through the city, went directly to the port, where the Roman ſhip was at anchor, and entering the veſſel, curled himſelf into ſeveral circles in the cabbin of Ogulnius, who was at the head of the embaſſy, and continued quietly there. The other adventures of the pretended Æſculapius, in his paſſage from Epidaurus to Rome, have been celebrated both by the poets and hiſtorians. It is pretended, that the voyage was exceeding proſperous

perous and happy, till the veſſel approached the coaſts of Italy, when a violent ſtorm, ariſing all on a ſudden, forced the mariners to put in at the port of Antium, where there was a temple dedicated to Æſculapius. The ſnake, which had hitherto confined himſelf to Ogulnius's cabbin, here made his eſcape, and gliding along came to the court of the ſanctuary where he was worſhipped. As the place was [illegible]ed with myrtles and palm-trees, the pretended Æſculapius got upon one of the largeſt of them, and twiſting his long body round it, continued there three days. At length he returned to the galley of his own accord, and ſuffered himſelf to be carried to the place intended. The joy the Romans ſhewed upon the arrival of this ſalutary god is not to be expreſſed. Altars were erected all along the banks of the Tiber, and numberleſs ſacrifices offered. The Romans deſigned to receive him within their walls, and there build him a temple; but the god is ſaid to have choſe his own abode in the midſt of the Tiber, or an iſland formed in the infancy of the republic by ſtraw, trunks of trees, ſand, and the rubbiſh of the city. Thither the ſerpent retired, ſwimming gently through the water. From that time it was called the iſland of Æſculapius, and a temple was ſoon erected to him there, and enriched with numberleſs preſents. It was built in the ſhape of a ſhip, the higher part of it reſembling the ſtern, and the lower the prow. Pliny tells us, that the Romans, who had an averſion to phyſicians and their art, would not ſuffer Æſculapius to be brought within their wall; and indeed it muſt be owned, that the Romans had not that regard for phyſic, which an art of that importance deſerves. For a long courſe of years they left the practice of it wholly to perſons of a ſervile condition or freedmen. This contempt for phyſicians was chiefly owing to the roguery and ignorance of the empirics or quacks, who under the title of phyſicians, abuſed the credulity of the people, made their market of them, and at the ſame time much endangered the ſick under their care. However, the temple of the god of health was much frequented by the common people at Rome. The ſick came and paſſed a night in it; and either imagination, or the ſtrength of nature, ſometimes wrought cures there, which were aſcribed to the power of the god. Thoſe who recovered ſacrificed to the god by way of thankſgiving a cock; for this bird was ſacrificed to Æſculapius, and a ſymbol of the vigilance, which is neceſſary for the cure of diſeaſes. It was in alluſion to this, that Socrates when condemned to die, and thereby delivered from all the evils and diſtempers attending this life, ordered a cock to be ſacrificed to Æſculapius.

torians have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. In Samnium the two Fabii gained great advantages, and were actually beſieging Cominium, which the Samnites had rebuilt, when Poſthumius arrived with a new conſular army. Fabius Gurges had been continued in the command of the army in quality of proconſul; but nevertheleſs Poſthumius ſent him orders to deſiſt from the ſiege and leave that enterprize to him. Fabius had recourſe to the ſenate, acquainting the conſcript fathers with the orders he had received from the conſul; whereupon the ſenate immediately d ſ tched a meſſenger to Poſthumius, injoining him to bend his forces another way, and not diſturb Fabius in the enterprize he was carrying on; but Poſthumius, without paying any regard to the authority of the ſenate, gave their meſſenger this haughty anſwer, Tell the conſcript fathers, that it is their duty to obey their conſul, and not his to ſubmit to their commands. He then marched towards Cominium, reſolved to give the Fabii battle, if they did not yield to his obſtinate humour. Young Fabius, being warranted by the authority of the ſenate, was for ſuſtaining the attack of the raſh aggreſſor; but his father prevailed upon him, for the ſake of the public good, to give way to his imperious rival. Then Poſthumius, having a clear ſtage, preſſed Cominium with ſuch vigor, that he made himſelf maſter of it in a few days. From thence he turned his arms a- Cominium retaken from the Samnites.
gainſt Venuſium, an important place on the confines of Apulia, Lucania, and Samnium, and brought it under ſubjection to the Romans. He then wrote to the ſenate, giving them an account of his conqueſt, which, he hoped, would have reconciled the conſcript fathers to him, and made them forget his diſobedience. In the ſame letter he propoſed, that a colony might be ſent to Venuſium, to keep the neighbouring provinces in awe. His propoſal was approved, but occaſion taken from it to mortify him, and make him ſenſible, that the ſenate preferred obedience to valour. It was cuſtomary for the conqueror of a city to be one of the tr mviri ſent thither to ſettle a colony; but,

Æſculapius. There were ſome remains of the antient temple of Æſculapius to be ſeen in the ſixteenth century, near the church of St. Bartholomew in the iſland of the Tiber (19).

but, in the caſe of Venuſium, the ſenate, without any regard to Poſthumius, named three others, allowing him no ſhare in that honour. Nor was this all; to humble the proud Poſthumius yet more, they granted the honours of a triumph to young Fabius his rival, who entered Rome triumphantly on the calends of the month Sextilis. The brave Pontius, famous for having ſurprized the Roman legions and made them paſs under the yoke at the Caudine Forks, followed the chariot of the conqueror, and, by an act of inhumanity unworthy of a civilized nation, was condemned to loſe his head. While young Fabius was riding in his triumphal chariot, his father followed him on horſeback. He had formerly in his firſt triumphs, carried his ſon in his chariot with him, and was now overjoyed to march after him, to mingle in the crowd, and to hear the acclamations of the people, and the ſongs of the ſoldiers, in praiſe of the triumphant victor; however, the ſpectators did him juſtice, ſaying, that the ſon was honoured with a triumph, but that the father deſerved it [c].

Pontius, the famous Samnite general, put to death at Rome.

POSTHUMIUS, ſeeing his rival thus honoured, and himſelf treated with ſo much contempt, vented his rage in bitter invectives againſt the ſenate, and invented a new kind of revenge, which was to diſtribute among his ſoldiers all the booty he had taken in the two conquered cities, without lodging any part of it in the public treaſury. He then out of ſpite diſbanded his troops, before his ſucceſſor could arrive. His collegue Brutus preſided in the comitia, when P. Cornelius Rufinus and Manius Curius Dentatus were choſen. Poſthumius was no ſooner out of office, than he was brought to a trial before the comitia by tribes. Before he left Rome, he had employed a detachment of his troops in the ſervile work of grubbing up a foreſt in his own eſtate. His accuſation chiefly turned on his employing in ſo mean an office men of free condition, and who owed no ſervice but to the public. As this crime offended the people more than his diſobedience to the ſenate, they condemned him to pay a conſiderable fine [d].

THE war with the Samnites had already furniſhed the Roman generals with matter for twenty-four triumphs, but had coſt the conquerors a great deal of blood, many fatigues, and vaſt expences; ſo that the republic was quite tired tired with engaging every year the ſame enemy. In order therefore to put an end to this tedious war, both conſuls were ordered into Samnium, where they acted ſeparately, each at the head of a conſular army, ravaged the country, took ſeveral cities, gained ſome battles, and at length obliged that gallant nation, which after the loſs of their brave general and able governor Pontius, was no longer in a condition to oppoſe the progreſs of their arms, to ſue for peace. The republic readily conſented to enter into an alliance with them for the fourth time; but left the ſettling of the articles to Curius Dentatus, a man of great probity, and who, without any vanity or oſtentation, lived in that voluntary poverty and unaffected contempt of riches, which the philoſophers of thoſe times cried up and recommended. The Samnite deputies found him ſitting on a poor wooden ſeat near the fire, dreſſing his own dinner, which conſiſted of a few roots, and offered him a large ſum of money; but Curius expreſſed his indignation with a diſdainful ſmile. Without doubt, ſaid he, my poverty inſpires you with hopes of corrupting me; but your attempts are vain. I had rather command the rich, than be rich myſelf. Carry back with you this fatal metal, which men make uſe of only for their deſtruction; and tell your countrymen, that they will find it as difficult a matter to corrupt, as to conquer me. The conditions Curius impoſed upon them are not known; but it is probable they were no-ways favourable to that warlike and reſtleſs nation. The treaty was no ſooner concluded, than the conſul returned to Rome, where he triumphed, to the unexpreſſible joy of the people, who found themſelves diſburdened of a war, which had laſted forty-nine years, and given the republic more trouble, than their wars with all the other ſtates of Italy together.

The republic enters into an alliance with the Samnites. Year after the flood, 2714. Before Chriſt, 285. Of Rome 463.

AND now the conqueſt of Samnium drew after it the entire reduction of the Sabines, whoſe confederacy with Rome was as antient as the city itſelf; but, notwithſtanding their alliance with the republic, they had joined the Samnites. Curius being therefore ſent againſt them, brought the whole country under ſubjection; but as they were old allies, and had not aggravated their offences by any long revolt or obſtinate hatred, the weight of the yoke was leſſened, and the right of Roman citizenſhip beſtowed upon them, but without the right of ſuffrage. For the conqueſt of the Sabines Curius had a ſecond triumph decreed him the ſame year, an honour which no general before him had ever enjoyed. As Curius was by birth a plebeian, ſome patricians attempted to caſt a ſtain upon his reputation, accuſing him of appropriating to himſelf part of the ſpoils taken from the enemy. As the proofs were not clear, Curius was put to his oath, and then he confeſſed, that he had kept a little wooden oil veſſel for making libations to the gods; but proteſted that he had reſerved nothing more. Such was the character of his diſintereſtedneſs that he was believed, the malice of his accu[illegible]rs ſerving only to heighten the luſtre of his virtue [e].

In the following conſulate of M. Valerius Corvinus and Q. Cædicius Noctua, Curius Dentatus was ſent into Lucania, in quality of proconſul, to aſſiſt the Thurini againſt the Lucanians, who had invaded their territory. In this expedition, being attended with his uſual ſucceſs, he defeated the Lucanians, and obliged them to retire into their own country. The two conſuls ſpent their whole year in works of peace, and in ſending colonies to the conquered cities; namely to Adria, a maritime town, which is ſaid to have given name to the Adriatic ſea; to Caſtrum in Picenum, and to Sena, another city on the Adriatic, at the mouth of the Seno, in the country of the Senones. As men were grown more vicious, and the number of malefactors daily encreaſed, as is uſual in time of peace, three new judges were appointed to relieve the prætor and try criminals. The puniſhments theſe judges could inflict were confined to pecuniary fines; but nevertheleſs they were ſtyled triumviri capitales, becauſe the care of the priſons, where the greateſt criminals were kept, was committed to them, and they had the direction of their execution. Theſe new magiſtrates were choſen annually in the comitia by tribes; and from their ſentence there lay no appeal. The time of this general peace was alſo thought a proper ſeaſon to take a cenſus of the Roman people, by which it appeared, that the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms, amounted to two hundred and ſeventy-three thouſand [f].

The fruit of this new peace was, trouble abroad, and diſſenſion at home. The people, oppreſſed by the uſuries of the rich citizens, revived a quarrel, which had begun near two hundred years before. They kept themſelves at firſt within bounds, only demanding, that ſome abuſes ſhould ſhould be reformed with reſpect to contracts, whereby creditors exacted an immoderate intereſt for money lent. But the year enſuing, when Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina were conſuls a ſecond time, a new accident drove them to extremities. T. Veturius, one of thoſe unfortunate conſuls who had been ſurprized in the Caudine Forks, died inſolvent; and his ſon, who had been educated with great care and formed to virtue, borrowed a conſiderable ſum of one C. Plotius, to defray the expence of his father's funeral. Plotius, ho had alſo lent great ſums to the father, ſoon after preſſed the ſon to pay both his father's debts and that which he had lately contracted himſelf. Young Veturius, having neither money nor credit, was forced to ſubmit to ſlavery, and work for his creditor, till he had diſcharged the whole debt. He bore his ſervitude with great conſtancy, and made it his ſtudy to pleaſe his creditor in every thing, till that infamous wretch ſolicited him, as he was a youth of great beauty, to gratify a brutal paſſion he had conceived for him; but then Veturius, remembring his birth and the leſſons he had been taught in his earlieſt infancy, rejected his ſhameful addreſſes with the utmoſt indignation. His conſtancy was immoveable, tho' his cruel maſter treated him moſt unmercifully for his virtuous reſiſtance. One day, being covered all over with blood and torn with ſtripes, he made his eſcape out of the houſe, appeared in the forum, and there ſhewed the people the marks of his barbarous creditor's cruelty, and diſcovered the infamy of his tyrant. The people laid hold of this opportunity to decry the uſurers, and to demand the abolition of the law, which impowered them to reduce inſolvent debtors to ſlavery. This inhuman law had been annulled once before on a like occaſion; but the patricians had, by their authority and intereſt, revived it. As for the execrable Plotius, the tribune accuſed him before the aſſembled centuries, and got him condemned to death. The plebeians, not content with this firſt victory, inſiſted on the abolition of the above-mentioned law. The patricians oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power: This is robbing us, ſaid they, of our ſecurity for what we have lent. Debts muſt be paid, according to the old law, either in body or goods. The people, finding the patricians obſtinate and inflexible, had recourſe to an expedient, which had ever proved effectual. They left the city and poſted themſelves on the hill Janiculus, with the Tiber between them and their proſecutors. By this removal of the people, the city being left deſtitute of artificers and labourers, and no proviſions being brought thither from the country, for the country-people had likewiſe their complaints, the patricians and rich citizens found themſelves obliged to humour the multitude. The conſuls therefore of this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Nautius Rutilus, were ordered to name a dictator, in order to appeaſe the revolted populace. The perſon they named was Q. Hortenſius, who, immediately entering into a treaty with the ſeparatiſts, made them the following conceſſions, viz. that the law in queſtion ſhould be repealed, and that two other laws, which had been formerly made but no-ways regarded by the patricians, ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved for the future. Theſe were, that the decrees made by the tribes ſhould be equally obſerved both by the patricians and plebeians; and that all laws ſhould firſt paſs in the ſenate, and be afterwards brought to the comitia, to be there approved or rejected. The country-people complained, that juſtice was not adminiſtered at Rome on market-days; and that, when any cauſes were depending, they were forced to leave their work and return to the city again. This was rectified, and the dictator promiſed, that market-days ſhould no longer be vacation-days for the judges, that the huſbandmen might have their cauſes heard before they went home. When theſe articles were drawn up, and the people's minds began to be calmed, Q. Hortenſius died. It being therefore neceſſary to nominate another dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus was raiſed to that dignity, who choſe for his general of the horſe a famous plebeian named Volumnius Flamma. By the interpoſition of theſe two great men, the work, which Hortenſius had begun, was ſoon accompliſhed; and the people, having attained to the higheſt pitch of their deſires, returned to the city, and thought only of enjoying the ſweets of tranquillity. The balance of power leaned now rather to their ſide. The nobility had no other advantage over them but that of great riches, and reſpect which is naturally paid to perſons of high birth. The peace of the city being therefore no mor interrupted by inteſtine conteſts, we ſhall ſee the republi encreaſe her dominions abroad with incredible rapidity The great Fabius died ſoon after he had happily accompliſh ed the accommodation. In his life-time he had been look ed upon as a prodigy of valour, wiſdom, and virtue; an upon his death the people contributed to the expence of h obſequies with ſo much generoſity, that his ſon, with th victims offered at his funeral, gave a public entertainme

to the whole city [g]. It is probable, that, after the reconciliation, the dictator Fabius preſided at the election of the new conſuls M. Valerius Potitus and C. Ælius Pætus, whoſe year proved barren of remarkable events; as did alſo the following, when C. Claudius Canina and M. Æmilius Lepidus were conſuls. But in the following conſulate of C. Servilius Tucca and L. Cæcilius Metellus, the Tarentines, jealous of the proſperity of the Romans, and apprehending that they aimed at the conqueſt of all Italy, ſtirred up both old and new enemies againſt the republic, and engaged her in one of the moſt formidable wars ſhe had ever ſuſtained.

The Tarentines ſtir up new and old enemies againſt Rome.

TARENTUM was a city of Great Greece, which comprehended the greateſt part of the ſouth coaſt of Italy. Moſt of the cities in this great province had been founded by Greeks, who brought thither with them the Greek language, cuſtoms, and manners. The Tarentines in particular were a colony of Spartans, who, ſettling on the continent of Italy under the conduct of one Phalantus, made themſelves maſters of a city firſt called Oebalia, and afterwards Tarentum, from one Taras, or, as others will have it, Tarentus, who is ſaid to have encreaſed and embelliſhed the city after the Greeks were maſters of it. Theſe tranſplanted Spartans ſoon forgot the ſevere diſcipline of Sparta, and plunged themſelves into all the debaucheries with which the reſt of the Greeks were reproached. The heat of the climate, the fruitfulneſs of the country, and the opportunity of ſupplying themſelves by ſea with all the delights of Greece, ſunk them into idleneſs, and all the vices that attend it. Their whole life was ſpent in feaſts, ſports, and public entertainments. Buffoons and proſtitutes governed the ſtate at their pleaſure, and often determined the moſt important affairs by a joke or an indecent geſture. They bore a mortal hatred to the Romans and dreaded their dominion, not ſo much out of fear of loſing their liberty, as of being diſturbed by that warlike and rough people in the purſuit of their pleaſures. They therefore employed all their Grecian ſubtlety to draw ſuch a number of enemies upon them, as ſtill to keep them at a diſtance from themſelves, and this without appearing to be concerned.

AT the ſame time the Senones, having raiſed a formidable army, marched into Hetruria, with a deſign ro beſiege Arretium, retium, a city about forty leagues from Rome, at a ſmall diſtance from the Arnus. The Aretines had immediately recourſe to the Romans, who, they knew, would never ſuffer the Gauls to make conqueſts in Hetruria, and thereby open themſelves a way to Rome. The republic, alarmed at the leaſt motion of ſo powerful an enemy, diſpatched, without loſs of time, the conſul Lucius Cæcilius with an army to the aſſiſtance of the Aretini; but, before any act of hoſtility, a deputation was ſent to the Senones, to diſſuade them from their deſign. But the proud Gauls, inſtead of liſtening to the mediation of Rome, killed the deputies, and brought their troops before Aretium. Hereupon the conſul advanced with his army, and came to an engagement with the enemy, in which he himſelf was killed, with ſeven legionary tribunes, the beſt part of the Roman knights, and thirteen thouſand private men. Upon the news of this dreadful overthrow, the famous Curius Dentatus was ordered with new troops into Hetruria, to ſupply the place of the conſul Cæcilius; but that wiſe commander, inſtead of marching to the relief of Aretium and engaging the enemy flushed with their late victory, held his rout along the confines of Hetruria, and entering the country of the Senones, took advantage of the abſence of their beſt troops to ravage it without oppoſition. He plundered and burnt their houſes, laid waſte their fields, put all thoſe to the ſword who were able to bear arms, carried the women and children into captivity, and, in ſhort, reduced the whole country to a vaſt deſart, in which there ſcarce remained any appearance of its having ever been cultivated or inhabited [h]. Thus he took ample revenge for the murder of the Roman embaſſadors.

The Senones kill the deputies of Rome, and defeat the Roman army.

THE next year, in the beginning of the adminiſtration of the new conſuls, P. Cornelius Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius Calvinus, the Boii, the Hetrurians, and the Samnites, once more declared againſt the republic, being ſtirred up under-hand by the Tarentines; but, notwithſtanding this great confederacy, the ſenate and people repoſed ſo great a confidence in the new conſuls, that they did not think of creating a dictator, as was uſual in times of great danger. Nor was their confidence ill grounded; for Domitius taking the field and meeting the Senones, who had raiſed the ſiege of Aretium and were marching ſtraight to Rome, to revenge the devaſtations made in their country gave them a total overthrow, and covered the field of battle with their dead bodies. Only a ſmall number of them eſcaped, and ſaved themſelves in the country of the Boii, whom they preſſed to take arms immediately and revenge the common cauſe of the Gauls. Accordingly the Boii, having raiſed all the young men in their territory who were able to bear arms, and being reinforced by a great body of Hetrurians, purſued the attempt which the Senones had begun, and marched towards Rome; but the conſul Cornelius, who waited for them on the banks of the lake Vademonis in Hetruria, now il Lago de Baſſano, engaged them, killed almoſt all the Hetrurians and the greater part of the Boii. The latter made ſome faint efforts againſt the Romans the next year; but, being defeated a ſecond time, they were forced to ſue for peace. As for the Senones, they were ſo utterly deſtroyed, that there ſcarce remained any footſteps in Italy of a nation, which had diſtinguiſhed it ſelf ſo much by the taking of Rome.

And alſo the Boii and Hetrurians.

In the following conſulate of C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus, almoſt all Italy roſe in arms againſt the imperious republic; but Fabricius being ſent into Lucania, defeated there the confederate forces of the Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnites, and made himſelf maſter of their camp. Twenty-five thouſand of the enemy, with their general Statilius, were ſlain. The Romans, imagining that the god Mars had fought in perſon for them, returned him ſolemn thanks for his aſſiſtance by public ſupplications (B). As for the Tarentines, though they were the real authors of this war, they had not yet appeared in the field, nor openly declared againſt Rome; but an accident made them at length throw off the maſk, and brought on, after a long ſeries of events, their utter ruin. Valerius, or, as others call him, Cornelius, one of the maritime duumviri, or admirals of the Roman fleet, happened to come to the mouth of the harbour with ten ſhips, while the idle inhabitants of the city were aſſembled, as uſual, in the theatre, which looked towards the harbour. The Tarentines, imagining that Rome, having at laſt diſcovered their ſecret plots, had ſent that fleet to puniſh them, they all, with one conſent, ran down to the port, fell upon the Roman fleet with the fury of madmen, ſunk one ſhip and took four, the other five eſcaping. All the priſoners fit to bear arms were put to the ſword, and the others ſold for ſlaves to the beſt bidder. The Romans, upon the news of this unexpected act of hoſtility, ſent a deputation to Tarentum, to demand ſatisfaction for the inſult offered to the republic; but the Tarentines, inſtead of hearkening to their demands, inſulted the embaſſadors in the moſt outrageous manner. They admitted them to an audience in the theatre, where Poſthumius Megellus, who was at the head of the embaſſy and had been thrice conſul, harangued the aſſembly in Greek. His advanced age, his perſonal merit, and, above all, the character of an embaſſador from a powerful people, ought to have gained him reſpect; but the Tarentines, heated with wine, not only gave no attention to his diſcourſe, but burſt into loud laughter, and impudently hiſſed him, whenever he dropped an improper expreſſion, or pronounced a word with a foreign accent. Nor was this all: when he began to ſpeak of reparations of injuries, they flew into a rage, and rather drove him out of the aſſembly, than diſmiſſed him. As he was walking off with an air of gravity and dignity, which he preſerved, notwithſtanding the reception they gave him, a buffoon, named Philonides, coming up to him, urined upon his robe, a new ſource of immoderate laughter to the mad and drunken multitude, who clapped their hands, applauding the outrageous inſolence. Poſthumius, turning about to the aſſembly, ſhewed them the ſkirt of his garment ſo defiled; but when he found that this had no effect but to encreaſe the loudneſs of their contumelious mirth, he ſaid, without the leaſt emotion, Laugh on, Tarentines, laugh on, now while you may; the time is coming when you will weep. It is not a little blood that muſt waſh and purify this garment.

(B) Fabricius, after having defeated the confederate army of the Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnites, found it a difficult enterprize to force their camp. The means, by which he ſucceeded in it, and which had ſomething of the air of a miracle, was probably a ſtratagem of his own contriving. While he ſeemed to be in ſuſpenſe what meaſures to take, a young man, full of ſtrength and vigor, wearing feathers in his helmet, appeared on a ſudden in the midſt of the legions, exhorted them to decline no danger for the honour of their country, and then ſeizing a ladder, advanced to the rampart through a ſhower of darts, planted his ladder againſt it, and mounted the wall. This bold action intimidated the confederates, and inſpired the Romans with ſuch intrepidity, that they ſoon made themſelves maſters of the camp. After the victory, the conſul ordered the young man to be ſought for, in order to reward him for having firſt mounted the rampart; and becauſe he was not to be found, the Romans immediately imagined, that he was the god Mars himſelf.

ment. This ſaid, he withdrew, left the city, and embarqued for Rome. When the Tarentines came to themſelves, and began to reflect on the enormity of their conduct, and at the ſame time on the inability of their neighbours to defend them againſt ſo powerful a republic, they caſt their eyes upon Pyrrhus king of Epirus, whoſe great reputation for valour and long experience in war had gained him the reputation of one of the heroes of Greece. They therefore immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to him, but rather to ſound his diſpoſition and obſerve the ſituation of his affairs, than to enter, without farther deliberation, into any engagements with him. As Pyrrhus naturally loved action and the buſtle and hurry of war, the embaſſadors found him in a diſpoſition to hearken to any propoſal, which would furniſh him with employment worthy of his ambition [i].

The take Thurium.

In the mean time, the Tarentines, to amuſe the Romans till the return of their embaſſadors from Epirus, beſieged Thurium, which was defended by a Roman garriſon, and made themſelves maſters of it. This news was brought to Rome a little after the return of Poſthumius and the other embaſſadors, who had been ſo ill treated at Tarentum. The new conſuls therefore, L. Æmilius Barbula and Q. Marcius Philippus, having aſſembled the conſcript fathers, laid before them the ſituation of the affairs of the republic on one hand, and the ſhameful indignity which had been offered the embaſſadors on the other. It was dangerous to engage in a new war, when the republic had ſo many nations to contend with. The Hetrurians were ſtill in arms; the Samnites, without regard to the faith of treaties, had declared anew againſt the republic; and the Lucanians and Brutians were grown more confident ſince the taking of Thurium. On the other hand, the hoſtilities committed by the Tarentines and the inſult offered to Poſthumius, whoſe robe was produced in the ſenate, left no room to deliberate, whether they ſhould enter into a war with that people or not. They were all unanimous as to the neceſſity of chaſtiſing them; but whether it was adviſeable for the republic to ſhew her reſentment immediately was doubted. Some of the ſenators were for declaring war forthwith; others for deferring it, till the provinces bordering on the Tarentine territories were ſubdued.

Never was debate more tedious or more perplexing. The ſame queſtion was diſcuſſed and warmly debated, from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſet, for ſeveral days together. At length the opinion of thoſe, who were for beginning the war immediately, prevailed; and the decree of the ſenate being confirmed by the people, orders were diſpatched to the conſul Æmilius, who was on his march into Samnium, to lay aſide that expedition and turn his arms againſt Tarentum. The Tarentines, upon the approach of a conſular army, carried on their deliberations with more ſerioufneſs; and when the conſul ſent once again to demand ſatisfaction before he began hoſtilities, the better ſort of citizens declared for peace. Æmilius offered them moderate terms; and, after all, it was but equitable, that they ſhould repair the injuries, and wipe off the reproach they had thrown on a conſiderable republic without any provocation; but the populace, who had nothing to loſe, inſiſted on a war; and their clamours prevailed over the juſt reaſons of the wiſeſt men in Tarentum. The propoſal of bringing Pyrrhus into Italy was revived, and a decree paſſed for inviting that prince to Tarentum. One Meton, a citizen of good ſenſe, and no ways infected with the general corruption which prevailed in the city, endeavoured to divert his countrymen from this mad deſign (C); but was thruſt out of the aſſembly, and embaſſa-

(C) Meton, on the day that a public decree was to paſs for inviting Pyrrhus to Tarentum, and when the people were all placed in the theatre, putting a withered garland on his head, and having a flambeau in his hand, as was the manner of the drunken debauchees, came dancing into the midſt of the aſſembly, accompanied by a woman playing on the flute. This ſilly ſight was ſufficient to divert the Tarentines from their moſt important deliberations. They made a ring, and called out to Meton to ſing, and to the woman to play; but when they, expecting to be entertained with a ſong, were all ſilent, the wiſe citizen, aſſuming an air of great ſerioufneſs, You do well, Tarentines, ſaid he, not to hinder thoſe from diverting themſelves, who are diſpoſed to mirth; and, if you are wiſe, you will yourſelves take advantage of the preſent liberty you enjoy to do the ſame. When Pyrrhus comes, you muſt change your way of life; your mirth and joy will be at an end. Theſe words made an impreſſion upon the multitude, and a murmur went about, that he had ſpoken well but thoſe who had ſome reaſon to fear that they ſhould be delivered up to the Romans, in caſe of an accommodation, being en-

dors were immediately diſpatched into Epirus, not only in the name of the Tarentines, but of all the Greek colonies in Italy, with magnificent preſents for the king, and with inſtructions to acquaint him, that they only wanted a general of fame and experience; and that as for troops, they could themſelves furniſh a numerous army of twenty thouſand horſe and three hundred and fifty thouſand foot, made up of Lucanians, Meſſapians, Samnites, and Tarentines. As ſoon as the news of this deputation was brought to the Roman camp, Æmilius, who had hitherto made war on the Tarentines but gently, in hopes of adjuſting matters by way of negotiation, took other meaſures, and began to commit all ſorts of hoſtilities. He took cities, ſtormed caſtles, and laid the whole country waſte, burning and deſtroying all before him. The Tarentines brought their army into the field; but Æmilius ſoon obliged them to take refuge within their walls. However to induce them to lay aſide the deſign of receiving Pyrrhus, he uſed the priſoners he had taken with great moderation, and even ſent them back without ranſom. Theſe highly extolled the generoſity of the conſul, inſomuch, that many of the inhabitants were brought over to the Roman party; and they all began to repent of their having rejected a peace and ſent for Pyrrhus. But, in the mean time, the Tarentine embaſſadors arriving in Epirus, purſuant to the powers they had received, made an abſolute treaty with the king, who immediately ſent before him the famous Cyneas, with three thouſand men, to take poſſeſſion of the citadel of Tarentum. This eloquent miniſter, whoſe character we have given in our hiſtory of Epirus [k], ſoon found means to depoſe [illegible] whom the Tarentines had choſen to be their general and the governor of the city, tho' a ſincere friend to the Romans. He likewiſe prevailed upon the Tarentines to deliver up the citadel into his hands; which he no ſooner got poſſeſſion of, than he diſpatched meſſengers to Pyrrhus, ſoliciting him to haſten his departure for Italy. In the mean time, Cyneas arrives at Tarentum.

raged at what he had ſaid, reviled the aſſembly for ſuffering themſelves to be ſo mocked and affronted; and crouding together thruſt Meton out of the aſſembly (20).

(20) Plut. in Pyrrho,

the conſul Æmilius, finding that he could not attempt any thing with ſucceſs againſt the Tarentines this campaign, reſolved to put his troops into winter quarters in Apulia, which was not far from the territory of Tarentum, that was ſoon to become the ſeat of the war. As he was obliged to paſs though certain defiles, with the ſea on one ſide and high hills on the other, he was there attacked by the Tarentines and Epirots, from great numbers of barks, fraught with baliſtæ, that is, engines for throwing ſtones of a vaſt weight, and from the hills, on which were poſted a great many archers and ſlingers. Hereupon Æmilius placed the Tarentine priſoners between him and the enemy; which the Tarentines perceiving, ſoon left off moleſting the Romans, out of compaſſion to their own countrymen; ſo that the Romans arrived ſafe in Apulia, and there took up their winter-quarters. As for the conſul, he repaired to Rome, where his collegue Marcius had a triumph on the calends of April, for having vanquiſhed the Hetrurians[1].

THE next year P. Valerius Lævinus and Tib. Coruncanius were choſen conſuls. The latter was raiſed to the conſulate purely for his merit; for he was of a mean deſcent, and not even a Roman by birth, but a native of Camerium, a Roman municipium in Latium. It fell to his lot to carry on the war in Hetruria, and to his collegue's to conduct that againſt the Tarentines. Æmilius, who had acted againſt the Tarentines the laſt year, was continued in the command of his own troops with the title of proconſul, and ordered to make war upon the Salentines, who had declared for the Tarentines. The preſent exigence of affairs obliged the Romans to inliſt the proletarii, who were the meaneſt of the people, and therefore, by way of contempt, called proletarii; as being thought incapable of doing the ſtate any other ſervice than that of peopling the city, and ſtocking the republic with ſubjects. Hitherto they had never been ſuffered to bear arms, but were now, to their great ſatisfaction, inrolled as well as others. In the mean time, Pyrrhus arrived at Tarentum, having narrowly eſcaped ſhipwreck; and being conducted into the city by his faithful Cyneas was received there with loud acclamations. Thus began the memorable war between the Romans and that famous commander, the firſt foreigner they had to deal with. I wa was carried on with great vigor on both ſides for the ſpace of ſix years, during which time the following conſuls were at the head of the Roman armies; the firſt year, P. Valerius Lævinus and T. Coruncanius; the ſecond, P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Decius Mus, whoſe father and grandfather were both famous for their devotements; the third, C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius, two men of moſt diſtinguiſhed merit; the fourth, Cornelius Ruffinus and C. Junius Brutus, the former a man extremely covetous and ſelf-intereſted, but nevertheleſs promoted by the intereſt of Fabricius, becauſe he was a much abler commander than any of his competitors; the fifth, Q. Fabius Gurges and C. Genucius; and laſtly, the ſixth, the famous Curius Dentatus and L. Cornelius Lentulus. But as, in our hiſtory of Epirus, we have given a very particular account of this war, and the various events which attended it, from the landing of Pyrrhus in Italy to his return into his own dominions [m], we ſhall here only relate what happened after the latter period, referring the reader for an account of the war itſelf to the above-mentioned hiſtory.

PYRRHUS having thought it adviſeable to leave Italy, after the laſt battle, in which he was defeated by Curius Dentatus with the loſs of twenty-three thouſand men, Curius returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph, it being the moſt magnificent one that had ever yet been ſeen; great quantities of rich ſpoil, veſſels of gold, purple carpets, ſtatues, pictures, and, in ſhort, all the fineries of the Greek cities, were carried before him. Among the captives were Epirots, Theſſalians, and Macedonians, not to mention Lucanians, Brutians, Tarentines, and other Greek nations. The appearance and dreſs of ſo many foreigners gave the ſpectators great pleaſure; but nothing ſo much raiſed their admiration, as the elephants with towers on their backs, animals which had never before been ſeen in Rome. As for the triumphant victor, he rode in a chariot, and the acclamations the people gave him were very ſincere; they thought they could never give him ſufficient proofs of their gratitude. The ſenate impowered him to appropriate to himſelf fifty acres of the conquered lands; but he declined this favour, ſaying, That he ought to be looked upon as a dangerous ſubject, who could not live upon the produce of ſeven acres. Of all the ſpoils he reſerved only a little veſſel of beech for his do- The triumph of Curius.

meſtic ſacrifices. This magnificent triumph of Curius was followed by that of his collegue Lentulus, who had made a ſucceſsful campaign in Lucania, and taken from the Samnites the famous city of Caudium. This happy conſulate ended with a cenſus and a luſtrum. The virtuous Fabricius and his conſtant collegue Æmilius Papus being cenſors, they made a new liſt of ſenators, and ſtruck out the names of all thoſe who led diſſolute lives; nay, Cornelius Ruffinus, who had been conſul and dictator, was excluded, only for having ten pounds weight of ſilver in plate. Happy times for the republic, when riches and luxury were branded with ignominy! By the cenſus there appeared to be in Rome two hundred ſeventy-one thouſand two hundred and twenty-four citizens fit to bear arms [n].

THE Romans, apprehending that the king of Epirus would ſoon appear in Italy again, with a more numerous army than ever, continued Curius Dentatus in the conſulate for the next year, giving him for his collegue Cornelius Merenda. In the mean time, the Tarentines, being now well appriſed, that Pyrrhus, under pretence of going to fetch new ſupplies, had entirely deſerted them, obliged Milo, whom the king had left in the city with a ſtrong garriſon, to confine himſelf to the citadel. Theſe diviſions made Curius believe, that the Tarentines and Epirots would deſtroy each other; and upon this belief he neglected to beſiege Tarentum, and turned his arms againſt the Samnites and Lucanians, who retired for refuge to their mountains; but they appeared again in the field the next year, when C. Fabius Dorſo and C. Claudius Carina were conſuls. The latter defeated them, once at leaſt, in a pitched battle; for we read in the Faſti Capitolini, that Claudius Carina triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brutians on the day of the Quirinalia, or the feſtival of Romulus, that is, on the ſeventeenth day of February.

Embaſſadors from Ptolemy Philadelphus.

And now the reputation of the Romans being ſpread into foreign countries, Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, ſent embaſſadors to congratulate the republic on her ſucceſs, and to aſk the friendſhip of the Roman people. The Romans, not to be outdone in civility, ſent four embaſſadors to Egypt, choſen, with the utmoſt circumſpection, by a ſenate ſtudious to preſerve their reputation abroad entire. Fabius Gurges was at the head of this embaſſy, and with him were joined three curule ædiles, two of them brothers of

of the Fabian family, and the third Q. Ogulnius. Their reception was equal to their merit and worthy of ſo magnificent a prince. He invited them to his table, and preſented each of them with a crown of gold; which they accepted, being unwilling to diſoblige the king by a refuſal; but placed them the next morning on the heads of the king's ſtatues, that were erected in the public places of the city. This contempt of riches gained the Romans great reputation in Egypt; however, the king would not ſuffer them to depart without new preſents, both for themſelves and their republic; which they, upon their return to Rome, depoſited in the public treaſury; but the ſenate and people ordered the quæſtors to reſtore to the embaſſadors what had been given them for their own uſe.

THE next year, the Romans, ſtill under the apprehenſion that Pyrrhus would once more return into Italy, raiſed to the conſulate two great men, who had already bore that office, and commanded with great reputation the armies of the republic. Theſe were L. Papirius Curſor, the worthy ſon of an illuſtrious father, and Sp. Corvilius, ſurnamed Maximus. Theſe generals had ſcarce entered Samnium with two armies, when a certain account came of the death of Pyrrhus. This news threw the Samnites into deſpair; they now looked upon their liberty as loſt, and, like men in that unhappy ſituation, put all to the hazard of a battle, in which they were entirely defeated. An hiſtorian in ſpeaking of this victory, ſays it was ſo complete, that Samnium itſelf was no more [o]. And thus ended this bloody war, which had laſted ſeventy-two years, and procured the Roman generals thirty-one triumphs. After the entire reduction of Samnium, the Lucanians and Brutians gave way in their turn and ſubmitted to the yoke; ſo that only Tarentum remained unpuniſhed, which the conſuls ſoon inveſted. There was a kind of civil war between Milo in the citadel and the Tarentines in the city; and the latter, as it is thought, had implored the aſſiſtance of the Carthaginians, who lay with a fleet before the town, pretending to have no deſign but againſt the Epirots and the citadel. The Romans, on the other hand, attacked the city, taking care to prevent the Carthaginians from reducing the citadel. With this view Papirius privately ſignified to Milo, that, if he would ſurrender the citadel to him, he and his garriſon ſhould not only have their lives ſpared, but be ſafe-ly tranſported, with all their baggage and effects, into Epirus. Milo readily liſtened to this offer, and even undertook to put the city as well as the citadel into the conſul's hands. Accordingly he aſſembled the Tarentines, and prevailed upon them to depute him to the conſul, promiſing to make ſuch advantageous terms for them, that they ſhould neither loſe their lives nor their goods. Milo was as good as his word; for Papirius, in order to hinder the Carthaginians from getting any footing in Italy, promiſed him all he aſked. The Romans, being ſoon after admitted into the city, did no violence to the inhabitants. As for the Carthaginians, when they found themſelves diſappointed, they retired with their fleet, leaving the Romans under juſt ſuſpicions, that, notwithſtanding their antient alliance, they intended to rob the republic of a city, which, by right of conqueſt, belonged to them. The Tarentines were all diſarmed, their ſhips taken from them, and their city diſmantled and made tributary to Rome [p].

AND now the Sabines, Volſci, Campanians, Hetrurians, and Samnites being utterly ſubdued, the republic was at leiſure to wipe off the diſhonour thrown upon her by a Campanian legion, ſoon after the arrival of Pyrrhus in Italy. While that prince was at Tarentum, and the Carthaginians infeſted all the Ionian ſea, the inhabitants of Rhegium, ſituated in the ſouthern extremity of Italy near Sicily, applied to the republic for a Roman garriſon to defend them from an invaſion. A legion was raiſed in Campania for that purpoſe, and ſent to them under the command of one Decius Jubellus. Theſe ſoldiers, having been uſed to a laborius life, began ſoon to envy the inhabitants the pleaſures and eaſe in which they lived; and it was not long before they formed and executed a ſcheme to make thoſe advantages their own. They forged letters from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, importing an offer to put the place into his hands; and under this pretence they maſſacred all the chief men of the city at a banquet, and then falling upon the reſt, either put them to the ſword, or drove them out of the place. As for the women, they obliged them to marry the murderers of their fathers and huſbands. This news was brought to Rome at a time when the affairs of the republic would not allow her to take vengeance of the perfidious legion; but the republic, having now no enemies to fear, as ſoon as the new conſuls C. Quinctius Claudius and

and L. Genucius Clepſina entered upon their office, ordered the latter to turn his arms againſt Rhegium and beſiege it. The uſurpers not only called to their aſſiſtance the Mamertines, who were originally Campanians and had acted the ſame part at Meſſina, as we have related in the hiſtory of Sicily, but opened an aſylum for all the profligate wretches of the country, who flocked to the city in great crouds from all the neighbouring countries. The Campanians, being thus reinforced, made a vigorous defence, and held out, till, proviſions beginning to fail in the camp of the Romans, Genucius was obliged to have recourſe to Hiero king of Syracuſe, who, by ſupplying him not only with the corn he wanted, but with a reinforcement of ſome Sicilian troops, enabled him at laſt to make himſelf maſter of the place. Of about four thouſand men, of which the guilty legion had at firſt conſiſted, only three hundred remained now alive, the reſt having been killed in the ſeveral attacks made upon the city. Theſe, as the Campanians enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens, were ſent priſoners to Rome to be tried there. The ſenate condemned them all to be firſt beaten with rods and then beheaded; but, in order to prevent a mutiny, which ſo bloody an execution might raiſe among the populace, the criminals were put to death on different days in the forum, by fifty at a time. By this means Rome cleared herſelf of the ſuſpicion of having ſent the Rhegians ſuccours, with no other view, but to ſeize their city. Such of the inhabitants, as had eſcaped the cruelty of the Campanian legion, were, by a decree of the ſenate, reinſtated in the poſſeſſion of their eſtates, liberties, and laws [q].

The perfidious legion at Rhegium puniſhed.

THE following year, C. Genucius and Cn. Cornelius were raiſed to the conſulate. The former gained a victory over the Sarcinates, a people of Umbria, and was on that account honoured with a triumph [r]. The ſucceeding conſuls, Q. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Pictor, were ſent againſt one Lollius a Samnite, who, having made his eſcape from Rome, where he was kept as a hoſtage, had ſeized a ſtrong place in Samnium, and, being joined by the Caricini a people of that country, laid the neighbouring provinces under contribution. The conſuls beſieged the city of the Caricini, which made ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that they were very near failing in the enterprize; however, being at length privately admitted into the city by ſome deſerters, deſerters, they made themſelves maſters of it; but not without the loſs of many legionaries, the beſieged defending themſelves to the laſt with incredible bravery. Under the ſame conſuls, the Romans, who had hitherto uſed no money in commerce, except pieces of braſs,, ſtamped with the figure of a bull, a ram, and a boar, began to coin ſilver and introduce it into commerce. The place appointed for the mint was the temple of Juno Moneta, of which we have ſpoken elſewhere; and hence came the word money [r].

Silver money coined at Rome.

THE following conſuls, P. Sempronius Sophus and Appius Claudius Craſſus, ſon to the famous Appius Claudius, entered Picenum jointly; but new commotions in Umbria obliging them to ſeparate, Appius entered that country; and having made himſelf maſter of Camerinum, ſold all the inhabitants for ſlaves, contrary to his agreement with them, depoſited the money accruing from the ſale in the public treaſury, and ſeized all their lands. But the ſenate had too much equity to authorize ſo wicked a fraud; they cauſed all thoſe unhappy wretches to be carefully ſought out, allowed them the privileges of Roman citizens, granted them a place upon mount Aventine for their habitation, and allotted each of them as much land in property as they had loſt in Umbria. In the mean time, the other conſul, Sempronius Sophus, carried on the war againſt the Picentes with great ſucceſs. He gained a complete victory over them, which, however, coſt him very dear; for he loſt the greater part of his troops in the action (D). Aſculum, the capital of Picenum, ſubmitted to the conqueror, and the whole nation gave themſelves up to Rome; a great encreaſe of power to the republic, this country alone being able to ſupply her armies with three hundred and ſixty thouſand

(D) We are told, that while the two armies were in ſight of each other and ready to engage, a ſudden earthquake greatly terrified the Romans, and damped their ardor for fighting; but Sempronius Sophus, not ſurprized at a natural effect, encouraged them, ſaying, That the earth ſhook only for fear of changing its maſters; and then vowing a temple to the goddeſs Tellus, they quickly recovered their former ardor, and fell upon the Picentes with their uſual intrepidity (21).

ſand men. After this the Romans, the better to ſecure their new conqueſts and keep the conquered nations in awe, ſent out two colonies, one to Ariminum in the country of the Picentes, and another to Beneventum in that of the Samnites. This ſame year the Sabines, who had hitherto had no other privilege but that of being incorporated in the legions, inſtead of ſerving as auxiliaries, were admitted to the right of ſuffrage in the city, which made them entirely Romans [s].

THE conſuls of the following year, L. Julius and M. Attilius Regulus, began a war with the Salentines. Their pretence was, that this nation had favoured the deſcent of Pyrrhus and eſpouſed the cauſe of the Tarentines, a pretence invented by the ambitious republic to rob her neighbours of their liberty. The chief cities of the Salentines were Hydruntum, Aletium, and Brunduſium. This laſt port was what the Romans chiefly coveted. It was ſo advantageouſly ſituated, that, by being maſters of it, they were in a condition to contend with the nations beyond ſea, and to carry war into Africa, Aſia, and Greece. The Salentines diſputed their country inch by inch; and tho' Attilius Regulus took Brunduſium, yet neither he nor his collegue had the glory of ſubduing that gallant nation. Their ſucceſſors, Numerius Fabius and D. Junius Pera, took Aletium and Hydruntum, with other cities, and by that means obliged the Salentines to ſubmit to the yoke. The ſame campaign they ſubdued the Sarcinates in Umbria; and, on their return to Rome, were honoured each with two triumphs for the reduction of two nations, a thing unheard-of before in the republic [t]. The Salentines ſubdued honour, privileges, and liberty, were founded on the different terms granted to the conquered upon their ſurrender, and were afterwards encreaſed, according to their fidelity and the ſervices they did the republic.

AND now the republic was miſtreſs of all the countries in Italy, from the remoteſt part of Hetruria to the Ionian ſea, and from the Tyrrhenian ſea to the Adriatic. But theſe nations did not all enjoy the ſame privileges; ſome were entirely ſubject to Rome, and had no laws but what they received from thence; others retained their old laws and cuſtoms, but in ſubjection to the republic; ſome were tributary, and others allies, and were obliged to furniſh the Roman army with troops, and maintain them at their own expence. Some had the privilege of Roman citizenſhip, their ſoldiers were incorporated in the legions; others had likewiſe a right of ſuffrage in the elections made by the centuries in the campus Martius. Theſe different degrees of honour, The extent of the Roman dominions.

The Apolloniates court the friendſhip of the republic.

THE fame of the Roman name being, after this great encreaſe of power and dominion, ſpread into foreign countries, their friendſhip was courted by free cities and whole nations on the other ſide of the ſea. Apollonia, ſituated over-againſt Brunduſium, was the firſt city of Macedon that ſent embaſſadors to deſire the protection of Rome. Theſe embaſſadors were kindly received by the ſenate; but, upon ſome occaſion not mentioned in hiſtory, inſulted by Fabricius and Apronius, two young patricians and at this time ædiles. The republic would not ſuffer this breach of the laws of nations to go unpuniſhed; they were both tried, and the ſentence paſſed upon them was, that they ſhould be put into the hands of the Apolloniates, carried into Macedon, and there puniſhed at the pleaſure of the people, whom they had offended in the perſons of their embaſſadors. The republic obliged the offenders to abdicate the ædileſhip, before they ſet out from Rome; and left the embaſſadors ſhould be inſulted on the road by the friends and relations of Fabricius and Apronius, they were conducted to Brunduſium, together with the priſoners, by a detachment of troops under the command of a quæſtor. This was ſhewing the Apolloniates great regard; and they, in their turn, ſhewed a prudent reſpect for the republic. The priſoners were hoſpitably received, and then ſent back to Rome. This event gave riſe to a law, which laſted as long as the republic, whereby it was enacted, that, if any citizen, of what quality ſoever, inſulted an embaſſador, he ſhould be delivered up to the injured nation [u].

Provincial quæſtors created.

THE republic enjoying now a profound tranquillity both at home and abroad, the new conſuls, Q. Fabius Gurges and L. Mamilius Vitulus, applied themſelves wholly to the regulating of the public revenues. Theſe aroſe from the tributes each nation was to pay from the rents of certain arable and paſture lands, which the republic reſerved for herſelf as her demeſns, whenever ſhe diſtributed any conquered lands among the citizens; from the tenth of the produce of all lands which were dependent upon her; and laſtly, from the impoſts upon all merchandize imported into her dominions. The four quæſtors, already appointed to

to receive and pay the public monies, were hardly ſufficient to go through the buſineſs, even before the late conqueſts. It being now therefore abſolutely neceſſary to augment the number of theſe officers, four new ones were created, with the title of provincial quæſtors, to take charge of the four provinces into which the republic had divided her conqueſts. The quæſtor of the firſt province reſided at Oſtia, and his quæſtorſhip reached from the ſprings of the Tiber and the Arnus to the mouth of the Liris, and comprehended Hetruria, Latium, Sabinia, Umbria, and in ſhort all the coaſts of the Tuſcan ſea, and all the lands between that ſea and the Appenines. The quæſtor of the ſecond province reſided at Cale in Campania, and had under his juriſdiction all the country between the Liris and the gulf of Tarentum, that is, Campania, Samnium, Lucania, the country of the Brutii, and Oenotria. The third province reached from the Apennines to the ſhore of the Adriatic ſea, and was called the Gallic quæſtorſhip. It contained the countries formerly conquered by the Gauls, eſpecially the Senones, from the Rubicon to the Æſis, and alſo Picenum, the country of the Frentani, and all the other countries as far as Apulia. The fourth quæſtorſhip, of which we have not ſo diſtinct an account as of the other three, could only compriſe Apulia, Calabria, and the territories of the Salentines, Meſſapians, and Tarentines. For theſe four provinces Rome created four new quæſtors; and it was then ſettled, that all the eight quæſtors ſhould for the future be choſen in the comitia by tribes. After the elections, which were renewed every year, the eight quæſtors drew lots in the preſence of the people, to decide who ſhould have the Roman, who the military, and who the provincial quæſtorſhips. The military quæſtors attended the conſuls in their expeditions, kept the military cheſt, paid the troops, and ſold the priſoners and ſpoils taken from the enemy; the Roman quæſtors had care of the public treaſury; the provincial quæſtorſhips were moſtly deſired by the ambitious, before Rome had extended her conqueſts beyond Italy; but little coveted after the republic had brought the eaſt and weſt under ſubjection, and great kingdoms were become ſo many provinces under her dominion.

We have often obſerved, that it was the fate of the Romans to be afflicted with domeſtic misfortunes, when they were not engaged in any war; and this was the caſe at preſent: a contagion broke out, which made a dreadful havock both in the city and country. Hereupon recourſe being had to the Sibylline books, according to cuſtom, it was there ſuppoſed to be found, that ſome ſecret crimes had drawn down the wrath of heaven upon the republic. A veſtal, named Caparania, was found, upon diligent enquiry, guilty of incontinence, and condemned to be buried alive without the gate Collina. The guilty veſtal, to avoid ſo cruel a death, ſtrangled herſelf; but the ſame ceremonies of interment were performed over the dead body, as if ſhe had been living [w]. Notwithſtanding the havock made by the plague, we are told, that, by a cenſus taken this year, the number of citizens fit to bear arms appeared to be two hundred ninety-two thouſand two hundred and twenty-four. Either the plague did not make great ravages in Rome, or in this enumeration the Sabines were comprehended, to whom the right of ſuffrage had been lately granted; for the number of citizens in this cenſus was greater than ever [x]. With this cenſus, and the luſtrum which followed it, ended the magiſtracy of the two cenſors, C. Marcius Rutilus and Cn. Cornelius Blaſio, who had been now five years in their office, and were both men of great probity. The former had been, on account of his extraordinary merit, elected, contrary to cuſtom and his own earneſt remonſtrances, a ſecond time to this high ſtation; and hence he acquired in all likelihood the ſurname of Cenſorinus, which was perpetuated in his family. But, in order to put a ſtop to ſo dangerous a practice, Marcius got a law paſſed, forbidding any perſon to hold the cenſorſhip a ſecond time [y].

A war with the freedmen of Volſinii.

WHILE the two conſuls, Fabius Gurges and Mamilius Vitulus, were employed at home in works of peace, an unexpected war ſprung up in the very bowels of the republic. Volſinii, one of the capital cities of the twelve Hetrurian leucumonies, had been allowed by the Romans to enjoy her antient laws and form of government; but as the inhabitants no longer conſidered themſelves as a free and independent people, they deſpiſed the public offices, and ſuffered their freed-men to uſurp them, giving themſelves wholly up to their pleaſures. Theſe freed-men became by degrees tyrants, in that little republic, and made it their whole buſineſs to humble their old maſters. They took away their wives from them by force, and carried their inſolence and licentiouſneſs ſo far, that they paſſed ſed a law, that no virgin-daughter of a man free-born ſhould be married to a huſband of the like condition, till ſhe had ſubmitted to the paſſion of a freedman. To theſe indignities they added the baniſhments and proſcriptions of the moſt worthy citizens. The Volſinienſes, deſpairing of being able to redreſs their grievances themſelves, ſent deputies to Rome, to implore the aſſiſtance of the republic. The deputies ſet out privately, and carried on their negotiations with great ſecrecy; but nevertheleſs the freed-men, getting notice of the whole, put the deputies to death upon their return; and when the conſul Fabius, who was ſent againſt them with a ſmall army of voluntiers, appeared before their city, they even ventured to face him in the field and give him battle. Fabius put them to the rout; but as he was entering the town with the runaways, he received a mortal wound from an unknown hand. Thus fell a great man, who had been honoured with triumphs, embaſſies, and three conſulates, and who, contrary to the expectation of the great Fabius his father, did no-ways degenerate from the virtue of his anceſtors. The conſul was no ſooner carried out of the croud, than the freed-men facing about fell upon the Romans with ſuch fury, that they obliged them to retire. Then Decius Mus, lieutenant to Fabius, inveſted Volſinii, and began to beſiege it in form; but it was not taken till the arrival of M. Fulvius Flaccus, one of the conſuls for the next year, who forced the freed-men to ſurrender at diſcretion, and put all thoſe who had acted any part in this ſcene of villainy to death. The antient citizens, and thoſe who had not been concerned in the revolt, were tranſplanted to another place, and their city razed. This conduct of Flaccus was ſo agreeable to the republic, that ſhe granted him the honours of a triumph. He entered Rome in ſtate on the calends of February in the year ſucceeding this, which was the year of his conſulate. We have anticipated this latter part of hiſtory, to avoid blending an affair of ſo little importance with the great events we are going to relate in the following chapter, namely, thoſe of the firſt Punic or Carthaginian war.

The conſul Fabius Gurges killed.

CHAP. V.

The history of Rome, from the first Carthaginian war to the second.

The occasion of the first rupture between Rome and Carthage. Year of the Flood, 740. Year before Christ, 259. Of Rome, 489.

THE Carthaginians, when the war first broke out between their republic and that of Rome, were possessed of extensive dominions in Africa, had made considerable acquisitions in Spain, were masters of Sardinia, Corsica, and all the islands on the coasts of Italy, and had extended their conquests to a great part of Sicily. The occasion of the first rupture between the two republics was as follows: The Mamertines, of whom we have spoken at length in the history of Sicily [x], being vanquished in battle and reduced to great straights by Hiero king of Syracuse, had resolved to deliver up Messana, the only city which they now possessed, to that prince, with whose mild government and strict probity they were well acquainted. Accord[illegible] Hiero was advancing, at the head of his troops, to take possession of that important place, when Hannibal, who at that time commanded the Carthaginian army in Sicily, prevented him by a stratagem. The cunning African came to meet Hiero, as it were, to congratulate him on his victory, and amused him, while some of the Carthaginian troops filed off towards Messana. Hereupon the Mamertines, seeing their city supported by a new reinforcement, were divided into several opinions. Some were for accepting the protection Carthage offered them, others were still for surrendering to the king of Syracuse; but the greater part were for calling the Romans to the assistance of a city, whose inhabitants were originally Italians; for the Mamertines were a party of Campanian mercenaries, who having served under Agathocles king of Sicily, on their return home, seized on the city of Messana, into which they had been admitted and entertained as friends, massacred the inhabitants, and took possession of their lands, houses, and wives. The arrival of their deputies at Rome occasioned great debates in the senate; the conscript fathers thought it would cast no small blemish on their reputation to protect a company of villains, who had formerly got possession of Messana by the same treache-

and cruelty, as the perfidious Campanian legion had made themſelves maſters of Rhegium. Shall we, ſaid they, countenance the ſame actions in ſome, which we have, with the utmoſt ſeverity, puniſhed in others? But, on the other hand, looking upon the Carthaginians with an eye of jealouſy, and being well appriſed, that they undertook the defence of that important place, only with a view to ſeize it for themſelves, they were long deliberating what to determine in ſo nice a point. Meſſana, ſaid they, will be ſoon ſubject to the Carthaginians; and if we tamely ſuffer them to get poſſeſſion of a place, which is divided from Italy only by a narrow ſtreight of the ſea, we ſhall ſoon be obliged to engage in a war with them for the defence of our own continent. This ſelfiſh conſideration made moſt of the ſenators forget the regard they had hitherto ſhewn for rigid probity, and come into the meaſures of the people, who, from the very beginning, were eagerly bent upon driving the Carthaginians out of Meſſana. Accordingly it was decreed, that Appius Claudius, ſurnamed [illegible]ex, who was then conſul with M. Fulvius Flaccus, ſhould be ſent over into Sicily to attempt the deliverance of Meſſana. The conſul nevertheleſs continued at Rome, and diſpatched in his ſtead one Claudius, a legionary tribune, a man of great boldneſs and experience in military affairs. The tribune, not thinking it adviſeable to expoſe the few triremes he could get together to the inſults of the Carthaginian fleet, which infeſted the ſtreights, went over to Meſſana in a fiſher-boat, in order to diſcover the diſpoſition of the inhabitants. Upon his arrival, he convened the Mamertines in the uſual place of their aſſemblies, and acquainted them, that he came as a deputy from the Romans, to offer them the aſſiſtance which they had deſired, and aſſured them, that the forces of his republic ſhould be withdrawn, as ſoon as their city and eſtates were in ſafety. The Mamertines, intimidated by the preſence of the Carthaginians, who were already in poſſeſſion of the citadel, made anſwer, That his offers were come too late; and that every free city had a right to call whom ſhe pleaſed to her aſſiſtance. A free city! replied Claudius with a ſneer; are you then in poſſeſſion of your liberty? What do I ſee here but foreign troops, who begin to make you feel the weight of that ſlavery, which you cannot avoid without our aſſiſtance? The Mamertines being ſtruck dumb at theſe words, Claudius, with great intrepidity, declared, that he looked upon their ſilence as a tacit conſent; and quitting the aſſembly, returned ſtreight to Rhegium, and from thence to Rome, where the ſenate, upon his report, judged, that the Mamertines were diſpoſed to receive ſuccours from the republic. The ſame tribune was therefore ordered to ſet ſail and ſteer with the Roman fleet to Meſſana (E). But how weak

(E) Polybius tells us (22), that the Romans were utter ſtrangers to naval affairs, and quite ignorant of the art of building ſhips, before the firſt Punic war. He adds, that it would have been impoſſible for them to build and equip a fleet, had not fortune, who always eſpouſed their cauſe, by a mere accident, inſtructed them in the method; for a Carthaginian galley, which was out a cruiſing, venturing too near the ſhore, chanced to be ſtranded and was taken by the Romans before the mariners could get her off. This galley ſerved them for a model; for they built by it, ſays he, a fleet of a hundred and twenty gallies. The equipment of this fleet ſeemed to him a prodigy, and made him reſolve to write the hiſtory of the firſt Punic war. But that author was certainly miſtaken, when he wrote, that the Romans had no ſhips at ſea before the firſt Punic war; nay, it is no eaſy matter to reconcile him with himſelf on this ſubject; for when he elſewhere (23) ſpeaks of the articles of a treaty agreed on by the Romans and Carthaginians, in the conſulſhip of Brutus and Horatius, immediately after the expulſion of the Tarquins, he tells us, that one of the articles was to this effect, that the Romans, and the allies of the Romans, ſhould not ſail beyond the Fair Promontory, unleſs conſtrained by weather, or by an enemy. In two other treaties, of which he gives us the tranſcripts, there are ſeveral clauſes to the ſame effect. Theſe precautions on the ſide of the Carthaginians manifeſtly ſuppoſe, that the Romans had at that time ſhips, traded to Africa, and were not ſo utterly unacquainted with naval affairs, as Polybius repreſents them to have been at the beginning of the firſt Punic war. Neither can Polybius be underſtood as ſpeaking only of ſhips of war, it being plain from the reaſons of the Tarentine war agreed on by all hiſtorians, that the Romans had at that time a fleet of ten gallies; nay, we are told by all the antients, that, long before the Tarentine war, the conſul Mænius, having ruined the port of Antium, carried part of the fleet of the Antiates, which conſiſted of twenty gallies, to Rome, and laid them up in the place appointed for building ſhips. It is no leſs certain, that many years before the firſt Punic war, the Roman people appointed the duumviri navales, whoſe province was confined to the inſpection and repairing of the ſhips of the republic. It is therefore falſe, that the firſt time the Romans had a fleet, or ventured to ſea, was in the time of the firſt Punic

weak and inconſiderable was this fleet, in compariſon of that which the Carthaginians had brought into the ſtreights! How ignorant were the Romans at that time of ſea affairs! Nevertheleſs the bold tribune weighed anchor; but, being attacked by Hanno the Carthaginian admiral, and having at the ſame time a ſtorm to ſtruggle with, moſt of his ſhips were taken, others daſhed in pieces, and he obliged to return to Rhegium. While Claudius was buſy in refitting his fleet, Hanno ſent back the ſhips he had taken from him, with a view either to pique the Romans in point of honour, or to divert them from ſending ſuccours to Meſſana; but as the deputies, who came to reſtore the ſhips, reproached the Romans with having firſt infringed the treaties of friendſhip between the two nations, and declared, that the Carthaginians would never ſuffer the Romans to be maſters of the ſtreights between Italy and Sicily, nay, not even to waſh their hands in them, Claudius rejected the preſent with the utmoſt indignation, and carried on his preparations with great vigour. Having refitted his ſmall fleet in the beſt manner he could, he put to ſea again, and timed his enterprize ſo well, that he eluded the vigilance of the Carthaginians, and got ſafe into the port of Meſſana. Hanno, who was now become commander of the land forces, upon the arrival of Claudius, abandoned the city to the Romans, and retired into the citadel. Claudius, ſeeing himſelf in poſſeſſion of the city, deſired the Mamertines to ſummon an aſſembly, and to invite Hanno to it. The Carthaginian, for fear of ſhewing a diſtruſt of thoſe whom he pretended to protect, complied with the ſummons and appeared in the aſſembly. The two generals reproached each other in bitter terms, till at length Claudius was ſo provoked, that he ordered ſome brave legionaries, who attended him, to arreſt Hanno, and keep him priſoner. The Mamertines applauding the reſolution of the Roman, Claudius made good uſe of this declaration in his favour. What by menaces, and what by perſuaſions, he prevailed on the Carthaginian to ſurrender up the citadel to him; a piece of cowardice which coſt the unhappy Hanno dear; for he was, on his return home, crucified by order of the ſenate. The Carthaginians, reſolved at all events to drive the Romans mans out of Meſſana, raiſed both ſea and land-forces, and diſpatched them into Sicily, under the command of another Hanno, who, arriving with this fleet at Lilybæum, prevailed upon Hiero, king of Syracuſe, to enter into an alliance with his republic, and to inveſt Meſſana jointly with him. Hitherto the conſul Appius had not appeared in the diſpute, ſo that had the Carthaginians ſtopt their proceedings, all the ſteps, taken only by a tribune of the army, might have been diſowned. But a monſtrous piece of cruelty, committed by Hanno, determined Rome to keep no longer any meaſures with her rival. That general, upon the refuſal of Claudius to ſurrender up Meſſana to him, cauſed all the Italians who ſerved in his army to be inhumanly maſſacred; which was no ſooner heard at Rome, than the conſul Appius haſtened his departure from thence and came to Rhegium. As he apprehended both danger and diſhonour in the enterprize, he ſent from Rhegium deputies to king Hiero, conjuring him, by the antient friendſhip between the Romans and him, to deſiſt from the ſiege he had undertaken. Hiero in anſwer reproached the Romans not only with ingratitude to him, but with deviating from their pretended equity in protecting the treacherous tyrants of Meſſana, eminently guilty of the ſame crime which Rome had ſeverely puniſhed in the Campanian legion at Rhegium. Appius, having received this anſwer, reſolved to paſs over into Sicily, purſuant to the orders of the ſenate; but, to conceal his deſign, he gave out, that he could not venture upon that enterpriſe before he conſulted the ſenate. This report reaching the Carthaginian fleet made them watch the ſtreights with leſs care and vigilance. In the mean time, Appius, going on board a galley, built unſkilfully and in great haſte, pretended only to coaſt along the ſhore in his way to Rome; but as ſoon as he was out of ſight, he tacked about, and, being favoured by a dark night, reached with ſome tranſports the neareſt ſhore of Sicily, and landed his forces, without being perceived by the enemy either at ſea or land. For this bold enterpriſe he got the ſurname of Caudex, which then ſignified a boat ill-built. Claudius, encouraged by this ſucceſs, advanced in all haſte with his legions againſt the king of Syracuſe, who blocked up Meſſana on the ſide of mount Chalcis, and having ſurpriſed and defeated him, entered triumphantly into Meſſana, highly delighted with gaining the firſt victory the Romans had ever obtained out of their continent. After this defeat, Hiero, thinking himſelf betrayed trayed by the Carthaginians, who had ſuffered him to be ſurpriſed by not guarding the ſtreights, decamped haſtily in the night, and, giving way to his diſtruſts, returned to Syracuſe. Claudius, receiving next morning intelligence of his retreat, reſolved to loſe no time, but forthwith to attack the Carthaginians. Purſuant to this reſolution, he made a briſk ſally, and routed them with great ſlaughter. Having thus raiſed the ſiege of Meſſana, he over-ran the lands of the Syracuſans like a torrent, pillaged and laid waſte the whole country, and, having no enemy in the field to contend with, advanced to the very gates of Syracuſe. But the year being already far ſpent, he ſoon returned with his troops to Meſſana, and, having left a ſtrong garriſon in that city, paſſed over to Rhegium, and from thence purſued his journey to Rome [y]. Eutropius [z] and Silius Italicus [a] tell us, that he received the honours of a triumph for his Sicilian expedition; but we find no mention made of it in the triumphal tables.

THE ſucceeding conſuls, Manius Octacilius Craſſus and Manius Valerius Flaccus, were ordered to transport into Sicily two conſular armies, conſiſting each of eight thouſand legionaries and twelve hundred horſe, with a great number of auxiliaries. Upon their arrival moſt of the towns, that had ſubmitted to the Carthaginians and Syracuſans, delivered themſelves up to the Romans; inſomuch, that in a few months they ſaw themſelves maſters of ſixty-ſeven places, among which were Taurominium and Catana, two cities of great importance. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, they reſolved to undertake the ſiege of Syracuſe, the capital of the iſland, and at that time one of the greateſt cities in the world. They had no ſooner inveſted it, than Hiero, being now ſenſible that he had formed a wrong judgment touching the iſſue of the war, and that the hopes of the Romans were founded on better meaſures than thoſe of the Carthaginians, ſent out deputies to treat with the former of a peace. The conſuls readily embraced the overture, knowing that, by entering into an alliance with Syracuſe, they ſhould be plentifully ſupplied with proviſions, for want of which they had been the laſt year reduced to great ſtreights by the Carthaginians, who were maſters at ſea. They therefore agreed to a treaty with the king on the following following conditions; that Hiero ſhould releaſe all the Roman priſoners without ranſom, and pay the republic a hundred talents of ſilver. Upon theſe conditions, which were approved of by the Roman ſenate and people, Rome promiſed to acknowledge Hiero as a friend to their republic, and to protect his dominions from all hoſtilities [b].

The Romans, having now no enemies to contend with but the Carthaginians, and being ſupplied with all manner of proviſions by Hiero, now their friend and ally, made themſelves maſters of all the places on the weſtern coaſt of Sicily. The inhabitants of Segeſta and Aliena maſſacred the African garriſon, and opened their gates to the conſuls. The cities of Hilara, Tyrita, and Aſcela were beſieged in form, taken by aſſault, and treated with great rigor. The campaign being ended, the two conſuls carried back moſt of their troops with them, and, putting them in winter quarters on the coaſt of Italy, returned to Rome, where Valerius was decreed a triumph, which he enjoyed on the ſixteenth of the calends of April. His ſurname of Meſſala, and this mark of diſtinction, which he alone received, plainly ſhew, that he had ſignalized himſelf above his collegue in the defence of Meſſana and the wars with Hiero and the Carthaginians [c]. This year Cn. Fulvius Centumalus was created dictator, who choſe Q. Marcius Philippus for his general of the horſe. But their only buſineſs was to drive a nail into the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, to ſtop a plague which raged at Rome.

The new conſuls, L. Poſthumius Megellus and Q Mamilius Vitulus, were both ordered into Sicily. But the republic, depending on the alliance of king Hiero, thought it adviſeable to leſſen the number of troops in that ſervice, and therefore appointed them two legions only. They ſet out from Rome, and, embarquing at Rhegium, landed at Meſſana, without meeting with any oppoſition in their paſſage. They no ſooner came aſhore, than they aſſembled the reinforcements they were to receive in the country, and with them marched ſtreight to Agrigentum, which the Carthaginians had made their magazine of arms and proviſions. The place was very ſtrong by nature, and had been rendered almoſt impregnable by the new works, with which the Carthaginians had ſecured it during the winter, with a view to make it their aſylum or place of refuge, in caſe caſe of any miſcarriage or diſaſter. Beſides, it was defended by a very numerous garriſon under the command of Hannibal, a general of known valour and great experience in war. However, the Romans came and encamped before the place, blocking it up on all ſides. As it was then harveſt-time and the fruitful fields of Sicily were covered with corn, the conſuls gave their ſoldiers [illegible] to go and reap it in ſmall parties, in order to provide [illegible] the wants which uſually attend long ſieges. Hannibal reſolved to take advantage of this relaxation of military diſ[illegible]ne, and made two ſallies at the ſame time, one upon [illegible] reapers, and the other upon the Roman camp. The reapers, not being able to rally ſoon enough, were overpowered by the Carthaginians, and for the moſt part cut in pieces. But the Romans in the camp repulſed the enemy with great ſlaughter, and purſued them to the very gates of the city. After this action the Carthaginians were more cautious in their ſallies, and the conſuls took care not to ſuffer their men to go out and forage in ſmall parties. [illegible] now, the Carthaginians making no more ſallies, the R[illegible]mans thought it adviſeable to divide their army into two bodies. With one they encamped near the temple of Æſculapius, at ſome diſtance from the city, with the other on the ro[illegible] to Heraclea. A large ditch was thrown up round th[illegible] city to guard the camps againſt the ſallies of the beſieged, and a ſecond line beyond the two camps to ſecure them from any ſurprize from without, and to prevent proviſions from being conveyed into the city. The Roma[illegible]s were plentifully ſupplied with all neceſſaries from Erbeſſa, a city not far from Agrigentum, whither they were brought from all parts of Sicily, and ſafely conveyed from thence to the camps. Thus the Romans continued before the place five months, hoping to reduce it by famine. And indeed, as there were no fewer than fifty thouſand ſouls in Agrigentum, the city was ſoon reduced to great ſtreights. But Hannibal kept up their courage with promiſes, and from time to time diſpatched, notwithſtanding the vigilance of the Romans, meſſengers to Carthage to ſolicit ſpeedy ſuccours. Hereupon the Carthaginians, having levied what troops they could in Africa, Spain, Gaul, and Liguria, put on board a fleet, under the command of Hanno, fifty thouſand choſen foot, ſix thouſand horſe, and ſixty elephants, ordering them to ſail to Sicily, and attempt at all adventures the relief of Agrigentum. Hanno, without loſs of time, ſet ſail, an[illegible]anding his forces at Lilybœum, marched ed from thence to Heraclea, within twenty miles of Agrigentum. There he received a deputation from ſome of the inhabitants of Erbeſſa, where the Romans had their magazines, offering to put the town into his hands. The Carthaginian, overjoyed at this meſſage, marched with all his forces ſtreight to Erbeſſa, which was accordingly delivered up to him, ſo that the Romans, who were the beſiegers, became themſelves beſieged: all their convoys were intercepted, and they reduced to ſuch ſtreights, that they often deliberated about raiſing the ſiege, and had certainly abandoned the enterprize, had not Hiero afforded them what help he could, which with great parſimony ſupported them, but was not enough for their convenient ſubſiſtence; ſo that diſtempers, the uſual conſequences of ſcarcity, ſpread in the Roman army, and daily ſwept off great numbers. But, in the mean time, Agrigentum being reduced to the utmoſt extremity by famine, Hannibal found means to acquaint Hanno with the deplorable condition of the place, who thereupon reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement, thinking himſelf now a match for the Romans, who were greatly weakened by ſickneſs and diſtempers. Accordingly, having acquainted Hannibal with his deſign and ordered him to make a ſally the moment the Romans appeared in the plain, he marched with all his troops from Heraclea, ſending his Numidian horſe before, with orders to advance to the very intrenchments of the Romans, as if they deſigned to force them; but in caſe the Romans ſallied out upon them, they were to retire towards the army. Theſe orders were punctually executed, and the Roman cavalry ſallying out upon the Numidians and purſuing them too far, were ſurrounded by the whole army, and either taken or cut in pieces. Notwithſtanding this advantage, Hanno poſting himſelf on mount Taurus, about a mile and a half from the Romans, continued there two months without ſhewing any inclination to come to a deciſive action. At length Hannibal giving him notice, as well by ſignals from the town, as by expreſſes, that the garriſon could no longer hold out, and that they deſerted by companies to the Romans, Hanno was forced to venture an engagement, to which the Romans were equally diſpoſed, being in great want of proviſions. The two armies therefore drew up in a large plain between the two camps, and engaged with incredible fury. The ſucceſs continued doubtful, till the mercenaries, who were in the van guard of the Carthaginian army, gave way and fled.

In

In their flight they fell in among the elephants, which they put into diſorder, and by that means entirely broke the line that ſuſtained the rear. By this accident the whole army being diſcompoſed, the Carthaginians, quitting their ranks, betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight, the Romans purſuing them with great ſlaughter. Hannibal attempted to make a ſally and bring his forces to the aſſiſtance of Hanno; but was repulſed by the troops which the conſuls had poſted at all the avenues to the city, and obliged to return, after he had loſt a great number of his men. In this battle the Romans took eleven elephants, wounded three, and killed thirty. As to the number of men killed in the action and purſuit, it is not exactly known. The enemy after the defeat retired to Heraclea, which they gained with much difficulty, the plain being all covered with dead bodies [d].

HANNIBAL, perceiving that the Romans after the fatigues of ſo glorious a day were leſs upon their guard, ſallied out at midnight with the greateſt part of his troops, and, filling up the Roman trenches with faggots, made his eſcape, and retired with his forces to a place of ſafety. The Agrigentines, to revenge themſelves for being thus abandoned, and at the ſame time to make their court to the conſuls, maſſacred the Carthaginians who were left in the city. But ſuch cruelties not being agreeable to the Romans, the conſuls gave up the city, after it had ſurrendered at diſcretion, to be plundered; and above twenty-five thouſand perſons of free condition were made ſlaves. Such was the ſucceſs of a ſiege, which laſted at leaſt ſeven months, and was the moſt remarkable and difficult the Romans had ever yet undertaken. The conqueſt was both an important and a glorious one: but it coſt the beſiegers dear; for they are ſaid to have loſt, what in the battle and in the frequent ſkirmiſhes, and what by famine and other hardſhips, about thirty thouſand men, Romans and allies [e]. The campaign being ended with the taking of Agrigentum, the conſuls returned to Meſſana, and from thence to Rome. Eutropius tells us, that they both triumphed; but the ſilence of all other writers, eſpecially of the triumphal tables, inclines us to believe, that the ſenate and people did not grant them that mark of diſtinction for reaſons unknown to us. Perhaps they intended by this refuſal to puniſh them for ſuffering ing Hannibal to make his eſcape, which was entirely owing to their neglect in keeping the guards with the uſual vigilance.

THE reduction of Agrigentum inſpired the Romans with hopes of conquering all Sicily. The only difficulty was how to make themſelves maſters of the maritime cities without the aſſiſtance of a fleet, equal at leaſt to that of Carthage. Hitherto they had tranſported their troops on board of veſſels borrowed of their neighbours, the Tarentines, Locrians, Neapolitans, &c. But now the republic formed a deſign of being as formidable at ſea as ſhe was by land, and ordered a hundred and twenty veſſels to be built after the model of a Carthagenian galley, which, venturing too near the ſhore, had been ſtranded and taken. The Romans immediately ſet about this laborious piece of work, cut down trees in their foreſts, and conveyed them to the ſea-ſide, with an expedition peculiar to themſelves. This fleet was equipped, as Polybius informs us, in two months time, reckoning from the day the trees began to be cut in the foreſts, and conſiſted of a hundred galleys with five benches of rowers, and twenty with three. While ſome were employed in building the gallyes, others aſſembling thoſe who were to ſerve in the fleet, inſtructed them in the uſe of the oar after the following manner, which at firſt ſeemed ſomewhat ridiculous: They contrived benches on the ſhore in the ſame faſhion and order as they were to be in the galleys, and placing their ſeamen with their oars in like manner upon the benches, an officer, by ſigns with his hand, inſtructed them how to dip their oars all at the ſame time, and how to recover them out of the water. By this means they became acquainted with the management of the oar; and as ſoon as the veſſels were built and equipped, they ſpent ſome time in practiſing on the water what they had learnt aſhore [e].

The Romans equip a fleet.

BUT while the galleys were yet on the ſtocks, the new conſuls, L. Valerius Flaccus and T. Octacilius, brother to M. Octacilius, who had been conſul two years before, ſet out for Sicily, where they eaſily reduced all the cities that were at any diſtance from the ſea. But while they were ſubduing the inland countries, the Carthaginians either kept ſteady in their intereſt, or brought under ſubjection, all the places on the coaſt. So that both parties were equally ſucceſsful.

In the beginning of the conſulate of Cn. Cornelius Scipio and C. Duilius, the fleet being equipped and all things ready for their departure, the two conſuls choſe their different commands by lot. The command of the fleet fell to Cornelius, and that of the land-forces to Duilius. The latter immediately ſet out with two legions, and paſſed the ſtreights. Cornelius followed him with ſe nteen of the new-built galleys, ſteering his courſe a.ong the coaſt to Meſſana, to give directions there for the reception and ſecurity of the fleet. Upon his arr.. at that port, he was informed, ſome ſay by men ..red for that purpoſe by Hannibal, that the iſland and city of Lipara would ſurrender to the Romans upon the firſt ſummons. Cornelius, giving credit to this report, immediately ſet ſail with his ſquadron for Lipara, and entered that port. But at break of day he found himſelf blocked up by a greater number of Carthaginian veſſels, under the command of one Boodes a ſenator. In this ſurprize, Cornelius ſaw no remedy but to ſubmit, and accordingly yielded up himſelf and his ſquadron to the enemy. Thus far Polybius [f]. But Livy [g] tells us, that the Carthaginian invited Cornelius and his tribunes, that is, the commanders of his gall.ys, on board his ſhip, to confer about the differences be..n the two republics in an amicable manner; and that the conſul being weak enough to truſt to the honour of Boodes, was ſeized by him with all his officers, and ſent to Carthage: This author adds, that the ſquadron, being thus deprived of all its commanders, ſurrendered without fighting. Thus the firſt attempt of the new fleet proved very diſadvantageous and unſucceſsful. In the mean time, the hundred and three Roman galleys, which had remained in the ports, ſet ſail according to the orders Cornelius had given, and, coaſting along Italy, made the beſt of their way towards the mouth of the ſtreights. Hannibal, upon advice that the Roman fleet was at ſea, ſailed out with a ſquadron of fifty galleys to take a view of their new-faſhioned veſſels. But his curioſity coſt him dear. For the Roman fleet appearing, when he leaſt expected it, immediately attacked his ſquadron, which was diſperſed about, with great vigor, and either ſunk or took the greateſt part of his galleys, Hannibal himſelf eſcaping with great difficulty, when his whole fleet believed him loſt. Thus the

the Carthaginian admiral, upon the firſt trial he made in perſon of the ſkill of the Romans at ſea, was obliged to quit the action with ſhame and retire, after having been in great danger himſelf. The Romans, after this victory, purſued their courſe to Sicily, and being informed of the defeat and captivity of Cornelius, who was to have commanded then they ſent an expreſs forthwith for Duilius, who had the command of the land-forces in the iſland. Duilius, being now left ſole commander both at ſea and land, went immediately, without heſitation, on board the fleet. But the reflection he made on the heavineſs of his galleys did not a little abate his confidence. For the Romans plainly ſaw, even in the battle, wherein they had all the advantage, that their veſſels were not built with great art, but were very unwieldy in working, and wanted the lightneſs of thoſe they were to engage with. But while he was ruminating on this matter, an engineer in the fleet found means to make amends for this defect, by deviſing that machine, which was afterwards called corvus. All hiſtorians agree, that the uſe of this contrivance was to ſtop the enemy's ſhips as ſoon as the Romans came up with them, and thereby give them an opportunity of boarding them. But it is no eaſy matter to find out how theſe machines were built. Polybius gives us the following deſcription of them: They erected, ſays he, on the prow of their veſſels a round piece of timber about a foot and a half diameter, and about twelve foot long, on the top whereof they had a block or pully. Round this piece of timber they laid a ſtage or platform of boards, four foot broad and about eighteen foot long, which was well framed and faſtened with iron. The entrance was longways, and it moved about the aboveſaid upright p -e of timber, as on a ſpindle, and could be hoiſted up within ſix foot of the top. About this was a ſort of parapet knee high, which was defended with upright bars of iron ſharpened at the end, towards the top whereof there was a ring, through which faſtening a rope, by the help of the pully, they hoiſted and lowered the engine at pleaſure. With this they attacked the enemy's veſſels, ſometimes on their bow, and ſometimes on their broad-ſide, as occaſion beſt ſerved. When they had grappled the enemy with theſe iron ſpikes, if they happened to ſwing broadſide to broadſide, then they entered from all parts; but in caſe they attacked them on the bow, they entered two and two by the

the help of this engine; the foremoſt defending the fore-part, and thoſe who followed the flanks, keeping the boſs of their bucklers level with the top of the parapet. Thus Polybius deſcribes the corvus [h].

THE invention of this machine, of which a trial was made, giving the conſul more confidence, he left the command of the land-forces to his ſubalterns, and going on board the fleet, ſet ſail for Mylæ to encounter the enemy, who had made a deſcent on that coaſt. The Carthaginians, who deſpiſed the Romans as quite ignorant of ſea-affairs, were overjoyed when they firſt deſcried their fleet. They did not ſo much as give themſelves the trouble to draw up their ſhips in line of battle, but advanced with a ſquadron in diſorder up to the unweildy triremes of the Romans, dreaming of nothing but certain victory. As they approached, they were at firſt ſurpriſed at the ſight of the engine we have deſcribed above, and ſtood ſome time in ſuſpenſe, not knowing the uſe of it. But the boldeſt of the Carthaginians, looking upon this machine as ſome fooliſh invention of perſons not acquainted with the ſea, rowed up with confidence to the Roman galleys, and by the boldneſs with which they attacked them, ſhewed how little account they made of their engines. The Romans grappling with them by the help of their corvi, and boarding their ſhips with great eaſe, fought hand to hand with them upon deck as on firm ground. As the Romans were more expert in this kind of fight than the Carthaginians, and better armed, they ſoon gained the aſcendant over them, and took thirty ſhips, with all thoſe who were on board of them. Among theſe was the admiral's own galley, which was a ſeptiremis taken formerly by the Carthaginians from the king Pyrrhus. Hannibal himſelf was on board of it; but when he ſaw the Romans entering his galley, he leaped into a ſmall boat and eſcaped, when he was by all given for loſt. At length the reſt of the Carthaginian fleet, conſiſting of a hundred and twenty galleys, came up, and fell upon the Roman fleet, as they had greatly the advantage in the lightneſs of their veſſels, they nimbly rowed round the Roman galleys, in order to avoid the corvi. But the Romans having learnt the art of working their ſhips, ſo as to preſent their machines machines to the enemy, which way ſoever they approached them, they took fifty more of the Carthaginian ſhips, and obliged the reſt to retire into the neighbouring ports of Sicily. In theſe two engagements the Romans took ſeven thouſand priſoners, killed ſeven thouſand men, ſunk thirteen ſhips, and took eighty. After this victory Duilius, going aſhore, put himſelf at the head of the land-forces, relieved Segeſta beſieged by Hamilcar, and made himſelf maſter of Macella, though defended by a numerous garriſon. The campaign being ended, Duilius returned to Rome, but left his legions in Sicily. During his abſence, a diſpute aroſe between them and the Sicilian auxiliaries. The Sicilians complained, that the Romans were always placed in the moſt honourable poſts, that is, in the moſt dangerous. The difference came to ſuch a height, that the Sicilians ſeparated from the Romans and encamped by themſelves. Hamilcar, who was too vigilant not to draw advantages from this miſunderſtanding, attacked the Sicilians in their intrenchments, and put four thouſand of them to the ſword. He then drove the Romans from their poſts, took ſeveral cities from them, and over-ran great part of the country. In the mean time, Hannibal, after having been overcome in the ſea engagement by the Romans, leaving Sicily, ſailed with the remains of his ſhattered fleet to Carthage. But, in order to ſecure himſelf from puniſhment, ſent one of his friends with all ſpeed, before the battle was known there, to acquaint the ſenate, that the Romans had put to ſea with a good number of heavy ill-built veſſels, carrying ſome machines, which the Carthaginians had never ſeen before, and conſequently knew not the uſe of. After the meſſenger had given the ſenate this account of the Roman fleet, he aſked them whether it was their opinion, that Hannibal ſhould attack them? The anſwer was unanimous; Let our admiral, they cried out with one voice, fight the Romans, and puniſh them for daring to brave us on our element. Then Hannibal's friend acquainted them with what had happened. What you now command, ſaid he, Hannibal has ventured to do. Fortune indeed has not favoured him; but who can be anſwerable for the event of things? Hannibal thought as you do. And ſhall the uncertainty of fortune be deemed a crime? And the ſenators could not condemn him without condemning themſelves

WHILE the Carthaginians were thus diſgracing their unfortunate admiral, the Romans were heaping honours on the brave Duilius. A victory gained by ſea was more valued at this juncture, than all the conqueſts their conſuls and dictators had formerly made by land. The conſul entered the city in triumph, attended with the acclamations of all Rome. A mark of diſtinction was granted him, which had never been heard of before. Whenever he returned from ſupper, he was attended with muſic and flambeaux. This honour was granted for once only to thoſe who triumphed; and this was when they returned home in the evening from the ſolemn feaſt, which was prepared at the expence of the public for the cloſe of the triumph. But to Duilius this diſtinction was continued as long as he lived. Cicero [k] and Florus [l] ſeem to inſinuate, that Duilius aſſumed this uncommon mark of diſtinction without the conſent of the ſenate and people. But it is not probable, that either the patricians or plebeians, who called the leaſt ſtep towards an independency a ſtate crime, would have ſuffered a private perſon to aſſume this ſingular privilege. It is more probable, that Duilius demanded it as a reward for his ſervices. To perpetuate the memory of his triumph, medals were ſtruck, and a pillar of white marble was erected to his honour in the Forum Romanum (F).

THE conſuls for the next year were L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Aquilius Florus. The command of the fleet fell by lot to the former, and that of the land-forces to the latter. They were both ordered into Sicily, but Cornelius had leave to make an attempt upon the iſlands of Corſica and Sardinia, if an opportunity offered. While he was getting ready the fleet in the different ports of Italy, his collegue was detained at Rome to ſuppreſs a dangerous conſpiracy. The republic had cauſed a great number of men to be brought to Rome, from all the provinces ſubject to her, to ſerve as rowers on board her galleys. Among theſe were four thouſand Samnites, who, being unwilling to enter into the ſea ſervice, and finding a plot already formed by the diſcontented ſlaves to burn and plunder the city, readily entered into the conſpiracy, and joined the ſlaves, who were three thouſand in number. As they wanted a head, they pitched upon one Errius Potitius, who commanded the auxiliaries and was a man of known experience. Errius ſeemed to go heartily into their meaſures, till he had learnt the whole ſecret, and then he diſcovered it to the ſenate. All the ſlaves were put in irons by their maſters, and the Samnites impriſoned.

DURING

Silius ſpeaks more like an hiſtorian than a poet in this place. The Columna Roſtrata was accidentally recovered in 1560, and placed by the care of cardinal Alexander Farneſe in the capitol. Juſtus Lipſius and Ciaconius have endeavoured to fill up the chaſms of the inſcription on the pedeſtal, which are in old Latin. The ſubſtance of it, according to their interpretation, is as follows: Caius Duilius conſul, the ſon of Marcus, general of the Roman army in Sicily againſt the Carthaginians, forced Hamilcar to raiſe the ſiege of Segeſta, a city in friendſhip and alliance with the Roman people, and obliged him to return on board his fleet, after he had left his camp and nine elephants, to the mercy of the enemy. Then he took Macella, one of the ſtrongeſt places in Sicily. He fitted out a fleet in the ſpace of ſixty days, defeated the Carthaginians, commanded by Hannibal, at ſea, took from them thirty ſhips, with all their rigging, and the ſeptiremis which carried the admiral himſelf; ſunk thirty; and took ſeveral priſoners of diſtinction, who walked before his chariot, and added to the glory of his triumph. In memory of which exploits, the Roman ſenate and people erected this pillar. This inſcription on the baſis of the pillar, which every curious ſtranger viſits at Rome, ſhews us the way of writing in the early times of the republic.

DURING theſe diſtractions at Rome, Cornelius had weighed anchor, and was already on the coaſts of Corſica. As men are generally fond of new undertakings, the conſul thought the two iſlands of Corſica and Sardinia worthy of a campaign. And indeed, no conqueſt, next to that of Sicily, could ſo well anſwer the end the republic then had in view, which was to gain the empire of the ſea. The Carthaginians, who were then maſters of them, had fortified ſome cities there, in order to be nearer to Italy, and make themſelves formidable to the maritime coaſts. The firſt the conſul attacked was Corſica, which he eaſily reduced, after he had made himſelf maſter of Aleria, the only ſtrong place in the iſland. From Corſica he ſailed to Sardinia, and appeared with his fleet off Olbia, a large city on the eaſt ſide of the iſland. But as the place was defended by a numerous garriſon, and the conſul wanted land-forces, he ſailed back to Italy, took on board his fleet as many troops as he could conveniently carry, and returning to Sardinia, made a deſcent, and laid ſiege to Olbia. Hanno, who had behaved ſo well in Sicily, defended the place with incredible bravery; but, he being killed in one of the attacks, the Carthaginians were obliged to ſurrender the place to the conqueror, who gave the Africans an inſtance of humanity, to which they were utter ſtrangers. He honoured the dead body of their general with magnificent obſequies, and attended it in perſon to the place of burial [1]. The conſul did not ſuffer the ardor of his troops to cool; but beſieged and took moſt of the maritime cities, driving the Carthaginians every-where before him.

The Romans conquer Corſica and Sardinia.

IN the mean time, Aquilius, arriving in Sicily, repaired the loſſes the republic had ſuſtained there ſince the departure of Duilius. Hamilcar had taken from the Romans the cities of Enna and Camerina, and fortified Drepanum, a place of great importance on account of its harbour. As the conſul Aquilius had been detained at Rome to ſuppreſs the conſpiracy, and did not arrive in Sicily till the campaign was near ended, the republic recalled his collegue Cornelius to preſide at the election of the new conſuls; when A. Atilius Collatinus and C. Sulpicius Paterculus were choſen. The command of the fleet fell to the latter, and that of the land-forces to Attilius. As for Aquilius, he was continued in the command of the army in Sicily with the title of proconſul, till the arrival of Attilius; during which ſhort time he drove Hamilcar quite out of the field, and laying ſiege to Myſiſtratum, a city of great ſtrength, which the Romans had often endeavoured in vain to reduce, brought it to ſuch ſtreights, that it ſurrendered to his ſucceſſor Attilius ſoon after his arrival. The proconſul upon his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, as was his collegue Cornelius for the conqueſts he had made in Sicily and Sardinia [m]. From Myſiſtratum, Attilius led his army to Camerina, but on his way was all on a ſudden ſurrounded in a deep valley by the Carthaginians, who, under the command of Hamilcar, lay concealed on the hills all round it, ſo that, all the avenues being blocked up, he could neither advance nor retire. In this extremity a legionary tribune, called by ſome writers Cæditius, by others Laberius, but by the greateſt number M. Calpurnius Flamma, deſired the conſul to give him three hundred choſen men, promiſing to find the enemy ſo much employment with this ſmall company, as ſhould oblige them to leave a paſſage open for the Roman army. He performed his promiſe with a bravery truly heroic; for having ſeized, in ſpite of all oppoſition, an eminence, and intrenched himſelf on it, the Carthaginians, jealous of his deſign, flocked from all quarters to drive him from his poſt. But the brave tribune kept their whole army in play, till the conſul, taking advantage of the diverſion, drew his army out of the bad ſituation, into which he had imprudently brought it. When the legions were out of danger, they haſtened to the relief of their brave companions; but all they could do was only to ſave their bodies from the inſults of the enemy, for they found them all dead in the place, on which they had poſted themſelves, except Calpurnius, who lay under a heap of dead bodies, covered all over with wounds, but ſtill breathing. His wounds were immediately dreſſed, and it fortunately happened, that none of them proved mortal. The brave officer recovered, and for this glorious enterpriſe was rewarded with a crown of gramen, which was in thoſe happy days a greater encouragement to the Romans to ſerve their country, than the hopes of more ſubſtantial rewards [n].

The Roman army ſaved by the bravery of a legionary tribune.

The Romans take ſeveral cities in Sicily.

Attilius, being thus reſcued from the Caudine Forks, we may ſay, in Sicily, purſued his march to Camerina, which he took by the help of engines ſent him by Hiero king king of Syracuſe, and ſold all the Carthaginians in the place for ſlaves. He then marched to Enna, the inhabitants of which place opened the gates to him, delivering the Carthaginians up to the Romans, who put them all to the ſword. Sittana was taken by aſſault, and the army, which came to relieve it, put to flight. From hence the conſul led his army into the country of the Agrigentines, and, by making himſelf maſter of Camicus and Erbeſſa, drove the enemy quite out of that fruitful territory. Attilius, flushed with this ſucceſs, raſhly laid ſiege to Lipara, expecting it would ſurrender upon the firſt ſummons. But Hamilcar, having conveyed himſelf privately into the city with ſome choſen troops, made a ſally, when the Romans were beginning to ſcale the walls, and repulſed them with great loſs [o].

As for Sulpicius, who commanded the fleet, he completed the conqueſt of Corſica and Sardinia, and aſſiſted his collegue in the reduction of the maritime cities of Sicily. But this was not enough for the brave conſul. He was ambitious of ſignalizing his campaign by a naval victory; but as no Carthaginian fleet appeared at ſea, he ſpread a report, that he intended to go in queſt of it, and burn the ſhips of the African republic in their harbours. This news alarmed the Carthaginians, who thereupon truſted Hannibal once more with the command of a conſiderable fleet. He immediately put to ſea, and met Sulpicius not far from the coaſt of Africa. But while both fleets were preparing for an engagement, a ſudden ſtorm parted them, and drove the Roman, as well as the Carthaginian, veſſels into the ports of Sardinia. The ſtorm no ſooner began to abate, than Sulpicius putting to ſea ſurpriſed Hannibal in the harbour, and either ſunk or took moſt of his ſhips. This misfortune occaſioned a mutiny among the ſeamen of his fleet, who ſeizing on the perſon of their commander, crucified him in the city of Sulci in Sardinia, where he had taken refuge. Such was the end of old Hannibal, as he is called by the hiſtorians to diſtinguiſh him from the ſecond Hannibal, who proved ſo fatal to the Romans. Sulpicius after this victory returned to Rome, where he received the honours of a triumph.

The Carthaginian fleet ſurpriſed by the Romans.

THE conſuls of the following year, C. Attilius Regulus and Cn. Cornelius Blaſio, having, according to cuſtom, drawn lots for their commands, that of the fleet fell to Regulus, and the leading of the land-forces to Cornelius. A. Attilius was continued in the command of the army in Sicily with the title of proconſul. Regulus, who commanded the Roman fleet, being at Tyndaris, deſcried that of the Carthaginians lying along the coaſt in diſorder. Whereupon, at the head of a ſquadron of ten galleys only, he advanced to obſerve their number and ſtrength, ordering the reſt of his fleet to follow with all poſſible expedition. But as he drew too near the enemy, he was on a ſudden inveſted by a far greater number of Carthaginian galleys. The Romans fought with their uſual bravery, but being overpowered by numbers, were obliged to yield. However, the conſul found means to make his eſcape and join the fleet, which was following the unfortunate ſquadron in line of battle. He then had his full revenge on the enemy, who were put in diſorder at the firſt onſet, and obliged to ſave themſelves in the port of Lipara, after having loſt eighteen ſhips, ten of which were taken, with all their crews, and eight ſunk. For this victory C. Attilius Regulus, on his return to Rome, received the honours of a triumph, as did alſo A. Attilius for his exploits at land, during his conſulſhip and proconſulſhip. As for the conſul Cornelius, he had no opportunity to ſignalize himſelf: he is ſaid only to have pillaged ſome open villages, and laid waſte the iſland of Melita, which were too inconſiderable exploits to deſerve a triumph [p]. Rome was terrified with ſeveral prodigies during this campaign; whereupon the ſenate thought themſelves obliged to renew the Feriæ Latinæ, which had been for ſome time neglected. Q. Ogulnius was created dictator to preſide at them, and he appointed M. Lætorius for his general of the horſe.

The Carthaginians defeated at ſea.

THE war with Carthage had already laſted eight years. The Carthaginians had loſt Corſica, Sardinia, and all their dominions in Sicily, except Lilybæum, Panormus, and a few places in that neighbourhood. Sicily had long ſeemed to be the utmoſt limits of the ambition of the Romans. But now they thought of nothing leſs than reducing Carthage itſelf. With this view the conſuls, L. Manlius Vulſo and Marcus Attilius Regulus, whoſe name is famous in hiſtory, were ordered to paſs into Africa, and to make that country the ſeat of the war for the future. Their fleet for this expedition conſiſted of three hundred and thirty galleys galleys of different sizes, and aboard each galley were a hundred and twenty soldiers and three hundred rowers. The enemy's fleet, under the command of Hanno and Hamilcar, was yet more formidable; for it consisted of three hundred and sixty sail, and was far better manned than that of the Romans. With this fleet the Carthaginian admirals set sail, and arrived at the port of Heraclea in Sicily, in order to watch the motions of the Romans, and oppose at all events their descent upon the coast of Africa. The consuls nevertheless pursued their course, and appearing off Heraclea with their fleet, drew up in line of battle. Hanno and Hamilcar accepted the challenge; whereupon a bloody engagement ensued, which lasted the greater part of the day with equal success, the soldiers and commanders on both sides distinguishing themselves on this occasion in a most eminent manner. But at length fortune, which from the beginning of this war had espoused the cause of the Romans, declared in their favour. The Carthaginians were entirely routed; thirty of their ships were destroyed; threescore and three taken with their crews; and the rest obliged to take shelter in the ports of Sicily and Africa. In the whole action the Romans lost but twenty-four galleys, which were all sunk [q].

The battle of Heraclea.

In pursuance of this complete victory, the consuls, returning into the ports of Sicily, equipped with all possible expedition the ships they had taken from the enemy, embarqued new troops, and took in fresh provisions, in order to make the intended descent upon Africa. Hanno endeavoured to amuse them by conferences about a peace, in hopes of receiving in the mean time supplies from Carthage, in order to venture a second engagement. Nay, he had the boldness to come in person to confer with the consuls, as a deputy from his republic. He no sooner arrived, than the multitude cried out, that he should be detained prisoner by way of reprisal, for the treachery practised five years before on the person of the consul Cornelius Asina. Hanno, alarmed at these clamours, with an air of confidence put this flattering and artful question to the consuls: What advantage can it be to you, O consuls, to imitate our perfidiousness? It will only be said, that Rome produces as bad men as Carthage. The consuls, piqued in honour at these words, replied, that though the perfidious Carthaginians had violated the law of nations, it became the

the probity of the d o ns to obſerve them even with traitors; and ſufferec th to return untouched r. But as for peace, there beingan iſpoſition to it on either ſide, Hanno made the beſt for way to Carthage to give notice of the approaching bett . At length the conſuls ſet ſail, and, t ather proving favourable, had a fortunate paſſage. The firſt land in Africa they ſet their eyes on was cape Hermea; and there the fleet lay at anchor ſome time, waiting till all the galleys and tranſports came up. From thence they coaſted along till they arrived before Clupea, a city to the eaſt of Carthage, and there they made their firſt deſcent. Clupea, or, as the Greek writers call it, Aſpis, was very conveniently ſituated for a magazine of arms and proviſions, and had near it ſeveral ports for ſheltering ſuch ſhips as ſhould come from Italy. The Romans, therefore, having laid up their fleet in one of theſe ports, and ſecured it on the land-ſide with a rampart and a large ditch, ſummoned the city to ſurrender. Some writers tell us, that this important place ſubmitted upon terms; others, that it was abandoned by its inhabitants. Be that is will, it is certain, that the conſuls ſoon became maſters of it, and fortified it after the Roman manner, in order to make it the general rendezvous of the Italian fleets and a key to Africa. From Clupea they diſpatched a meſſenger to Rome to acquaint the ſenate and people with their ſucceſs, and to receive freſh inſtructions as to their proceedings. For at this time the conſuls did little more than execute the orders of the conſcript fathers, who, being for the moſt part able and experienced commanders, were capable of directing the conduct of their new and often unexperienced generals. While the conſuls waited for the return of the meſſenger, they marched up into the country, and ravaging the fruitful plains of Africa, where no enemy had long appeared, returned to the coaſt with an immenſe booty. We are told, that in theſe incurſions they took above twenty thouſand priſoners. While they were thus living at diſcretion in the enemy's country, the meſſenger returned from Rome, with orders for Manlius to repair to Italy with the fleet, and for Regulus to purſue the war in Africa, with as many troops and ſhips as he thought proper for that ſervice. But Regulus, either out of ſome ſecret foreboding of the misfortunes that were to befal him, or becauſe he was impatient to receive the honours of a triumph for his late naval victory victory, appeared greatly diſſatisfied with the province aſſigned him, and deſired to be recalled. His pretence, which would be now thought a very trifling one, ſhews the character aud manners of the Romans in thoſe times. He repreſented to the ſenate, that upon the death of the huſbandman, who had the care of his little farm of ſeven acres of ground, he had been obliged to intruſt a day-labourer with the manuring of it, who had ſtolen his cattle and carried off all his ſtock; ſo that his preſence was neceſſary at home to provide for the ſubſiſtance of his wife and children. Upon this the ſenate ordered his wife and children to be maintained at the expence of the public, but directed him to continue in Africa, and command the army there with the title of proconſul, when the year of his conſulate ſhould expire [s]. Purſuant to theſe orders, Attilius remained in Africa with forty ſhips, fifteen thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, while his collegue returned to Rome with the reſt of the army, carrying aboard his fleet twenty-ſeven thouſand priſoners.

THE following year, the republic raiſed Ser. Fulvius Nobilior and M. Æmilius Paulus to the conſulate; but all the attention of the republic was upon Regulus, who now, as proconſul, puſhed on his conqueſts with incredible rapidity. To oppoſe his progreſs, Hamilcar was recalled from Sicily, and to him were joined Boſtar and Aſdrubal. Hamilcar commanded an army juſt equal to that of Regulus; the other two headed ſeparate bodies, which were to join him, or act apart, as occaſion required. But, before they were in a condition to take the field, Regulus, purſuing his conqueſts, arrived on the banks of the Bagrada, which empties itſelf into the ſea at a ſmall diſtance from Carthage. There he had a monſter to contend with, in the deſcription of which the Latin hiſtorians have employed ſo much art and eloquence, that we cannot help thinking they have exaggerated their accounts beyond all meaſure. This monſter, ſay they, was a ſerpent of an immenſe ſize, which infected the waters of the river, poiſoned the air, and killed all other animals with its breath alone. When the Romans went to fetch water, this huge dragon attacked them, and twiſting itſelf round their bodies, either ſqueezed them to death, or ſwallowed them alive; ſo that it was neceſſary to fight this furious monſter in form. As its hard and thick ſcales were proof againſt their darts and arrows, they were forced forced to have recourse to the baliſtæ, which they made uſe of in ſieges to throw great ſtones, and beat down the walls of the beſieged cities. With theſe machines, they diſcharged ſhowers of huge ſtones againſt this new enemy, and had the good luck with one of them to break his back-bone, which diſabled him from twiſting and winding his immenſe body, and by that means gave the Romans an opportunity of accoſting and diſpatching him with their darts and javelins. But his dead body corrupted the air and the water of the river, and ſpread ſo great an infection all over the country, that the Romans were obliged to decamp. We are told, that Regulus ſent the ſkin of this frightful monſter to Rome, whichwas a hundred and twenty foot long, and that it was hung up in a temple, where it was preſerved to the time of the Numantine war. This ſtory has been totally omitted by Polybius, and by other Greek writers ſo qualified, as to have ſome appearance of truth. Upon the whole, this dreadful monſter ſeems to have been a crocodile, an animal common in Africa, but never before ſeen by the Romans, who, ſurpriſed at the ſight of it, and frightened at the miſchief it might have done them, tranſmitted hyperbolic accounts of the whole to Rome, which were copied by the Latin hiſtorians [t].

ATTILIUS, having paſſed the Bagrada, beſieged Adis, or Adda, not far from Carthage, which the enemy attempted to relieve; but as they encamped among the hills and rocks, where their elephants, in which the main ſtrength of their army lay, could be of no uſe to them, Regulus attacked them in their camp, killed ſeventeen thouſand of them, took five thouſand priſoners, and eighteen elephants. Upon the fame of this victory, which was ſoon ſpread all over Africa, deputies came from all quarters to ſubmit in the name of their reſpective cities and ſtates to the conqueror; inſomuch that Regulus in a few days became maſter of fourſcore towns, among which were the city and port of Utica. This encreaſed the alarm at Carthage, which was reduced to deſpair, when Regulus laid ſiege to Tunis, a great city about nine miles from that capital. The place was taken in ſight of the Carthaginians, who from their walls beheld all the operations of the ſiege, and ſuffered the Romans to carry on their attacks and batter the place, without offering

ing to relieve it. And to complete their misfortunes, the Numidians, their neighbours and irreconcileable enemies, took up arms, entered their territory, laid waste their fields, and committed every-where most dreadful devastations, which soon occasioned a great scarcity of provisions in the city. The public magazines were soon exhausted; and, as the city was full of selfish merchants, who took advantage of the public distress to sell their provisions at an excessive price, a famine ensued with all the evils which attend it. In this extremity Regulus advanced to the very gates of the city, and having encamped under the walls, sent deputies to treat of a peace with the senate. It may seem strange, that the consul should shew so much indulgence for a republic, which rivalled his own, at a time, when one single stroke more would, in all probability, have brought her under subjection. But it must be owned, that though the proconsul loved his country, he likewise loved his own glory and reputation. He considered, that his proconsulate was ready to expire; that at the end of the year Rome would appoint him a successor, who would rob him of the glory of a conquest, the beginnings of which had cost him a great deal of labour and fatigue, and that at Rome those, who put the last hand to great conquests, were much more regarded than the generals, who had happily begun them. Upon these considerations, he resolved to conclude the war to his own glory and the benefit of his republic, by such an advantageous peace, as should ever do honour to his memory. With these views he resolved to spend the rest of the campaign, which he thought was not sufficient to accomplish the reduction of Carthage, in treaties and negotiations. The deputies sent by the proconsul were received at Carthage with inexpressible joy; but the conditions they proposed were such, that the senate could not hear them without the utmost indignation; and Regulus, as if he had made a complete conquest of Carthage, would abate nothing of his first demands. The conditions were; 1. That the Carthaginians should relinquish all claims to Sardinia, Corsica, and Sicily. 2. That they should restore to the Romans all the prisoners they had taken from them ever since the beginning of the war. 3. That if they cared to redeem any of their own prisoners, they should pay so much a head for them, as Rome should judge reasonable. 4. That they should for ever pay the Romans an annual tribute. 5. That for the future they should fit out but one man of war for their own use, and fifty triremes to ſerve in the Roman fleet at the expence of Carthage, when required by any of the future conſuls. Theſe extravagant demands provoked the ſenators, who loudly and unanimouſly rejected them, proteſting, that they would rather die a thouſand times, than ſubmit to ſo ſhameful a ſlavery. The Roman deputies, in leaving the aſſembly, told the ſenate, that the Roman proconſul would not alter a ſingle letter in the propoſals, and that they muſt either conquer the Romans, or obey them. After this formal declaration, the Carthaginians had nothing left but to ſell their lives dear, and die with honour in defence of their country [u].

BEFORE this negotiation, the Carthaginian republic had ſent to hire mercenaries in Greece, and this reinforcement arrived juſt in the height of her diſtreſs. Among theſe mercenaries was a Lacedæmonian, by name Xantippus, a man of great bravery and experience in war. We do not find, that he had any conſiderable poſt in the troops of his own country; he was one of thoſe ſubalterns, who are often more able ſoldiers than their generals, and only want an opportunity of exerting themſelves. The Lacedæmonian, having informed himſelf of the circumſtances of the late battle, declared publicly, that their overthrow was owing more to their own miſconduct, than to the ſuperiority of the enemy. His diſcourſe being ſpread among the people and ſoldiery, came to the knowledge of the ſenate; and the ſenators immediately commanded him to be brought before them. Being introduced to them, he explained himſelf ſo clearly, and talked ſo judiciouſly, that the Carthaginian generals, as well as the reſt, were for putting him at the head of the army; and a decree was made for that purpoſe.

Xantippus, being thus inveſted with the ſupreme command, applied himſelf in the firſt place to the diſciplining of his troops; and having taught them how to march, encamp, widen, and cloſe their ranks, and rally after the Lacedæmonian manner under their proper colours, he took the field with twelve thouſand foot, four thouſand horſe, and about an hundred elephants. The Romans were ſurpriſed at the ſudden change they obſerved in the enemy's conduct. However, Regulus, elated with his late ſucceſs, came and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the Carthaginian army, in a vaſt plain, where the enemy's elephants and horſe had room room to act. The two armies were parted by a river, which Regulus boldly paſſed, and by that means left his troops no way to retreat in caſe of a misfortune. This was what Xantippus wanted, who immediately cried out, The gods favour us, and drew up his men in order of battle. In the firſt line he placed his dart-men, with orders to retire into the ſpaces between the battalions, as ſoon as they had made their diſcharge. Behind them, but at ſome diſtance, were placed the elephants in a long front, carrying wooden towers filled with men. Behind the elephants was the Carthaginian phalanx, conſiſting of the beſt infantry of the army; and theſe were the main body. As for the wings, Xantippus poſted his light-armed troops in the left, and the mercenaries in the right. Theſe two wings were ſupported by the African cavalry. Regulus, on the other hand, drew up his troops after the Roman manner; but was guilty of one great fault: to prevent the elephants from breaking in upon him, he made his main body too narrow and too deep, which expoſed it to the danger of being ſurrounded [w].

XANTIPPUS began the attack, ordering the leaders of the elephants to advance, and attempt the breaking of the enemy's firſt line. The Romans ſtood the ſhock of thoſe dreadful animals with great bravery. But, in the mean time, the Roman cavalry in the wings, being charged by the Carthaginian, which was greatly ſuperior in number, were overpowered, put into confuſion, and obliged to fly. On the other hand, Regulus's left wing falling upon the mercenaries, whom Xantippus had poſted in his right, broke them, and purſued them to their camp, whither they retired in diſorder. But, in the mean time, the main body of the Romans, which Regulus commanded in perſon, being attacked in front by the elephants, and in the rear by the African cavalry, was put into diſorder; the elephants bore all down before them, and ſuch of the Romans as attempted to make their eſcape to avoid the fury of thoſe monſtrous animals, fell in among the horſe and were cut in pieces. The main body being thus broke and caſt into confuſion, the whole army was put to the rout, and the ſlaughter was univerſal. Of all the Roman army, only two thouſand, who purſued the mercenaries, eſcaped, and arrived ſafe at Clupea. Regulus himſelf, with five hundred choſen men who kept conſtantly about him, was ſurſurrounded by the enemy and taken. The reſt, to the number of thirty thouſand men, were cut in pieces, either in the battle, or in the purſuit. The loſs of the Carthaginians was ſcarce above eight hundred men, moſt of them mercenaries, in the right wing, which was routed. The victorious army returned to the capital of Africa, which Xantippus entered, as it were in triumph, leading the Roman conſul with him among the reſt of the priſoners. All the people of Carthage ran to meet their deliverer, and could ſcarce believe their own eyes. They beheld with unſpeakable pleaſure the proud Roman, in a ſtate to implore that compaſſion, which he had refuſed them. As for Xantippus, they looked upon him as a hero ſent by the gods, to reſcue a miſerable people from deſpair and oppreſſion, and beſtowed on him all the honours which a ſincere gratitude could ſuggeſt. But the wiſe Lacedæmonian, foreſeeing that the ſervice he had done them, which was too great for a reward, would create him both envy and danger, reſolved to content himſelf with the glory of ſo noble a victory, and, without waiting for any other reward, to return to Lacedæmon. His departure is differently related, but all accounts reflect an eternal ſhame and diſhonour on the Carthaginian nation. Some ſay, that the Carthaginians, jealous of his glory, put privately on board with him aſſaſſines, who murdered him and threw his dead body into the ſea [x]. Others tell us, that a leaky veſſel was got ready for him; but that the artful Greek, being appriſed of their wicked deſign, went on board another galley, and arrived ſafe in his own country [y]. However that be, neither Xantippus's victory, nor the monſtrous ingratitude of the Carthaginians, will ever be forgot. As for Regulus, he was treated with all the cruelty revenge could dictate. After they had made him the ſport of the multitude, and expoſed him to the inſults of an enraged and cruel populace, they ſhut him up in a public priſon, affording him no more food than was barely ſufficient to prolong his life, and in all other reſpects treating him as the criminals, who were under the ſame confinement.

THE defeat and captivity of Regulus cauſed as much grief at Rome, as joy at Carthage. The ſenate no ſooner received an account of the poſture of their affairs in Africa, ſo contrary to their expectation, but they ordered the conſuls for the year, Fulvius and Æmilius, who had hitherto continued at Rome inactive, to take proper meaſures for the ſecuring of the coaſts of Italy from an invaſion, to haſten into Sicily, and from thence, if they thought it adviſeable, to paſs over into Africa, and ſave the remains of Regulus's army and conqueſts. In the mean time, the Carthaginians ſat down before Clupea, but the garriſon made ſo brave and obſtinate a defence, that the enemy, notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts, were obliged to raiſe the ſiege. From Clupea they marched to Utica, which they likewiſe beſieged, but abandoned the enterpriſe, upon the news they received, that the Romans were equipping a fleet of three hundred and fifty ſail. And indeed this formidable armament was ready before the end of the ſummer; ſo that the conſuls from Sicily, where they left ſome land-forces, ſet ſail for Africa, in order to make a ſecond deſcent. The Carthaginians, who had, with incredible expedition, refitted their old veſſels and built a good number of new ones, met the Roman fleet off cape Hermea, or Mercury, and gave them battle. But the loſs they ſuſtained was much greater, than the advantage they had gained over Regulus. An hundred and four of their ſhips were ſunk, thirty taken, and fifteen thouſand of their ſoldiers or rowers killed in the action. After this the Romans purſued their courſe to Clupea, where they had no ſooner landed, than they were attacked by the Carthaginian army under the command of the two Hannos, father and ſon. But as the brave Lacedæmonian was no longer with them, notwithſtanding the new diſcipline he had taken great care to teach them, they were routed at the very firſt onſet, in which they loſt nine thouſand men, and among them many of their chief lords. After theſe two glorious victories, the one by ſea and the other by land, the Romans found themſelves obliged, for want of proviſions, to drop their African expedition, and to evacuate both Clupea and Utica. In their way home they were deſirous of ſignalizing the end of their conſulate by ſome important conqueſts on the coaſt of Sicily, where ſome cities ſtill adhered to the Carthaginians. They thought, that the ſudden appearance of a victorious fleet with a formidable army would awe them into ſubjection. Inſtead therefore of returning home, they ſteered their courſe to the northern coaſt of Sicily, contrary to the opinion of all the pilots in the fleet, who adviſed them, as the ſeaſon was far advanced, to ſail ſtreight for Italy. Their obſtinacy proved the deſtruction of the fleet; for, a more violent ſtorm ariſing than had been known in the memory of man, the fleet was almoſt entirely deſtroyed; for of three hundred and ſeventy veſſels, which compoſed it, fourſcore only eſcaped ſhipwreck, the reſt being either ſwallowed by the ſea, or daſhed againſt the ſhore. This was by far the greateſt loſs Rome had ever ſuſtained; for, beſides the great number of ſhips that were caſt away with their crews, a numerous army was deſtroyed with all the riches of Africa, which had been by Regulus amaſſed and depoſited in Clupea, and were now tranſporting from thence to Rome. The whole coaſt from Pachynum to Camerina was covered with dead bodies, and ſtrewn with the wrecks of the ſhips; inſomuch, that hiſtory can ſcarce afford an example of the like dreadful diſaſter. The Romans on this occaſion experienced the conſtant friendſhip of good king Hiero, who ſupplied ſuch as eſcaped the common calamity, with cloaths, proviſions, and ſhips to convey them to Meſſana. This misfortune, however, was not imputed to the conſuls, who were continued each in the command of an army the next year, with the title of proconſul. The new conſuls were Cn. Cornelius Aſina and A. Attilius Calatinus. The former had been treacherouſly taken priſoner by Hanno the Carthaginian, as we have related above, and kept in captivity till the firſt deſcent of the Romans in Africa, when he was delivered from ſlavery, during which he had been obliged to drive a plough [z].

THE Carthaginians, upon advice of the misfortune which had befallen the Romans at ſea, renewed the war in Sicily with freſh fury, hoping the whole iſland, which was now left defenceleſs, would ſoon fall into their hands. But the Romans, having in the ſpace of three months launched a hundred and twenty new gallies, which with the old ones that were refitted made a fleet of two hundred and fifty ſail, both the conſuls and proconſuls were ordered to paſs over into Sicily, the former to command at ſea, and the latter at land. As they beſieged only maritime cities, they acted jointly, the land-forces inveſting them on one ſide, and the fleet on the other. Their firſt attempt was on the city of Cephalœdium, on the north coaſt, not far from the mouth of the Himera, which was betrayed to them by ſome of the inhabitants. From thence they ſailed to Panormus, the capital of the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily, and, having ſeized the port, ſummoned the town to ſurrender. But the inhabitants and garriſon being being determined to ſtand a ſiege, the conſuls landed all their troops, and began to batter the walls with their engines, by which a tower ſtanding near the ſea was quickly ruined. At this breach the Romans entered, and made themſelves maſters of the quarter called The New City, thoſe who defended it retiring into The Old City, whither they carried with them terror and famine; ſo that the inhabitants ſoon ſent a deputation to the conſuls, offering to ſurrender, upon condition that their lives, liberties, and effects were ſpared. But the conſuls, not ignorant of the extremity to which they were reduced, would not even grant them their lives and liberties, unleſs they paid ſo much a head by way of ranſom. The unhappy people were obliged to ſubmit, and forty thouſand of them paid two minæ each, that is, 6l. 9s. 2d. for their ranſom. Thoſe who could not advance that ſum were made ſlaves, to the number of about thirty thouſand, and ſold to the beſt bidder. After this conſiderable conqueſt, the conſuls ſet ſail for Rome; but in their paſſage the tranſports, on which they put the money and ſpoils brought from Panormus, were taken by the Carthaginian fleet [a]. The two proconſuls entered Rome in triumph, for the victory gained over the Carthaginians at ſea during their conſulate.

And Panormus taken by the Romans.

THE conſuls for the new year, Cn. Servilius Cæpio and C. Sempronius Blæſus, with a fleet of two hundred and ſixty galleys, ſet ſail for Sicily, and appeared off Lilybæum; but, finding this place too ſtrong and too well garriſoned for them to attempt the ſiege of it, they ſteered from thence to the eaſtern coaſt of Africa, where they made ſeveral deſcents, ſurpriſed ſome cities, and plundered ſeveral towns and villages. But, as they were returning with the ſpoils of that rich country, they narrowly eſcaped loſing their whole fleet on the flats of the Leſſer Syrtis, near the iſland of the Lotophagi; where, by coaſting too near the ſhore, their veſſels grounded and ſtuck on the ſand-banks, till the flood brought them off again; and then they made off ſo faſt, that the Africans took their departure for a flight. They arrived ſafe at Panormus, and from thence after a few days ſet ſail for Italy, having a fair wind till they came off cape Palinurus, where ſo violent a ſtorm overtook them, that a hundred and ſixty of their galleys and a great number of tranſports were loſt.

loſt. And now the republic, conſidering the two tempeſts, which had deſtroyed her two fleets, as a declaration of the will of the gods againſt her deſign of depriving the Carthaginians of the empire of the ſea, made a decree, that for the future no more than fifty veſſels ſhould be equipped, and that theſe ſhould be employed only in guarding the coaſt of Italy and tranſporting troops into Sicily. The proconſul Cornelius commanded this campaign the land-forces in Sicily, and though hiſtorians give us no account of his exploits, there is no room to doubt, but they were very conſiderable, ſince he was, on his return to Rome, decreed a triumph, as was alſo the conſul Sempronius Blæſus, but not his collegue Servilius Cæpio; which is ſomewhat ſurpriſing, ſince he ſeems to have had a ſhare in all the exploits of this campaign. Both the triumphal tables and ſeveral medals, which have reached our times, confirm the triumphs of Cornelius and Sempronius [b].

C. Aurelius Cotta and P. Servilius Geminus, being the enſuing year raiſed to the conſulate, paſſed over into Sicily to command the land-forces there, and made themſelves maſters of Himera, a city ſtanding at the mouth of a river bearing the ſame name. Aurelius, animated with this important conqueſt, which put his republic in poſſeſſion of a fruitful territory, formed a deſign upon the iſland and city of Lipara; and being ſupplied with ſhips by that ever faithful friend to the republic, king Hiero, he tranſported ſome of his choſen troops into the iſland, and ſat down before Lipara, the metropolis. But being ſeized with [illegible] unaccountable ſcruple touching the auſpices, he returned from Meſſana to conſult the auguries anew. During his abſence, Q. Caſſius and P. Aurelius Pecuniola, his relation, both legionary tribunes, being entruſted with the command of the army, made an attempt upon the city, contrary to their general's expreſs command. But the beſieged made ſo vigorous a ſally, that they repulſed the aggreſſors, and, purſuing them with great warmth, burnt their palliſades, and had like to have taken their camp. The conſul, upon his return to the camp, deprived Caſſius of his employment, and reduced Aurelius, after he had cauſed him to be beaten with rods, to the ſtate of a private ſoldier, obliging him to go through the ſervile drudgeries of a common centinel. After this the conſul applied himſelf wholly to the ſiege of the place, took it by aſſault, aſſault, and put almoſt all the inhabitants to the ſword [c]. The conſul, having finiſhed this conqueſt, returned to Sicily, and, with an army of forty thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, laid ſiege to Ereta, a ſtrong-hold of great importance; but, as ſoon as the Carthaginian army appeared, they abandoned the enterprize, the Romans being too much diſheartened ever ſince the defeat of Regulus, and too much afraid of the elephants to hazard a battle in the open country. They would fain have drawn the enemy up to the eminences, thereby to render their elephants uſeleſs. But neither party coming into the meaſures of the other, the campaign ended without any conſiderable action [d]. As for the conſul Servilius, he probably acted ſeparately; but did not ſignalize himſelf by any great exploit.

THIS year a plebeian by name Tib. Coruncanius, by ſome unknown revolution was raiſed to the dignity of pontifex maximus. As he was a man of eminent probity he concurred with the conſul Aurelius, who was naturally ſevere, and the cenſors, to puniſh thoſe who neglected the worſhip of the gods, led irregular lives, or tranſgreſſed the laws of military diſcipline. Thirteen ſenators were ignominiouſly ſtruck out of the liſt; and, at the motion of Aurelius, four hundred knights, who had refuſed to obey his orders in the iſland of Lipara, were degraded. Their horſes were taken from them, and they deprived of the right of ſuffrage in their centuries, without being exempted from the taxes. The pay likewiſe, which the republic owed them for their paſt ſervices, was declared forfeited. Aurelius, who had taken Himera and Lipara, was honoured with a triumph, which he obtained on the ides of April [e]. By a cenſus taken this year, there appeared to be in Rome 297797 men fit to bear arms. The Carthaginians, ſeeing themſelves now maſters of the ſea, and their hopes of reconquering Sicily encreaſing in proportion as they found their rivals reduced to act upon the defenſive, began to make new levies in Africa, to hire troops in Gaul and Spain, and to equip a new fleet. But, their treaſures being exhauſted, they ſent an embaſſy to Ptolemy king of Egypt, entreating him to lend them two thouſand talents. That prince being reſolved to ſtand neuter, refuſed to aſsist them against the Romans, telling them, that he could not, without breach of fidelity, assist one friend against another. However, the Carthaginian republic made an effort, and, exerting herself, equipped a fleet of two hundred sail, and raised an army of thirty thousand men, horse and foot, and an hundred and forty elephants, appointing Asdrubal commander in chief both of the fleet and army.

The Carthaginians fit out a new fleet.

While Carthage was making these great preparations, Rome raised L. Cæcilius Metellus and C. Furius Pacilus to the consulate. They both went into Sicily, and there acted only upon the defensive, pursuant to their instructions from the senate. But though the conscript fathers approved of the obedience of their generals, yet they began to reflect, that so much caution and circumspection dishonoured the commanders, and greatly abated the courage of the soldiers. They resumed therefore their former vigor, and, forgetting their shipwrecks, resolved to put a new fleet to sea, there being no other means to preserve Sicily. While the vessels were building, the comitia chose two consuls, who were both men of great valor and experience, viz. L. Manlius Vulso and C. Attilius Regulus, cousin-german to the famous captive. The late consul Furius was recalled from Sicily; but his collegue Metellus continued there, with the title of proconsul, to oppose the formidable army under the command of Asdrubal. Metellus, who was an able commander, being allowed by the senate to act according to his own judgment, soon recovered the former reputation of the Romans in Sicily. For, by pretending fear, he drew Asdrubal into a disadvantageous spot of ground near Panormus, and, then sallying out upon him, gave him a terrible overthrow, and obtained one of the most signal victories mentioned in the Roman history. Twenty thousand of the enemy were killed, and many elephants; of these latter a great number were also taken with their leaders, and sent afterwards to Rome, where they swelled the pomp of the conqueror's triumph. Asdrubal after this defeat fled to Lilybæum, which he reached with great difficulty; and the proconsul, having no more enemies to contend with in the field, returned to Rome, which he entered with triumph on the seventh of the ides of September. The Romans had never seen a more magnificent entry. The elephants, to the number of a hundred and four, marched through the city in procession. The air rung with with acclamations at the ſight of thoſe animals, and of the great number of priſoners in chains, among whom were thirteen officers of diſtinction. As the Romans had reſolved never to make uſe of elephants in war, and did not care to be at the expence of feeding them, they orde.ed them to be hunted, and put to death in the circus by their athletæ or wreſtlers; ſo that the people were at the ſame time diverted, and taught to deſpiſe the animals they had hitherto ſo much dreaded. As for the unhappy Aſdrubal, he was condemned in his abſence, and on his return home crucified, one ſingle misfortune blotting out the remembrance of his many former important ſervices [f].

And now the two conſuls, with the new fleet of two hundred and forty galleys and ſixty ſmaller veſſels, paſſing over into Sicily, reſolved, by a noble emulation, to ſurpaſs, if poſſible, their predeceſſor Metellus, and to drive the Carthaginians quite out of the iſland. With this view they laid ſiege to Lilybæum, a city deemed impregnable, and the only place of retreat for the Carthaginian armies. But Lilybæum proved a ſecond Troy; the ſiege laſted ten years, the forces of the two republics being exhauſted, within and without the walls of one ſingle city. The people of Carthage, upon the news of this enterpriſe, were ſo diſcouraged, that they began to think of a peace. The war had already laſted fourteen years; they had loſt their beſt commanders; their elephants had been taken from them; their fleets had been deſtroyed as faſt as they had put them to ſea; their finances were as much exhauſted as their armies were diminiſhed; the only towns they had now left in Sicily were Lilybæum and Drepanum, the one inve ied, and the other expoſed to the inſults of the enemy's new fleet. Theſe conſiderations induced them to think of putting an end to ſo deſtructive a war by a ſpeedy peace. With this view they began to ſoften the rigors of Regulus's confinement, and endeavoured to engage him to go to Rome with their embaſſadors, and uſe his intereſt there to bring about a peace upon moderate terms, or at leaſt an exchange of priſoners. Regulus obeyed his maſters, and embarqued for Rome, after having bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath to return to his chains, if the negotiation did not ſucceed. The Carthaginian ſhip arrived ſafe in Italy; but when Regulus came to the gates of the city, he refuſed to enter them; My misfortunes, ſaid he, hath made me a ſlave to the Carthaginians; I am no longer a Roman citizen; the ſenate gives always audience to foreigners without the gates. His wife Marcia went out to meet him, and preſented to him his two young children. But he, only caſting a kind of wild look on them, fixed his eyes on the ground, as if he thought himſelf unworthy of the embraces of his wife and the careſſes of his children. When the ſenators aſſembled in the ſuburbs, he was introduced to them with the Carthaginian embaſſadors, and together with them made the two propoſals with which he was charged: Conſcript fathers, ſaid he, being now a ſlave to the Carthaginians, I am come on the part of my maſters to treat with you, concerning a peace and an exchange of priſoners. Having uttered theſe words, he began to withdraw and follow the embaſſadors, who were not allowed to be preſent at the deliberations and diſputes of the conſcript fathers. In vain the ſenate preſſed him to ſtay, and give his opinion as an old ſenator and conſul. He refuſed to continue in the aſſembly, till his African maſters ordered him, and then the illuſtrious ſlave took his place among the fathers; but continued ſilent with his eyes fixed on the ground, while the more antient ſenators ſpoke. When it came to his turn to deliver his opinion, he addreſſed himſelf to the confcript fathers thus: Though I am a ſlave at Carthage, yet I am free at Rome, and will therefore declare my ſentiments with freedom. Romans, it is not for your intereſt either to grant the Carthaginians a peace, or to make an exchange of priſoners with them. Carthage is extremely exhauſted, and the only reaſon why ſhe ſues for peace is, becauſe ſhe is not in a condition to continue the war. You have been vanquiſhed but once, and that by my fault; a fault which Metellus has repaired by a ſignal victory. But the Carthaginians have been ſo often overcome, that they have not the courage to look a Roman in the face. Your allies continue peaceable, and ſerve you with zeal. But your enemy's troops conſiſt only of mercenaries, who have no other tie but that of intereſt, and will ſoon be diſobliged by the republic they ſerve, Carthage being already quite deſtitute of money to pay them. No, Romans, a peace with Carthage does not by any means ſuit your intereſt, conſidering the condition to which the Carthaginians are reduced. I therefore adviſe you to purſue the war with greater vigor than ever.

As for the exchange of priſoners, you have among the Carthaginian captives ſeveral officers of diſtinction, who are young, and may one day command the enemy's armies. But as for me, I am advanced in years, and my misfortunes have made me uſeleſs. Beſides, what can you expect from ſoldiers, who have been vanquiſhed and made ſlaves? Such men, like timorous deer, that have eſcaped out of the hunter's toils, will ever be upon the alarm and ready to fly. The ſenate, greatly affected with his diſintereſtedneſs, magnanimity, and contempt of life, would willingly have preſerved him, and continued the war in Africa. Some were of opinion, that in Rome he was not obliged to keep an oath, which had been extorted from him in an enemy's country. The pontifex maximus himſelf being conſulted in the caſe, declared, that Regulus might continue at Rome without being guilty of perjury. But the noble captive, highly offended at this deciſion, as if his honour and courage were called in queſtion, declared to the ſenate, who trembled to hear him ſpeak, that he well knew what torments were reſerved for him at Carthage; but that he had ſo much of the true ſpirit of a Roman, as to dread leſs the tortures of a cruel rack, than the ſhame of a diſhonourable action, which would follow him to his grave. It is my duty, ſaid he, to return to Carthage. Let the gods take care of the reſt. This intrepidity made the ſenate ſtill more deſirous of ſaving ſuch an hero. All means were made uſe of to make him ſtay, both by the people and ſenate. He would not even ſee his wife Marcia, nor ſuffer his young children to take their leave of him. Amidſt the lamentations and tears of the whole city, he embarqued with the Carthaginian embaſſadors to return to the place of his ſlavery, with as ſerene and chearful a countenance, as if he had been going to a country ſeat for his diverſion. The Carthaginians were ſo inraged againſt him, that they invented new torments to ſatisfy their revenge. Firſt, they cut off his eye-lids, keeping him for a while in a dark dungeon, and then bringing him out, and expoſing him to the ſun at noon-day. After this they ſhut him up in a kind of cheſt ſtuck with nails, having their points inwards, ſo that he could neither ſit nor lean without great torment; and there they ſuffered him to die with hunger, anguiſh, and want of ſleep [g] (G). WHEN

(G) It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that Hoffman ſhould look upon a fact, atteſted by a croud of credible witneſſes, as a fable. It is true,

WHEN the news of theſe cruelties reached Rome, the ſenate, by way of retaliation, gave up the chief of the Carthaginian captives to the revenge of Marcia the wife of Regulus, who, venting her rage upon thoſe unhappy wretches, cauſed them to be ſhut up two and two in great cheſts thick ſtuck with nails, and there to ſuffer the ſame torments which her huſband had endured at Carthage. Boſtar died the fifth day; but Hamilcar, notwithſtanding the ſtench and corruption of the dead body of his companion, lived ten days, having as much food allowed him as was ſufficient to prolong his life in miſery. At length the ſenate put a ſtop to this cruel uſage, and commanded Boſtar's aſhes to be ſent home, and the reſt of the priſoners, who had ſurvived their tortures, to be uſed with more humanity [h].

The Romans carry on the ſiege of Lilybæum.

In the mean time, the two conſuls, Manlius and Attilius, carried on the ſiege of Lilybæum with great vigor. Himilco, a general of great experience and perſonal valor, commanded in the place, which was ſtrong both by nature and art, and defended by a very numerous garriſon, conſiſting of ten thouſand mercenary Gauls and Greeks, beſides a prodigious number of Carthaginian and African troops. The conſuls divided the attacks between them, the one inveſting the city on the ſide of the ſea, the other of the land. Their camps had a communication by a deep ditch, covered with a rampart and a wall, ſo that they could mutually aſſiſt each other. The firſt attack was made at the point of cape Lilybæum, where it jets out moſt into the true, that Polybius, in other caſes a moſt exact hiſtorian, does not mention the cruel death of Regulus. But is the ſilence of one ſingle author, who is wholly taken up in deſcribing battles and ſieges, ſufficient to weigh down the expreſs teſtimonies of Cicero, Livy, Appian, Zonaras, Valerius Maximus, and eſpecially of Tuditanus, who lived in the ſame age with Polybius? All theſe writers agree, that Regulus died in the moſt exquiſite torments; though it muſt be owned, that they relate the circumſtances of his death very differently. Some ſay that he was crucified; others, that he died of the miſeries of a long impriſonment: but the moſt comon opinion is, that which we have inſerted in the text. Regulus was not the only perſon the Carthaginians ſacrificed to their revenge. Valerius Maximus tells us, that with unparallelled cruelty they cruſhed great numbers of the Roman priſoners to death, with the weight of the galleys that were upon the ſtocks.

the ſea, and where there were ſeven towers, which had a communication with each other, and reached in a direct line to the town. Theſe towers being taken one after another, the conſuls prepared to batter the wall of the city; but were obliged firſt to fill up a ditch ſixty cubits broad and forty deep, in order to bring their machines up to the wall. This proved a laborious piece of work, the beſieged drawing up the earth into the city by certain engines, as faſt as the beſiegers threw it into the ditch. But the Romans, by the ſuperior number of their workmen, gained their point. Then Himilco, with incredible expedition, threw up a a rampart, and built a new wall to cover the wall of the city. The Romans endeavoured to undermine it; but the enemy, countermining them, attacked the Roman miners under-ground, and prevented them from carrying on their work. The beſieged, however, were reduced to great ſtreights, numbers of them being killed in the frequent ſallies they made, and the reſt haraſſed day and night in defending their works againſt two conſular armies. The town muſt have ſoon fallen into the enemy's hands, had it not received a ſeaſonable reinforcement. The Romans had ſhut up the port ſo cloſely, that Himilco could not find means to acquaint the ſenate of Carthage with the unhappy condition to which he was reduced. But, nevertheleſs, it was concluded there, that, after ſo long and ſtreight a ſiege, the place muſt ſtand in need both of men and proviſions. A ſupply was therefore decreed them of proviſions, and as many men as could be tranſported in a ſquadron of fifty galleys; which were accordingly diſpatched under the command of Hannibal the ſon of Hamilcar. That brave commander arriving ſafe at the iſland of Æguſa, at a ſmall diſtance from the coaſt of Sicily, ſheltered himſelf there, waiting for a proper time to force his way through the enemy's fleet, which lay at the mouth of the harbour. As ſoon as a briſk ſouth wind blew, he crouded all his ſails, and ordering his rowers to ply their oars, paſſed through the midſt of the Roman fleet, and arrived ſafe in the port with a reinforcement of ten thouſand men and a great quantity of proviſions. The ſudden appearance of the African ſquadron, and the fear of being forced into the port with the enemy by the violence of the wind, prevented the Romans from attacking Hannibal, ſo that he got into Lilybæum without the loſs of a ſingle man. Himilco, encouraged by this new reinforcement, made the very next day a briſk ſally at the head of twenty thouſand ſand men, in hopes of deſtroying the engines of the Romans. Never was action begun or carried on with more bravery; but at length the beſieged were repulſed with great loſs, without being able to ſet fire to the engines as they intended [i].

THE night after this obſtinate fight, Hannibal, finding himſelf to be of no uſe in Lilybæum, put all the Carthaginian cavalry on board his galleys, ſailed boldly through the Roman fleet, and got ſafe to Drepanum, whence he made incurſions into the territories of the allies of the Romans, and intercepted the proviſions which were deſigned for the conſular armies. This occaſioned a great ſcarcity in the two camps, which obliged one of the conſuls to retire with his two legions from the reſt of the army. In the mean time, his collegue endeavoured to ſhut up the harbour with a bar, made of ſtrong beams, faſtened together with iron braces. But this work was ſoon deſtroyed by the winds and ſtrong currents. However, the report being ſpread at Carthage that the harbour was quite ſhut up, no veſſel would venture out for ſome time to bring them from Lilybæum an account of the ſiege. At length a Rhodian, by name Hannibal, undertook to get into the place, and bring them intelligence how their affairs ſtood there, provided the harbour was not yet quite barred up. His undertaking was well received, but little dependence was had upon it, in regard the Roman fleet rid at anchor before the mouth of the harbour. Nevertheleſs the Rhodian with a veſſel of his own put to ſea, and getting ſafe to one of thoſe iſlands, which lie oppoſite to Lilybæum, the very next morning with a fair wind and a freſh gale he paſſed through the enemy's fleet, and to their great ſurprize entered the port. The conſuls gave ſtrict orders to have a more careful eye on the entrance of the haven, and ordered ten of his lighteſt veſſels to be placed there, with their oars, like ſo many wings, diſplayed, and ready to fly after the prey they expected. But the Rhodian, depending upon his ſkill in ſea affairs, and the lightneſs of his veſſel, not only eſcaped ſafely, but in contempt of the Romans who purſued him, would often lie upon his oars, till they got near him, and then row quite round their veſſels. He thus paſſed and repaſſed ſeveral times, carrying to Carthage an account of the ſiege, and to Lilybæum the orders of the ſenate, the Romans being inraged and confounded to ſee one ſingle galley triumph as it were over their whole fleet. The ſucceſsful temerity of the Rhodian encouraged ſeveral Carthaginians to make the like attempt. But one of theſe adventurers, leſs ſkilful than Hannibal in the knowledge of the currents between the rocks and the flats, grounded and was taken by the Romans. The conſul immediately put on board this light galley the beſt crew he had, and waited with impatience for a freſh inſult from the Rhodian. It was not long before the Rhodian entered the port again in the night-time, according to his cuſtom, and was preparing to ſail out in broad day, not knowing that the Romans were now maſters of a galley, which was as good a ſailor as his own. He weighed anchor with great confidence, and ſailed out of the port in ſight of the enemy's fleet; but was greatly ſurpriſed to ſee the Romans purſue him cloſe, and at length come up with him, notwithſtanding the lightneſs of his veſſel. He ha[illegible]ow no way left but to engage them, which he did with a[illegible]n-daunted bravery; but the Romans, who were all choſen men, ſoon put an end to the diſpute. The Rhodian veſſel was boarded, and taken with all her crew. The Romans, being now in poſſeſſion of two light galleys, ſhut up the port ſo effectually, that no Carthaginian ever after attempted to enter it [k].

He is taken by the Romans.

The Greeks before Lilybæum deſtroyed.

The beſieged were not diſcouraged by being deprived of this advantage; they boldly reſiſted two general attacks of the beſiegers, and obliged them to retire with great ſlaughter, after they had got poſſeſſion of the firſt rampart. The advantage they gained in theſe attacks was followed by another, which had like to have reduced the Romans to deſpair. A ſudden ſtorm ariſing, and the wind blowing from the land with ſuch violence, as almoſt to overturn the machines of the Romans, the Carthaginians, by the advice of ſome mercenary Greeks in their ſervice, took advantage of this accident, and ſallying out ſet fire to the galleries, platforms, towers, and baliſtæ of the beſiegers. As the ſtorm blew full in the faces of the Romans, they were ſo blinded with the ſmoke, that they could only throw their darts at a venture, while the flame, which ſpread very faſt, gave light to the enemy. So that the work of ſeveral months was conſumed in a few hours. The boaſted conſtancy of the Romans would not have been able to bear bear up under this terrible diſaſter; had not their gene rous friend Hiero raiſed their drooping ſpirits, by ſendin them convoys of proviſions, and exhorting them not to a bandon the enterprize [l].

AFTER this ſhock, the conſul, not finding himſelf in condition to take Lilybæum by force, turned the ſiege int a blockade. At Rome the news of this diſaſter made dif ferent impreſſions on the people and the ſenate. The peo ple were more animated by it to continue the ſiege. Nay ten thouſand of them, entering into an aſſociation to ſerv in the army before Lilybæum, paſſed over to Meſſana, an from thence marched on foot to the Roman camp. Bu in the ſenate many were for concluding a peace, and th diſpute aroſe to ſuch a height, that from words they cam to blows, and one ſenator was killed for appearing too zea lous for a peace [m]. The next year, when P. Claudius Pul ch[illegible] and L. Junius Pullus were conſuls, proved ſtill mor unfortunate for Rome. The former, who had the com mand of the land-forces, and had inherited all the pride an raſhneſs of the Claudian family, no ſooner arrived at th camp, but he began to defame his predeceſſors, and reproach the ſoldiery with indolence and cowardice. Though he ha but little knowledge in the art of war, his fiery temper pu him upon projects, which required great ſkill in military affairs and he was too proud to take advice. He had ſcarce take upon him the command of the army, when, without con ſulting the other officers, he formed a deſign of ſurpriſing Dre panum, where Adherbal, an able captain, commanded for th Carthaginians. With this view he put to ſea in the dead o the night, with a fleet of a hundred and twenty galley that lay before Lilybæum, having on board the flower o his land-forces. Adherbal was greatly ſurpriſed, when a break of day he diſcovered the enemy's fleet; but reco lecting, that if he ſuffered the harbour to be blocked up, h muſt endure the calamities incident to a ſiege, he reſolv to venture an engagement; and accordingly ſailed out the port with a ſquadron of ninety galleys, and conceal himſelf behind ſome rocks, till the Roman fleet began enter the mouth of the haven. He then appeared all on ſudden, and falling upon the enemy's ſquadron before th could draw up in line of battle, put them into great conf ſion. All the Roman officers adviſed Claudius not to e gage the enemy, but to return before Lilybæum, whi he might eaſily have done. But the conſul, obſtinate to venture an engagement, tacked about, and made a ſignal to the headmoſt galleys to do the ſame. It was with the utmoſt difficulty, that he drew them up in line of battle along the coaſt. His ſituation was highly diſadvantageous; for in caſe his veſſels ſhould be obliged to give way in the leaſt, they could not avoid running aground on the flats, or ſplitting againſt the rocks. Notwithſtanding this diſadvantage, Claudius perſiſted in his former deſign of engaging the enemy, not only contrary to the opinion of his officers, but in defiance of the auſpices, which it was then thought highly impious to deſpiſe. For when the ſacred chickens were conſulted in his preſence and refuſed to feed, he threw them coop and all into the ſea: If they wont eat, let them drink, ſaid he, not reflecting that ſuch a contempt of religion would diſcourage his troops. And indeed the Romans ſeemed to have forgot themſelves in the action which enſued. They made but a faint reſiſtance, and ſuffered themſelves, like mere cowards, to be boarded by the enemy, and driven either upon the ſhore or againſt the rocks. As for Claudius, who had been ſo forward to hazard a battle, he no ſooner ſaw the victory incline to Adherbal's ſide, than he made off as faſt as he could with thirty galleys, leaving the reſt to ſtruggle with the waves, the rocks, and the enemy. The Romans loſt ninety gallies in this ill conducted action. Eight thouſand of their men were either killed or drowned, and twenty thouſand taken and ſent priſoners to Carthage. The Carthaginians gained this ſignal victory, without loſing a ſingle man, or one galley [n].

Claudius Pulcher defeated at ſea by the Carthaginians.

THE news of this fatal action no ſooner reached Rome, than Claudius was recalled and ordered to name a dictator. The proud conſul, to inſult the ſenate and in deriſion of the laws, nominated to that ſupreme dignity one of his own clients, named Claudius Glycias, a man of the meaneſt of the people, who had no other office in the city but that of viator, or, as we may call him, tipſtaff to Claudius during his conſulate. This unſeaſonable jeſt highly provoked all orders of men againſt Claudius. The mock-dictator was forced to abdicate, but the ſenate allowed him to wear the robe bordered with purple, called prætexta, in the theatre and circus the reſt of his life, for having reſigned his dictatorſhip torſhip with a good grace. M. Attilius Calatinus ſucceeded him, who appointed the famous Cæcilius Metellus for his general of the horſe. As for Claudius, he was, after his depoſition, tried before the people for his miſdemeanors. Some writers ſay, he was condemned; others tell us, that the people was prevented from condemning him, and driven from the forum by a ſudden ſtorm, which they looked upon as a tacit abſolution given him by the gods, and therefore did not call him to judgment again [o]. But this has the air of a fable, invented to wipe off the ſtain from the Claudian family, which was in great power at Rome. Polybius ſays, he was tried, and loaded with a very rigorous ſentence [p].

As for the other conſul, Junius Pullus, he ſailed with a fleet of a hundred and twenty galleys, and eight hundred other veſſels, to Syracuſe, in order to take in proviſions there for the camp before Lilybæum. From Syracuſe he ſent the quæſtors before him with a ſquadron to ſupply the preſent wants of the army, while he followed with the reſt of the fleet. Adherbal, who carefully watched all the motions of the Roman fleet, no ſooner heard that the conſul was at ſea, than he detached Carthalo from Drepanum with a hundred galleys, ordering him to cruiſe off of Heraclea, and there wait for the Roman fleet and convoys. He had no ſooner put to ſea, than news was brought him, that a Roman ſquadron, which was that of the quæſtors, appeared at ſome diſtance. Hereupon, as he had the Romans in great contempt ſince their laſt defeat, he prepared to engage them, promiſing himſelf a ſure victory. But the quæſtors, diffident of their own ſtrength, ſheltered themſelves among certain rocks near Phintia, a city ſubject to the Romans, where Carthalo attacked them, but was not attended with the ſucceſs he expected. The Romans defending their veſſels with baliſtæ and other engines, which they had brought in great haſte from the town and planted on the ſhore; ſo that Carthalo, after having taken only a few tranſports, retired to a harbour in a neighbouring river, where he came to an anchor, and kept a vigilant eye on the motions of the Roman fleet. While he was thus waiting for the quæſtors, he was informed by the veſſels he had ſent out to make diſcoveries, that the conſul Junius had with a numerous fleet doubled cape Pachynum, and was ſteering ſteering his courſe for Lilybæum. Upon this important piece of news he immediately weighed anchor, reſolved to give the conſul battle before he could join the quæſtors ſquadron. He crouded all the ſail he could, and came in ſight of the conſul's fleet off of Camerina. But Junius, not caring to hazard a battle, choſe to act the ſame part his quæſtors had done, though he did not know it. For he turned to the coaſt, and took ſanctuary among the rocks that were next at hand, thinking it more adviſeable to run ſome hazard, than expoſe by the loſs of the fleet, which might be the conſequence of a battle, the land-forces to the mercy of the enemy. Carthalo forbore attacking them in ſo dangerous a poſt, but retiring to a place between the two fleets, kept that ſtation, carefully obſerving their motions. While matters ſtood thus, the Carthaginian pilots, who were well ſkilled in the weather, and acquainted with thoſe ſeas and coaſts, foreſeeing by certain ſigns that a ſtorm would ſoon ariſe, adviſed Carthalo to weigh anchor, double cape Pachynum, and ſhelter himſelf under the oppoſite ſhore. Carthalo followed their advice, and with great difficulty doubled the cape, and ſecured his fleet, while the Roman ſhips were either daſhed againſt the rocks, or driven upon the coaſt. Never was there a more complete ſhipwreck. We are told, that of the conſul's fleet and the quæſtors ſquadron, which conſiſted of a hundred and twenty galleys and eight hundred tranſports, laden with all ſorts of proviſions and military ſtores, not one veſſel, nay, not a plank, was ſaved, which could be uſed again [q]. Thus Rome was deprived once more of all her naval force, and once more renounced the empire of the ſea. But neither did this dejection laſt long, their ambition getting the better of all difficulties.

The Roman fleet entirely deſtroyed.

As the Romans, notwithſtanding theſe loſſes, were ſtill ſtronger by land, the blockade of Lilybæum was continued. The conſul Junius, to repair his misfortune, made an attempt upon Eryx, a place of great ſtrength, and ſituated on the declivity of a mountain bearing the ſame name, and the higheſt in Sicily, except mount Ætna. He ſucceeded in his attempt, and ſurpriſed the place in the night by the help of ſome ſoldiers, who betrayed it to him. To ſecure this conqueſt, he built a fort at the foot of the mountain, and placed a garriſon in it of eight hundred men. But Carthalo

Eryx ſurprized by the conſul Junius.

[q] Polyb. c. 54.

Carthalo soon after made a descent, took the fort by assault, and put the garrison to the sword [r]. Some writers say, that Junius was taken prisoner in defending the place [s]; others, that he laid violent hands on himself, for fear of being condemned at Rome for his ill conduct, or out of melancholy for so fatal a campaign [t].

One of the consuls being dead and the other deposed, the dictator's presence became necessary in Sicily. As from the foundation of Rome no dictator had appeared out of Italy, great things were expected from him. But Attilius performed no remarkable exploits. He gained some small advantages before Lilybæum, and then returned to preside at the elections for the ensuing year; when two were promoted to the consulate, who had enjoyed that dignity once before, C. Aurelius Cotta and P. Servilius Geminus. The Romans had now no fleet, and therefore both the consuls were ordered to pursue the siege of Lilybæum, and to prevent the Carthaginians from carrying succours or provisions into that place, or into Drepanum. Carthalo attempted both, but finding the Romans every where upon their guard, he endeavoured to draw one of the consuls out of Sicily, by making a descent upon Italy, and ravaging the provinces belonging to the republic. But upon the first advice, that he had landed in Lucania, the prætor of Rome putting himself at the head of an army, which was immediately raised in the city, forced him to re-embarque and return to Sicily. And now his mercenary troops began to murmur for want of pay, no money having been sent to them for some time from Carthage, which was almost quite exhausted with so long and expensive a war. To put a stop to the mutiny, he punished the most seditious with great rigor: some were transported to desart islands, and there left to perish; others were sent to Carthage, and there executed. This provoked even those who were most peaceably inclined; insomuch that, the rebellion becoming general, Carthalo was seasonably recalled, and a commander sent in his room, who became afterwards famous for his implacable hatred to the Romans, which he did not suffer to die with him, but transmitted to his posterity. This great man was Hamilcar, surnamed Barcas, the father of the famous Hannibal, the greatest officer Carthage ever produced. Hamilcar, having appeased the sedition which which his predeceſſor had raiſed by his unſeaſonable rigor, ſailed to Italy, and, more ſucceſsful than Carthalo, laid waſte the territories of the Locrians and Brutians, and returned to Sicily with an immenſe booty. Having landed his troops, he encamped on a ſteep rock between Panormus and Eryx, both belonging to the Romans; and from thence, making incurſions into the lands of the allies of Rome, ſo haraſſed the conſuls, that they could make but little progreſs in the ſiege of Lilybæum. Hamilcar's campaign was looked upon at Carthage as a maſterly piece of conduct. He had ſubſiſted, in ſpite of the Romans and at the expence of their allies, between two of their cities, and at a great diſtance from any place allied to Carthage, and at the ſame time diſconcerted all the meaſures of the conſuls [t].

THE new conſuls, L. Cæcilius Metellus and Fabius Buteo, were both ordered to Sicily; the former, who had been conſul once before, and was ſo famous for his magnificent triumph, was appointed to carry on the ſiege of Lilybæum, and his collegue to beſiege Drepanum. But Hamilcar, by innumerable ſallies from his eminence, kept both the conſuls in play, and by his maſterly conduct prevented them from gaining any conſiderable advantage during the campaign. According to the beſt hiſtorian of thoſe times, the brave Hamilcar ſeemed to be every-where; his foreſight extended to all particulars, and his valour was ſufficient for any attempt [u].

WHILE affairs were in this ſituation in Sicily, the Romans pillaged the coaſts of Africa with a fleet built and equipped at the expence of private perſons; for the republic had laid aſide all thoughts of building new galleys, after the loſſes ſhe had ſuſtained by ſea. However, ſhe paſſed a decree, empowering all her ſubjects to build, equip, and arm ſhips at their own charges, to pillage the coaſt of Africa, and apply all the plunder to their own uſe. Nay, the republic lent the gallies ſhe had left to private perſons gratis, with this proviſo only, that they ſhould return them in as good a condition as they had received them. This fleet of privateers committed great devaſtations on the coaſt of Africa, entered the port of Hippo, ſet fire to the ſhips and houſes, and put to ſea again loaded with a rich booty.

A fleet of Roman privateers defeats a Carthaginian fleet.

On their return to Sicily they met off Panormus a Carthaginian fleet carrying proviſions to Hamilcar, and gained a conſiderable advantage over it. However the pride of the the Romans being now in a good meaſure abated by their many late misfortunes, they conſented at laſt to an exchange of priſoners; and they were accordingly exchanged man for man. As the Carthaginians had more captives to redeem than the Romans, the latter received money for the overplus, which recruited their exhauſted treaſury. The number of the Roman citizens appeared by a cenſus taken this year to be no more than 251220, which was leſs by 86575 than the number at the laſt cenſus. A very conſiderable diminution, which can only be aſcribed to the war, and the many ſhipwrecks which the republic had ſuffered [w].

THE following year. M. Ottacilius Craſſus and M. Fabius Licinus were created conſuls; but they made little or no progreſs in the ſiege of Lilybæum, which was the province allotted to them, being daily haraſſed by parties ſent out by Hamilcar. As they did not return before the time of their conſulate expired, Tib. Coruncanius was appointed dictator to preſide at the election of new magiſtrates, when M. Fabius Buteo and C. Attilius Bulbus were choſen conſuls. At this time a woman of the firſt rank was ſeverely puniſhed, only for dropping ſome words, which betrayed a want of affection for the public. Claudia, the ſiſter of the late Claudius Pulcher, a woman thoroughly tinctured with all the vices of her family, returning in a chariot from a public ſhew, happened to be preſſed in the throng. Upon this ſhe cried out in a tranſport of rage; I wiſh my brother Claudius were alive again, that he might rid Rome, as formerly, of the ſcoundrel mob, with which the city is crouded. For theſe words ſhe was cited by the two ædiles to appear before the tribes; and, notwithſtanding all the whole body of the nobility could ſay or do in her favour, ſhe was forced to appear before the tribunal of the Roman people, which had never before happened to any woman, and was condemned to pay a fine of twenty-five thouſand aſſes of braſs, that is, 80 l. 14 s. 7 d. which the ædile Sempronius employed in building a little chapel on the hill Aventinus, dedicated to Liberty [x].

Claudia puniſhed for treaſonable words againſt the people.

THE two new conſuls had no ſooner entered upon their office, than they ſet out for Sicily. The Romans hoped to reduce Lilybæum at length by famine, and therefore perſiſted in carrying on the ſiege. But, in ſpite of all the care care and vigilance of the two conſuls, the brave Hamilcar found means to ſupply the place with freſh proviſions. He ſailed with his ſmall fleet from the port of Epirecte, near which place he lay encamped, and in the night ordered a good number of tranſports, loaded with proviſions, to advance behind the iſlands Ægates, which covered the port of Lilybæum. In the morning he himſelf appeared out at ſea with the ſmall remains of his galleys, bidding as it were, the enemy defiance. The Roman gallies, which guarded the port, made what haſte they could to attack him. But when they had got a great way from the port, the Carthaginian ſhips, which lay concealed behind the iſlands, entered it, unloaded their proviſions, landed ſome freſh troops, and got out to ſea again before the Romans returned from their vain purſuit [y]. This ſame year the Roman privateers gained a conſiderable victory over a Carthaginian fleet within ſight of the iſland of Ægimur near Africa; but were afterwards daſhed in pieces by a ſtorm, which drove them againſt the rocks on the coaſt of Africa [z].

The Roman privateers deſtroyed by a ſtorm.

NOTWITHSTANDING all theſe misfortunes, the Romans with an unaccountable ſteadineſs continued the ſiege of Lilybæum, and diſpatched their two new conſuls, A. Manlius Torquatus and C. Sempronius Blæſus, into Sicily, with orders to uſe their utmoſt efforts againſt the place. As it was well ſtored with proviſions, Hamilcar gave himſelf no farther trouble about relieving it, or ſending in new ſtores. His mind was wholly bent upon a more noble deſign, which was to recover the city of Eryx, taken formerly by the conſul Junius. This was a difficult and dangerous enterprize. The city of Eryx ſtood about the middle of the mountain of that name, and was fortified by art as well as by nature. The Romans were in poſſeſſion of the temple of Venus Erycina on the ſummit of the mountain, and had a fort at the bottom of it defended by a good garriſon. But nothing could diſcourage the Carthaginian general. He ſet out from his camp in the dead of the night, and, winding round the mountain, in a profound ſilence, arrived undiſcovered at the gates of the city, which he eaſily forced open in that ſurpriſe, and made himſelf maſter of the place. All thoſe who were found under arms, he put to the ſword, and ſent the reſt priſoners to Drepanum. The war now took another turn: the Romans mans made it their whole buſineſs to diſpoſſeſs Hamilcar of this advantageous poſt, and the Carthaginian did all that lay in his power to maintain himſelf in it. The Romans, who were maſters of a fort at the foot of the mountain, beſieged him; and he at the ſame time beſieged the Romans, who were poſted at the top of it in the temple of Venus. In this poſt between two garriſons of the enemy, Hamilcar maintained himſelf, and amuſed the Romans two whole years. And this diverſion was of great ſervice to his country; for, in the mean time, the ſiege of Lilybæum advanced but ſlowly, and that of Drepanum was raiſed. Of ſo great a weight in the ſcale was the valour and addreſs of one ſingle man. The new conſuls, C. Fundanius and C. Sulpicius Gallus, endeavoured in vain to drive Hamilcar from his poſt. The beſieged and the beſiegers ſuffered, each in their turn, all the miſeries of war and famine. Never was fury more uninterrupted, or battles more frequent. No day paſſed without ſome rencounter. Both parties ſeemed, as Polybius expreſſes it, quite inſenſible of pains and fatigues, fought as if they had been invulnerable, and bore the inconveniencies of hunger and watching, as if their bodies had been proof againſt all pain and hardſh ps. After the conſuls had by a thouſand ſtratagems attempted in vain to make themſelves maſters of the diſputed city of Eryx, the Gauls, who made up the beſt part of Hamilcar's garriſon, being at length tired out with continual fighting, and not receiving their pay, plotted together to put the place into the hands of the Romans. But Hamilcar, too vigilant to be ſurpriſed, diſcovered and defeated their deſign. Howe[redacted]hey delivered up to the conſuls an advanced poſt, whi[redacted]arded, and entered into their ſervice. This is the firſt[redacted] we read of foreign forces in the pay of the republic, w[redacted] armies had hitherto conſiſted either of Roman citizens, who were paid by the public, or of Italian allies, who were maintained by their reſpective ſtates.

A new Roman fleet built at the expence of private citizens.

But now the ſenate being thoroughly convinced, that the republic could never eſtabliſh her dominion in Sicily, ſo long as the Carthaginians were maſters of the ſea, turned their thoughts anew to the building of a fleet, reſolving to try fortune a third time, how adverſe ſoever ſhe had hitherto been. They propoſed to man their veſſels with hired troops from foreign countries, that, in caſe of new misfortunes, Rome might not ſuffer ſo great a loſs of her own citizens as ſhe had done formerly. The great difficulty was, how to find money for ſuch an undertaking, the public treaſury being quite exhauſted. On this occaſion the ſenators gave to the reſt of the citizens an example of zeal for the ſervice of their country. The moſt wealthy among them built, each a quinqueremis, at his own expence. Others taxed themſelves at ſo much a head, and a galley was fitted out at the joint expences of three or four. In ſhort, a fleet of two hundred quinqueremes was put to ſea by private perſons, without any other burden on the republic, than that of reimburſing the private perſons, when ſhe ſhould be in a condition to do it. This new armament far excelled any of the former ones, all the galleys that compoſed it having been built upon the model of that light galley, which was taken from Hannibal the Rhodian [z].

THE conſuls choſen for the next year, were C. Lutatius Catulus and A. Poſthumius; but the latter being at the ſame time high-prieſt of Mars, Cæcilius Metellus, at this time pontifex maximus, would not ſuffer him to exerciſe any military function; ſo that he had the bare name of conſul. But the republic, not thinking it adviſeable to truſt the command of her armies to one general, and being well appriſed of the inconveniences which would ariſe from the too long abſence of the prætor, to whom it naturally fell to ſupply the place of the conſul, created a ſecond prætor, that one might be at the head of the army, and the other reſide at Rome and adminiſter juſtice there. This new inſtitution continued even when both conſuls took the field. One of theſe prætors was to hear cauſes between citizen and citizen, and the other between citizens and foreigners: hence the former was called prætor urbanus, and the other prætor peregrinus. The two prætors choſe their provinces by lot, and were themſelves choſen, as the conſuls, in the comitia by centuries [a]. Valerius Falto was the firſt prætor peregrinus. He embarqued on board the new fleet to make war, together with the conſul Lutatius, in Sicily. They began the campaign with the ſiege of Drepanum, and ſoon made a breach in the wall with their engines, which battered the place day and night. But as the conſul was mounting the breach at the head of his men, he received a dangerous wound in the thigh. As he was greatly beloved by the ſoldiers, they all haſtened to his relief, and, giving over the attack, carried him back to the camp. After this he did not puſh on the ſiege with great vigor; but, being perſuaded that the Carthaginian fleet would ſoon appear, and that a victory at ſea would contribute much more, than the taking of a ſingle town, towards the entire conqueſt of Sicily, he turned all his thoughts to the diſciplining of his men, and preparing them for a naval engagement. He was not yet cured of his wound, when news was brought him, that a Carthaginian fleet of four hundred ſhips, under the command of Hanno, had been ſeen at ſea. This terrible armament was the laſt effort of the African republic. Hanno had on board new levies, arms, money, proviſions, and all ſorts of ſtores; and his deſign was to touch at the port of Eryx before the Romans could have account of his motions, and to ſail from thence in queſt of the enemy's fleet, after he had unloaded his veſſels and taken on board the flower of the troops there, together with Hamilcar, whoſe name he thought was enough to fill the Romans with terror. But Lutatius, indiſpoſed as he was, having cauſed himſelf to be carried on board the prætorian galley, immediately ordered the fleet to join the ſquadron before Lilybæum, and ſteer their courſe directly from thence to the iſlands called Ægades, the place of rendezvous for the enemy's fleet. He had ſcarce left Lilybœum, when he deſcried the Carthaginian fleet off Hiera, ſhaping their courſe to Eryx. Hereupon he ordered the commanders of his veſſels to prepare for a battle. The wind was then favourable for the Romans; but it changed all on a ſudden, and at the ſame time the ſea began to run very high. However, the conſul, after having been ſome time in ſuſpenſe and undetermined what to do, reſolved in the end not to defer the engagement one moment. Afterwards, ſaid he, we ſhall have a greater advantage in fighting with ſhips that are heavy laden, than diſadvantage in the roughneſs of the ſea. If Hanno carries his fleet to Eryx, takes Hamilcar on board, embarques his brave mercenaries, and gets rid of theſe new recruits, the ſucceſs will be more doubtful, and the victory longer diſputed. Upon theſe conſiderations Lutatius drew up his fleet in line of battle, and made directly towards the enemy. As the Carthaginians were on this occaſion inferior to the Romans in every thing, except the number of their ſhips, the diſpute was ſoon decided. The Romans routed them at the firſt onſet. Fifty of the Carthaginian veſſels were ſunk and ſeventy taken, with all the marines and ſoldiers they had on board. The reſt, by an uncommon common inſtance of good fortune, made their eſcape. For the wind, which had hitherto been favourable to the Carthaginians in their voyage to Sicily, changed all on a ſudden and favoured their eſcape. After the battle the conſul ſteered his courſe to Lilybæum, to diſpoſe of the money, arms, proviſions, and above all of the priſoners he had taken, who were at leaſt ten thouſand in number. Such was the battle of the Ægades, which determined the fate of Sicily [b].

HAMILCAR was the firſt who felt the effects of this terrible defeat. The conſul Lutatius had no ſooner diſpoſed of his booty and captives, than he marched againſt him, and in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes killed above two thouſand of his men. Hereupon that gallant commander, having no longer any hopes of ſuccours, was forced to capitulate. The Romans, elated with their late victory, inſiſted upon his paſſing under the yoke with his garriſon. But he rejected the propoſal with the utmoſt indignation, proteſting, that he would rather ſuffer all extremities, than ſubmit to ſuch an indignity, or abandon a place with diſgrace, which he had ſo long defended with honour. While he was treating with the conſul, he received full powers from his republic to do whatever he judged to be moſt for her intereſt. Being thus appointed mediator between Carthage and Rome, he conſidered, that Carthage was too much exhauſted to maintain her conqueſts in Sicily, and therefore thought it more adviſeable to yield the iſland by a treaty of peace, than to be driven ſhamefully out of it, and at the ſame time expoſe Africa to the ravages of a victorious fleet. For this purpoſe therefore he ſent deputies to Lutatius, who received them with great [illegible] being deſirous to put an end to the war before his conſulſhip expired, that his ſucceſſors might not have the glory of finiſhing a work, which had coſt him ſo much blood and labour. Both parties being thus diſpoſed to purſue the ſame end, after ſome ſlight difficulties, the conſul drew up the following articles, while he lay before Eryx, as the terms of a peace between the two republics. There ſhall be peace and friendſhip between Rome and Carthage upon the following conditions, if the people of Rome approve thereof: 1. The Carthaginians ſhall evacuate all the places which they have in Sicily, and entirely quit the iſland. 2. They ſhall in twenty years pay the Romans, at equal payments every year, two thouſand two hundred talents of ſilver, that is, 437250 l. ſterling. 3. They ſhall reſtore the Roman captives and deſerters without ranſom, and redeem their own priſoners with money. 4. They ſhall not make war upon Hiero king of Syracuſe, or his allies. Theſe articles being agreed on, Hamilcar ſurrendered Eryx, upon condition, that all his ſoldiers ſhould march out with him upon his paying for each of them eighteen Roman denarii. Hoſtages were given on both ſides, and this long war concluded with a truce[c]. The only thing now remaining was, to get theſe articles confirmed by the Roman people aſſembled in the comitia, they being the ſole arbitrators of peace and war. For this purpoſe both Lutatius and Hamilcar ſent deputies to Rome. The republic, tho' overjoyed at the conſuls ſucceſs, was diſſatisfied with the too eaſy terms he had granted the Carthaginians, and therefore appointed ten commiſſioners to treat perſonally with Hamilcar, and demand farther advantages. Theſe, after having thoroughly informed themſelves of the ſtate of affairs, added to the former articles two more; viz. 1. That a thouſand talents ſhould be paid immediately, and the two thouſand two hundred in the ſpace of ten years at equal payments. 2. That the Carthaginians ſhould quit all the little iſlands about Italy and Sicily, and never more come near them with ſhips of war, or raiſe mercenaries in thoſe places. Neceſſity obliged Hamilcar to conſent to theſe new terms; but he returned to Carthage with a hatred to the Romans, which he did not ſuffer even to die with him, but left as an inheritance to his ſon, the famous Hannibal. He had no ſooner given his conſent to theſe articles, than he ſet out for Lilybœum, and from thence ſailed to Carthage, not caring to be a witneſs of the ſolemn oath, which was to be the laſt ratification of the peace[d]. It may be juſtly ſaid of Hamilcar, that his country never produced a general equal to him in valour and prudence. He always conquered as long as his republic could ſupport him, and only ſunk in the common misfortune of his country. At laſt he returned into Africa to be the defender, or rather the deliverer, of Carthage, in the cruel war, which ſhe was to maintain with her diſcontented mercenaries, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Carthage.

THE next year the conſul Lutatius and the prætor Valerius, who had acted as his collegue, were continued in Sicily, the firſt in quality of proconſul, and the ſecond in that of proprætor, while the two new conſuls, Q. Lutatius Cerco and A. Manlius, marched an army into Hetruria to quell a ſudden rebellion of the Faliſci, who had affronted a tribune of the people, named Genucius, and not only refuſed to give the republic ſatisfaction, but openly revolted, and even ventured to take the field againſt ſome Roman troops that were ſent againſt them. The two conſuls were therefore ordered to enter Hetruria, and bring the Faliſci back to their duty. The rebels did not confine themſelves to the defence of their city, but taking the field, fought two pitched battles in the ſpace of ſix days. The ſucceſs of the firſt was pretty equal; but the ſecond turned ſo much to their diſadvantage, that they were obliged to lay down their arms, and deliver up their city to the conquerors, after they had loſt fifteen thouſand men. Their capital ſituated on an inacceſſible mountain, was razed, but they were allowed to build a new one in the plain; their arms, horſes, part of their moveables, and half their lands, were confiſcated. From Hetruria the conſuls returned to Rome, and from thence paſſed over into Sicily to put the laſt hand to the peace, which was ratified by the ſolemn ſacrifice of a ſow, and the mutual oaths of the two nations. Thus ended the firſt Punic war, the longeſt and moſt memorable which had ever been waged till that time. It had laſted full four and twenty years, during which time the conquerors loſt ſeven hundred ſhips, and the conquered only five hundred. But the Romans prevailed at length by their conſtancy, or, as Polybius expreſſes it, by a certain inflexibility of reſolution peculiar to themſelves.

The revolted Faliſci ſubdued.

The firſt Punic war ended.

AND now the great affair at Rome was, to determine the fate of Sicily, the manner in which it ſhould be governed, and the emoluments which the republic ſhould draw from ſo fine a conqueſt. The whole iſland, except the kingdom of Syracuſe, was declared a Roman province, that is, a country to be governed by Roman laws and Roman magiſtrates. A prætor was to be ſent annually thither to be governor and judge in civil cauſes, and a quæſtor to receive the revenues of the republic. Theſe revenues were either fixed or caſual. The fixed were called tributes, and conſiſted of a certain ſum of money, which the province was every year to pay into the public treaſury.

treaſury. The caſual were the tenths of the product of the lands, and the duties upon merchandize exported and imported. Certain officers, called publicans, generally choſen out of the body of the Roman knights, were appointed to levy both theſe ſorts of taxes; and the latter ſort were farmed by the publicans at a certain annual rent, which they conſtantly paid the republic at all events. However, theſe fixed revenues did not hinder the Romans from often demanding of the provinces extraordinary ſupplies of men, ſhips, corn, &c. Thus Sicily, the firſt province Rome eſtabliſhed out of Italy, was deprived of its own laws, and conſequently of the beſt part of its liberty. By becoming Roman, it was indeed leſs free, but more happy. It had been long the ſcene of war between three nations; the Carthaginians, the Mamertines, and the Syracuſans, contending for the dominion of it. The Romans, who came after them, encreaſed at firſt the calamities of that unhappy people, but afterwards ſecured their tranquillity. There were now but two ſovereigns in the whole iſland, Hiero and the Romans; and as there reigned a perfect union between them, the Sicilians enjoyed all the bleſſings of an uninterrupted peace.

SICILY being thus ſettled in perfect tranquillity, the two conſuls [illegible]atius Cerco and Manlius Atticus, the proconſul Lutatius Catulus, and the proprætor Valerius, returned to Rome with their troops, to receive there the honourable reward of their labours. The proconſul and proprætor triumphed for the naval victory at the Ægades, and the conſuls for having vanquiſhed the Faliſci in Hetruria.

THE joy of the people of Rome for their late proſperity was much damped by two dreadful misfortunes, which followed cloſe upon one anothe The Tiber on a ſudden overflowed with ſuch violenc, as to overturn a great many houſes on the lower grounds; and the water continued ſtagnated ſo long in the forum, as greatly to damage the foundations of the houſes there. After this a fire broke out in the upper city, and thence ſpread as far as the forum. Rome, ſays Livy [e], loſt more wealth in one day, than ſhe had got by many victories. The temple of Veſta was not exempted from the common misfortune, and the moſt antient monuments of religion had been deſtroyed, had not Cæcilius Metellus, the preſent pontifex maximus, ventured his life to ſave them. He made his way through the flames, went into the ſanctuary where where the palladium was kept, and saved it from the fire; an action more celebrated in history, than the glorious victory which he gained over the Carthaginians, at the head of a consular army. One of his arms was much hurt in the attempt, and, which was much worse, he entirely lost his sight. This heroical action procured him a mark of distinction, which had never before been granted to any man; he was allowed to be drawn to the senate-house in a chariot [f]. This year the tribes were probably augmented to thirty-five, by the addition of the tribes Velina and Quirina. It certain at least, that from this time the tribes were reckoned to be thirty-five, which number was never afterwards encreased. The consular year was closed with a census made by the censors, Aurelius Cotta and Fabius Buteo; and unless there be some mistake in the cyphers, Eusebius reckons us up but one hundred and sixty thousand citizens. If his numbers are right, a prodigious multitude of citizens must have perished by the inundation and fire.

The new consuls, C. Claudius Centho and M. Sempronius Tuditanus, having no employment abroad, turned their thoughts to the securing of their frontiers against the Gauls and Ligurians, by planting colonies in their neighbourhood. In the first year after the Punic war, Livius Andronicus, the reformer of the Roman stage, appeared at Rome. He introduced connected fables after the Greek manner, instead of the buffooneries and rambling discourses with which the people to that time had been entertained. He was the freedman of Marcus Livius Salinator, whose children he had educated. His poetry was grown obsolete in Cicero's time, and, in the judgment of that orator, would not bear a second reading. Andronicus flourished about an hundred and fifty years after the death of Euripides and Sophocles, and fifty-two after that of Menander. The following consulship of C. Mamilius Turinus and Q. Valerius Falto proved an interval of peace. The Romans indeed had some thoughts of taking arms anew against the Carthaginians, who, having seized some of their merchants carrying arms and provisions to the revolted mercenaries, had made five hundred of them prisoners, and thrown some of them into the sea. But they were appeased by a respectful embassy from Carthage, and continued faithful to the treaty of peace, though the city of Utica, which had declared for the rebels, would have submitted to Rome, and the mercenaries, who had seized seized Sardinia, invited them to take possession of that island. About this time, Ennius the famous poet was born at Rudes, an antient city of Calabria near Tarentum. He was the inventor of hexameter verse among the Latins, though the Greek was his mother-tongue. The life of Scipio Africanus, which he wrote in Coriacks, was his master-piece. By this work he gained the affection of the Cornelian family, who shewed their gratitude to him even after his death, depositing his ashes in the same tomb with those of Scipio Africanus, and erecting a marble statue to him near the statue of that great commander. Besides the life of Scipio, he wrote the history of Rome in eighteen books, recording in verse the events of which he himself had been witness. His poem was a history in verse, the Romans in his time being too grave to have any taste for poetical fictions [g]. The poet Nævius, who was his contemporary, after having made some campaigns in the first Punic war, wrote the history of that war in verse, according to the taste of those times [h].

CARTHAGE, during her war with the revolted mercenaries, affected to pay a great deference to Rome, and even restored all the Italian merchants, who had been taken in carrying arms and provisions to the rebels. The Romans were so well pleased with this instance of respect, that they sent back to Carthage without ransom all the Carthaginian prisoners, who were still detained at Rome, prohibited their merchants all intercourse and traffick with the rebels, and allowed them to supply the Carthaginians with arms, provisions, and whatever they wanted [i]. But notwithstanding the sincere friendship, which seemed to subsist at this time between the two rival republics, Hamilcar had no sooner by his valour and conduct put an end to the rebellion at home, than he turned all his thoughts to the humbling of a republic, whose interests were so opposite to those of his own. With this view, as Carthage was not then in a condition to renew the war with Rome, he formed two schemes, both worthy of a great genius, which, if wisely pursued, might at length have crushed the imperious republic, or at least bring her upon a level with Carthage. The first was to extend extend the Carthaginian dominions into Spain, that his republic might, by this means, be able to raiſe within her own dominions a ſufficient number of forces to make head againſt thoſe multitudes of ſoldiers, with which Italy furniſhed the Romans. The ſecond was to form young Hannibal his ſon ſo, that he ſhould inherit his valour, his experience, and his hatred to the Romans, and ſteadily purſue his deſigns. He had no ſooner appeaſed the inteſtine troubles, than he applied himſelf wholly to the purſuit of theſe two projects. But before he paſſed the ſtreights, known then by the name of the Pillars of Hercules, in order to make war in Spain, he took an opportunity to inſpire his ſon, though but nine years old, with his own ſentiments. Before he embarqued, he ordered a ſolemn ſacrifice to be offered to Jupiter; and when all things were ready and the victim juſt going to be ſlain, he took his ſon by the hand, and, leading him to the altar, aſked him whether he was willing to attend him in his Spaniſh expedition? The courageous boy not only conſented to go, but conjured his father by the gods preſent to form him to victory, and teach him the art of conquering. That I will joyfully do, replied Hamilcar, and with all the care of a father who loves you, if you will ſwear upon the altars, to be an eternal enemy to the Romans. Hannibal readily complied with the motion; and the ſolemnity of the ceremony and the ſacredneſs of the oath made ſuch an impreſſion upon his mind, as nothing afterwards could ever efface. He then firſt imbibed that hatred for Rome, which ended only with his life. Hamilcar by this proceeding plainly declared, that he paſſed into Spain with no other view, than that of falling afterwards [illegible] the Romans. But we muſt leave him making conqueſts there, and return to the affairs of Rome.

Hannibal takes an oath to be an eternal enemy to the Romans.

The Italic Gauls, called Boii, who had been ſubdued by the Romans before the firſt Punic war, threw off the yoke, and joined the Faliſci in Hetruria. On the other hand, the Ligures were in motion, and ſeemed to threaten the republic with an approaching war. The preſent conſuls therefore, C. Mamilius Turinus and Q. Valerius Falto, divided their forces. The latter, who marched againſt the Gauls, was defeated by them with the loſs of three thouſand five hundred men. Upon the news of this defeat, M. Genucius Cipus, one of the prætors, was immediately diſpatched from Rome with a reinforcement for the conſul. But Valerius, looking upon this as a perſonal affront, reſolved ſolved to conquer the enemy before the ſuccours arrived, or periſh in the attempt. Accordingly, he fell upon the Gauls with ſuch fury, that he killed fourteen thouſand of them, and took two thouſand priſoners (H). However, this victory did not procure him a triumph, becauſe he had by his raſhneſs expoſed the Roman army to the danger of a ſecond defeat. As for Sempronius, the other conſul, he gained a battle, though not a deciſive one, againſt the Ligurians; but had not time to purſue his victory, being by the republic ordered into Sardinia. This iſland had been formerly ſubdued by the Romans, as we have related above, but ſoon after returned, we know not how, under the dominion of its antient maſters. The revolted mercenaries had ſeized it, and offered to put the Romans in poſſeſſion of it, in order to engage them to take their part. But Rome made it then a point of honour not to ſide with rebels. However, this ſcrupulous fit of honour was ſhortlived. As this iſland was of great importance, and had never been yielded to the Carthaginians by any treaty, the ſenate thought they might juſtly claim it by right of conqueſt.

The Boii defeated.

(H) It is pretended, that M. Genucius Cipus, then one of the prætors, who was charged to lead theſe reinforcements to the conſul, was ſcarce got out of the city, when two horns grew out of his forehead. Being alarmed at this prodigy, he conſulted a diviner of Hetruria, in order to learn what misfortunes it foreboded to him. The Hetrurian told him, that he ſhould one day be inveſted with royal authority; which made Cipus dread his fate, as the Romans were bred up with an utter averſion to monarchy, and do all that lay in his power to prevent the accompliſhment of the prediction. From that moment he reſolved never to enter Rome, entreated the ſenate to aſſemble without the walls, and there preſſed the conſcript fathers to paſs a decree of perpetual baniſhment againſt him. The ſenate admired his diſintereſted affection for his country, and granted his requeſt; but at the ſame time, to reward his virtue, allowed him as much ground as he could encloſe in a circle in one day, with a plough drawn by two oxen, and guided by himſelf; and beſides, erected a ſtatue of braſs, repreſenting Cipus's head with the two horns, and placed it over the gate of the city, at which he went out. From this monument the gate was called the brazen gate. This prodigy is related by Feſtus, Valerius Maximus, and Ovid; but they look upon it as a fable, though the ſtatue of Cipus was ſtill to be ſeen in their time over the brazen gate (25).

queſt. They therefore ſent, on trifling pretences, Sempronius with a fleet to take poſſeſſion of it. The conſul on his arrival acquainted the Carthaginian commander, that if his republic did not immediately withdraw her troops from Sardinia, and relinquiſh all pretenſions to that iſland for ever, he would, in the name of the ſenate and people of Rome, declare war with Carthage. The Carthaginians, who had juſt put an end to the war with the mercenaries, were ſo terrified at this expreſs declaration made by a conſul at the head of an army, that they readily ſubmitted, and gave up all claims to Sardinia for ever. But this was not enough for the conſul; he obliged them to defray the charges of his armament, and the further ſum of twelve hundred talents. An extortion, which contributed moſt of all to confirm Hamilcar in his hatred to the Romans, and to render Hannibal inexorable in the wars, which we ſhall ſoon ſee him carry on with great cruelty in Italy [i]. The Romans recover Sardinia.

THE new conſuls, L. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, purſued the war with the Gauls and Ligurians, in which they were attended with good ſucceſs, ſo long as the two conſular armies encamped together. But the love of glory and booty having made the conſular armies ſeparate, Fulvius, who had entered the country of the Gauls bordering on the Po, was obliged to continue in his intrenchments, and there paſs a melancholy and ſhameful campaign, under continual apprehenſions of a ſurpriſe. Cornelius had better ſucceſs againſt the Ligurians neareſt to Hetruria; for in one action he killed twenty-four thouſand of the enemy and took five thouſand priſoners. For this victory he was honoured on his return with a triumph [k]. The Ligurians defeated.

THE new conſuls, P. Cornelius Lentulus and C. Licinius Varus, were obliged to take the field to oppoſe the Gauls, whoſe chiefs, depending on the vaſt multitudes of men they had aſſembled, and the expectation of a ſtrong reinforcement of their countrymen from the other ſide of the Alps, demanded the reſtitution of Ariminum from the Romans. The conſuls, not having their troops complete, referred the affair to the ſenate, and, in the mean-while, propoſed a truce to the Gauls, who readily conſented to the propoſal, upon the news that they received that a numerous army of Tranſalpine Gauls, under the conduct of Atys

Atys and Galatius, two generals, or rather kings, were in full march to join them. This army was so numerous, that it gave no small jealousy to the Italian Gauls, who thereupon turned their arms against those who were come to assist them, killed their two leaders, and put the whole body to flight. The enemy having thus defeated themselves, Lentulus with one consular army brought both the Boii and Ligurians to reason, depriving the former of a part of their territory, and taking several strong holds from the latter. In the mean-time, Varus was preparing to pass over into the island of Corsica, which, by the secret intrigues of the Carthaginians, had been induced to shake off the Roman yoke. The consul, not finding a fleet ready to transport his whole army, was forced to send a squadron before him, under the command of that Claudius Glycias, who had been formerly named dictator in derision. He had since that time been honoured with several military employments, and always distinguished himself among the troops. When he saw himself at the head of part of the consular army, swelled with ambition, he thought it would be much to his honour to gain this island to the republic without bloodshed; and therefore without the consent either of the consul or senate, he made a shameful peace with the Corsicans. But the consul on his arrival disannulled the treaty, renewed the war, and subdued the island by force of arms. As for Claudius, he was delivered up to the Corsicans, whom he drew, said they into a bloody war by a fallacious peace. In which sentence the senate had likewise the further view of preventing the reproach, which might have been cast upon the consul for having made war upon a people, who depended on the faithful execution of a treaty. The Corsicans had more honour than to treat him with severity. They sent him back to Rome, where he was put to death in prison; and then his body being carried to the top of the steps, called Scalæ Gemoniæ (I), was dragged by an iron hook from thence to the Tiber, into which it was thrown [1].

Corsica subdued.

However,

[1] Val. Max. l. vi. c. 3.

(I) The Gemoniæ was a place appointed either for torturing criminals, or for receiving their dead bodies after their execution. Some derive the name of Gemoniæ from one Gemonius, who was the first executed there; others from the Latin word, gemere, to groan, because the place rung with groans and complaints of those who

HOWEVER, this execution of Claudius did not appeaſe the Corſicans, who had been amuſed by a treaty of peace, that Rome might have the better opportunity of ſubduing them by a war. They communicated their diſcontents to the Sardinians, who, being ſtirred up under-hand by the Carthaginians, attempted to ſhake off the Roman yoke. The republic had too much penetration not to ſee from whence the blow came, and was leſs concerned at the loſs of the two iſlands, than at the renewal of a war with a powerful republic; but the ſenators were all of opinion, that if it was really neceſſary to come to an open rupture with Carthage, war could not be declared too ſoon. Preparations were accordingly made at Rome, and all over Italy, for beginning it with vigor. Carthage, alarmed at this news, ſent embaſſadors after embaſſadors to negotiate an accommodation; but the Romans anſwered them only with reproaches and bitter words. At length ſhe diſpatched ten of her principal men for the ſame end, among whom was one Hanno, a young lord of great ſpirit and vivacity, who, enraged at the haughty anſwers of the proud republic, cried out with an air of equal pride, If you are reſolved to break the treaty, reinſtate us in the condition we were in before it was concluded; reſtore us the cities we poſſeſſed in Sicily. Theſe were the price we paid for the peace, which, it was agreed, ſhould be perpetual; otherwiſe you have made us pay very dear for this ſhort truce. Equity ought to prevail over avarice. Would not that trader be thought unjuſt, who, after he had gone from his bargain, ſhould keep both the money and the merchandize? This diſcourſe filled the ſenators with confuſion, who, being either really juſt, or affecting to appear ſo, diſmiſſed the Carthaginian embaſſadors with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of peace [1].

The Carthaginians ſecretly excite the Sardinians to revolt.

But pacify the Romans by an embaſſy.

THE new conſuls, C. Attilius Bulbus and T. Manlius Torquatus, drew lots for their provinces. The former who were put to death. It was on the hill Aventinus, and there were ſeveral ſteps which led up to it; whence it had the name of Scalæ Gemoniæ. The dead bodies of thoſe who died by the hand of the executioner, were dragged thither with an iron hook, and, after they had been ſome time expoſed to public view, thrown into the Tiber (26).

continued in Italy, while the latter, by a few ſlight engagements, recovered Sardinia, and made it tributary; but without reducing it to the form of a Roman province. And now, peace reigning every-where, the temple of Janus was ſhut for the firſt time ſince the reign of Numa Pompilius. But this tranquillity laſted only a few months. The conſuls for the following year, L. Poſthumius Albinus and Sp. Carvilius, were obliged to raiſe new forces to act againſt the Sardinians, Corſicans, and Ligurians, who had engaged, by mutual treaties, to aſſiſt each other. The conſul Carvilius was employed againſt the Corſicans, whom he ſoon reduced. The prætor Cornelius made war with the Sardinians; but the bad air and water of Sardinia cauſed a plague in his army, and he himſelf was carried off by the contagion; which accident would have ruined the affairs of the republic there, had not Carvilius tranſported his legions thither from Corſica. Upon his arrival, the rebels ventured to face him in the open field; but the conſul had all the advantage over them, which diſciplined troops always have over confuſed multitudes. The Sardinians were defeated; and, by one ſingle victory, the whole iſland was brought under ſubjection. As for the conſul Poſthumius, whoſe province it was to make head againſt the Ligurians, hiſtorians tell us, that he had all the ſucceſs he could have wiſhed for [m].

A new oath concerning marriages.

In this conſulſhip, the cenſors, obſerving the number of citizens to be conſiderably leſſened, and imputing it to mens marrying only with a view to intereſt, and afterwards deſerting their wives and carrying on unlawful intrigues with other women, obliged all the citizens to ſwear, that they would not marry with any other view but that of encreaſing the ſubjects of the republic. This oath raiſed many ſcruples, and cauſed many ruptures between huſbands and wives. Among the reſt one Carvilius Ruga, a man of diſtinction, thought himſelf bound by his oath to divorce his wife, whom he paſſionately loved, becauſe ſhe was barren. Accordingly he put her away and married another. This is the firſt inſtance of a divorce ſince the foundation of Rome, tho' divorces were allowed by the laws of marriage ſettled by the firſt kings. Afterwards they became ſcandalouſly frequent, as a corruption of manners prevailed in the republic. And now marriage-contracts were introduced, to ſecure womens portions in caſe of divorces. This

This ſame year a veſtal, named Tutia, was condemned to be buried alive for an intrigue with a ſlave; but ſhe prevented the execution of the ſentence, by laying violent hands on herſelf [n]. In the preſent conſulſhip, the poet Nævius introduced the firſt regular comedy after the Greek manner on the Latin ſtage.

In the following conſulate of M. Pomponius Matho and Q. Fabius Maximus, ſurnamed Verrucoſus, from a wart or wen upon his lip, the Sardinians and Ligurians roſe upon arms anew. It fell to Fabius's lot to make war with the latter; and he drove them out of the plain country, and obliged them to take ſhelter among the Alps. This is that Fabius, whom we ſhall ſoon ſee reſtoring, at the head of the Roman army, the affairs of his diſtreſſed country by his wiſe delays. He had the ſurname of Maximus from his great-grandfather Fabius Rullus, of whom we have made frequent mention above. In his infancy he was called Ovicula, or The little ſheep, on account of his natural ſweetneſs of temper and docility. He was even in his earlieſt years remarkable for that conduct and behaviour, free from all precipitation and raſhneſs, which afterwards rendered him ſo ſerviceable to his country. As for his colleague Pomponius, he ſailed for Sardinia, where he found, that the frequent revolts of that iſland were owing to the intrigues of the Carthaginians, whoſe ſhips were continually paſſing from Carthage to Sardinia and the other iſlands, and inſpiring the people, where-ever they came, with an hatred to the Roman name. In order therefore to ſound their ſentiments, the ſenate ſent an embaſſy to Carthage, under pretence of demanding the ſums which they had ſtipulated to pay the Roman republic. The deputies were ordered to add threatenings of renewing the war, in caſe the Carthaginian ſhips preſumed to touch at any port belonging to the Roman ſtate. But the Carthaginians, flushed with the ſucceſs of Hamilcar in Spain, being no-ways moved by theſe menaces, the deputies, purſuant to their inſtructions, preſented them a caduceus, the ſymbol of peace, and a little javelin, the emblem of war, ſaying, Take your choice. The Carthaginian dictator anſwered, That he was ready to take which ſoever they ſhould think fit to leave him. However, this haughty anſwer did not abſolutely deſtroy the treaties between Rome and Carthage, but raiſed ſuch mutual diſtruſts, as we ſhall ſoon ſee break out into a flame. As for Pomponius, he gained some advantages over the Sardinians, for which a triumph was granted him [o].

A new tribunal instituted.

THE Romans at this time instituted a new tribunal of justice, at the motion of two tribunes of the people, both Ebutii. As the two prætors, who were often obliged to take the field, could not dispatch all civil affairs, which multiplied in proportion to the encrease of the republic, it was enacted, th three able and judicious men should be chosen out of each tribe, and form a new tribunal, subordinate to the prætor. These new judges were called, for brevity's sake, centumviri, tho' they were a hundred and five in number, and were divided into four courts or chambers. The causes, which fell under their cognizance, were such as related to proscriptions, guardianships, last-wills, inheritances, &c. This tribunal subsisted ever after in Rome, and the judges, tho' in after-ages encreased to the number of a hundred and eighty, still continued to be called centumviri [p].

IN the following consulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus and M. Poblicius Malleolus, Flaminius, tribune of the people, made a motion to the people, to pass a law for distributing a fruitful country, lately taken from the Gauls, among the poor citizens. The patricians, who had always opposed motions of this kind, united their strength and interest to hinder the passing of this law; but neither the threats of the consuls, nor the entreaties of the senate, nor the tears of old Flaminius, whom the patricians had gained over to their party, could prevail on the tribune to desist from pursuing his point. On the day appointed for proposing the law to the people, he mounted the rostra, and began to harangue the multitude with great warmth; but while he was yet speaking, his father appeared, ascended the rostra, and taking the hot-headed tribune by the arm, ordered him to follow him home. Flaminius, without pleading either his dignity or the actual exercise of his office, obeyed his father, and left the affair he was so bent upon, when it was almost finished; and, what is most extraordinary, not a murmur was heard in the whole assembly, which immediately dispersed. Afterwards indeed the affair took another turn; for the tribune Carvilius revived it and succeeded;

ed: but the diſtribution of lands among the Romans, which had long belonged to the Gauls, ſo provoked that nation, that they took up arms, and began a war, which endangered Rome itſelf, as we ſhall ſee anon [9].

In the following year, the new conſuls, M. Pomponius Matho and C. Papirius Maſo, finiſhed the conqueſt of Sardinia and Corſica, which two iſlands they reduced to the form of a Roman province, upon the ſame foot as Sicily. Pomponius continued in the new province, which conſiſted of both the iſlands, all the next year, and governed it in quality of prætor. Papirius, who had ſubdued Corſica, returned to Rome, where he found, that a dictator had been created to hold the comitia for electing new conſuls. He demanded a triumph; but not having intereſt enough to obtain it, he took a method entirely new to do himſelf juſtice. He put himſelf at the head of his victorious army, and marched to the temple of Jupiter Latialis, on the hill of Alba, with all the pomp that attended triumphant victors at Rome. He made no other alteration in the ceremony, but that of wearing a crown of myrtle inſtead of a crown of laurel, and this on account of his having defeated the Corſicans in a place where there was a grove of myrtles. The example of Papirius was afterwards followed by a great many generals, to whom the ſenate refuſed triumphs.

Corſica and Sardinia made a Roman province.

Triumphal proceſſions on the hill of Alba.

The next year, when M. Æmilius Barbula and M. Junius Pera were conſuls, a new war ſprung up in a kingdom out of Italy. Illyricum, properly ſo called, which bordered upon Macedon and Epirus, was at this time governed by a woman, named Teuta, the widow of king Agron, and guardian to her ſon Pinæus, who was under age. The ſucceſs of her late huſband againſt the Ætolians had flushed her to ſuch a degree, that inſtead of ſettling the affairs of her ward in peace, ſhe commanded her ſubjects to cruize along the coaſt, ſeize all the ſhips they met, take what places they could, and ſpare no nation. Her pirates had, purſuant to her orders, taken and plundered many ſhips belonging to the Roman merchants; and her troops were then beſieging the iſland of Iſſa in the Adriatic, though the inhabitants had put themſelves under the protection of the republic. Upon the complaints therefore of the Italian merchants, and to protect the people of Iſſa, the ſenate ſent two embaſſadors to the Illyrian queen, Lucius and Caius Coruncanius, to demand of her, that ſhe would reſtrain her ſubjects from infeſting the ſeas with piracies. She anſwered them haughtily, That ſhe could only promiſe, that her ſubjects ſhould not for the future attack the Romans, in her name and by publick authority; but as for any thing more, it is not cuſtomary with us, ſaid ſhe, to lay reſtraints on our ſubjects, nor will we forbid them to reap thoſe advantages from the ſea, which it offers them. Your cuſtoms then, replied the youngeſt of the embaſſadors, are very different from ours. At Rome we make public examples of thoſe ſubjects who injure others whether at home or abroad. Teuta, we can, by our arms, force you to reform the abuſes of your bad government. Theſe unſeaſonable threatenings provoked Teuta, who was naturally a proud and imperious woman, to ſuch a degree, that, without regard to the right of nations, ſhe cauſed the embaſſadors to be murdered on their return home. When ſo notorious an infraction of the law of nations was known at Rome, the people demanded vengeance; and the ſenate, having firſt honoured the manes of the embaſſadors, by erecting, as was uſual in ſuch caſes, ſtatues three foot high to their memory, ordered a fleet to be equipped, and troops raiſed, with all poſſible expedition. But now Teuta, reflecting on the enormity of her proceedings, ſent an embaſſy to Rome, aſſuring the ſenate, that ſhe had no hand in murdering the embaſſadors, and offering to deliver up to the republic thoſe who had committed that barbarous aſſaſſination. The Romans, being at that time threatened with a war from the Gauls, were ready to accept this ſatisfaction; but in the mean time, the Illyrian fleet having gained ſome advantage over that of the Achæans, and taken the iſland of Corcyra near Epirus, this ſucceſs made Teuta believe herſelf invincible, and forget the promiſe ſhe had made to the Romans; nay, ſhe ſent her fleet to ſeize on the iſland of Iſſa, which the Romans had taken under their protection. Hereupon the conſuls for the new year, P. Poſthumius Albinus and and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, embarqued for Illyricum, Fulvius having the command of the fleet, which conſiſted of a hundred galleys, and Poſthumius of the land forces, which amounted to twenty-thouſand foot, beſides a ſmall body of horſe. Fulvius appeared with his fleet before Corcyra in the Adriatic, and was put in poſſeſſion both of the iſland and city by Demetrius of Pharos, governor of the place for queen Teuta. Nor was this all;

all; Demetrius found means to make the inhabitants of Apollonia drive out the Illyrian garriſon, and admit into their city the Roman troops. As Apollonia was one of the keys of Illyricum on the ſide of Macedon, the conſuls, who had acted hitherto jointly, no ſooner ſaw themſelves in poſſeſſion of it, than they ſeparated, the fleet cruiſing along the coaſt, and the army penetrating into the heart of the queen's dominions. The Andyæans, Parthini, and Atintanes voluntarily ſubmitted to Posthumius, being induced, by the perſuaſion of Demetrius, to ſhake off the Illyrian yoke. The conſul, being now in poſſeſſion of moſt of the inland towns, returned to the coaſt, where, with the aſſiſtance of the fleet, he took many ſtrong holds, among which was Nutria, a place of great ſtrength and defended by a numerous garriſon; ſo that it made a vigorous defence, the Romans having loſt before it a great many private men, ſeveral legionary tribunes, and one queſtor. However, this loſs was repaired by the taking of forty Illyrian veſſels, which were returning home laden with booty. At length the Roman fleet appeared before Iſſa, which, by Teuta's orders, was ſtill cloſely beſieged, notwithſtanding the loſſes ſhe had ſuſtained. However, upon the approach of the Roman fleet, the Illyrians diſperſed; but the Pharians, who ſerved among them, followed the example of their countryman Demetrius, and joined the Romans, to whom the Iſſani readily ſubmitted [r].

In the mean time, Sp. Corvilius and Q. Fabius Maximus being raiſed to the conſulate a ſecond time, Poſthumius was recalled from Illyricum, and refuſed a triumph for having been too prodigal of the Roman blood at the ſiege of Nutria. His collegue Fulvius was appointed to command the land-forces in his room, in quality of proconſul. Hereupon Teuta, who had founded great hopes on the change of the conſuls, retired to one of her ſtrong holds, called Rhizon, and from thence early in the ſpring ſent an embaſſy to Rome. The ſenate refuſed to treat with her; but granted the young king a peace upon the following conditions: 1. That he ſhould pay an annual tribute to the republic. 2. That he ſhould ſurrender part of his dominions to the Romans. 3. That he ſhould never ſuffer above three of his ſhips of war at a time to ſail beyond Lyſſus, a town on the confines of Macedon and Illyricum.

The places he yielded to the Romans in virtue of this treaty, were the iſlands of Corcyra, Iſſa, and Pharos, the city of Dyrrachium, and the country of the Atintanes. Soon after Teuta, either out of ſhame, or compelled by a ſecret article of the treaty, abdicated the regency, and Demetrius ſucceeded her. The proconſul Fulvius, having thus put an end to the Illyrian war, diſpatched embaſſadors to the Ætolians and Achæans, acquainting them with the true motives of their coming into Illyricum, of the ſucceſs of their arms, and the articles of the treaty, which were publicly read in the dyets of theſe two ſtates. The embaſſadors were received with great reſpect by the Greeks, who were overjoyed to ſee themſelves delivered from the piracies of the Illyrians. At the ſame time the ſenate ſent embaſſadors to Athens and Corinth, to acquaint thoſe republics with the advantages they had gained over the Illyrians, and the tranquillity they had procured for all the maritime cities, by reducing thoſe pirates. The Athenians ſhewed their gratitude, by admitting the Romans to partake of the myſteries of Eleuſis, of which we have ſpoken in the hiſtory of Greece; and the Corinthians ever after permitted the Romans to be preſent at the Iſthmian games. Thus the Romans became firſt known to the people of Greece [s]. The proconſul on his return to Rome, was decreed a triumph, which he enjoyed on the tenth of the calends of the month Quintilis [t].

BEFORE this foreign war was ended, the Gauls began to be in motion in Italy, and at the ſame time the republic was greatly alarmed at the incredible progreſs the Carthaginians made in Spain. The ſenate, therefore thought it neceſſary, by ſome means or other, to put a ſtop to their encreaſe of dominion. To this end they ſent a deputation to Carthage, and at the ſame time to Aſdrubal, who had ſucceeded Hamilcar in the command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. Carthage, unwilling to give her rival umbrage, agreed to the two following articles: 1. That ſhe ſhould not extend her conqueſts beyond the river Iberus; and, 2. that Saguntum, a city between the Iberus and that part of Spain which belonged to the Carthaginians, ſhould remain free [u].

A new treaty with the Carthaginians.

THE new conſuls, P. Valerius Flaccus and M. Attilius Regulus, continued in a manner inactive all their year, though

though the Gauls were raising troops and making extraordinary preparations for war. Rome seemed to be afraid to enter the lists with so warlike a nation. At this time a prophecy, pretended to be found in the Sibylline books, was spread about Rome, viz. that the Gauls and Greeks should one day make themselves masters of it. The new consuls therefore, M. Valerius Messala and L. Apustius Fullo, having consulted the pontifices, to appease the superstitious populace, caused an edict to be published by the decemviri, who had the care of the Sibylline books, commanding two Greeks, a man and a woman, and two Gauls, likewise a man and woman, to be buried alive in the ox-market. By this they persuaded the credulous multitude, that the prophecy was fulfilled, and that the Gauls and Greeks had taken possession of Rome [w]. The difficulties, which superstition had raised, being surmounted by this cruel piece of policy, Rome made it her whole business to raise divisions among the Gauls, and found means to gain over to her party the Cænomani and Veneti, two considerable nations among them; but this not the Gauls repaired with the new levies they made beyond the Alps, where, by their embassadors, they engaged the Gæsatæ to join them. The Gæsatæ, according to Polybius, were a very warlike people, and ready to fight for any nation that would pay them; whence they had the name of Gæsatæ, that is, hirelings. Others derive this name from a sort of weapon, which they used, and in their language called Gæsum. The consuls, Valerius and Apustius, spent the greater part of the year in raising troops for their successors; and indeed Rome had never before had so numerous an army on foot. All the nations of Italy, subject to the republic, were exhausted, and none excused from sending their quotas. We are told by a credible historian [x], that the number of forces Rome raised on this occasion amounted in all to eight hundred thousand men. Of this incredible multitude two hundred forty-eight thousand foot and twenty-six thousand six hundred horse were Romans or Campanians. Nevertheless the Gauls, with only fifty thousand foot and twenty thousand horse, began hostilities, forced themselves a passage through Hetruria, and took their rout towards Rome.

Two Gauls and two Greeks buried alive at Rome.

A prodigious army raised against the Gauls.

In the mean time, the republic raised L. Æmilius Papus and C. Atilius Regulus to the consulship. The latter was sent ſent into Sardinia, to quiet ſome commotions there, while his collegue took upon him the conduct of the war with the Gauls, who were now joined by the Gæſatæ from the other ſide of the Alps, to the number of above two hundred thouſand men, commanded by two kings, Concolatinus and Aneroeſtus. The conſul Æmilius, not knowing what rout the Gæſatæ would take, encamped near Ariminum, in order to prevent them from entering the Roman lands by the coaſts of the Adriatic ſea. At the ſame time a prætor, whoſe name is not mentioned in hiſtory, was ſent into Hetruria with a body of fifty thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. In the mean time, the Gæſatæ, having left the coaſt of the Adriatic, to avoid Æmilius's army, croſſed Inſubria, and joined the troops of their nation in Hetruria; whence this terrible army marched ſtreight to Rome. They found means to bring the prætor to a battle, in which they killed ſix thouſand of his men, and obliged the reſt to fly in confuſion to a neighbouring hill, where they intrenched themſelves; but were the next day inveſted by the Gauls, who attacked their intrenchments with a fury not to be expreſſed. The Romans in this diſtreſs defended themſelves with great reſolution, hoping, that fortune, which had eſpouſed their cauſe, would, by ſome means or other, reſcue them out of the hands of ſo cruel an enemy; and accordingly an unexpected accident delivered them from death or ſlavery. The conſul Æmilius being informed, that the Gauls were in full march to Rome, had left his camp at Ariminum, in order to cover the city. As he drew near Fæſulæ, he received an account of the advantage the Gauls had gained over the prætor's army, and of the deplorable ſituation to which he was reduced. Upon this advice he did not deliberate a moment, but immediately ordered the legions to advance in good order to the enemy's camp, while he himſelf led the cavalry to the foot of the hill, which the Gauliſh cavalry kept cloſely inveſted. The Gauls were ſo alarmed at the unexpected arrival of the conſular army, that they decamped in great confuſion, in order to return home through Inſubria, and ſecure the booty and wealth which they had amaſſed. In their march they kept along the ſhore of the Hetrurian ſea, and Æmilius, ſtrengthening his army with the remains of the prætor's troops, followed them cloſe, with a deſign rather to haraſs than engage them; but it luckily happened, that Attilius having put a ſpeedy end to the troubles of Sardinia, had, on his return home, landed his his army at Piſa, and was now marching along the ſhore towards Rome, not expecting to find an enemy in his way. He was overjoyed when he learned by his ſcouts the ſituation of affairs; and, in order to intercept the Gauls, he drew up his troops near Telamon, a little port in Hetruria, making as wide a front as he could. With his cavalry he poſted himſelf on an eminence over which the enemy muſt neceſſarily paſs. The Gauls imagining, that this body of Roman horſe was a detachment from Æmilius's army, ſent ſome ſquadrons of horſe to attack it. As for Æmilius, he knew not that his colleague was ſo near; he had only learned, that he had left Sardinia and was arrived at Piſa; but as ſoon as he perceived at a diſtance the two parties engaged, he immediately concluded that Attilius was attacking the enemy in front, and detached ſome ſquadrons to his relief. Then the attack was renewed with more vigour than ever. The conſul Attilius, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner, was killed, and his head, ſtuck on the top of a lance, was carried through all the files of the enemy's army; but the death of this brave man proved no advantage to them. One of his lieutenants took his place, and the battle was continued with the ſame ardor and reſolution. While the Gauliſh cavalry was engaged with that of the Romans on the top of the hill, their infantry had time to draw up in the plain. As they were to oppoſe two conſular armies, one of which was to attack them in front and the other in the rear, they diſpoſed their troops ſo, that one part of them faced the conſul Æmilius, and the other the army which Attilius had commanded. In the firſt line, over-againſt Æmilius, were placed the Gæſatæ, who were lately come into Italy, and behind them the Inſubres. At the head of the other body were the Taurini, aud behind them the ſeveral nations of the Gauls, who dwelt on both ſides of the Po. This ſecond army, if we may ſo call it, faund the legions, which Attilius had brought from Sardinia, agaid turned their backs to the other. By this diſpoſition the Gauls ſupported each other, and could neither fly nor retreat. Before the action, the Gæſatæ, obſerving that the plain, on which they were going to engage, was covered with brambles and buſhes, and fearing they might, by entangling their clothes, prevent them from uſing their arms with freedom, ſtripped themſelves naked, and in that manner advanced againſt the Romans, who were greatly ſurpriſed at that ſight. The attack began with great ſhouts, while the air at the ſame time rung with an infinite number of horns and trumpets, which were much uſed by the Gauls. The Romans, who engaged the Gæſatæ, kept at a diſtance from them, and made a dreadful ſlaughter with the ſhowers of darts which they diſcharged upon them. Naked as they were, they kept their ground, till the greater part of thoſe, who fought in the firſt file, were either killed or wounded. Then the reſt began to retire, which occaſioned ſome confuſion, and encouraged the legionaries to advance and attack them ſword in hand. The Gauls behaved with great reſolution; and tho' their arms were far inferior to thoſe of the Romans, yet they ſtood the ſhock, till the Roman cavalry, which had been engaged on the hill, came down full ſpeed, and attacked them in the flank. Then the defeat of the Gauls was general; forty thouſand of them were killed on the ſpot, and above ten thouſand taken priſoners, with Concolitanus one of their kings. Aneroeſtus, the other king, and the moſt experienced commander among the Gauls, eſcaped to a neighbouring village, where he laid violent hands on himſelf, as did moſt of the officers who attended him [y].

AFTER this victory, Æmilius, now ſole commander of the two armies, marched along the borders of Hetruria, and entering the territories of the Boii, gave up that fruitful country to be plundered by his ſoldiers. When they were loaded with booty, he began his march to Rome. As he paſſed through Hetruria, he reſtored to the owners all the booty the Gauls had taken from them. He entered Rome in triumph on the third of the nones of March; and as his victory was one of the moſt important the republic had ever gained, his triumphal proceſſion was one of the moſt pompous and magnificent. The triumphant victors generally ſtripped the captives of their military ornaments; but the Gauls were ſuffered to appear in their belts, in deriſion of the vow they had made not to quit them till they were upon the capital, and there they were taken from them, amidſt the hiſſes of all the people [z].

HOWEVER, this terrible defeat did not make the Gauls ſubmit. The republic therefore caſt her eyes on two commanders of great experience, who had been both conſuls before, in hopes they would finiſh this important war. Theſe were T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus;

cus; but they performed nothing worth mentioning. Their marches being retarded with violent rains, they could not pass the Po, as they designed; besides, a plague broke out in their army, which not only kept them in a state of inaction, but prevented them from returning to Rome at the usal time; so that it was necessary to create a dictator, who was the famous Cæcilius Metellus, to hold the comitia in their absence for a new election of consuls. C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philo were chosen. These were the first Roman generals who passed the Po; but they were so terrified at the very sight of the Insubres, whose country they intended to invade, that they entered into a treaty with them, and, repassing the Po, took refuge among their faithful allies the Cænomani. Having rambled about those unknown regions for some time, they resolved to make another attempt upon Insubria; but the Romans being at this time much frightened with prodigies, the augurs declared, that there must have been some defect in the election of the consuls. Whereupon the senate immediately dispatched a courier with a letter, commanding them to return to Rome and abdicate. The consuls, who were then in sight of the enemy, thinking a retreat through so many nations, whose fidelity was dubious, might be attended with dangerous consequences, resolved not to open the letter till after the battle. The consul Flaminius seems to have taken the whole command upon himself on the day of the battle; for no historian makes mention of his colleague Furius in describing it. As the Romans were far inferior to the enemy in numbers, the consul designed at first to reinforce his army with those Gauls, who were in amity with the Roman people, and sent orders to them to come and join him; but, upon their arrival, he began to consider, that it war a dangerous thing to trust those auxiliaries, who were a wavering people, and might, in the heat of the action, out of compassion for their countrymen, desert the Romans, and even turn their arms against them. Upon this consideration, he resolved not to accept them in an affair of so great importance, and therefore ordered them to pass the river Addua; which they had no sooner did, than he caused the bridge to be broken down, and, by that means, as the river was not fordable, prevented them from siding with the enemy, since he could not resolve to trust them as friends. This was the only prudent step the consul took, either before, or in the time of, the action; for he drew up his men, not after the Roman manner, but so close, that that the whole army ſeemed to be one phalanx: and beſides, he poſted the laſt line ſo near the Addua, that, if they had been preſſed ever ſo little, they would have been forced into the river; but the ſkill and management of the legionary tribunes made amends for the conſul's imprudent conduct. Theſe had obſerved, in their battles with the Gauls, that they made but one briſk attack, after which their fire abated; and that their ſwords were only fit for cutting and eaſily bent; ſo that, if they had not time to ſet them ſtrait again with their foot on the ground, after a cut or two, they became quite uſeleſs. The tribunes therefore took two precautions, which determined the fate of the day in their favour. In the firſt place, they diſtributed among the ſoldiers of the firſt line the javelins uſed by the Triarii, which were a kind of halberts, ordering them to preſent the points of their javelins to the enemy, and by that means keep them at ſuch a diſtance, as to prevent them from making uſe of their ſwords. In the ſecond place, the tribunes commanded their men to throw down the javelins, as ſoon as the firſt fire of the enemy was ſpent, and cloſing with them ſword in hand, ſtab them in the throat and breaſt. To theſe orders the Romans owed the victory; for the Gauls having, in the beginning of the attack, blunted their ſwords againſt the long javelins of the Romans, the latter no ſooner perceived that their ardor began to cool, than they ſhortened their ſwords, and cloſing with the enemy, ſo as to leave them no room to lift up their arms, ſtabbed them, as they had been ordered, without running any danger themſelves, the ſwords of the Gauls having no point. Nine thouſand of the enemy were killed upon the ſpot. and ſeventeen thouſand taken priſoners.

The Inſubrians defeated.

Thus, in ſpite of all the bad prognoſtics and the orders of the ſuperſtitious ſenate, a complete victory was gained, tho' it was rather owing to the conduct of the ſubalterns, than to the ſkill or prudence of the general [a].

AFTER the action, the conſuls opened the packet, when Furius, who perhaps had declined the command during the action, out of reſpect to the ſenate, was for immediately obeying the order, but Flaminius, thinking a ſucceſsful act of diſobedience more honourable than a blind and timorous ſubmiſſion, was for purſuing the advantages of the victory; which he did accordingly, enriching his ſoldiers with with booty, while his collegue continued inactive, waiting to join him, when he ſhould return from his incurſions into Inſubria. At length Flaminius rejoined his collegue, and they returned to Rome together, where they met with a very cold reception both from the ſenate and people; but the troops of Flaminius, whom he had enriched with the ſpoils of the enemy, prevailed upon the people to grant both the conſuls a triumph, ſince the victory had been gained under the auſpices of both. However, the ſenate obliged them to abdicate immediately after; ſo that the republic fell into an inter-regnum when the centuries choſe M. Claudius Marcellus, one of the greateſt men Rome ever produced, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio to the conſulate. They had ſcarce entered upon their office, when the Inſubres ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to beg a peace upon any terms; but the ſenate having, at the inſtigation of their new conſuls, diſmiſſed their deputies with a refuſal, they reſolved to make their laſt effort; and accordingly took into their pay thirty thouſand Gæſatæ, who, paſſing the Alps, entered Italy, under the command of their king Viridomarus. Early in the ſpring the conſuls paſſed the Po, and opened the campaign with the ſiege of Acerræ, a place near that river. Hereupon the Gauls, who were now ninety thouſand ſtrong, in order to make a diverſion and oblige the Romans to raiſe the ſiege they had undertaken, paſſed the Po, and, entering the Roman territories, inveſted Caſtidium, a city placed by Plutarch in Ciſalpine Gaul, but by Livy in Liguria Montana. Upon the news of this motion of the enemy, Marcellus, with two thirds of the cavalry, and about ſix hundred of the light-armed infantry, haſtened to the relief of the place. The Gauls, receiving intelligence of his approach, raiſed the ſiege, and marched in order of battle to meet him. Marcellus drew up his ſmall army with great ſkill, and advanced leiſurely in order of battle againſt the enemy. When the two armies drew near each other, Viridomarus advanced before his troops, and challenged the Roman general to a ſingle combat. Marcellus readily accepted the challenge; ſo that both parties, leaving the middle free for the champions, retired to wait for the iſſue of the combat. Marcellus, ruſhing upon the enemy full ſpeed, pierced his breaſt-plate with his lance, and gave him a deep wound. Then ſpurring his horſe with great violence againſt that of his adverſary, he made him recoil, rear, and throw his rider, whom he ſoon diſpatched with repeated blows. The Gæſatæ being disheartened by the death of their leader, the Romans charged them with great fury and put them to flight. Thus a handful of Romans defeated a numerous army of Gauls, and obliged them to shelter themselves in the woods and forests of their own country [b].

DURING the absence of Marcellus, Acerræ had been taken by his collegue, who from thence had marched to invest Mediolanum, the largest, richest, and most populous city of Insubria, but he was himself more closely besieged by the Gauls, than Mediolanum was by him. But, upon the arrival of Marcellus, the scene changed; the Gæsatæ retired with precipitation, repassed the Alps, and left the inhabitants of Mediolanum to the mercy of the conquerors. The city immediately surrendered at discretion, as did also Comum, another city of great importance. Thus all Italy, from the Alps to the Ionian sea, became entirely Roman. Insubria and Liguria were now made one province, and called Cisalpine Gaul, which was governed by a prætor sent annually from Rome. In order to keep the conquered Gauls from revolting, two Roman colonies were settled at Cremona and Placentia, on the opposite banks of the Po [c].

Insubria and Liguria made a Roman province.

MARCELLUS was decreed at Rome an extraordinary triumph, for having conquered, as the decree was worded, the Insubres and the Germans [d]. And this is the first time we find the Germans mentioned in the history of Rome. Polybius indeed places the Gæsatæ on the banks of the Rhone; but other writers tell us, that they inhabited the countries bordering on the Rhine. Marcellus, in his triumphal procession, carried on his shoulders the rich armour and spoils of Viridomarus, and dedicated the third and last opima spolia to Jupiter Feretrius, single combats between generals growing out of use after this time. Part of the rich spoils taken on this occasion was sent to good king Hiero, who was yet living, and a gold cup made out of them sent to the temple of Apollo at Delphos. As for Cornelius, he did not receive the honours of a triumph, but was continued in the new province in quality of proconsul to regulate affairs there.

Istria conquered.

THE new consuls, M. Minucius Rufus and P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, were ordered to make war upon the Istrians, for having taken some Roman ships. All Istria Iſtria was reduced in one year's time, tho' ſome writers tell us, that the reduction of it coſt the conquerors a great deal of blood [e].

DURING the preſent conſulate, news was brought to Rome of the death of Aſdrubal in Spain; which gave the Romans great concern, becauſe he had been ever faithful to his treaties, and the republic thought ſhe had much more to fear from the bold and enterpriſing genius of young Hannibal, who was appointed to ſucceed him, though at that time not above twenty-five years of age. And indeed the firſt expedition of this young warrior confirmed the Romans in their fears. In his firſt campaign, he made war upon the Olcades, a people bordering on the Iberus, and gave reaſon to believe, that he would ſoon paſs that river, contrary to the treaty. Althœa, and ſeveral other cities in that neighbourhood, ſubmitted to him; however, as Rome had yet no reaſon to declare herſelf his enemy, ſhe turned her arms another way. Demetrius of Pharos, on whom the republic had heaped many favours, ſeeing the government of Illyricum lodged in his hands, and the Romans engaged in a troubleſome war with the Gauls, had deſpiſed their orders; and acting not as regent, but as king of Illyricum, had obliged the Atintanes to renounce their alliance with Rome, and come into his meaſures; nay, he even ventured, contrary to the treaty, to ſend fifty ſhips of war, beyond the Lyſſos, to pillage the Cyclades. Complaints being brought to Rome from all parts, the new conſuls, L. Veturius Philo and C. Lutatius, would have immediately ſet ſail for Illyricum, if they had not been obliged to abdicate, upon ſome defect found in their election. They were ſucceeded by M. Æmilius Lepidus and M. Valerius Lævinus; but the year being too far advanced to begin the expedition, it was poſtponed to the next conſulſhip. This year ended with a cenſus, by which the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms appeared to be two hundred ſeventy thouſand two hundred and thirteen. At the time of the cenſus, all the libertini or freed-men, who lived diſperſed among all the tribes, and occaſioned great diſturbances in the city, were confined to four tribes, viz. the Eſquilina, the Palatina, the Suburrana, and the Collina [f].

An army ſent againſt Demetrius of Pharos.

AND now both conſuls, M. Livius Salinator and L. Æmilius Paulus, embarqued for Illyricum, and opened the campaign with the ſiege of Dimalum, a city of importance in that country, which Demetrius had fortified with ſo many works, that it was deemed impregnable. However, the Romans, by ſurpriſing efforts, took this formidable bulwark, by which the regent pretended to ſcreen himſelf from the vengeance of Rome, in the ſpace of ſeven days. Their next attempt was upon Pharos, an iſland in the Adriatic ſea, and the birth-place of Demetrius. Here he had aſſembled the beſt of his troops, looking upon this iſland and city as his laſt refuge. As the Roman fleet had two conſular armies on board, one was landed in the night, with orders to conceal themſelves in the foreſts and behind the rocks, till the ſignal was given. Then the fleet appeared off Pharos in open day, as it were to land ſome forces. Hereupon Demetrius marched out of the town at the head of his troops, to prevent the deſcent; and then the legionaries, leaving their ambuſh, marched ſilently, and ſeized an eminence between the city and the port. Demetrius endeavoured to diſlodge them; but, in the mean time, the Romans on board the ſquadron having made their deſcent, the Illyrians were inveſted on all ſides, and ſoon diſperſed. Demetrius made his eſcape to Macedon, on board a veſſel he had kept ready for that purpoſe. The city of Pharos was taken, plundered, and razed; ſo that Rome was now the ſecond time miſtreſs of Illyricum, which, however, ſhe did not reduce to the form of a province, having ſome compaſſion for the young king Pinœus, who had been brought into theſe troubles merely by the fault of his guardians [g]. The conſuls, on their return to Rome, were accuſed before the tribes of having applied to their own uſe great part of the ſpoils taken from the enemy, and of diſtributing the reſt partially among the ſoldiers. Æmilius indeed was acquitted; but his collegue Salinator was condemned by all the tribes, except the tribe Mæcia; an affront which he could not brook, and therefore appeared no more in public, but retired to a houſe he had in the country, and there led a ſolitary life, till the calamities of his country brought him upon the ſtage again. When he was afterwards cenſor, he deprived all the tribes, except the tribe Mæcia, of the right of ſuffrage and all the privileges of Roman citizens. To ſuch a height did he carry his reſentment.

Illyricum reduced a ſecond time.

ment [h]. In this conſulſhip, one Archagathus of Peloponneſus introduced the art of ſurgery into Rome. Till his time every one had their family receipts, as Pliny calls them [i], conveyed down to him by tradition; but the Peloponneſian cured all ſorts of wounds in a regular way; on which account he was honoured with the right of citizenſhip, and had a houſe built for him at the expence of the public; but as he uſed to make large inciſions in order to cure wounds with more certainty, the Romans gave him the name of Butcher, which ſoon brought his profeſſion into diſrepute [k]. The art of ſurgery introduced at Rome.

WHILE the Romans were engaged in the Illyrican war, Hannibal was puſhing on his conqueſts in Spain. The Vaccæi, the Olcades, and the Carpetani had attempted to oppoſe his progreſs with an army of an hundred thouſand men; but that brave commander had defeated them by his ſuperior ſkill in war, and obliged them to ſubmit to the yoke. Elated with this ſucceſs, he advanced, at the head of his army, into the territory of Saguntum, and, contrary to the late treaty between Rome and Carthage, laid ſiege to that city. Hereupon the Roman ſenate diſpatched two embaſſadors, P. Valerius Flaccus and Q. Bebius Tamphilus, to Hannibal, with orders to proceed to Carthage, in caſe the Carthaginian general refuſed to comply with their requeſt. They were ſcarce landed, when Hannibal, who was carrying on the war with great vigour, ſent them word, that he had ſomething elſe to do than to give audience to embaſſadors; however, he admitted them at laſt, and, in anſwer to their remonſtrances, told them, that the Saguntines had drawn their misfortunes on themſelves, by committing hoſtilities againſt the allies of Carthage; and at the ſame time deſired the deputies, if they had any complaints to make of him, to carry them to the ſenate of Carthage. However, the artful Carthaginian immediately diſpatched to Carthage ſome friends, in whom he could confide, to give the ſenate favourable prepoſſeſſions with relation to his enterprize upon Saguntum. He then returned to the attack of that city, which he had interrupted for ſome days, in order to refreſh his troops. The Saguntines defended themſelves for the ſpace of ſix months with ſurpriſing bravery; and when they could hold out no longer, they firſt burnt all their richeſt effects, and then ſhutting themſelves up in their houſes, Hannibal beſieges Saguntum.

Roman embaſſadors ſent to Carthage.

In the mean time, the Roman embaſſadors arriving at Carthage, found the ſenate there divided into two factions; the Barcan, of which Hamilcar Barcas, the father of Hannibal, had been the head, and that of Hanno, which conſiſted of the oldeſt ſenators and wiſeſt men in the republic. The embaſſadors, after having complained to the ſenate of Hannibal's haughtineſs and unjuſt violences, demanded, that he ſhould be delivered up to the Romans, to be puniſhed according to his deſerts; and at the ſame time declared, that Rome would look on the refuſal of ſo juſt a demand, as a public approbation of the infraction of the treaty and the deſtruction of Saguntum. This demand had the air of authority, which was very ſhocking, eſpecially in times of proſperity. It ſeemed both cruel and ſhameful for the Carthaginians to deliver up to his implacable enemies a young conqueror, who was the glory and hopes of his nation. However, Hanno, in a warm ſpeech, preſſed the ſenate to give the Romans the ſatisfaction they required; but the Barcan faction oppoſed this motion, and, being more numerous, prevailed. A commiſſioner, expert in negotiations, was appointed to diſcuſs the affair with the Roman embaſſadors, and to anſwer their complaints; but, after ſeveral conferences, in which the African negotiator uſed all the chicanery and evaſions poſſible to colour the proceeding of Hannibal, the embaſſadors renewed their demand before the ſenate, and, to cut off endleſs diſputes, the chief of the embaſſadors, having made two folds in his robe, ſaid, addreſſing himſelf to the ſenate, On one ſide is peace, on the other war; chuſe which you pleaſe. The preſident of the aſſembly anſwered, We will chuſe neither; give us which you pleaſe. Take war then, replied the embaſſador. At which words the Barcan faction cried out with joy, War, war; a fatal declaration, which brought both nations to the brink of ruin. If we conſider only the laſt hoſtilities committed by Hannibal, his republic was certainly in the wrong; for they were a manifeſt infraction of the treaty with Aſdrubal: but if we trace the matter higher, we ſhall find that the Carthaginians were not to blame, the Romans having obliged them, by their haughty behaviour, their repeated extortions, and their unjuſt invaſions of Corſica and Sardinia, to take up arms in their own defence.

CHAP. VI.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the beginning to the end of the ſecond Punic war.

THE new conſuls, P. Cornelius Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longus, had ſcarce entered upon their office, when the embaſſadors ſent firſt to Hannibal, and then to Carthage, returned to Rome. The account they gave of their embaſſy, and the news of the deſtruction of Saguntum, left the ſenate no room to deliberate about war or peace. The former was now unavoidable, and even declared by their embaſſadors, purſuant to the inſtructions they had received before they left Rome. The conſuls were therefore ordered to draw lots for their reſpective provinces. Africa fell to Sempronius, and Spain to Cornelius Scipio. The former was directed to paſs over into Sicily, aſſemble all the troops in that iſland, and ſail from thence to Africa, and begin hoſtilities there. Cornelius, on the other hand, was commanded to go into Spain, and uſe all poſſible means to prevent Hannibal from entering Italy. Extraordinary levies were made all over Italy. Six legions were raiſed, amounting to twenty-four thouſand foot and eighteen hundred horſe; and among the ſeveral nations in Italy ſubject to the republic, four thouſand horſe more and forty-four thouſand foot. As for the fleet, Rome equipped two hundred and twenty quinqueremes, and twenty other light veſſels. Two legions, conſiſting each of four thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, with fourteen thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe of the allies, were put under the command of Cornelius Scipio, who was to tranſport them on board a fleet of ſixty quinqueremes to Tranſalpine Gaul. Two legions, with fourteen thouſand foot and ſixteen hundred horſe of the allies, were left in Italy, under the command of the prætor L. Manlius, to keep Ciſalpine Gaul in awe. As for the conſul Sempronius, who was deſigned for Africa, his army conſiſted of two legions, ſixteen thouſand foot of the allies, and eighteen hundred horſe. Theſe troops were put on board a fleet of a hundred and ſixty gallies and twenty light veſſels. Before the arrival of Sempronius in Sicily, the Carthaginians had ſent out a ſquadron of twenty ſail to plunder the coaſts of Italy; but theſe ſhips being diſperſed by a ſtorm, king Hiero, who happened

ed to be then at Meſſana with his fleet, had detached part of it, and taken ſome of them. The priſoners informed him, that Carthage had equipped another ſquadron of thirty-five gallies, with a deſign to ſurprize Lilybæum. This intelligence the king immediately communicated to Æmilius prætor of Sicily, who, without loſs of time, ſailed with his ſmall ſquadron to join the Syracuſan fleet, in order to defend the threatened city. The Carthaginians finding, upon their arrival, both fleets riding at anchor before the mouth of the harbour, did not attempt to enter it, but, keeping at ſome diſtance, drew up in line of battle. The Romans and Syracuſans accepted the challenge; ſo that an engagement enſued, in which the Carthaginians were defeated, with the loſs of ſeven ſhips. Seventeen hundred of their men were taken priſoners, and a great many killed in the action. The Romans did not loſe one ſingle galley, and had but a very ſmall number of men killed. The king, on his return to Meſſana, finding Sempronius arrived there, went immediately on board the conſul's ſhip, embraced him tenderly, and aſſured him, that he ſhould continue the ſame affection for Rome in his old age, which he had always ſhewn her in his youth; nor was this all, he cloathed the legionaries and the crews of the Roman ſhips at his own expence, ſupplied the whole army with corn, and then ſet ſail with the conſul for Lilybæum, where they parted with regret [m].

The Carthaginians defeated at ſea.

SEMPRONIUS from Lilybæum ſteered his courſe to the iſland of Melita, ſituated between Sicily and Africa; and he no ſooner appeared before it, than one Hamilcar, the Carthaginian governor, ſurrendered up to him the iſland, the city, and the garriſon. But, in the mean time, the Carthaginians having made a deſcent on the coaſts of Italy, Sempronius was preparing to drive them from thence, when news was brought him, that Hannibal had paſſed the Alps, and at the ſame time an order from the ſenate to return in all haſte to Italy. Leaving therefore the prætor Æmilius in Sicily, with a ſufficient number of troops and ſhips to defend the iſland, he went on board his fleet, and entered the Adriatic ſea, with a deſign to land at Ariminum.

The iſland of Melita ſeized by the Romans.

HANNIBAL, being authorized by the ſenate of Carthage to act againſt the Romans as he thought fit, reſolved not to wait for their coming to attack him in Spain, but to carry the war into the very heart of their dominions. With this this view he had made it his whole buſineſs, during the winter, to ſettle affairs in Spain. He appointed his brother Aſdrubal governor of that country in his abſence; and, in order to put him in a condition to oppoſe any deſcents there, he left him fifty quinqueremes, four quadriremes, and five triremes. As to the land-forces, he did not leave his brother to the mercy of the enemy, but tranſported thirteen thouſand eight hundred and fifty foot, and one thouſand two hundred horſe, of the Spaniſh troops, into Africa, and brought fifteen thouſand Africans into Spain. By this exchange he wiſely provided for the ſecurity of both countries. After theſe prudent regulations, he waited only for the anſwers of the Italic Gauls, to whom he had ſent his emiſſaries, ſoliciting them to ſhake off the Roman yoke. He no ſooner received aſſurances of their earneſt deſire to ſee him in Italy, than he applied himſelf wholly to the preparations for his march. He began by putting himſelf under the protection of Hercules, who was worſhipped at Gades, whither he took a journey to offer ſacrifices and vows to that god. Then he aſſembled his troops, harangued them, and, upon a muſter, found, that they amounted to ninety thouſand foot and twelve thouſand horſe. However, by the deſertion of ſome of his troops, by his diſmiſſing others, and by the ſeveral detachments he made for the ſecurity of the new conquered provinces, his army, when he croſſed the Pyrenees, conſiſted only of fifty thouſand foot and nine thouſand horſe[n]. With theſe troops, having paſſed the Pyrenees without oppoſition, he arrived at Illiberis, a city of Gallia Narbonenſis on the coaſt of the Mediterranean, which he had appointed for the place of the general rendezvous.

Hannibal begins his march for Italy.

In the mean time, the Boii, receiving intelligence that Hannibal was ſet out on his march to Italy, began to act as if he had already croſſed the Alps. They bore an implacable hatred to the Romans, and therefore, impatient to wait till the arrival of the Carthaginians, they openly revolted, and, being joined by the Inſubres, fell upon the two new colonies of Placentia and Cremona. The inhabitants, who were but juſt come, fled for refuge to Mutina, an old Roman colony, whither the rebels purſued them, with a deſign to beſiege the place; but as they were not ſkilled in taking cities, they had recourſe to treachery, drew the three leaders of the colony, who were men of diſtinction, out of the place, under pretence of a conference, and then then ſeized them, with a deſign to exchange them for the hoſtages they had formerly left in the hands of the Romans. This rouzed the prætor Manlius, who had been left, by Cornelius Scipio, with two legions, to keep Ciſalpine Gaul in ſubjection. He immediately led one of them to the relief of Mutina; but as the country, through which he marched, was covered with foreſts, the Gauls, who were acquainted with all the roads, ſurprized him, and cut moſt of his legionaries in pieces, the prætor himſelf eſcaping with great difficulty to an eminence, whence he retired to Tanetum, a city on the banks of the Nicia, where he was immediately inveſted by the enemy. However, upon the approach of the prætor Lucius Attilius, at the head of the other legion and five thouſand auxiliaries, they raiſed the ſieges both of Tanetum and Mutina, and diſperſed [o].

In the mean time, the conſul Cornelius Scipio, having ſailed from Piſa, and kept along the coaſt of Liguria, had landed his troops at that mouth of the Rhone, which is neareſt Maſilia. His deſign was to wait there for Hannibal, and give him battle before he attempted to croſs the Alps. He had indeed received notice of Hannibal's having paſſed the Pyrenees; but could not imagine that he was near, conſidering the vaſt countries, and the many Gauliſh nations, through which he was to paſs. He therefore encamped on an iſland formed by the Rhone, which the antients call Camaria, and the moderns La Camarque, and remained there a few days to refreſh his troops after the fatigues of the ſea. But Hannibal, more expeditious than Scipio imagined, having ſurmounted all difficulties, was actually encamped on the banks of the Rhone, and contriving means to paſs that rapid ſtream. The Gauls on his ſide the river favoured him through fear; but thoſe on the other ſide, jealous of ſo powerful an army, prepared to oppoſe his paſſage with all their might. Scipio knew nothing of this; otherwiſe, by joining the Gauls, who were determined to diſpute his paſſage, he would, in all likelihood, have made the Rhone the boundary of Hannibal's expedition; but, in this great criſis, Hannibal's fortune was equal to his valour. On the other hand, the Carthaginian ſuſpecting that a conſular army was not far off, and being therefore obliged without delay to paſs the river, which was no-where fordable, in ſight of the enemy, he had recourſe to ſtratagem. He detached part of his army, under the command of Hanno the ſon of Bomilcar, with orders to march up along the river, croſs croſs it out of ſight of the enemy's camp, and, by taking a tour, to get behind them and lie in ambuſh. Hanno having executed his commiſſion and given the ſignal agreed on, Hannibal prepared to paſs the river with that part of the army which remained with him. He ordered his cavalry to embarque on the greater veſſels, and his foot on canoes, made only of hollow trees. He directed thoſe who governed the greater veſſels to keep their bow upon the ſtream, thereby to check the current of the river, and cover the others from danger. The horſes were not embarqued but ſwam after the ſmall boats, one man holding three or four by the bridle on each ſide the boat. While they were thus contending againſt the violence of the ſtream, and animating each other, the enemy waited for them on the oppoſite bank, and with their cries and howlings, gave them to underſtand, that they were ready to receive them; but, in the mean time, Hanno's detachment attacking them in the rear, they were ſeized with ſuch a panic, that they immediately betook themſelves to flight, and diſperſed, every one making the beſt of his way to his own village [P].

Hannibal croſſes the Rhone.

In the mean-time, news being brought to Scipio, that the enemy was already encamped on the banks of the Rhone, he did not at firſt believe it, it ſeeming to him incredible, that they ſhould be able to perform ſo long a march in ſo ſhort a time. However, in order to get ſuch intelligence as he might rely on, he commanded out three hundred choſen horſe to reconnoitre. Theſe fell in with a party of five hundred Numidian horſe, ſent out by Hannibal for the ſame purpoſe; whereupon a ſharp action enſued, in which the Numidians loſt two hundred men, and the Romans a hundred and ſixty. The Numidians were put to flight; and this advantage, how inconſiderable ſoever, was looked upon by the Romans, who laid great ſtreſs upon preſages, as a happy omen for the reſt of the war. However, it did not diſcourage Hannibal, who, upon certain information that the conſular army was not far off, was for ſome time in doubt, whether he ſhould attack the Romans, or march ſtreight for Italy; but the deputies from the Ciſalpine Gauls, the chief of whom was one Magalus or Mægilus, determined him, by their advice, to lead his army over the mountains entire, and not run the hazard of weakening it by a diſaſter. They made Hannibal rich preſents, tendered him their ſervice, and took upon them to be his guides over the Alps. The Carthaginian therefore, to avoid Scipio, marched marched up the river, and encamped at the conflux of the Rhodanus and the Araris, or the Rhone and the Saone. Here Hannibal found two brothers diſputing for the dominions of the country, and their armies drawn up ready to engage. At the requeſt of the elder brother Hannibal joined him againſt the younger, whom he drove out of the country. The conqueror immediately expreſſed his gratitude, by furniſhing the Carthaginians with clothes, which they greatly wanted, moſt of them being half-naked and bare-foot, and ſupplying them with what was neceſſary to guard them againſt the ſnow and ice of the Alps. Nor was this all; as the Carthaginians were afraid of being attacked by the Gauls diſperſed about thoſe unknown countries, the king guarded them in perſon, and conducted them ſafe to the foot of the mountains, which they reached after ten days march [q].

And here an hiſtorian is as much at a loſs what rout to take as Hannibal himſelf was, the antients having left us in great darkneſs, as to the exact place where the Carthaginian general paſſed the mountains. Some of the moderns point out one place, and ſome another; but as they may be all, for aught we know, equally miſtaken, we ſhall follow Hannibal, through the immenſe difficulties he met with in this his famous paſſage, without pretending to aſcertain the preciſe place, where he attempted, and happily accompliſhed, ſo bold an undertaking. As ſoon as the king we have mentioned above left the Carthaginian army, Hannibal ordered his troops to begin their march up the mountains; and then the petty kings of the country, aſſembling their troops in great numbers, poſſeſſed themſelves of the eminencies, over which the Carthaginians muſt neceſſarily paſs. And indeed, had they concealed themſelves longer, the Carthaginian army would have been in great danger; but, by appearing openly, they leſſened their advantage, and tho' they killed great numbers of the enemy, they loſt an equal number of their own men. However, they continued haraſſing the Carthaginians, and were no ſooner driven from one eminence than they ſeized another, diſputing every inch of ground with the enemy, and deſtroying great numbers of them by the advantage they had of the ground. Hereupon Hannibal made his army halt, and take up their quarters that night among the rocks. In the mean time, being informed by the Gauls, who ſerved him as guides,

guides, that the barbarians kept guard in thoſe places only in the day-time, and in the night retired to a village not far off, he decamped in broad day, and moving ſlowly, drew near the poſt which the mountaineers poſſeſſed in the evening, as if he deſigned to paſs the night there; but, as ſoon as it was dark, and the enemy were, according to their cuſtom, retired, he put himſelf at the head of a detachment of choſen men, and gained one of the eminences. When day diſcovered to the enemy what had paſſed, they reſolved to attack the Carthaginians from the other eminences, which commanded the narrow, ſtony, and broken way through which they marched. Accordingly leaping from rock to rock with the agility of hinds, they fell upon them from all quarters at once. The Carthaginians loſt in this unforeſeen attack an incredible number of horſes and beaſts of burden; for, the way being narrow and broken, the beaſts of burden were eaſily thrown down: but the horſes that were wounded gave them moſt trouble; for falling in ſo narrow and crouded a way, they threw down others by ſtriving to recover their feet, and by that means occaſioned a general confuſion. Hannibal, obſerving this, immediately left the poſt he had taken, and falling on the enemy from the higher ground, killed moſt of them on the ſpot, and diſperſed the reſt. Having eſcaped this danger, he marched himſelf at the head of a ſtrong detachment againſt the town, which had harboured the enemy, and finding it deſerted, took it without oppoſition. Here he found the priſoners, horſes, and beaſts of burden, which had fallen into the enemy's hands, and beſides, cattle and corn ſufficient to ſupport the army for three days. In this town Hannibal remained a day to reſt and refreſh his troops, and then purſued his march for three days together, without the leaſt moleſtation or alarm; but the fourth day he fell into a greater danger than that he had lately eſcaped. Other mountaineers, who inhabited the towns on the way he was to paſs, met him with olive branches and garlands of flowers, ſymbols of peace and friendſhip, and tendered him their ſervice. Hannibal, thinking it equally dangerous to truſt or diſtruſt them, endeavoured by ſeveral queſtions, to ſound their deſign. They told him, that his having defeated thoſe who oppoſed him, and taken their town, had prompted them to come and implore his protection; and that as to themſelves, they were reſolved to do him no injury, nor ſuffer any to be done him by others. Hannibal at firſt only pretended to truſt them for fear of diſobliging bliging them ; but after they had ſupplied his army with proviſions, and converſed with all manner of freedom and confidence with his ſoldiers, he began to entertain a better opinion of their ſincerity, and even put ſo much confidence in them, as to accept their tenders of ſerving him as guides. However, as he ſtill retained a ſecret doubt of their ſincerity, he placed his elephants and horſe in the van, and his choiceſt foot in the rear. And this precaution preſerved his army from being entirely deſtroyed ; for theſe faithleſs guides, having led the army into a valley, ſurrounded with rocks and ſteep hills, all on a ſudden faced about, and fell upon them in front, while their countrymen, who lay concealed among the rocks, attacked their rear ; but the elephants ſtopped the fury of the one, and the infantry ſtood their ground againſt the other. Nevertheleſs the Carthaginians ſuffered no ſmall loſs both of men and horſes on this occaſion ; for the enemy, rolling down huge ſtones from the upper ground, killed a great number of them. The conſternation was ſo great in Hannibal's army, that he himſelf was obliged to ſtop, and take up his quarters that night on the top of an eminence, expoſed to the open air, with that part of the army which was with him, remote from the baggage and the reſt of the troops, who had much ado to compaſs their paſſage through the valley before day-break. In the morning, the enemy being now retired, Hannibal joined his army and baggage, and continued his march. After this the Gauls appeared only in ſmall bodies, falling ſometimes on the van, and ſometimes on the rear of the army, and ſeldom failing to carry off part of the baggage. At length, after many fatigues and loſſes, Hannibal arrived at the top of the mountains nine days after he had begun to aſcend them. There he encamped, and halted two days, to give his weary troops ſome repoſe, and to wait for the ſtragglers. During this ſtay, he ſaw with pleaſure many horſes arrive, which he thought loſt, and ſome of his men, who had not been able to keep up with the army. As the ſnow was lately fallen in great plenty on the tops of theſe high mountains and covered the ground, this ſight terrified the Africans and Spaniards, who were much affected with the cold. In order therefore to encourage them, and inſpire them with new reſolution againſt the ſufferings that yet threatened them, the Carthaginian general led them to the top of the higheſt rock on the ſide of Italy, and thence gave them a view of the large and fruitful plains of Inſubria, acquainting them, that the Gauls, whoſe country they ſaw, were ready to join them. He alſo pointed out to them the place whereabout Rome ſtood, telling them, that, by climbing the Alps, they had ſcaled the walls of that rich metropolis. Having thus animated his haraſſed troops, after two days reſt he decamped, and began to deſcend the mountains [r].

THE difficulties they met with in going down were equal to thoſe they had found in the aſcent. They had indeed no enemy to contend with, ſaving ſome ſcattered parties, that came rather to ſteal than to fight; but the deep ſnows, mountains of ice, craggy rocks, and frightful precipices, proved more terrible than any enemy. However, the troops, now inured to the greateſt hardſhips, were proof againſt all difficulties, and went through them with chearfulneſs. After they had for ſome days marched through narrow, ſteep, and ſlippery ways, they came at length to a place, which neither men, elephants, nor horſes could paſs. The way, which lay between two precipices, was exceeding narrow, and the declivity, which was very ſteep of itſelf, was become more dangerous by the falling away of the earth. Here the guides ſtopped, and the whole army being terrified, Hannibal propoſed at firſt to march round about, and attempt another way; but all places round him being covered with ſnow to a great depth, he found himſelf reduced to the neceſſity, either of turning back, and climbing up the mountains again, or getting down a place, which was almoſt perpendicular, and where a thin ſurface of freſh ſnow covered a hard and thick ice. However, the infantry began to deſcend; but their feet ſlipping, and there being nothing to catch hold of, they rolled down the precipices, which were on either ſide of this narrow paſſage, and were either cruſhed to pieces, or buried in the ſnow. Hereupon Hannibal, having ordered the ſnow to be removed, which covered all the ground, and the ice to be broken, encamped at the entrance of this paſs, in order to deliberate on the proper method of ſurmounting the preſent difficulty. After he had well conſidered the nature of the place, he concluded, that the only means of getting over it was to cut a way into the rock itſelf, through which his men, horſes, and elephants might paſs, without danger of falling down the precipices. This was a laborious piece of work; but the Numidians ſetting chearfully about it, and frequently relieving relieving one another, with unſpeakable pains made, in one day, a way in the rock for the foot, and in three days more for the horſe, and likewiſe for the elephahts, who had ſuffered much and were almoſt dead with hunger, the ground being in that part of the Alps covered with ſnow; ſo that no forage could be found. Some hiſtorians tell us, that the Numidians uſed vinegar to ſoften the rocks [s]; but the ſilence of the moſt judicious writers, as to this particular, is ſufficient to juſtify our not giving credit to ſo idle a ſtory. All they tell us is, that the Africans made uſe of fire, pick-axes, and other inſtruments of irons, for the accompliſhing of ſo laborious an undertaking. Thus Hannibal, having ſpent nine days in climbing up the Alps, and ſix in deſcending them, gained at length Inſubria, and notwithſtanding his many diſaſters by the way, entered that country with all the boldneſs of a conqueror. the account we have given of this ſo much celebrated paſſage of Hannibal over the Alps, we have chiefly followed Polybius, who advanced nothing but what he learned from thoſe who lived at that time, and who took himſelf a journey to the Alps for his better information [t].

Hannibal enters Inſubria.

HANNIBAL, upon his entering Inſubria, reviewed his army, when he found, that of the fifty thouſand foot, with which he had ſet out from New Carthage five months and fifteen days before, he had now but twelve thouſand Carthaginians, and eight thouſand Spaniards; and that his twelve thouſand horſe were reduced to ſix thouſand. Some writers tell us, that Hannibal entered Italy at the head of forty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe; others make his troops amount to two hundred thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe [u]. But the above-mentioned number was ſpecified by Hannibal himſelf, and engraved, as Polybius informs us, on a column, which he erected near the Lacinian Promontory in Calabria [w]. Hannibal's firſt care, after he had entered Italy, was to refreſh his troops, who, after ſo long a march, and ſo many inexpreſſible hardſhips, looked like ſo many ſkeletons raiſed from the dead, or ſavages born in a deſert. However, he did not ſuffer them to languiſh long in idleneſs; but, joining the Inſubres, who were at war with the Taurinians, laid ſiege to Taurinum, the only city city in the country, and made himself master of it in three days time, putting all who made resistance to the sword. This struck such terror into the neighbouring barbarians, that they all submitted to the conqueror, and supplied his army with all sorts of provisions [x]. Takes Taurinum.

But to return to Scipio, whom we left encamped on the island of Camaria. When that general understood, upon the return of the party he had sent out, that Hannibal was arrived at the banks of the Rhone, he immediately decamped, and marched up the river, with a design to give him battle; but finding that the Carthaginian had crossed the river three days before, and was pursuing his march over the Alps into Italy, he marched back to his fleet with all possible expedition; and, having dispatched his brother Cneius Scipio with the best part of his troops to carry on the war in Spain against Asdrubal, he embarqued the rest, with a design to return to Italy by sea, and meet Hannibal at his descending the Alps. He soon arrived at Pisa, and from thence crossing Hetruria, joined that army, which the consul Manlius had so unfortunately led against the Boii. With this, and the few troops he had with him, he passed the Po, and encamped on the banks of the Ticinus, which discharges itself into that river. Hannibal was greatly surprized, when he understood, that Scipio, whom he had left on the banks of the Rhone, was already returned from Gaul to Italy, had crossed Hetruria, passed the Po, and was ready to receive him. On the other hand, Scipio was no less struck with admiration at Hannibal's expedition in crossing the Alps, through ways which he deemed impassable. This reciprocal respect, which the two generals had for each other, encreased their emulation, and inspired them with an eager desire of entering the lists together. In the mean time, the news of Hannibal's arrival in Italy at the head of a powerful army, of his taking Taurinum, and advancing to meet the consul Scipio, filled Rome with terror. The senate expected every hour the tidings of a battle, and the uncertainty of the success kept all men in suspense: and indeed the two armies were two near each other to defer entering upon action. Scipio encouraged his troops in an harangue well suited to the occasion; but Hannibal employed a new kind of eloquence, which made deep impressions

impreſſions on the minds of his Carthaginians. He had treated the priſoners he had taken on the Alps with the utmoſt rigour; ſo that they earneſtly wiſhed to put an end to their miſeries with death. They were loaded night and day with heavy chains, ſtarved almoſt to death, and daily beaten with rods in a moſt barbarous manner. Hannibal, from the time he took them, deſigned them for the diverſion with which he now entertained his troops; for he cauſed them to be brought out at the head of the army, which he aſſembled for that purpoſe, and aſked them whether they were willing to engage each other in ſingle combats, and fight till one of them was killed in ſight of his troops? He ordered horſes and rich habits and furniture to be produced at the ſame time, as rewards for the conquerors, and comforted the vanquiſhed before-hand with the hopes of death, which would put an end to their inſupportable miſeries. There was not one of them, who did not, with great joy, conſent to the propoſal. Hereupon Hannibal ordered a certain number of them to be choſen by lot, in order to enter the liſts two and two. Thoſe on whom the lot fell leaped for joy, while the others broke out into loud lamentations. While they fought, the reſt of the priſoners looked on the conquered as no leſs fortunate than the conquerors, having by their death put a period to the miſeries they endured. The conſtancy of thoſe who died was more admired, by the Carthaginian ſoldiers, than the valour and ſkill of the ſurvivors. While their imaginations were warm with theſe objects, Hannibal told them, that their fate was like that of the captives, whoſe glorious deaths they had admired, and whoſe rewards they had envied; that Italy was a vaſt priſon to them, having the enemy's country before them, and behind them the Alps; that they could not eſcape the miſeries to which hunger, thirſt, nakedneſs, and heavy chains would reduce them, unleſs they purchaſed liberty, neceſſaries, and life itſelf by their bravery; that, ſince they could entertain no hopes of returning to their native countries by flight, they ought to have the ſame ſentiments, which they had juſt before admired in the captives, ſince they were under the ſame neceſſity of conquering or dying; that, if they conquered, not fine horſes only and rich furniture would be their lot, but all the wealth of the richeſt country and city in the world, &c.

THE diſcourſe of the general was applauded by the whole army, every man declaring that he was determined to conquer or die. With this diſpoſition the army drew near the Ticinus, which Scipio had already paſſed. The next day the two armies came in ſight of each other, when Scipio advanced at the head of the cavalry, with ſome companies of dart-men, to obſerve the enemy's motions and diſpoſition. Hannibal marched out againſt him at the head of the Spaniſh and Numidian cavalry. As the leaders on both ſides and the troops they commanded were eager to engage, they ſoon came to blows; but ſcarce had the Roman dart-men, whom Scipio had placed in the front, made their firſt diſcharge, when they retired into the ſpaces between their troops, through fear of being trod down by the horſe. Hannibal's horſe made but one large front, the Numidians in the two wings, and the Spaniards in the center. The onſet began between the cavalry of the Gauls, in the Roman army, and the Spaniſh horſe, in the Carthaginian. The former, ſupported by the dart-men, who were drawn up in the intervals between the ſquadrons, ſuſtained the ſhock of the Spaniſh horſe with great reſolution; but, in the mean time, the Numidians, taking a compaſs, attacked the Romans in flank, and, after an obſtinate and long diſpute, obliged them to give ground. Hereupon the Gauls, who had hitherto fought with great bravery, retired likewiſe in ſome confuſion. Scipio, at the head of a ſmall body of horſe, endeavoured to animate his men, more by his example than by words, till he fell from his horſe by a wound he received. Then the Romans, believing their general killed, betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight; and Scipio would have been left upon the place, had not his ſon, attended by a few Roman knights, in ſpite of all oppoſition, reſcued him and carried him back to the camp. Some ſay, that a Ligurian ſlave ſaved the conſul; but moſt writers give this honour to young Scipio. Be that as it will, the latter tradition prevailed, perhaps from the inclination of the Romans to magnify the riſing merit of one of the greateſt heroes their republic ever produced [y].

He defeats the Romans on the banks of the Ticinus.

SCIPIO, conſidering that the enemy was ſtronger in horſe, and conſequently that it would be dangerous to give them battle in the champaign country, abandoned his camp, repaſſed the Po, and retired to Placentia. Hannibal, on the

the other hand, ſtaid ſome time in the field of battle, in expectation that the legions would appear; but, when he underſtood, that the conſul was decamped, he purſued him cloſe as far as the bridge, over which he had paſſed the Ticinus; but finding it broke down, he took ſix hundred men, whom the Roman general had left to defend a ſmall fort, and, without loſs of time, marched up the Ticinus, till he came to the banks of the Po, which he croſſed on a bridge of boats. He then divided his army into two bodies, giving the command of one to his brother Mago, with orders to purſue the enemy, while he himſelf remained in the neighbourhood of the Po, to receive the deputies of ſeveral Gauliſh nations, whom his firſt advantage had brought over to him. They engaged to ſupply him with as many men, arms, and proviſions, as he ſhould want. Encouraged by theſe offers, he marched forward, joined his brother, and took the road to Placentia, where the conſul was encamped. Scipio, believing himſelf ſafe there, thought of nothing but curing his own and his ſoldiers wounds. He was therefore greatly ſurprized to ſee Hannibal advance within reach of his entrenchments, draw up his army, and offer him battle. Scipio, inſtead of accepting the challenge, fortified himſelf in his camp; and Hannibal, not thinking himſelf ſtrong enough to force the enemy's lines, encamped ten miles from him [z].

Treachery of the Gauls in the Roman army.

In the mean time, an unexpected event doubled the apprehenſions of the Romans, and encreaſed the confidence of the enemy. About two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, of thoſe Gauls who ſerved in the conſul's army, about the fourth watch, when all was quiet in the Roman camp, entered the tents that were next to them, murdered the Romans while they were aſleep, and, cutting off their heads, made their eſcape to Hannibal, who, by the kind reception he gave them, ſhewed how acceptable that black and treacherous action was to him. He invited them with great promiſes into his ſervice; but gave them leave for the preſent to retire to their reſpective habitations, thereby to ſpread the fame of this action, and win over their countrymen to the ſervice of the Carthaginians. At the ſame time embaſſadors came to him from the Boii, bringing with them the three commiſſioners of the two Roman colonies, whom they had formerly taken by treachery. Hannibal received the deputies with great demonſtrations of kindneſs;

neſs; but left the three illuſtrious captives in their hands, adviſing them to make uſe of them, as they had formerly propoſed, to redeem their hoſtages [a].

In the mean time, Scipio, not doubting but the Gauls, after their countrymen had acted ſo criminal a part, would all declare for the enemy, reſolved to leave his camp at Placentia, where he was ſurrounded on all ſides by Gauliſh nations, and to ſeek ſome ſafer poſt, where his troops would not be ſo much intimidated by ſuſpected neighbours. Accordingly he decamped about the fourth watch of the following night, and paſſing the Trebia, a ſmall river which falls into the Po, poſted himſelf on an eminence near that river, in the neighbourhood of many of the allies of the Roman people. Hannibal, upon intelligence of the conſul's march, detached his Numidian horſe in purſuit of him, while he himſelf followed with the main body of the army. The Numidians, finding the Roman camp empty, ſtaid to ſet fire to it; and this delay gave the Romans time to paſs the plains, where the cavalry might have made a great ſlaughter of them, and gain the eminences on the other ſide of the river. Scipio intrenched himſelf in his new poſt, reſolved not to leave it till his wound was cured, and his collegue Sempronius, whom he impatiently expected from Sicily, was arrived with another conſular army. Hannibal, that he might not loſe ſight of the enemy, came and encamped within five miles of them, on the other ſide of the Trebia. Hither great numbers of Gauls flocked to him from all parts, inſomuch, that proviſions grew ſcarce in his camp; but he ſoon ſupplied this want, by bribing one Daſius, a Brunduſian, governor of Claſtidium, where the Romans had fixed their magazines of arms and proviſions, to deliver up the place to him; by which means he transferred the ſcarcity from his own camp to that of the Romans [b].

Claſtidium deliv[illegible]d up to Hann[illegible]bal.

When news was brought to Rome of the battle of the horſe, and the iſſue of that engagement, the ſenate was greatly ſurprized, as expecting quite different ſucceſs. Some blamed Scipio, others imputed that misfortune to the perfidiouſneſs of the Gauls, who, by their deſertion, had given a plain proof of their treachery and hatred to the Romans; but after all, as the legions were entire, they took courage, not doubting but that fine body of foot would be able to ſtop the progreſs of the conqueror. Their confidence was heightened by the joyful tidings of the arrival of the conſul Sempronius at Ariminum, after a voyage of forty days from Sicily to that place. He immediately ſet out on his march, and in a few days joined his collegue on the banks of the Trebia. After he had refreſhed his troops, and informed himſelf of the circumſtances of the engagement upon the Ticinus, the ſtrength of the enemy, and the character of their leader, impatient to enter upon action, he detached all his cavalry, contrary to the opinion of his collegue, with orders to paſs the Trebia, and attack a party of Numidian and Gauliſh horſe, which Hannibal had ſent out to lay waſte the lands of thoſe Gauls, who yet adhered to the Romans. The trivial advantage he gained on this occaſion made him reſolve to hazard a general engagement. Scipio, whoſe wound, grown worſe by his removing from one camp to another, confined him to his bed, did all that lay in his power to divert his collegue from ſo dangerous a deſign. Among other things he told him, that, as ſoon as his ſtrength would allow him to act, he had an enterprize to put in execution, which, he was confident, would much redound to the ſervice of his country; but this, inſtead of diverting Sempronius from his firſt deſign, made him more eager to engage the enemy, before Scipio could appear in the field and ſhare with him the glory of the victory; nay, becauſe that prudent commander would not by any means approve of his ill-timed eagerneſs for an engagement, he told him, That his mind was more affected than his body, and that his wound gave him an averſion to battles. Thus Sempronius, blinded by ambition, and pleaſed with the hopes of a complete victory, without Scipio's ſharing in the honour of it, reſolved to come to a pitched battle with the Carthaginians. In the mean time, Hannibal, having learned the conſul's deſign by ſome ſpies, whom he ſent into the Roman camp, detached the following night his brother Mago, with two thouſand choſen men, half horſe and half foot, ordering them to conceal themſelves under the banks of a winding rivulet, which watered a neighbouring plain, and wait there, till they ſhould receive orders to quit their ambuſcade. Early next morning the Carthaginian commanded a ſtrong detachment of Numidian horſe to march out, inſult the enemy in their camp, and then retiring ſlowly before the Roman cavalry, who, he did not doubt, would keep cloſe at their heels, to paſs the Trebia, and enter the plain. The Numidians, purſuant to their orders, advanced to the conſul's intrenchments;

trenchments, as if they intended to brave the Romans; which Sempronius not being able to bear, he firſt ſent out his cavalry againſt them, then his dart-men, and laſtly marched out himſelf at the head of all his legionaries. The Romans had not yet taken any nouriſhment, and beſides the day was very cold and ſnowy, and the nearer they drew to the river, the more ſharp the wind blew; however, ſuch was the eagerneſs of the conſul to come up with the enemy, who had juſt paſſed the river on horſeback, that he commanded the Roman infantry to leap into the water, which they did without heſitation, tho' it reached to their waiſts. When they came out of the river, they found themſelves ſo chilled and benumbed with cold, that they could not handle their arms; and beſides, as the day was far advanced before they all got over, they began to be pinched with hunger, for they had not yet taken any food; while, on the other hand, the Carthaginians had refreſhed themſelves with a plentiful repaſt, and anointed their bodies to arm themſelves againſt the cold [b].

The Romans engage Hannibal on the banks of the Trebia.

THE Romans no ſooner appeared in the plain, than Hannibal drew up his army in battalia. He placed eight thouſand Spaniards, moſt of them of the Balearic iſlands, armed with ſlings, in the advanced guard. Theſe were followed by twenty thouſand foot, Gauls, Spaniards, and Africans, all drawn up in one line, to make the larger front. His cavalry, to the number of ten thouſand, moſt of them Gauls, were poſted in the two wings, and, at the two extremities of the main body, were ranged the elephants, to cover the flanks of the army. Sempronius's troops conſiſted of ſixteen thouſand legionaries, twenty thouſand auxiliary forces, a handful of Cænomani, the only Gauls who continued faithful to the Romans, and four thouſand Roman horſe. The conſul drew up his men in the uſual order, keeping the triarii for a body of reſerve, and poſting his cavalry in the wings. The two armies being thus drawn up, Hannibal, to keep his men warm, ordered them to march briſkly againſt the enemy, who were waiting for them, and ſtarving with cold in the plain. However, at their approach, the Romans gave a great ſhout, the trumpets ſounded, and the attack began. The light armed infantry on both ſides made their diſcharges, the Baleares throwing ſtones with their ſlings, and the Romans their little javelins; but this way of fighting did not laſt long, the Romans retiring within the ſpaces in their lines, and the Baleares to the wings of their army. Hereupon the main bodies of the two armies advanced, the cavalry moving with the lines they flanked; but the Roman horſe, being juſt returned from purſuing the Numidians, being already much fatigued, were ſoon put to flight by the Gauliſh cavalry. Hereupon the flanks of the conſular army being expoſed and left naked, the Numidians fell upon them with great fury, and put them in confuſion. Then Hannibal ordered his elephants to advance, which encreaſed the diſorder of the Roman army; but nevertheleſs the legionaries in the ſecond and third lines ſtill kept their ground, and fought with incredible bravery, till the Numidians, under the conduct of Mago, riſing out of their ambuſcade, attacked with great ſhouts their rear. Then the brave legionaries, finding themſelves ſurrounded on all ſides, fought like men in deſpair, and being headed by Sempronius, who was a man of great perſonal courage, cut their way through the battalions of the Gauls and Africans, who oppoſed them, ſtrewed the ground with their dead bodies, and, in ſpite of all oppoſition, retired in good order, to the number of ten thouſand, to Placentia, their return to the camp being obſtructed by the Trebia and the victorious cavalry of the enemy, who, ſcouring the plain, cut all in pieces they met with. The allies in the two wings endeavoured to regain their camp; but ſome of them were drowned in the river, others killed by the enemy, while they were attempting to paſs it, and moſt of them trod down by the horſe and elephants; ſo that the rout was general, and the ſlaughter great. A ſmall body only of foot and a party of horſe, beſides the ten thouſand legionaries, made their eſcape, the enemy not being able, on account of the exceſſive cold, to purſue them beyond the river. Scipio, who continued indiſpoſed in his tent, no ſooner received the ſad tidings of this defeat, than he decamped, and joined his collegue at Placentia [c].

SEMPRONIUS, to prevent a conſternation at Rome, ſent diſpatches thither, acquainting the ſenate, that he had engaged the Carthaginian army; but that the ſeverity of the ſeaſon and the coldneſs of the weather had ſnatched the victory out of his hands. This the Romans were at firſt willing to believe; but when they underſtood, that Hannibal was maſter of the conſul's camp; that all the nations of

of the Gauls declared for him; that the Roman forces were all fled to the neighbouring colonies for refuge; and that the army had no proviſions, but what were conveyed to them by water up the Po, the city was filled with terror, every one taking it for granted, that the conqueror would ſoon appear at their gates. But, notwithſtanding this conſternation, intrigue had a greater ſhare in the election of the new conſuls, than a due regard for the wants of the ſtate. As both the conſuls were abſent, the ſenate had already paſſed a decree for nominating a dictator to preſide in the comitia, when, to their great ſurprize, Sempronius arrived. Raſhneſs had been always his character; and on this occaſion it ſucceeded: for though the roads between Placentia and Rome were much infeſted by Gauls and Africans diſperſed all over the country, yet Sempronius, without either diſguiſe or guard, ventured to croſs thoſe countries, and got ſafe to Rome, where he preſided in the comitia, when the famous C. Flaminius was choſen, a man without either morals or religion, and who had ſix years before ſignalized his conſulſhip, by diſobeying the orders of the republic, commanding him to abdicate, and by an open contempt of the gods and auſpices; but he had joined the tribunes of the people in promoting a law, which confined commerce to the plebeians (K), and therefore was by them raiſed to the conſulate the ſecond time. The collegue appointed him was P. Servilius Geminus, a man of great integrity, but of moderate abilities in war. It fell by lot to Flaminius to oppoſe Hannibal, and to the other to command an army in Ciſalpine Gaul. In the ſame comitia P. Cornelius Scipio, whoſe wound was not yet cured, was appointed to go into Spain in quality of proconſul, whither he had ſent his brother Cn. Scipio to carry on the war againſt Aſdrubal. The elections being over, and the conſulſhip of Sempronius not yet expired, he returned to Placentia, where he had taken up his quarters. As for Hannibal,

(K) Flaminius, entering into all the intrigues of the tribunes of the people againſt the nobility, had been the promoter of a law contrary to the intereſt of the nobility, which from him was called the Flaminian law. It was then cuſtomary for the nobility to fit out ſhips, and trade for their private advantage; but Flaminius confined the liberty of commerce to the plebeians, by getting a law paſſed, forbidding the ſenators to poſſeſs more than one veſſel each, and that only fit to bring proviſions from their own country houſes.

Hannibal, he did not continue idle, notwithſtanding the inconveniencies of the ſeaſon, but made two attempts on two different places belonging to the Romans. The firſt was on a village on the banks of the Po, which the Romans had fortified and made their magazine of corn; but Sempronius, who was very good at theſe ſudden expeditions, hearing from Placentia the ſhouts of the garriſon, haſtened with all his cavalry to their relief, and obliged Hannibal, who was wounded on this occaſion, to retire with great loſs. But the indefatigable Carthaginian, before his wound was well cured, made a new attempt upon Victumviæ, a ſmall city of Inſubria, which the Romans had built and fortified during their war with the Gauls. This place Hannibal took, and gave it up to be plundered by his Africans, who committed ſuch cruelties, as had never before been practiſed in Italy [d].

Victumviæ taken by Hannibal.

In the mean time, the ſenate at Rome provided every thing neceſſary for the next campaign. Forces were diſpatched into Sicily and Sardinia, under the command of their proper prætors; and Tarentum, as well as the other cities on the coaſt, ſecured with ſtrong garriſons, to prevent a deſcent. Sixty quinqueremes were equipped to cruize on the Mediterranean and Adriatic, and great convoys ſent into Ciſalpine Gaul and Hetruria, which were, in all likelihood, to be the ſeats of the war. But now Hannibal, finding the Gauls uneaſy at his reſiding ſo long among them, began to grow jealous of that nation; and his apprehenſions were ſuch, that, fearing they might make ſome attempt upon his life, he invented the uſe of falſe hair of ſeveral colours, which he changed ſeveral times a day, as well as his dreſs, to diſguiſe himſelf; but as this ſubjection did not ſuit his temper, he reſolved to croſs the Appenines, and enter Hetruria, at a time when thoſe mountains were almoſt impaſſable. He was not apprized of the dreadful ſtorms which the wind raiſes on thoſe high rocks, eſpecially towards the end of winter; and therefore unwarily expoſed his troops to great danger, in attempting to croſs them at that ſeaſon. So terrible a hurricane ſurprized him on his march, and the wind blew the ſnow mixed with rain ſo violently in the faces of his men, that not being able to advance a ſtep, they were forced to halt, and let the ſtorm blow over. When the rain ceaſed, the wind became more violent; inſomuch that, after they had in vain attempted attempts vain to croſs the Appenines.

attempted to pitch their tents, they were obliged to return to the plain, after two days fatigue and diſtreſs. Hannibal loſt on this occaſion a great many men, who were ſtarved to death with cold, and ſeven out of the ſmall number of elephants that ſtill remained; however, his natural activity did not allow him to take any reſt. Early the next morning he marched out of his intrenchments, with twelve thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, and offered the conſul Sempronius battle. The Roman general, always ready to engage, accepted the challenge, and, after a moſt obſtinate diſpute, which laſted till three hours after noon, repulſed the enemy quite to their camp. The raſh conſul, intoxicated with this ſucceſs, thought now of nothing leſs than forcing Hannibal's camp; but, after he had fatigued his men to no purpoſe in this raſh enterprize, he was forced to ſound a retreat. As the Romans were retiring, Hannibal, having firſt ſent out detachments to attack them in flank, fell upon their rear himſelf with all his infantry. The Romans faced about, and the battle was renewed with ſuch fury, as threatened a dreadful ſlaughter on both ſides, if night coming on had not put an end to it [c].

As Hannibal had only poſtponed his deſign of entering Hetruria, he now began to enquire of thoſe who were acquainted with the country, which was the beſt road to take; and being informed that there were two, the one longer, but more eaſy, the other ſhorter, but leading through marſhy grounds ſcarce paſſable, he choſe the latter, being on all occaſions prompted by his natural inclination to embarque in ſuch enterprizes, as were apt to raiſe admiration and ſtrike terror into the enemy. Being therefore aſſured, that tho' great part of the country, through which he was to paſs, lay under water, the bottom was ſound, he ordered his army to begin their march. He placed the Spaniards and Africans with their proviſions in the van, next to them the Gauls, and the horſe in the rear. Mago, with a body of N[illegible]ians, kept hovering about the flanks of the army, to prevent the ſoldiers from ſtraggling, and the Gauls, who were impatient of labour, from deſerting. The Spaniards and Africans, who were inured to all ſorts of hardſhips, went into the water without heſitation, and tho' they were half-way up the leg in mud, kept their ranks; but the Gauls, who followed them, marched with great d[illegible]culty, the ground being ſcratched and and broken by the multitudes of men and beaſts of burden who went before them. The whole army ſuffered unſpeakable hardſhips on this march, being obliged to paſs four days and as many nights in the water and mire, without finding a dry place on which they could take any reſt. The horſe of the Gauls were moſt part of them loſt by the way, falling and ſticking in the mire; which, however, proved ſome ſort of relief to the ſoldiers, who made uſe of them as they lay with their burdens above water to get a moment's ſleep, the want of which was their greateſt torment. Great numbers of the Gauls ſunk under the fatigue and died. Nor was Hannibal himſelf without his ſhare of the inconveniencies of the march; for tho' he rode the only elephant he had left, yet as he was before much affected with a defluxion in his eyes, the evil grew to ſuch a height, by the unwholeſome qualities of the damp air, that he loſt one entirely [f].

The conſul Flaminius leaves Rome without being inaugurated

HANNIBAL, having thus, to the great ſurprize of all, paſſed the marſhes, encamped in Hetruria, where he was informed, that Sempronius, immediately after his departure, had left Placentia, marched his army to Lucca, and there ſurrendered the command of it to the new conſul Flaminius. We have obſerved above, that Flaminius obtained the conſulſhip by the favour of the people, contrary to the inclinations of the ſenate. Being therefore apprehenſive, leſt, when the came to be inaugurated, the augurs, influenced by his enemies, ſhould find ſome pretence to render his election invalid, he left Rome, without performing the uſual ceremonies of religion; and, putting himſelf at the head of the army, encamped with four legions under the walls of Aretium in Hetruria. The ſenators, highly provoked at this unprecedented ſtep, ſent deputies to him, ordering him to return to Rome, and perform there the uſual ceremonies of religion; but Flaminius, without paying any regard to their orders, continued in his camp, and diſmiſſed their deputies with ſcorn. As for his collegue Servilius, whoſe province was Ciſalpine Gaul, he was detained at Rome, to aſſiſt at various expiations, the people being much terrified by accounts of prodigies. On the other hand, P. Cornelius Scipio, being now cured of his wound, ſailed for Spain, to join his brother Cneius, who had gained great advantages over Aſdrubal. He had defeated th[illegible]thaginian army in a pi[illegible]ed battle, taken Hanno their their commander, with Indibilis a Spaniſh prince, reduced the whole country bordering on the Iberus, and gained over many princes to his republic. Tho' the news of theſe ſucceſſes raiſed a little the courage of the conſcript fathers, yet they were very anxious about the conduct of Flaminius, who was a man of a fiery temper, bold, and enterpriſing, and had a crafty and experienced enemy to deal with. And indeed Hannibal, having learnt the true character of the conſul, did not doubt but he ſhould ſoon bring him to a battle. With this view he advanced towards Aretium, where the conſul was encamped, and taking the way to Rome, left the Roman camp behind him. Flaminius, looking on this conduct of the enemy as a perſonal affront, reſolved to follow him and venture an engagement. All the officers of the army, in a council of war, endeavoured to divert him from ſo dangerous a reſolution; but he, reproaching them with cowardice, ruſhed out of the council in a rage, and gave the ſignal both for marching and fighting. He mounted his horſe in ſuch a hurry, that he fell from him; which was thought an ill omen. At the ſame time he was told, that the enſigns ſtuck ſo faſt in the ground, that the ſoldiers could not pull them out. This prodigy was no doubt feigned, on purpoſe to keep him in the camp; but the conſul, without paying any regard to ſuch omens, ordered the ſtandard-bearers to make uſe of ſpades and pick-axes, if they could not pull them up with their hands. He then marched out at the head of his troops, whoſe minds he ſo filled with hopes of victory, that the rabble, who followed the army for plunder, carrying with them chains and ſhackles to ſecure the priſoners, were as numerous as the ſoldiers. As for Hannibal, who was before the conſular army, by the terrible ravages he committed in the plains of Cortona, he provoked the conſul ſtill more to follow him, and at length drew him inſenſibly into an ambuſcade. Adjoining to Cortona are ſome pretty high mountains, near a great lake called Thraſimenus, now the lake of Perugia. Between the mountains and the lake is a large valley, into which there is but one narrow paſſage. Through this defile Hannibal marched, and encamped his Spaniſh and African infantry in the valley. His light-armed foot he drew up in one long line, and poſted them at the foot of the hills, on the left-ſide of the valley; and with his horſe he lined the right-ſide of it. Flaminius, without ſending ſcouts before to diſcover the ſituation of the enemy, entered the dangerous paſs. As it was late when he came into the valley, he had only time to pitch his camp before it was dark. As he ſaw nothing but Hannibal's camp before him, he was under no apprehenſion; but as ſoon as the Romans began to march again at break of day, they found themſelves attacked on a ſudden in front, in rear, and in flank, and yet, by reaſon of a thick fog from the lake, could not perceive the enemy by whom they were thus galled. Flaminius heard from his poſt the cries of his ſoldiers in different places, and the groans of dying men in the very center of his army; but as he could not, for the thickneſs of the fog, perceive whence the miſchief came, he ran ſometimes one way, and ſometimes another, in great perplexity, exhorting his ſoldiers, who in their diſtreſs were imploring the aſſiſtance of the gods, not to depend on idle prayers, but on their arms. The confuſion of the Romans was inexpreſſible. Every one endeavoured to ſhift for himſelf; but were ſtopped either by crowds of their fellow ſoldiers, who were flying as well as themſelves, or by the enemy, who ſurrounded them on all ſides. Some conſidering that it was in vain to fly, ſince they were ſhut in by a lake, by mountains, and by narrow paſſes well guarded, reſolved to ſell their lives dear. Accordingly they rallied, as it were by chance; and the officers mixing with the ſoldiers, without obſerving the uſual order in battle, they fell on the enemy with ſuch eagerneſs and fury, that they were not ſenſible of an earthquake, which overturned many cities in Italy. The ſlaughter continued three hours without intermiſſion. At length one Ducarius, an Inſubrian in the Carthaginian army, knowing Flaminius, whom he had formerly ſeen laying waſte his country with fire and ſword, cried out, There is the conſul, who did ſo much miſchief to our fields and cities. I will make him a victim to appeaſe the manes of my countrymen. At theſe words, he ſpurred on his horſe, broke through the Romans who guarded their general, and run his lance through his body. Flaminius fell down dead, and the Gaul was preparing to ſtrip him; but the triarii covered him with their bodies and bucklers. And now the Romans were intimidated to ſuch a degree, that ſome leaped into the lake and were drowned; others attempted to climb over the mountains; and a body of ſix thouſand of them opened themſelves a way through the narrow paſs, ſword in hand, and eſcaped to an eminence, whence they retired to a town in Hetruria, and there intrenched themſelves. Hannibal detached Adherbal after them them with all his cavalry and a great part of his infantry. The fugitives, being inveſted in the village and deſtitute of all manner of proviſions, ſurrendered to Maherbal, who promiſed them their lives and liberties; but Hannibal, pretending that Maherbal had not been impowered by him to make ſuch a promiſe, loaded the Romans with chains; but diſmiſſed their allies, aſſuring them, that he was come into Italy to deliver them from the tyrannical yoke of Rome, and reſtore them that liberty, which their fathers had enjoyed. By this artful proceeding, he hoped to draw over to his ſide the friends and allies of Rome [g].

AFTER this complete victory, the conqueror ordered the dead to be numbered, and found that he had loſt but fifteen hundred men; whereas the Romans had loſt as many thouſands dead upon the ſpot. The number of priſoners taken by Hannibal amounted, according to Plutarch, to ten thouſand; but Livy and Valerius Maximus tell us, that ſix thouſand only were made captives on this occaſion. About ten thouſand Romans, moſt of them wounded, made their eſcape, and took their rout to Rome, whither few of them arrived, the reſt dying of their wounds before they reached the capital. When news was brought to Rome of this great overthrow, the prætor Pomponius, knowing it could not be long concealed, mounted the roſtra about ſun-ſet, and to an exceeding numerous aſſembly, even the women crouding to it, contrary to cuſtom, pronounced the following words, "We are over come;" which ſtruck all with ſuch terror, that ſome who were preſent and had been in the battle, thought the defeat was greater at Rome, than it had been in the field. The dejection of the citizens was inexpreſſible. They haſtened in crouds to the gates of the city, to wait for thoſe who had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, and to learn from them the particulars of the action. Two mothers were ſo tranſported with joy, one at the gate of the city, when ſhe ſaw her ſon unexpectedly appear, the other at home, where ſhe found her ſon which ſhe had given up for loſt, that they both expired on the ſpot. In this general conſternation the ſenators alone preſerved their ſteadineſs. The prætor aſſembled them, and kept them ſitting three days together from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſet, but before they came to any reſolution, reſolution, news was brought of a ſecond defeat. The conſul Servilius, having heard at Ariminum, that his colleague had reſolved to give battle, had detached four thouſand horſe to his aſſiſtance, under the command of the proprætor Centenius; but Hannibal, hearing of this reinforcement immediately after the action, ſent out Adherbal with all his cavalry and a body of infantry, who meeting with the Roman horſe, killed two thouſand of them, and obliged the reſt to take ſanctuary on a neighbouring hill, where they were inveſted, and the next day forced to ſurrender [h].

AND now the ſenate, judging that the republic wanted an abſolute governor, without waiting for a nomination from the ſurviving conſul, of their own authority named a dictator; but, out of regard to the antient cuſtom, they gave him only the title of Pro-dictator. The perſon choſen was Fabius Maximus, ſurnamed Verrucoſus, a man as cool and cautious in his conduct, as Sempronius and Flaminius had been warm and impetuous. The people did not ſuffer him as was cuſtomary for dictators, to name his general of the horſe, but appointed one themſelves, and pitched upon one Minucius Rufus, a great favourite of the people, and a zealous partizan of the plebeian party. The new dictator began the functions of his office, by commanding the decemviri to conſult the Sibylline books, in order to learn from thoſe myſterious oracles the cauſes of the preſent calamities. The decemviri reported, that the misfortunes of the republic were owing to the non-performance of a vow made formerly by Aulus Cornelius to Mars, which was, to ſacrifice to that god all the pigs, lambs, kids, and calves that ſhould be brought forth in one ſpring; that is, from the firſt of March to the firſt of May. This is what the antients called ver ſacrum. This vow being renewed, and ſeveral others made, the dictator took the field at the head of the army Servilius had commanded, to which he added two new legions, appointing the city of Tibur for the place of general rendezvous. From thence he ſent orders to all the country people to burn their houſes, and retire with all their effects into places of ſafety. After this he ſet out on his march to meet Hannibal, not with a deſign to engage him, but only to watch his motions, ſtreighten his quarters, quarters, and cut off his proviſions, which, he knew, was the moſt effectual means of deſtroying him in a country ſo far from his own. Accordingly he followed him through Umbria and Picenum into the territory of Adria, and then through the countries of the Marrucini and Frentani into Apulia. When the enemy marched, he followed them; when they encamped, he did the ſame; but for the moſt part on eminencies and at ſome diſtance from their camp, watching all their motions, cutting off their ſtragglers, and keeping them in a continual alarm. This cautious way of proceeding, which gained him the ſurname of Cunctator, greatly diſtreſſed the enemy, but at the ſame time raiſed murmurs in the army. Minucius, who was a favourite of the people and ambitious of the chief command, made no ſcruple to accuſe the dictator of cowardice under the appearance of prudence; but neither the invectives of Minucius, nor the devaſtations which Hannibal committed in the countries of the allies of Rome, could make Fabius alter his meaſures. He ſtill continued following the Carthaginian army, without hazarding a battle, and was never above one, or at the moſt, two leagues from it. Hannibal, who was well appriſed, that the meaſures Fabius had taken muſt at length utterly ruin the Carthaginian army, did all that lay in his power to bring him to a battle. He ravaged Samnium, plundered the territory of Beneventum, a Roman colony, and laid ſiege to Teleſia, a city at the foot of the Apennines. But finding that neither the rava[illegible] the country, nor even the taking of ſome cities, [illegible]nake Fabius quit his eminences, he reſolved to m[illegible] of a ſtronger bait, which was to enter Campania, [illegible]neſt country in Italy, and lay it waſte under the dicta[illegible]eyes, hoping by that means to bring him to an act[illegible] Accordingly he ordered his guides, who were three [illegible]panian horſemen in his army, to lead him to the territ[illegible]y of Caſinum; but, as he ſpoke Latin very indifferently, he pronounced the word Caſinum in ſuch a manner, that the guides underſtood Caſilinum, and led his troops into narrow paſſes, which divide Samnium from Campania, at a ſmall diſtance from Caſilinum. He had no ſooner entered the ſtreights, than Fabius, who watched all his motions, atta[illegible] from the eminences his rear, put it into diſorder, [illegible]led about eight hundred of his [illegible]. fied; or as Livy has it, vented his rage on one of them only, cauſing him to be firſt beaten with rods, and then crucified, for an example of terror to others [i].

THE ravages he committed in Campania raiſed ſuch complaints in the Roman army againſt the dictator, that, for fear of irritating his men, he pretended to be as impatient of coming to a battle as Minucius, and accordingly marched after Hannibal with more expedition than uſual; but at the ſame time avoided an engagement, under various pretences, with more care than the enemy ſought it. He beheld, from the top of mount Maſſicus, the Carthaginians laying waſte the fruitful plains of Falernum, without ſtirring from his poſt. Hereupon both officers and ſoldiers began to mutiny, and hearken with pleaſure to the invectives of Minucius. We have indeed, ſaid the general of the horſe, a noble leader; for fear of endangering our lives, he hides us in the clouds. When theſe and ſuch like reflections were told Fabius, he only replied, That he ſhould be more cowardly than they ſuppoſed him, if, through fear of idle railleries, he neglected to follow the dictates of his reaſon; and continued the ſame conduct, notwithſtanding he underſtood, that his precaution and delays were blamed even at Rome. Hannibal finding he could not by any means bring the dictator to a battle, reſolved to quit Campania, which he found abounding more with fruit and wine than with corn, and to return into Samnium, through the paſs called Eribanus. Fabius concluded from his march, that this was his deſign, got there before [illegible] and encamped on mount Callicula, which comman[illegible] paſs, after having placed ſeveral bodies in all t[illegible]ues leading to it. Hannibal was for ſome time [illegible]ſs what to do; but at laſt contrived the followin[illegible]agem, which Fabius could not foreſee nor guard [illegible]. Being encamped at the foot of mount Callicula, order Aſdrubal to pick out of the cattle taken in the country two thouſand of the ſtrongeſt and nimbleſt oxen, to tie faggots to their horns, and to have them and the herdſmen ready without the camp. After ſupper, when all was quiet, the cattle were brought in good order to the hill, where Fabius had placed ſome Roman parties in ambuſh to ſtop up the paſs. Upon a ſig[illegible]n, the faggots on the horns of the oxen were ſet on[illegible]d the herdſmen, ſupported by ſome battalions armed armed with ſmall javelins, drove them on quietly. The Romans ſeeing the light of the fires, imagined, that the Carthaginians were marching by torch-light. However, Fabius kept cloſe in his camp, depending on the troops he had placed in ambuſcade; but when the oxen, feeling the fire on their heads, began to run up and down the hills, the Romans in ambuſh, thinking themſelves ſurrounded on all ſides, abandoned their poſts, and, climbing the ways where they ſaw leaſt light, returned to their camp. Then Hannibal, ſeeing the paſs open, entered it, and getting ſafe through with his army and baggage, gained the plain before day-light, and encamped near Allifæ, on the confines of Samnium and Campania. Fabius, tho' rallied by his ſoldiers for having been thus over-reached by the Carthaginian, ſtill purſued the ſame meaſures, marched directly after Hannibal, and encamped on the eminences near Allifæ. From thence he followed him all over Samnium into Apulia, intercepting many of his ſtragglers and convoys; but when he came to Larinum in the county of the Frentani, he received a letter from the ſenate, recalling him to Rome, on pretence of a ſolemn ſacrifice which required his preſence; and then the virtue of this great man was put to a ſevere trial. Not only the blind multitude, but even the conſcript fathers had imbibed falſe prejudices againſt him. As Hannibal had artfully ſpared his lands in the general deVaſtation, they began to ſuſpect him of holding a ſecret correſpondence with the enemy. [redacted] groundleſs ſuſpicion they gave a ſignal proof, b[redacted]g to ſend him a ſum of money for the redemptio[redacted]undred and forty ſeven captives, whom Ha[redacted]aſed, purſuant to an agreement between him[redacted]or concerning the exchange of priſoners; bu[redacted]ude of the ſenate ſerved only to heighten the [redacted]f his virtue; for, as he was a religious obſerver of h[redacted]rd, he ordered his ſon to ſell his lands, and with the money paid the ſum ſtipulated [k].

Fabius recalled to Rome.

THE dictator, upon his leaving the army, commanded his general of the horſe not to hazard a battle during his abſence; but Minucius, without paying any regard to his orders, immediately ſent out ſtrong parties to attack the Carthaginian foragers, and in two bloody ſkirm[redacted]ed [redacted]t many of them in pieces, and [redacted]k from them all t[redacted]ar[redacted]y.

ty. The news of this ſucceſs reaching Rome before the dictator, he found, on his arrival, both the ſenate and people ſtrangely prepoſſeſſed againſt him, and in favour of his general of the horſe. One Metilius a tribune of the people, made an harangue to the multitude in the preſence of Fabius, full of the blackeſt accuſations againſt him; but the dictator, thinking it beneath him to make an apology, addreſſed himſelf to the aſſembly with the following words: Fabius cannot be ſuſpected by his country. And then, with an air of grandeur and intrepidity ſuitable to his rank, Romans, ſaid he, let us make haſte to finiſh the religious ceremonies, which detain me from returning to the army. I have a refractory man to chaſtize, and a breach of military diſcipline to puniſh. I forbad Minucius to give battle; but he has diſobeyed my orders, and I muſt make an example of him. The friends of Minucius, ſtruck dumb with this declaration, began to conſult how they could ſcreen him from the ſeverity of a magiſtrate inveſted with an uncontroulable power. Metilius adviſed the people to give the general of the horſe an equal authority with the dictator. Terentius Varro was the only tribune, whom Metilius could prevail upon to ſecond his motion. He was the ſon of a butcher, and had followed his father's profeſſion in his youth; but growing rich, he had forſaken that mean calling, and, by the favour of the people, obtained firſt the prætorſhip, and afterwards the tribuneſhip. Now he aſpired to the conſulate, and therefore, ſeeing the people greatly inclir[illegible]our Minucius, he did not ſcruple to promote his [illegible] the expence of his honour. He ſeconded Meti[illegible]oth together got the law paſſed, eſtabliſhing, [illegible] of innovation, an equality between the di[illegible]eneral of the horſe. The ſenate, out of [illegible]ntable prejudice againſt Fabius, were mean-ſpirit[illegible]ugh to confirm this ſtrange law. Fabius, having aſſiſted at the ſacrifice to which he had been called, and preſided at the election of a new conſul, Attilius Regulus, in the room of Flaminius, had left Rome before the decree was confirmed by the ſenate, but was overtaken on the road by a meſſenger, enjoining him in the name of the Roman people and ſenate, to give his general of the horſe an equal ſhare of the command. When he arrived at the camp, Minucius, in the firſt conference he had with him, propoſed, t[illegible]ach ſhould take his turn in the command of the whol[illegible] for a day, or a week; but Fabius choſe to divide the [illegible], and command his ſhare ſeparately,

ſeparately, hoping by that means to ſave at leaſt a part of the Roman forces. The army being divided, the two generals did not remove far from each other, but encamped at a due diſtance, Fabius on the hill, and Minucius a little below him, almoſt in the plain. Hannibal poſted himſelf over-againſt the latter, and by his artful management, ſoon brought him to an engagement, in which, by the maſterly ſkill of the Carthaginian in laying ambuſhes, he was ſurrounded on all ſides, and would have been cut off with all his troops, had not Fabius, ſacrificing his private reſentment to the welfare of his country, haſtened to his relief. That brave Roman, moved with compaſſion at the ſight of the terrible ſlaughter that was made of his countrymen, ruſhed down like a torrent from his hills, fell upon the enemy where Minucius was moſt preſſed, cut all in pieces who oppoſed him, and put the reſt into the utmoſt confuſion. Then Minucius's troops rallying, the two armies united, and advanced in good order to renew the fight; but Hannibal, not caring to venture a ſecond action, ſounded the retreat and retired to his camp. He was heard to ſay, as he marched back, I have always foreſeen, that the cloud, which appeared ſo conſtantly on the mountains, would, ſome time or other break out into a ſtorm, and diſcharge itſelf upon our heads. After the action, Minucius and Fabius returned to their reſpective camps. The latter did not drop a word which ſavoured of oſtentation or of contempt for his collegue; and Minucius did juſtice both to himſelf and to Fabius. Having aſſembled [illegible]oops, he told them, He had learned by experience [illegible]e was not born to command, but that obedience ough[illegible]his province; and that he was therefore reſolved to re[illegible]tion, which he had ſo preſumptuouſly left. [illegible] dear fellow-ſoldiers, ſaid he, let us go and offer [illegible]s to the dictator, and put ourſelves again wholly [illegible] conduct. Let him command alone, ſince he alone [illegible] be the ſoul of ſo great a body. I will call him father; and you ought to give his ſoldiers, who delivered you, the title of patrons. It will be a greater glory for us to have conquered ourſelves, than to have conquered Hannibal. Having thus ſpoke, he immediately marched his legions to the dictator's camp, preſented himſelf before him, made his ack[illegible]now-ledgements, and reſigned the authority with whic[illegible] been entruſted. He declare[illegible] that he ſhould th[illegible] ſelf happy, if the dic[illegible]tor [illegible] only continue h[illegible] office of general of t[illegible]horſe, [illegible] begged, that none [illegible] his officers officers might be degraded, ſince his raſhneſs alone had brought diſhonour upon them. Fabius tenderly embraced him, granted him what he aſked; and the day, which began with ſo much terror, ended with an univerſal joy in the camp. The ſix months of the dictatorſhip being ſoon after expired, Fabius returned to Rome, after having reſigned the command of the army to the conſuls Servilius and Attilius, who obſerving the ſame conduct with Fabius, watched from the eminences the enemy's motions, without giving Hannibal, for the remainder of their year, an opportunity of attacking them [1].

The ſtate of affairs in Spain.

DURING theſe tranſactions in Italy, Cneius Scipio made a ſurpriſing progreſs in Spain. All the nations between the Iberus and the Pyrenees ſubmitted to him, and put him in poſſeſſion of a hundred cities. The Celtiberians entered into an alliance with him, and engaging Aſdrubal, defeated him in two pitched battles, killed five thouſand of his men, and took four thouſand priſoners. This was the ſtate of the Roman affairs in Spain, when P. Scipio, the brother of Cneius, arrived there with the character of proconſul, carrying with him eight thouſand Roman troops. With this additional ſtrength the two brothers paſſed the Iberus, and, penetrating into the heart of the Carthaginian provinces, marched towards Saguntum, which Hannibal had rebuilt before he left Spain, and ſecured with a ſtrong garriſon, under the command of Boſtar a Carthaginian, having placed in it all the young noblemen, whom he had obliged their parents to put into his hands, as pledges of their fidelity. [illegible]eſe hoſtages prevented the Spaniſh lords from revo[illegible]e Romans, the two Scipios marched to Saguntu[illegible]er to ſet them free. Their deſign was executed [illegible]belox, a Spaniſh officer in the garriſon, who, l[illegible] inclination to go over to the Romans, perſuad[illegible]r, that it would be much for the Carthaginian i[illegible] to oblige the Spaniſh noblemen by a voluntary releaſe of their children, urging, that, if the Romans ſhould take the place, and reſtore them to their parents, innumerable nations would immediately declare for them. He offered to conduct the hoſtages himſelf to their reſpective countries; but the inconſiderate Carthaginian [illegible] ſooner given his conſent to this motion, than Abe[illegible]ling away by night to the Roman camp, acquaint[illegible]

ed the proconſul with what he had done; and it was agreed between them, that the following night a detachment of Romans ſhould lie in ambuſh, and ſurprize both the youths and their leader. The project was happily executed; and Scipio, by ſending back the hoſtages to their parents, ſecured ſuch an intereſt in the country, that he was ſtronger there than the Carthaginians [m].

AND now the time for a new election drawing near, one of the conſuls named a dictator to preſide in the comitia, it not being ſafe for either of them to leave the army. The perſon named was L. Veturius Philo; but, the augurs finding ſome defect in his nomination, he was forced to abdicate, and give place to an inter-regnum; when Terentius Varro, of whom we have ſpoken above, was choſen to the conſulate, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the whole body of the nobility. The collegue given him was Æmilius Paulus, as bitter an enemy to the plebeians, as Varro was to the patricians. Servilius and Attilius were continued, in quality of proconſuls, at the head of the armies; but with orders to act under the direction of the new conſuls. That Terentius, who was a great favourite of the people, might have the glory of conquering Hannibal, eight new legions were raiſed, conſiſting each of five thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe; and the allies were ordered to furniſh the republic with double their contingents both of horſe and foot. The winter being ſpent in theſe preparations, the conſuls took the field early in the ſpring, and arriving at the camp, found affairs in a good condition there, Servilius and Attilius having avoided a general action, and in ſome ſkirmiſhes gained conſiderable advantages. Hannibal, after the arrival of the new conſuls, whoſe army conſiſted in all of eighty-ſeven thouſand men, being reduced to great ſtreights for want of proviſions, reſolved to leave Samnium, and penetrate into the heart of Apulia. Accordingly he decamped in the night, and, by leaving fires burning and tents ſtanding in his camp, made the Romans believe for ſome time, that his retreat was only feigned. When the truth was diſcovered, Æmilius was againſt purſuing him; but Terentius, contrary to the opinion of all the officers in the army, except the proconſul Servilius, was obſtinately bent on following the enemy, whom he overtook at Cannæ, till till this time an obſcure city in Apulia (L). It ſtood on the banks of the Aufidus, in a vaſt plain five miles from Canuſium, and ſix from the Adriatic ſea. Here Hannibal halted, not only becauſe he found a magazine of corn on the place, but becauſe he thought the open country about it very proper for a battle, there being room enough for his cavalry, the main ſtrengh and hopes of his army, to extend themſelves. The conſuls being divided in opinion about fighting, courier after courier was ſent to Rome, and even Æmilius went thither himſelf to receive the orders of the ſenate, who judged it neceſſary to fight the enemy; but adviſed Terentius not to do it yet. In the mean time Hannibal took his poſt on the banks of the river, and diſpoſed all things as if he were juſt coming to a battle. His troops had the ſun behind them at noon; ſo that the Romans muſt be expoſed not only to the inconvenience of too great a light, but to that of great clouds of duſt, which the ſouth-weſt wind, that blows almoſt every day in Apulia, would carry in their faces. As for the conſuls, they were no ſooner within reach of Cannæ, than a diſpute aroſe between them. Æmilius was for encamping on the eminences, where the enemy's cavalry, which was far ſuperior to theirs, could not act; and accordingly, when it was his turn to command, he pitched his camp among the hills; but Terentius the next day advanced into the plain, and brought the army into ſuch a ſituation, that Æmilius the following day could not retire, without expoſing the army to great danger.

(L) Cannæ, according to Livy, Appian, and Florus, was only a poor village, which afterwards became famous, on account of the battle fought near it; but Polybius, who lived near the time of the ſecond Punic war, ſtyles Cannæ a city; but adds, that it had been razed a year before the defeat of the Roman army. The account of Silius agrees with that of Polybius.

ſays that poet. It was afterwards rebuilt; for Pliny ranks it among the cities of Apulia (27). The ruins of Cannæ are ſtill to be ſeen in the territory of Bari, formerly called Apulia Peucetia.
